The rest, whose Estates were not vnder the Kings command, would not tye themselves by promise, but with the alliance of the houses of France and Bourgongne. This was most expedient for the King, but the violent conditions they propounded, withdrew his loue much both from her and them in particular, supposing he should soone haue all, without accepting of a part by an accord. Moreouer, hee was possessed with a wonderfull desire to conquer Arras. The Lord of Cordes might do much, he was Lieutenant in Picardie vnder the deceased Duke, Seneschall of Ponthieu, Capitaine of Courtray, Boulongne and Hedin, Gouverneur of Peronne, Montdidier and Roye: hee was younger brother to the Lord of Creuœur, and already did shew himselfe to be French, his estate lying within the territorie of Beauuais. The townes vpon the riuer of Somme, by the death of Charles (the last issue male of the house of Bourgongne) returned to the King, and so de Cordes became the kings Leage-man. His dutie then bound him to yeeld vnto the King such other places as he commanded, but he was bound by oth to his Mistresse seruice. A dispensation will salue it. There is no hole but Lewis finds a pin for it. Vpon his motion to the Ambassadors, that the deliuerie of Arras would make the way plaine for a good peace, and request, that they would bee a meanes to open the cittie of Arras vnto him, (for in those daies, there were both walles and ditches betwixt the Cittie and the Towne) Hugonnet and Himbercourt dispence with de Cordes of his oth, and consent to the deliuerie of the said Cittie.

The King for his reward gaue him a chaine of twentie links, and euery linke worth twentie Crownes in gold, and a good pension for his maintenance. The taking of Hedin, brought the King to Therouenne and Montreuil, the which easily yeelded to his obedience. Boulongne beeing summoned refuseth, but beeing battered, it yeelds the fifth or the sixth day. The town belonged to Bertrand de la Tour, Earle of Auvergne: the King finding it commodious for the State of his Realme, compounded, giuing him a sufficient recompence, and as new Lord of the town he did homage, without sword or spurres, bare headed and on his knee, before the virgin Mary, offering (as a dutie to the said image) a heart of masse gold, weighing two thousand Crownes: vpon condition, that he and his successours Kings after him, should hold the Countie of Boulle of the said Virgin, and do homage vnto her image, in the Church dedicated to her name, paying at euery change of a vassall, a heart of pure gold of the same weight.

While the King remaines at Boulle, those of Arras seeing themselves enuironed on all sides, write to their friends of Lille and Douay, to succor them with some numbers of men, and moreouer they send to the Duchesse of Bourgongne, to furnish them with some succours, meaning to put themselves into her hands. The Deputies beeing two or three and twentie in number, make shew to go to the King, to treat with him, and vnder this colour they obtaine a passe-port of the bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France. But beeing discouered vpon the way to Flanders, they were taken, brought to Hedin, deliuered to the Provoost Marshall, condemned, and eightene of them beheaded, the rest were saued by the Kings arruall. Amongst them that were executed, there was one Oudard of Bussie, borne at Paris, and married at Arras. The King had in former time offered him the place of a Councillor of the Court of Parliament at Paris then voide, and since he gaue him the office of Master of the accounts at Arras. He caused his head to be vnburi, and set vpon a pole in the market place, with a red hood furred with meniuer, like to the Councillors of the Parliament. A worthy punishment for so malicious an ingratitude.

The Deputies of Arras taken and many of them executed

There were some few horsemen at Douay, of the remainders of Nancy: they arme three hundred good and bad, and some few foote, and march at noone day in the sight of Arras. D The Lords of Lude and Fou, with the companie of the Marshall of Loheac, aduertised of their approach, go to meete with them, they fight with them, kill and take in a manner all of them. The king at his arriuall, caused foure-score of these prisoners to be executed, to terrifie those few men of warre that remained in the Countie. Some of them enter the town, but they were not able to stand out against so great forces. So as after a hard batterie they yeeld by composition: That they should remaine vnder the Kings obedience, as their Soueraigne, for want of heires male, rights and duties beeing not performed. That the Subsidies and Tributes should be leauied by the Kings officers, and deliuered by them to Mary the heire of Bourgongne, until she had done homage and taken her oath of fealtie to the King her Souerigne Lord. During which time the Inhabitants should receiue no garrison from the King. This was the fourth day of May.

Arras yeelded

E These things thus concluded, the King sent the Cardinall of Bourbon, the Chancellor of Orle, de Cordes Gouverneur of the Towne, and Guio Pot, Bayliffe of Vermandois, to take the oath of fealtie of the inhabitants. But after this oath, holily and religiously receiued by the deputies, who took their repast in the Monasterie of S. Vast, behold an insolent troupe of desperate people comes crying, Kill, kill: yet they were but terrified, and saued themselves presently in the cittie. This terror, together with the greedinesse of the Commanders, was the cause the composition was but ill obserued: for in the presence of Lude and Cerisy, many good cittizens and other rich men were spoyled and slaine, and the Cittie let at three-score thousand Crownes fine to the King, the which they pay was afterwards restored. And F to keepe these mutines in awe, the King transported most of the Inhabitants of Arras, and planted it with a new Colony of French, commanding it should be called Ville Francoise. At the same time the King aduertised, that the Flemings were in troupe, and lodged at Blanc-fosse, he sent to charge them, but they dislodge at the bruite thereof, yet not so speedily, but they leaue about two thousand men slaine at the first charge, and the like number in the chase, beeing pursued eight Leagues within the Countie of Flanders. seuerer punishment of the Liegeois had kept in awe,) now breake forth: They make a ward of their Duchesse, force her to restore their auncient priuiledges, which Philip and Charles had taken from them, and suddenly they resolute a deadly reuenge, vpon such by whome they say they had bene controuled. They lay hold vpon those whom they called their twen-tie and sixe Lawyers, whom Charles had established in the gouernment of the cittie, and puts them all, or the most part to death. They haue (say they) cut off ones head without any au-thoritie, for their power ended with the death of Charles. And moreover, they slew many good men within the cittie, that were wife and faithfull friends to Charles in his life. But they proceed yet farther.

Influence of the Gantois.

Their barbarous ciuilitie.

The happie course of Lewis his conquests doth much amaze them, whereupon they assemble some forme of a Parliament, by aduice whereof they make a motion of peace to the King, by an Ambassage, giuing him to vnderstand, that the Infanta of Bourgongne is determined to gouerne herselfe hereafter by the aduice and counsell of the three Estates of her Countries: they request the King to desist from making warre, and to appoint a day when they may quietly pacifie all controuersies. There was nothing at that time able to withstand the violence of the Kings armie. The Low-countries were left naked of souldiers, those which suruiued, being inconstant, had forsaken the Infantes seruice: He was well acquainted with the inconstancie of this people, not able to digest any man of iudgement that had bene in any authoritie with their deceased Prince. He knew, that their inclination was to loue the declining of their Lord, so as it were not with the preiudice of their countrie. And therefore he fore-casts, if he might, to sow some seeds of diuision amongst them, whereby he should greatly incoimber them. He stayes the Ambassadors vpon their speech, That their Princesse would not conclude any thing without the counsell of the three Estates of the Countrie: whereunto he replies, that they spake without warrant, and that he is duly informed, her meaning is to gouerne her affaires by priuate persons, who desired no peace. And vpon their protesting to the contrarie, affirming that they were grounded vpon good instructions, the King opens Maries letters, brought by Hugonnet, Himbercourt, and other Ambassadors, at their first Ambassage, and they returne with no other dispatch then this letter.

Behold here a companie vnexperienced in affaires, returne light with care, but fraught with reuenge and diuision: they make their report vnto their Ladie, assisted with the Duke of Cleues, the bishop of Leege, and many other great personages. They strike on that string which they meant to play vpon: that the King had prooued them liars, in that they maintained constantly, that she referred the gouernment of her affaires to the resolution of the States. And for prooffe, as they maintained the contrarie, not imagining her letter to haue bene produced, behold the Pensionarie of Gand, a brutish man and without respect, draws the said letter out of his bosome, and confounds this bashfull Princesse before the whole assembly. The Dowager, Rauestein, Hugonnet and Himbercourt were likewise present. The Duke of Cleues treated the marriage of his eldest sonne with the Infanta: hee sees himselfe now frustrate by the aboue-named, so as he presently becomes a mortall enemy to Himbercourt, from whom he expected fauour in this sute. The bishop of Leege complained of many disorders committed by him at Leege, whereof he had the gouernment. The Earle of Saint Paul, sonne to him that was beheaded, loued neither Hugonnet nor Himbercourt, for they had deliuered his father to the Kings seruants. The Gantois, according to their humors, hated them deadly, for that they were men of merit, and had bene good and loyall to their master.

To be short, the night after the letter was deliuered, Hugonnet and Himbercourt were tu-multuously seized on, and deliuered to suborned men of their Lawe: and for that they had caused the Cittie of Arras to be yeelded by the Lord of Cordes, as they said, or rather vpon certaine corruptions in iustice, and bribes which (they said) had bene received by them of the cittie of Gand, in a sute against a priuate man, and vpon many extorsions in their charges, and other things contrarie to the priuiledges of Gand, against the which (say they) whosoever offends must die: these two reuerend and graue personages, were with a shadow of Law condemned by the Sheriffe of Gand, and notwithstanding their appeale before the king

Hugonnet and Himbercourt condemned & beheaded.

A the King in his Court of Parliament at Paris, supposing that this respite and delay, might giue their friends meanes to procure their deliuerie, they were vnworthily put to death. Oh vniust, barbarous, and inhumane people! That the humble and earnest supplication of thy Princesse, being in the Towne-house, nor her weeping and desolate presence before that mournfull scaffold, were not of force to preferue and keepe the liues of these two her faith-full seruants.

This execution ended, they sequestred from this poore Princesse, the Dowager and Rauestein, who had signed the Letter, they disposing absolutely of her. Poore, without doubt, hauing not onely lost so many good and great Townes, but also sees her selfe now in the ty-rannicall possession of the auncient persecutors of her house. A great corrosiue, to be commanded by such as should obey. Afterward they banished whom they pleased, placed and displaced officers after their owne appetites, chase away indifferently all such as had best de-serued of this house of Bourgongne. And to continue their popular furie, they deliuered out of prison Adolfe Duke of Gueldres, whom Charles had long detained, and making him their head, they made a leaue in Gand, Bruges, and Ypre, of about twelue thousand men, the which they sent to Tournay, and burnt the suburbs, and then they retire. But the garrison issuing forth, put wings to their feete: so as Adolfe a valiant Prince of his person, turning head to fauour them that fled, and to make the retreat, was ouerthrowne and slaine, with a great number of his people with him. The Infanta was nothing grieved; for if this stratagem C had succeeded for the first fruites of his armes, some hold they would haue forced her to marrie this Adolfe.

Adolfe Duke of Gueldres
slaine.

But we haue wandred long enough in Arthois and Flanders, let vs retire a little into Bourgongne, and consider how this Duchie became French. Iohn of Chaalon, Prince of Orange, was in great credit there. He possessed much land, both in the Duchie and Countie, he was a man of action, and much esteemed in the Countrie, and pretended some inheritances against the Lords of Chaumergnon his Vncles. Charles of Bourgongne had giuen sentence in fauour of his aduersaries, and (as he said) to his great preiudice, so as hee had twice left his seruice. Now the question is to winne him againe. The King promiseth to inuest him in all those places which he pretends to belong vnto him, by the succession of his D grand-father, and to giue him good preferments in France. So he makes him in shew the head of that armie which the Lord of Craon commanded, being Lieutenant generall for the King in Bourgongne, whome the King trusted more then the Prince, being rash and light in the change of parties. Craon hauing commaundement to enter into Bourgongne, sends the Prince of Orange before, to practise the Towne of Dijon. He wrought so politically, that Dijon and many other places, both of the Duchie and Countie, did willingly submit themselves to the French command. Auxonne and some other places of strength continued still vnder the obedience of Mary of Bourgongne. Craon seeing himselfe in possession of these places, desired rather to hold them vnder the Kings authoritie, then to deli-uer them to the Prince of Orange, notwithstanding the Kings promise and instance, who E desired to gratifie this Prince, and yet would not discontent Craon, who commaunded the forces. The Prince hauing to do with a man that would yeeld nothing without good consideration, and seeing himselfe frustrate of his pretensions, he ioynes with Chastelaugnon his brother, and Claude of Vaudry, a braue Gentleman, raiseth some troupes, with the which he draweth from the King the most part of the aboue-named places, with as great facilitie, as if he had conquered them for him, and then follows the Infantes partie, whose age and weaknesse, required a great support by some worthie alliance.

The rout of
Orange.

There was some speech of Charles the Dauphin, but he was but nine yeares old. The duke of Cleues laboured for his eldest sonne, the Emperour for his sonne Maximilian, King of Romanes. Mary desired much the alliance of France, but the King had done her a great dis-F grace, deliuering her letters to the Gantois, the which she had secretly written: which caused the death of those two good men, and the banishment of her most affectionate seruants.
Moreover, her Estate required a man to gouerne it. She would willingly haue married with the Earle of Angoulême, if the King had bene so pleased.

The humours of the heire of Cleues pleased her not, nor such as were about her. The Emperour kept (as a pawne) a Diamond with a letter which the Infanta had written vnto him,

A range of

him, by her fathers command; whereby she promiseth to accomplish the marriage, in forme, according to her fathers pleasure. He sends it to the Duchesse, to aucter her hand and promise, demanding if she would persist therein. Shee doth auouch the contents, and agrees to make it good. So Maximilian comes to Gand, and there the marriage was consummated. A marriage which should prooue a fire-brand, to kindle (by their descendants, both within this Realme, and in many other estates) the combustuous tumults and furies which haue followed; the which happily had bene auoided by a French alliance. But God had otherwise decreed. This marriage was consummated during the Orangeois reuolt in Bourgongne, the which continued somewhat long, by the support the Germanes gaue him in fauour of Sigismund of Austria Vncle to Maximilian, who (hauing his territories adioyning, and especially the Countie of Ferrette, the which he had retired by the Suisses meanes) would gladly haue gotten somewhat of his neighbours. But the indiscretion of Sigismund, and the want of money to pay the Bourguignons, were a meanes that the King did more easily preuent the Prince of Orange his practises, who now called himselfe Lieutenant to the said Germanes. They supplied him with some troupes, with the which hee recovered almost all the Countie, continuing his course, vntill that Craon came to beseege him in Grey, a small towne of the said Countie.

before Dole.

Chasteauguion seeing his brother cooped vp, and the place readie to yeeld to Craons discretion, posts thither with all the forces he can, and comes to charge Craons armie in front, whilst that the beseeged should set vpon him behind. So charged both before and behinde, he found the match hard: yet by the defeat of fourteene or fiftene hundred men, for the most part enemies, and the taking of Chasteauguion, he wonne the victorie. Craon leades his armie after this victorie before Dole, the chiefe towne of the Countie: but for that hee did presse it but slackely, and neglected his enemy, whose forces he knew to be but small, he had ill successe: For in a fierce sally they slew many of his men, and carried away a great part of his artillerie. This affront brought him in disgrace with the King, who fearing a more dangerous checke, hearing likewise complaints from all parts, of his great exactions and money vnjustly taken, puts him from the gouernement of Bourgongne, preferring in his place Charles of Amboise, Lord of Chaumont, a valiant, wise, and vigilant Captaine. Loue preuailes more then force. He perswades the King to pacifie the Suisses and other Germanes, who followed the Prince of Orange, in fauour of the house of Austria: and to make the way more easie for the King, he himselfe doth practise the Commanders.

Then beganne the Suisses first league with the King; the which he effected by meanes of twentie thousand franckes hee gaue yearly among the Cantons, and the like summe to bee distributed among some Captaines which he employed. And to please them, he made him selfe a Bourgesse amongst them, and obtained the title of the first allied to their Commonweale. A title which the Duke of Sauoy pretended to bee due vnto him aboue all others. They likewise for their parts, promised to furnish fixe thousand men to serue the King continually, for foure Germaine Florins and a halfe a moneth, a number which continued alwaies vnto the death of Lewis. The Suisses are now vnder the Kings pay, and so the Bourguignons partie much weakened, who assemble the Nobility of the cuntry together, vnder the Prince of Orange, and defeat the companies of Salazard and Coninghen neere vnto Grey. But Amboise (beeing fortified with men and artillerie) takes Verdun, Montsaun, Semeur in Lauois, Chastillon vpon Seine, Bar vpon Seine, Beaulne, and Rochfort neere vnto Dole, belonging vnto Vaudray. Thus hauing freed all the approaches to Dole, hee camps before it, batters it, makes a breach, gives an assault, and takes it. Some troupes of the townes last subdued thrust themselues into it, either to warrant it from spile, or to haue a better share, but there enters such a multitude of frack-archers, as it was impossible to saue it from sacke and fire. Yet the King repaired the ruines about the walles, building a great part of the wall towards the riuer of Doux, with a great trench; whereby a great part of the said riuer did run forth, inuironing of that part of the wall: but this is nothing, in regard of the fortifications which haue bene since built, whereby it exceedes most of the cities of Christendome, beeing famous at this day, in Senate, Vniuersitie and Armes.

Auxonne deferred a long and sharpe sege: but the wisdom of Amboise preuailed so well after the sege of Dole, that (giuing the chiefe offices of the towne, to such as demanded them)

A them) it was yeelded within fixe or fixe daies, and likewise the Castles of Iou, Saint Agnes vpon Salins, Champagne, Arguel, and some others built vpon rockes. Besanson, an Imperial towne, yeelded to the King (by his Lieutenant generall) the like duties as they were accustomed to do the Earle of Bourgongne. Thus Bourgongne beeing conquered, remained sometime in the Kings quiet possession. A young horse hath need of a gentle hand, to make him taste the bit with delight. But Verdun and Beaulne not able to endure the command of the French, began first to lickie, yet by the Gouernours discretion, they were speedily subdued and recovered from Simon of Quingey, who led a troupe of fixe hundred men of foot and horse, Germanes and others, tumultuously assembled in Ferette and thereabouts, to put into the aboue-named places. Verdun was taken by assault, and subiect to the accustomed infolencies in the like prizes. Beaune yeelded by composition, in the beginning of Iuly, with liues and goods saued, and for a fine they payed fortie thousand crownes. These sodain exploits did so terrifie the other townes, as all kept themselues within their due obedience.

But how doth Edward King of England looke vpon this Theater, where our men play the pettie Kings? And how doth he suffer the King without any opposition, to enlarge his estate by the taking of Arras, Boulongne, Hedin, and so many other Townes, and to bee lodged many daies before S. Omer? In truth our Lewis had a quicke conceit, and very watchfull. Hee knew well that the English in generall, were wonderfully inclined to warre against this Realme, as well vnder colour of their auncient pretensions, as for the hope of gaine, inticed by many high deedes of armes, wherein they haue often had the aduantage, and of that long possession both in Normandie and Guienne, where they had commanded three hundred and fiftie yeares, vntill that Charles the seuenth dispossessed them. That this baite might well perswade them to crosse his desseignes, these two mightie Princes neighbours, cannot see (without ielousie) the one to grow great by new conquests, and the other to be at quiet. He therefore entertaines Edward with sundry Ambassages, presents, and goodly speeches: causeth the pension of fiftie thousand crownes, to be duly payed at London, and some fixeene thousand distributed among such as were in credit about him: so as the profite they drew from the iudicious bountie of Lewis, tyed their tongues, and blinded their eyes. Money was mucke to him in regard of a man of seruice, and he was pleased to vaunt, that the great Chamberlaine (whereof there is but one in England) the Chancellor, Admirall, Master of the horse, and other great Officers of England, were his Pensioners. So he gaue vnto Howard foure and twentie thousand crownes in money and plate, besides his pension, in lesse then two yeares: and to Hastings great Chamberlaine, a thousand markes of siluer in plate at one time, as appeares by their quittances, in the chamber of accompts at Paris.

Lewis had great need to vse this policie and bountie, for this young Princeesse did infinitely presse Edward, who for her cause did often send to the King to demand a peace, or at the least a truce; and in the Court of England, there wanted not some to incense Edward, that seeing the tearme was expired, by the which Lewis should send for the Infanta of England, E (whom they called Madame the Dauphine) he would deceiue him. Yet no respect, neither private nor publicke, could moue Edward: he was pursie, louing his pleasures, vnable to suffer paine, glorious of nine famous victories, and fraught with home-bred enemies: and aboue all, the loue of fiftie thousand crownes (so well payed in his Tower of London) kept him at home. Moreouer, the Ambassadors that came from him, returned laden with rich presents, and alwaies with irrefolute answers, to winne time; promising speedily to resolve the points of their demands, to their masters satisfactions.

But let vs obserue another ingenious policie: Lewis neuer sent one Ambassadour twice vnto Edward, to the end that if the former had happily treated of any thing that tooke not effect, the latter knew not what to answer, and so ignorance serued him for an excuse, with delay of time. Moreouer, he instructed his Ambassadors so well, as the assurance of the marriage they gaue to the King and Queene of England (the accomplishment whereof they both greatly desired) made them take hope for paiement. Yet the King had neuer any such meaning: there was too great an inequality of age: and thus getting a moneth or two by mutuall Ambassages, he kept his enemy from doing him any harme, who (without the bait of this marriage) would neuer haue suffered the house of Bourgongne to bee so oppressed.

liberalitie of
Lewis.

The disposition of Edward King of England.

1478. Another reason dissuaded Edward from embracing of Maries quarrell. Shee had refused to A marrie with the Lord Ruers, brother to the Queene of England. The which match was not equall, he being but a poore Baron, and the the greatest heire of her time. And the better to keepe Edward quiet, the King inuited him to ioyne with him, and consented that he should haue for his part the Prouinces of Flanders and Brabant, offering him to conquer for him, at his owne charge, foure of the greatest Townes in Brabant, to entertaine him ten thousand English men for foure moneths, and to furnish him with Artillerie and carriages, so as Edward would come in person, and seaze vpon Flanders, whilest that he employed his forces else-where. But Edward found that Flanders and Brabant were hard to conquer, and painefull to keepe: and also the English, by reason of the commoditie of their trafficke, had B no will to this warre. Yet (said he) since it pleaseth you to make me partaker of your victories, giue me of those places you haue conquered in Picardie, Boulougne, and some others: then will I declare my selfe for you, and assist you with men at your charge. A wise and discrete demaund: but thole places were no lesse conuenient for Lewis, who was loth to beate the bush, for another to get the birds.

It appeares, that Edward did wonderfully affect the alliance of France, and feared to giue the King any occasion to infringe it; so as (some say) hee caused his brother the Duke of Clarence to be put in prison, vpon colour that he would passe the seas, to succour the Dowager of Bourgongne: for the which crime, he was condemned to haue his head cut off, and his C body to be quartered, a punishment inflicted vpon traitors in England. But at the intreatie of their mother, Edward did moderate this sentence, and gave him the choice of what death he would, whereupon he was drowned in a Pipe of Malmesey. But this Duke was sonne in lawe to the Earle of Warwicke, whom Edward had slaine in battaile, as we haue said: and it seemes the greatest crime they could obiect against him, was the priuate hatred which vsurpers commonly beare to those whom they doubt might but crosse their tyrannicall vsurations. And as we haue recreated our selues beyond the Seas, let vs now passe the Alpes, and see what is done there, suffering our warriors to enioy a truce vntill the next yeare. There were at that time two mightie families at Florence, the one of Medicis, the other of Pacis. These were supported by Pope Sixtus the fourth, and by Ferdinand King of Naples, to ouerthrow the absolute gouernement of the cittie: they attempt to murder Laurence de Medicis, and all his D followers, and gaue for watch-word to the murderers; when as the Priest celebrating the high Masse, should say, Sanctus, in the Church of S. Reparé, where they should assist at a certaine day.

Laurence escaped, but being maimed of many of his members, hee saued himselfe in the Vestrie. Julian his brother was slaine and some of their followers. Then runne they to the Pallace, to murder all those which had the gouernement of the Cittie; but being mounted, they see that some of their men had abandoned them, so as they were not aboue foure or fife, and which was worse, the gates were shut vpon them. The Senatours (seeing these rascals thus banded) put their heads out at their windowes, they see this tumult, and heare James Pacis and others crying Liberta, Liberta, and Popolo, Popolo, (words to moue E the people, and to make them follow their faction) but they moued not: so as Pacis and his companions fled from the place, and those that were entred were presently hanged at the barres of the Pallace windowes. Francis Saluat Arch-bishop of Pisa, hauing said Masse with a cuirasse on his backe, was taken and hanged in the same habit. The Gouernours seeing the whole Towne to stand firme for them and the Medicis, they send presently to all the pal-sages, to apprehend all such as should be found flying. James and Francis Pacis were presently taken, with another Captaine of the Popes troupes vnder the Earle Ieronimo, and hanged instantly, with other great personages to the number of fourteene: some groomes and other base people, were knockt downe in the streetes. Nicholas, Cardinall of Saint George, F nephew to the Earle was a long time prisoner.

The King aduertised of this hurli-burly, sends the Lord of Argenton, both to take (in his Maiesties name) the homage which Bonne Duchesse of Milan, ought for the Duchie of Genoua, in the behalfe of the young Duke John Galeas her son, and to receiue the men at armes, which they had granted in fauor of the Medicis. The Pope aduertised of the execution done at Florence, doth excommunicate the citizens, and with the same breath commands his

armie to march, and to ioyne with that of Naples, being great and faire. It was commanded (for the Pope) by the Duke of Vrbino, Robert of Rimini, Constansine of Pescara, and many others: and for Ferdinando, by his two sonnes, the one Duke of Calabria, the other Don Fredericke. They take many places about Florence, and almost ruine the whole state. There were few Commanders, of small experience, and weake forces. The Kings assistance did some-what comfort them, being after much warre absolved and reconciled to the Church.
As also to terrifie the Pope, Lewis had called a Councell of the French Church at Orleans for the restoring of the pragmaticke Sanction in France, and to abolish the custome to carrie money to Rome for the obtaining of Bulls: yet the assembly brake off without any conclusion, and was referred to Lions the next yeare, but without effect. Thus passe the affaires B of this world, but many do oppresse him at the length. Our Lewis hath in a manner outliued all his greatest enemies, and now he begins to decline. Troubles, care and waywardnes, call him mildly to his graue: the vigor of his spirits faile him, and hereafter we shall see a strange alteration in his humors. The truce ends, and seeing we must returne to warre, let vs beginne it by some notable stratagem. The Archduke Maximilian hath now the Flem-mings hearts at his deuotion. To employ them, he campt before Therouenne, with aboue twentie thousand Flemmings, some Germaine troupes, and three hundred English, led by Thomas Abergeiny an English Captaine. The Lord of Cordes Lieutenant generall for the King in Picardie, assembles what troupes he can, out of the neighbour garrisons, eight thousand francke archers, eleuen hundred men at armes, and makes hast to releuee it. Maximilian understanding of their approach raiseth the slege, marcheth towards them, and affronts them at Guinegaste. Des Cordes was the stronger in horse, but the weaker in foote. The forwards ioyne without any stay, the Arch-dukes (being led by Rauestern) doth not maintaine the fight, but is soone broken and chased euen vnto Aire by Cordes and Torci. The foot stand firme, supported by the Arch-duke himselfe, the Lord of Rhomont, the Earle of Nassau, and two hundred Gentlemen all on foote: the francke Archers of the French, supposing that these footemen would flie with the fore-ward, fall vpon the baggage. The Duke doth charge them, forcing them to leaue their bootie and fall to armes. The slaughter was great, but most of the enemies. Eleuen thousand Bourguignons were slaine, sayeth the Historie, and D nine hundred prisoners, amongst the which was a Germaine Earle, and the King of Polands sonne: of the French there died fife thousand, and the small number of the Kings armie, made the enemy continue master of the field, who gathering together the remainders of his troupes, tooke the Castell of Malaunoy by assault, where Captaine Remonet (notwithstanding the faith which was giuen him when he yeelded) was hanged. For satisfaction hereof, ffitie of the aboue-named prisoners, were hanged by ten in a place, ten where as Remonet was executed, ten before Douay, ten before Saint Omer, ten before Arras, and ten before Lille. Des Cordes did runne rashly to this battaile and without the Kings commaundment: who was somewhat amazed with the first newes, thinking they had concealed the truth, and that it was quite lost for him. If it be so (saith he) farewell all my latter conquests: he was not accustomed to loofe, but alwaies very happie, being loth to hazard much in fight. But if E any Captaine had meanes to sell him a good place, he was a liberall purchaser at what price soeuer: but the seller must afterwards take heede of his Gossippe the Hermite the Controuler of his house.

This blast made Lewis resolute to treat a peace with Maximilian; so as it might be profitable vnto him; and that hee might thereby curbe the Arch-duke, and by the helpe of his owne subiects, so as afterwards he should haue no meanes to annoy him. For this effect the King seeks to the Gantois, that by their mediation, a marriage might be made betwixt Charles the Daulphin, and the Daughter of the said Arch-duke, vpon condition to leaue the Counties of Bourgongne, Auxerre, Mascon, and Charolois, and to quit him Arthois, reseruing Arras in the estate hee had fetled it, the Cittie commanding the Towne, the F which hereafter should beheld of the crowne by the Bishop. As for the Duchie of Bour-gongne, the Earledome of Boulougne, the Townes lying vpon Somme, and other places in Picardie there was no mention. The Gantois (and by their solliciting, those of Bruges with some other chiefe Townes of Flanders and Brabant, who desired rather to suppress, then to fortifie their new Lord) gaue eare to this transaction, ill intreating Maximilian and his wife all they could, being loth to submit them-selues to his command: first for that he was a stranger: secondly for that they knew more iudicious Princes, but not any more courteous then his father, whose sonne was seasoned with the same base couetousnesse, which carries with it great contempt. Notwithstanding this treating ended with a truce, attending the conclusion of a generall peace. In the meane time, our Lewis applies himselfe to order his realme, to reforme Iustice, and the Court of Parliament (especially for the tediousnesse of suites) one of the principall points for the which hee hated it) but without any diminution of the number of his officers nor of their authority. Moreouer he desired to bring into all the Countries of his obedience one custome, one waight, and one measure, to suppress those horse-leeches the practitioners, and the Marchants fraud. He had wonderfully oppressed his people, yea wittingly: and neither admonitions nor supplications could procure any releefe: the motion must come from him-selfe; hee is now wholly addicted there-vnto, but some-times a burning feuer tending to fury, some-times a cold palsy, some-times the trouble of the Hæmorrhoids, some-times his speech fayling, some times some other fits or distemperature of minde, diuerts him from his good humor. To teach vs, neuer to defer that vntill to morrow, which we may presently performe: for wee ought to feare, that God will not giue vs the will and meanes to do well, when wee haue once neglected it. All these ordinary infirmities made him froward and vnpleasing to his household seruants, causing him to take their seruices well meant in euill part. And being one day at Forges netre vnto Chinon, about dinner time, troubled with his ordinary fittes, as hee would haue drawne towards the windowes, they hindred him: vpon his first recouery, hee chased away all those that had by force staid his approach to the windowes: neither would hee euer after admit them to his presence, holding them-selues happy to enioy their offices. His iudgement being troubled, it made him thinke, that this manner of proceeding did derogate from his authority, which he sought to maintaine aboue all things, neither would hee be disobeyed in anything, doubting least in the end they should controule him in the gouernment of his affaires, as distraict of his witts. Vpon his amendment after any infirmity, hee would still know what expeditions and dispatches they had made. Hee tooke the letters, and made shew to read them, although he had no knowledge, or very little. Yet must they please him in all things, being dangerous to offend him. This first fit continued about fiftene dayes, at the end whereof hee recovered both speech and iudgment. Hee sets the Cardinall of Balue at liberty, (a prisoner since the yeare 1468.) at the request and pursuite of Cardinall Saint Peter ad Vincula, Legat in France, being sent to mediate a peace betwixt Lewis and Maximilian, and to sollicit them to succor the Christians oppressed vnder the Turkes persecutions, whom the King satisfied with hope and good words.

But being come to Peronne, and hauing giuen Maximilian and the Flemings intelligence of his arriuall, they would not admit him, and so his voyage prooued fruitlesse. Neither admonitions nor requests could euer moue the King to deliuer Balue, and now a scruple drawes him to it, seeking an absolution for that he had detained him so long in prison. And as he fees his strength and senses to decay, so ielousie and distrust (very incident vnto him) increased dayly, and apprehending death, hee feared least his owne subiects should hasten it by some new practises. In this perturbation, hee remembers that John Duke of Bourbon had followed the Duke of Guienne in the warre of the common-weale: and that hee might ioine with the Duke of Brittain, to raise vp new troubles and so shorten his dayes. He appoints certaine Commissioners ill-affected to the house of Bourbon, who not able directly to touch the Dukes person, they summon his Chancellor, his Attourney general, the Captaine of his gards, and other principall officers, to appeare in person, before the Court of Parliament at Paris. Being examined and heard, and finding nothing where-with to charge them, they were freed, and death did soone after free the said Duke from feare he had conceiued of the Kings hatred. Hee had imitated the Duke of Bourgongne's army, & by the aduice of des Cordes his Lieutenant generall in Picardy had newly imposed fiftene hundred thousand Frankes, for the maintenance of ten thousand foote: whereof the sixe thousand Swisses before mentioned were a part: two thousand fise hundred pioneers, and fiftene hundred men at armes of his ordinary, to fight on foote when as need should require, causing a great number of carts to be made to inclose them in, and

A tents to campe in, and therefore he called them soldiars of the campe. And for that they complained that the franke archers did greatly oppress the poore people, he did cassier all their companies. When this new campe was ready, he went to see it ranged in bataille in a valley neere to Pont de Larche in Normandy, vnder the command of his said Lieutenant generall, causing them to lie in campe a whole moneth together, to the end he might see what quantity of victuals were necessary for them: and then he returned into Touraine. Being at Tours, behold a relapse, which he feared greatly. He looseth his speech, they hold him for dead, he remains two houres couched on a pallet in a gallery. Being some-what recovered, seeking to diuert his disease and to reuiue his spirits by the change of aire, he went to Argenton, and then returned to Tours, but still languishing of his disease foretelling death. Then he vndertooke the journey of Saint Claude, which many gentlemen had vowed being present at his fall. Vpon his returne, newes comes of the death of Mary of Bourgongne, who going a hunting mounted vpon a stirring hobbeys, was cast, and after died of a quotidian, hauing had by Maximilian, Philip Arch-Duke, Margaret after-wards Queene of France, and Francis that died yong. A vertuous Princes, liberall, respected and beloued of all her subiects.

This death was wonderfull pleasing vnto our Lewis, in the midst of his afflictions, who not dreaming that he had one foote in the graue, thinkes now to do his busines the better: for (sayd he) the Emperour is miserable, ill beloued and of small credit in Germany: Maximilian young and of small experience, and ill beloued of his subiects: and moreouer the pupilles are in the Gantois keeping, a people inclined to mutiny against the house of Bourgongne. Yet he repined much at the secret intelligences the Duke of Brittain had with the English: and now a new subiect thrusts him on to this enterprise, the which doubtlesse he had vndergone, if his health would haue suffered him. Francis Duke of Brittain, vnderstanding that they made excellent armes at Milan, sent to buy a great number, and (to the end they should not be discovered by the noyse, and breed a new suspicion in the King, if he heard thereof) he caused them to be trussed vp in packs of silke, with cotton. These armes passing vpon moyles through Auvergne, Doyac Gouernor of the country had some intelligence, and aduertiseth the King thereof, who declares them forfeited to the benefit of Doyac.

This buying of armes, made Lewis to gape, more then euer, after Brittain, but he defers the execution, to practise the Gouernors of Gand by the Lord of Cordes, and treats the marriage of the Dauphin his sonne, with Marguerit the daughter of Maximilian and Mary lately deceased. The late surprise of Aire by Cordes, amazed the Flemmings and Brabanders, and made them willing to seeke an agreement with the King. To this end, Maximilian and they together send a great Ambassage to Arras, managed for the Arche-duke, by the Lords of Bergues and Launoy, with som Secretaries: and for the Comonalties by the Abbots of Saint Bertin and Saint Peter of Gand. The King appoints his Lieutenant generall in Picardy to heare them, with la Vacquery, lately created first President of the Parliament of Paris, and other graue personages. A peace is concluded by meanes of the sayd marriage, in fauour whereof, they giue (as a portion to the sayd Marguerit) the Counties of Arthois and Bourgongne, the lands and Seigneuries of Masconois, Auxerrois, Charolois, Salins, Bar, Sens and Noyon, to enioy them for euer. And in case that young Philip Earle of Flanders should die, Marguerit should succeed him in all the Lordships that belonged to her deceased mother, the fowerinty of Flanders remayning to the King. By meanes hereof, the Artoisians (that had bin confined) returned to Arras, and the citty recovered her ancient name.

Thus Marguerite was conducted into France by the Lady of Rauastein, the bastard daughter of Philip duke of Bourgongne, and receiued by the duke and Duchesse of Bourbon, who led her to Amboise, the place of the Dauphins abode, where the marriage was solemnly celebrated. Edward was wonderfully incensed at this marriage, seeing himselfe deprived of his pension, and tearing least this disgrace should breed him great contempt, yea a rebellion of his subiects, seeing the effects of that which he would not beleue. Moreouer hee did finde, the King had newly planted strong defences betwixt them two, and his conquests did stretch very neere vnto him. Hee conceyued so great a grieve vpon all these considerations, as soone after he died, partly for sorrow, and partly of an Apoplexy. A Soone after the death of Edward, Lewis receiues letters from the Duke of Glocester, who (by the murder of his two nephewes the soones of Edward his brother) had vsurped the crowne of England, and was called Richard. This Richard fought the Kings friendship, but Lewis abhorring so barbarous a cruelty, would not vouchsafe to answer his letters, nor to heare his message. But hee enioyed not long this tyrannous vsurpation. God raised vp that Earle of Richmond (whome we haue seene so long prisoner in Brittain) who with some little mony from the King, and three thousand men leuiued in the Duchy of Normandy, passed into Walles, and ioyned with his father in law the Lord Standley, with 26. thousand English, and with which forces he encountered Richard, fought with him, and slew him in the field, and then was crowned King of England. At the same time, William of March, brother to him whome they commonly called the Boare of Ardenne, (to instill his sonne in the Bishopricke of Liege,) leauiues a great number of foote and horse, and beleegeth Lewis, brother to the Duke of Bourbon, being Bishop there. The Bishop craues succors from the Arch-duke of Austria and the Prince of Orange his brother in law, who not able to come in time, and prest by some secret partisans of La Marche, hee goes forth in armes to fight with his enemy; and was slayne: wherby La Marche entred into Leige, but soone after he was surprised by the Lord of Montaigny, ayded with some troupes from the Arch-duke, and sodenly beheaded.

Our Lewis is now well satisfied touching the affaires of Flanders: there remained nothing but a reuenge of Brittain. But oh! how doth suspition, feare distrust, and finally death, breake off his great desseins? he is now at Plessis neere Tours, priuat, solitary, and shewing him selfe to few. He feares a decay of his estate, and yet is become vnable to gouerne a great Estate. The opening of a doore feares him; his owne shadow amazeth him, death terrifies him, but (the worst is) his conscience troubles him. He puts his most trusty seruants from him, he doubts his neere kinsmen, he abhors them he suspects, and suspects all the world. Those whom he doubts most, he dismisseth, with a couple of his Guard to guide them, pensue, sad, dreaming, froward, peeuish and cholericke: euery thing displeaseth him, all is vnreasonable, all offends him, hee knowes not what is fittest for him, either life or death, and yet he would liue and raigne. Hee knowes that he hath many enemies, and hath offended many, that the greatest of the Princes loue him not; that the meaner fort murmured, and that the peopple hated him: for hee hath ouercharged them, yea more then any of his predecessors; and hath not meane to ease them; and although he hath a will, yet it is now too late.

Oh what a greuous testimonie is the conscience of our mis-deedes! few enter at Plessis, but his household seruants, and the Archers of his Guard, whereof there are foure hundred daily in guard at the gate. No Nobleman lodgeth there, none come there but his sonne in lawe Peter (afterwards Duke of Bourbon, by the death of John his brother) and few of his followers: and yet he thinkes still, that some one enters in to offer violence to his person: or that by loue or force they will pull his scepter from him. He causeth his sonne to be streightly guarded, and will not suffer many to see him, least hee should be made the head of a faction. His daughter hath no access to him: his sonne in lawe no credit. His sonne in lawe returnes from the Daulphins marriage: Lewis with a deuise, makes the Captaine of his Guard to search such as are entred with the Duke, to see if they were not secretly armed. He commaunds him to hold the Councell, then he dissolues it: for in his absence they would make Monopolies. Who did euer see a mind more distracted, more vnquiet, and fuller of cares? He distrusts his sonne, his daughter, his sonne in law, and generally all those that may command.

The Castle gate is safely guarded; but they may leape ouer the walles, they must be planted with gaddes of iron, with many points, and so thicke as no man might passe them: and moreover the ditch at Plessis, compassed in with great barres, with foure engines of yron at the corners: Canoniers, and fortie Crosse-bow men were appointed to stand, ten day and night Centinell in the ditch, with commission to shoote at any one that should approach in the night, vntill the opening of the gate in the morning. Doubtlesse, the iustice of God would that those cages of yron, and those of wood covered with plates of yron both

A both within and without, those shakles, bolts, manacles, cheines, tyed to a great bowle, waighy beyond humane force: where hee had often-times imprisoned many, (yea and of honour,) for very fruitious causes, should now bee so many tortures to his conscience, at the last point of his death: and as he had giuen them eight foote in bredth, and it may bee so much in height, to stretch out them selues, so hee now retires him selfe into a little corner of the Castle, and like an other Perillus, they were farall to their first deuiser. The Bishop of Verdu remained foureteene yeares shut vp in the first that was made. To conclude, no dispatch came to Court, during this lamentable estate. The King had but one or two about him, men of no credit, who knew well, that after his death, the best that could chance vnto them, was to be shamefully chased away. But a great confusion attends them shortly. These men made no report vnto him of any thing that happened, but onely that which concerned the Estate and the realme, labouring to maintaine loue with all men. As for his person, euery day a new grome of his chamber, euery day new seruants. Yet knowes he not whom to trust. One onely amongst the rest gets some credit, but forced. It is his Phisition, James Cottier a Bourguignon: he giues him ten thousand crownes monethly, and what offices, or what lands he will demand, bee it from him selfe, or his friends; and for a nephew of his the Bishopricke of Amiens; and (as a man would say) his Crowne and his scepter, so as he will prolong his life. An odious, impudent, and audacious Phisition: who to continue his credit, said vnto the King, I know well that one of these mornings, you will send mee away with the rest, but (swearing a great othe) you shall not liue eight dayes after.

A strange heart-breaking, to be braued by a rascal, whereas so many great Princes did yeeld him voluntary obedience. But oh vanity, to thinke that the deuice of man can adde one minute to mans life! Lewis had neede to haue beene put in minde of this Oracle. I haue said, you are Gods, and all the children of the Lord, but you shall dye like men, and you that are Princes shall fall like other men.

At that time liued Francis borne at Paul in Calabria, a deuout Hermit, without learning, but of an austere life, and holy reputation, founder of the Friars Minimies. The King sent for him by a Steward of his house, in the company of the Prince of Tarentum, sonne to the King of Naples: at the first sight hee kneeles vnto him, and desires him to prolong his dayes. In truth, we haue often zeale, but not according to knowledge. But, Put no confidence in the chiefe of the people, nor in any of the sonnes of man, who haue no power to deliuer thee. O how happy is hee, whom the mighty God of Iacob helpe; and whose trust is in the Eternall! In the meane time, Lewis declines, and death followes him at the heeles: yet will hee not haue men to thinke so, and omits no inuention to diuert this opinion, both within and without the realme. Within, hee attires him selfe richly, contrary to his custome, and shewes himselfe, but onely in his Court, and gallery: hee makes seuerall lawes to be feared: sends away officers, dischargeth men at armes, cuts off pensions, and takes some quite away. To conclude, he passeth his time, to make and marre men. Without the realme, he payes that duty in England which he owes, and all other places, where he will haue them thinke that he is sound and alieue: hee sends men vnder colour to buy some thing: Into Spaine, Naples, and Germany for some horses; in Sicile, some good Mules, but especially of some good officer of the Country, and payed double for them. In Brittain, Gray-hounds, and Spaniels. In the kingdome of Valence, little Water-dogges. In Denmarke and Sweden, Hawkes. In Barbary, little Lions, of the bignesse of Foxes. To conclude, the more hee feared the decay of his dignity toward his latter end, the more hee sought to bee feared, and takes away all occasions to thinke that his end approached. Feeling his end draw neere, hee sent for the Daulphin his sonne, whom he had not seene in many yeares, causing him to be nourished apart, least the colour of his presence should haue bred some faction, as there had rashly risen in his yong age against Charles the seuenth his Father. And experience hauing taught him, how dangerous a sodaine alteration was; hee commanded him expressly not to displace any Officer, and especially to maintaine Oliver le Daim in the offices and goods hee had gotten in his seruice, as hauing assisted him well in his sickness. (But as this man was hastily and too highly exalted, so must hee and some others of like sort bee shortly supprest,) and John Doyac, gouernor of Auvergne, from whome hee had receiued good and notable seruices; to call maister Guyot Pot, and the Lord

Who (as a Sauoisien) hee had found by experience, to fauour the Bourguignon, and generally to confirme all those in their dignities, whom hee had aduanced: And to ease the people, whom hee had oppressed by the necessitie of the warres. Few dayes after the King had spoken to the Dauphin his sonne, his ordinary infirmity takes him, and he sodenly lost his speech, with a great debility of his forces. Hauing recouered (iudging him selfe but a dead man) hee sent the Duke of Bourbon to the King his sonne (so then he called him) giuing him the charge and gouernment of his said sonne. Then he sent the Chancellor with the seale, and part of the archers of his gard, and Capitaines, all his hounds, hawkes, and other things, and all such as came to see him, he sent them to Amboise. Yet was he not so well resolu'd for his death, but he had some hope to escape, namely by the meanes of his Hermit, and a multitude of reliques which were brought from Rheims, from Paris, and from Rome, the holy oyle, the rods of Moses and Aaron, the holy Crosse (were it true or false) and such like, vntill the diuines had taken counsell to let him vnderstand, that hee deceiued himselfe, and that his onely hope must consist in the mercy of God. A hard sentence to a man that had so often commanded, that euen in the last panges they should not pronounce that cruell word of death, the which hee feared beyond the condition of man, and preuented by all the remedies that might be inuented. Yet behold hee disposeth him selfe; I haue (said hee) hope that God will helpe me: but wisball he addes: yet happily I am not so sicke as you suppose. Norwithstanding, he felt the helpe of heauen, for his speech was restored, his vnderstanding good, his memory perfect, whereby he pronounced many prayers, adding there-vnto, by his last Will and Testament: That de Cordes should giue ouer the enterprise they had concluded vpon Calais: that they should suffer the Duke of Brittany to lue in peace, without feare of suspect, and likewise all the neighbours of the realme: that vnder the fauour of a peace of siue or sixe yeares, the people might breath, and the King his sonne grow in age. Finally, on Saturday the thirtieth of August, he yeelds vp his soule quietly to God, hauing liued threescore yeares and one, and reigned three and twenty: hee made choise for his buriall at our Lady of Clery, the place of his deuotion.

Lewis.

A cunning Prince, wise, painfull, reuengefull, vigilant, industrious, of a great memory, neuer hazarding that, which by policy, dissembling, money, or any other industry he might obtaine: vnquiet in his raigne, vnquiet in his life, and vnquiet in his death, not able to resolve but in extremities: Deuout, but inclining to superstition. A great oppresser of the people, but to giue to Churches, to forraine pensioners, and to purchase them deere, whom he had found fit for his purpose, as wee may easily perceiue by the discourse of his life. Hee was continent beyond the ordinary of great and generous Princes: and in truth greatly to bee commended, in that hee had so vertuously contained himselfe within the bounds of his professed vowe, and neuer to haue knowne other women then his owne wife. And if the 61. yeare, (the which he alwayes apprehended as the fatall period of his life, for that none of his predecessors since Hugh Capet, had passed that terme) had not ended his life, hee had reformed the State, ordred iustice, and releued the people. Happy in his death, hauing changed a continuall toyle, into an eternall rest: happy in that rest (which we hope for in heauen) to haue left a Successor quiet of himselfe, young, but of great hope, and chiefly, for that he had seene the Church, during his raigne, freed from that long and inueterate three and twentieth Schisme, which had so long turmoyled it. Thus are we come to the end of this raigne: but before wee proceed, wee must succinctly view the Estate of the Church and Empire vnder his raigne, seeing the course of our History hath drawne vs on thereto without interruption.

Wee haue seene, that by the renunciation of Felix the fift, Nicholas the fift of that name, remained in quiet possession of the Pontificall Sea. The most memorable acts of his Papacie, were the great lublie, which he did celebrate in the yeare 1450. where there was so great a concourse of people, that about two hundred were smothered, going and coming out of the Churches, besides an infinite number of people that perished in the riuer of Tyber, through the fall of the bridge of Saint Angelo. This Pope loued learning, hee gaue great pensions to learned men, sent them into diuerse places, to seeke out bookes which lay

Calixtus the third of that name, a Spaniard, of the age of 85. yeeres, before called Alphonso Borgias, bishop of Valence, and Cardinall of the foure crownes, succeeded by the consent of the whole Colledge: commended, for that in the first fruits of his Popedom, he had (according to a vow he had made) proclaimed a warre against Mahomet. And to stir vp B princes, he sent some notable preachers in those daies, as Iohn Capistran, and Robert de la Lize friars, to exhort Christians to releue their brethren, detained vnder the Turkes tyranny, and by ringing of the bell at noone day, to inuite them to pray for those that fought for this quarrell: yet blamed, for that vnder colour of his Indulgences and pardons, which were sold for siue ducats a peece, hee had gathered together; and left to his successor, a hundred and fiftene thousand ducats.

He died in Iuly 1458. Pius the second called Aeneas Silvius, a Siennois, a poore boy, hauing attained to much knowledge, by his laborious study, obtained the dignity of Pope. He had bene the Popes Secretary, at the councell of Basill, and by writing had impugned the authority of Eugenius the Scismaticke: and soone after was crowned poet laureat, by the Emperor Frederic the third, and honoured by him with many Ambassages to diuerse princes. Nicholas the fifth made him bishop of Triest, and after of Sienna; and Calixtus, Cardinal. But vpon his entry to the popedom, he sought to suppress two bookes, which hee had published for the approbation of the councell of Basill, and afterward laboured very ambitiously to enlarge the Romaine sea: for the encrease and preservation whereof, the History saith, he neither feared Kings, nor princes, people, nor tirants. A great enemy to King Lewis the eleuenth, whilest that hee would not yeeld to the abolition of that pragmatike sanction: who to crosse him in that yeere 64. did forbid to carry any money to Rome, or to bring any bulls from thence, renewing the same Edicts in the yeere 1478. But in the end hee was so flattered by this Aeneas, and by his successor Sixtus the fourth, as hee renounced all the rights of the pragmatike sanction. He had likewise proclaimed a voiage into Turkey, by a councell assembled at Mantua. But the Ambassadors of King Lewis and of René Duke of Aniou (hauing laid open the rights which the house of Aniou had to the Realme of Naples, and the wrong was done him, vsurping it to the behoofe of Alphonso the bastard of Ferdinand, whom this Pope had by his absolute authority put in possession of the Realme) grew so better against the French for Ferdinand, as the said Ambassadors would not promise any thing, in their masters name, for this warre: so as the assembly was dissolued, the eight moneth, without any good to Christendome. An ambitious man, austere to princes, a great persecuter of the enemies of the clergy, courteous and officious to his friends, busie for the enriching of the church, a great builder. And finally, as hee was ready to depart from Ancona, to march in person against the Turke, who was then entred Italy, a quotidian ague seized on him, whereof hee died in the yeere 1464. Of him wee read thus much: as Platina and Sabellicus doe report. Priests are forbidden to marrie for a great reason, but yet there is a greater for the which they should bee suffered; and moreouer. Peraduenture, it should not bee the worse, if many Priests were married, for many being Priests and married, should bee saved, the which in their barren Calibat are damned. Hee likewise would haue abolished some Nunneries of Saint Brigit and Clare; and caused the Nunnes to come forth, to the end (saith Calixtus Secundus) that vnder the habit of religion they should not hide their adulteries.

Paul the second, borne at Venice, before named Peter Barbo, Cardinall of Saint Mark, succeeded. His first calling was marchandise, but seeing an vnle of his chosen Pope, hee applied himselfe somewhat to learning, and was first created Arch-deacon of Bononia, then bishop of Ceruio, after Cardinall, and finally Pope. A man of a good personage, but arrogant and proud: so as Platina obserues, that hee first spake these wordes: That the Pope carries within the circuit of his bosome al diuine and humane laws. Exceeding al his predecessors cessors in attire: but above all in his mitre, the which he enriched with pearle and stones of an inestimable price, shewing himselfe proudly vpon sollemne daies, thus sumptuously attired, followed by his Cardinals with scarlet hats (the which he did forbid all others to weare, vpon greuous punishments) and mounted vpon mulets with foote-clothes of the same colour: grosse and dull-witted, louing neither learning, nor learned men: so as he declared them Heretiks that either in sport or earnest did pronounce this word Academy or Vniuersity. Couetous, dissolute, voluptuous, turbulent, giuen to coniuring, and the whole time of his raigne hee troubled Italy, with combustions and home-bred warres. Finally they report little good of him, but that he had bene pittifull to the poore and needy, to haue pre-pared Rome from famine, and reformed many Monasteries, reducing them to a better discipline. They say, that hauing one day read certaine poesies, made against him and his daughter, he began to greeue, and to blame the rigour of the law made by his predecessors, who did forbid priests to marry: so as seeing himselfe a scorne to the people, he resolved to giue priests liberty to marry, but an Apoplexy tooke him sodenly out of this world, the 25. of July 1471. leauing a rich treasure. In trueth, They gather goods (saith the Oracle) and know not who shall enioy them. Some impute this sodaine death to the Author of the Magicke art, the which he practised.

Sixtus the fourth, borne a Sauonne, and named Francis of Ruere, Generall of the Grey-Frias, and Cardinall of Saint Sixte, Legat of Auignon, was installed by the election of the Colledge, in the pontificall chaire. Liberall and charitable to his owne, beyond the bounds of true zeale: for in their fauour he gaue Indulgences and pardons prodigally, and granted many other things against all right and reason: so saith the History. Amongst the rest, he advanced Peter of Ruere to a Cardinallship: a monstrous man in his expences, who in two moneths deuoured in vanities, dissolution and loosenesse, about two hundred thousand crownes, besides the debts wherewith he chargeth his heires. He repaired many decayed churches and monasteries, built new, and gaue them great reuenues. Hee restored the A-breuators (which was a colledge of learned men, and studious in diuine and humane lawes, Poets, Orators, Historians, &c.) first instituted by Pius the second, then abolished by Paul the second his successor. Then did he institute a new the Bullistes, people fitter to get money, then for any other thing, and nine Notaries of the Apostolick treasure, appointing them certaine reuenues: which offices were sold in the beginning for fise hundred crowns, and since for two or three thousand crownes: so well could they sell their marchandise. Sixtus made many vniuersal warres, against Ferdinand King of Naples, for that against the Popes liking, he had succoured his sonne in law Hercules of Este, Duke of Ferrara, besieged by the Venetians; against the Venetians whom hee did excommunicate; against the Florentines, excommunicated likewise with an interdiction of fire and water. But by the intercession and threats of the King, and the succours the Venetians gaue to the Florentines against the Pope (who had incensed Ferdinand King of Sicilia, Alphonfus Duke of Calabria, and Frederick Duke of Vrbin, capitaine generall for the church) to make warre against them, hee absolved them. Then being sick of a feuer, hauing newes that a peace was made betwixt the Venetians and other potentates of Italy, hee died sodainly. There flourished vnder him Iohn Regiomontanus, a great Mathematician, Rodolphus Agricola, Pomponius Letus, Ambrose Calepin, learned men in humanitie. Let it suffice to haue noted such Popes as haue raigned vnder our Lewis, and now let vs see that which concerns the Empire.

That great Iohn Huniades, a firme and sound rampier for the Christians against the Turkes, had left two sonnes, Ladislaus and Matthias. They had for an hereditary enemy Vlrrike Earle of Sicilia, nere kinsman and a fauorite to Ladislaus King of Hungary and Bohemia, sonne to Albert of Austria, borne after his fathers death. Ladislaus the eldest, complaining one day to Vlrrike, of the slanders wherewith hee wrongfully charged him to King Ladislaus, they passed from words to blowes, so as he slue Vlrrike: for the which the King of Hungary caused him to bee publicly beheaded, and lead Matthias the yonger prisoner to Prague in Bohemia, to put him to death, farre from the view of the Nobility of Hungary, to whom the memory of Huniades was wonderfull deere and precious. But as Ladislaus prepared for his marriage at Prague, to bee sonne in law to Charles the seuenth, behold a blacke and

A and deadly poison sodainly shoakes vp the ioy which that new alliance had conceiued. After whose death there did arise great quarrells for the succession. Some Noblemen of Hungarie, wished the Emperour Frederick the third for their King: the greatest part preferred Matthias, both for that hee was of the nation, as for the happy memory of his father Iohn.

The election beeing made, Matthias is set at liberty by George Boicbrac, the new King of Bohemia: hee demands the crowne. Frederick armes himselfe with a constitution, which he had receiued from Elizabeth mother to Ladislaus deceased, when shee sent him her sonne to bring vp. Vpon refusall they goe to armes; but the Germane princes pacified this quarrell, concluding, that Matthias should pay for his crowne vnto the Emperour, foure-score thousand crownes. In the meane time there springs vp new seeds of warre in Germany. Pius the second (making the Emperour, and his deuotion to the Romaine sea his support) puts Dietrick Isebourg from the Arch-bishopricke of Mentz, aduancing Adolph of Nassau in his place. Isebourg opposed himselfe vigorously against the popes exactions, who spoiled (as he said) the provinces, vnder a pretext of warre against the Turke: and moreover hee would not tie himselfe by oath vnto the pope, who would likewise binde future Ecclesiasticall Electors; not to assemble the Electors of the Empire, for the election of any new Emperour, or for any other cause concerning the Empire, before hee were duly informed, to the end his pleasure might be preferred before all others. An audacious and vncivil demand. Frederick the victorious Conte Palatin of Rhine then administrator of the Electorship of his Nephew Philipp, the sonne of Lewis his brother being a pupill, stood firme-ly for Isebourg. Lewis Duke of Bauaria, surnamed the rich, ioynes with Frederick. The Emperour hated them both, and desired much to crosse them (although in his heart he had reason to fauour that party, for the which they fought) but he feared the valour of Frederick, and the wealth of Lewis.

The pope vrgeth him to stirre vp some great princes of Germany, to oppose against the protectors of Isebourg, rather then against Isebourg himselfe. Adolph of Nassau, was assisted by Albert Marquis of Brandebourg, Lewis of Bauaria, surnamed the black, Charles Marquis of Baden, and his brother, Iohn bishop of Metz, with Vlrrike Earle of Wirtemberg: all which eniued the prosperity of Frederick, and yet feared to try his valour. Frederick was the weaker in men, but right hath a strong party. They neglecting their enemies small forces, charge him disorderly: he resists them valiantly, beates them, defeats them, and puts them to flight, takes the Marquis of Baden, the bishop of Metz, and the Earle of Wirtemberg prisoners, the first of July 1461. and to let them vnderstand that they had erred in the discipline of warre, spoiling the corne, and burning the Mills, hee caused them to sup the first night of their imprisonment without bread.

The end of this warre was the beginning of an other, more fatall for the Emperour. The pope deposed George Boicbrac from the crowne of Bohemia, as fauouring the doctrine of Hus, and appoints Matthias, surnamed Cornutus, but the Emperour would not grant it, depending of the Empire. Matthias was much mooued, and the more, when as after the death of George, the Lords of Bohemia, and the Emperour likewise, leauing him, made choise of Ladislaus the sonne of Cassimir, King of Poland, and of Elizabeth, daughter to Albert of Austria. In this warre, the imperiall Maiestie was not onely shaken, but through Fredericks misfortune almost ruined, and hee in a manner expelled out of all Austria, and it reduced vnder the power of a strange Lord, mighty and warlike. When as behold Albert Duke of Saxony, sonne to Frederick the second Elector of Saxony, father to Duke George and Henry, Grandfather to Maurice and Augustus Electors, leauies a goodly army at his owne charge, assailes Matthias, and so weakens him in many battails, as hee abandons the greatest part of Austria, and forceth him in the end to accept a peace with such conditions as Albert would impose. During these partialities in the West, God raised vp some meanes to crosse the Turkes exploits, if the diuisions of Christian princes, for the most part procured by the popes, whilest they settled themselves, had not conuerted their owne forces against themselves. Three yeeres after this pittifull wound which the christian church receiued by the losse of Constantinople, Mahomet the second, besieged Belgrade, but to his confusion. A handfull of men, lead by that braue Huniades, in two daies together, giue him two bloody 1483. bloody batailles, wins them, kills about forty thousand of his men, spoiles his campe, takes his artillery, and with some difficulty he saued his person, being wounded in the left pap, and carried out of the fight as dead. Mahomet seeing by this disgrace, that the land did not fauour him, means to try an other element: hee rigges a great fleet of gallies, to seize vpon the Islands of the Archipelagus. But he had purchased a mighty enemy, Vsumcassan of the race of Asimbei a Turke, Lord of Cappadocia, Armenia and some other countries adioyning, who had lately slaine Molsombre, or (as some write) Demir of Persia, and by that victory inuaded the Realme. Vsumcassan hauing disapointed the designs of Mahomet, grew so proud, that to make his victory the more famous, he drew rich presents out of the treasures of Persia, and sent them vnto Mahomet, requesting him not to attempt any thing against Trebifonde, nor Cappadocia (a conquerors request imports an imperious command) countries which belonged vnto him by reason of the dowry of his wife, the daughter of Danid Commene. Mahomet not able to digest that a meaner then himselfe should prescribe him a lawe, imploies all his wit to obscure the glorie of this new King. Hee therefore sends a part of his fleet into Asia, directly to Pontus and Sinope, towards Trebifonde. And hee himselfe with an incredible speed crosseth Asia, and campes neere to Vsumcassan. Three batailles are fought: Vsumcassan winnes the first against Amurath Bascha, a Greeke by nation, neere to the riuier of Euphrates, which Bascha was slaine: and the second against Mahomet, where hee was in person. These two batailles did wonderfully weaken the Turke forces. In the third, the Persians amazed with the vnaccustomed noise of the Turkish shot, vnable to endure the terror of the harguebush, Vsumcassan and his men oppressed with this new army, lost the honour of the two first daies, and Zemald the sonne of Vsumcassan was slaine with a shot.

The Turkes
ouerthrowne
twice in Asia, winne the third bataille.

Mahomet pursues his good fortune, besiegeth and takes Sinope the capital city of the Province; and afterwards all Paphlagonia: then he campes before Trebifonde; batters it by sea and land, and in the end takes it; spoiles the treasures of King David Commene: sends him prisoner with his two sonnes, and his cousin Iohn le Beau, to Constantinople, to serue for a shew, the day of his triumph, causing them afterwards to be barbarously slaine, rooting out the race of *Commene*s. In the same voiage he tooke Cilicia from Piramet Caraman, and being returned to Constantinople, he conquered with his army by sea, the Islands of Lemnos and Lesbos: he vnpeopled Mitilene, and transported the Inhabitants of the Island into another country.

With his forces at land he assailed Dracula prince of Valachia: who with such small forces of foote and horse, as the shortnesse of time would suffer him to leauy, did so surpris and shut vp Mahomet, as both he and his army were in a maner ruined: when as behold Mahomet Bascha, Lieutenant Generall in the Turkes army, with a braue and hardy resolution opened the passage by force: but with great losse of his men, the which (fortified with new troupes,) hee sends into high Misia and Sclauonia: chased Stephen King of Bosnia, out of laize the chiefe city, dispossessed him of his Realme, and in the end slew him about the yeere 1463. A while after Mathias King of Hungary recovered the sayd city and Realm, E ouerthrew a great army of Turkes spoiling the country of Sirme, tooke many places in Croatia and Dalmatia, and in the end expelled Mahomet, being come to besiege laize, spoiled his campe, and was master of all his baggage. Scanderbeg (expelled his country) was retired into Italy, where shewing that the diuision of Christian Princes was the meanes to confirme the Turkes estate, and that it was impossible to make him giue ouer this audacious and insatiable desire, being at Lisse vpon the riuier of Drille, he was surprisid with a seuer, whereof hee died, being threecore and three yeeres old, in the yeere of our Lord 1467.

A prince exceeding all men in valour, of a wonderfull courage, so as euen with vehemency his lippes did bleed, at the beginning of euery charge. He neuer refused bataille, neuer turned his backe, neuer was hurt but once, lightly in the foote with an arrow: he neuer led about sixe thousand horse and three thousand foote, and had slaine with his owne hand about two thousand Barbarians, striking with such force, as hee cut many in two peeces.

Mahomet being freed by the death of Scanderbeg, vnderooke three warres at one instant: Misfihes of the race of the Paleologues, had commission to goe to Rhodes: Acomath Bascha into 1483. A into Italy, to conquer it, with Rome, and the Empire of the West: and Mahomed himselfe goes into Asia. Misfihes being often beaten, was forced to returne with the remainders of his army, languishing and in pittifull estate. Acomath lands in Calabria, takes Otranto, and so amazeth all Italy, as the Pope (neglecting all in regard of the safety of his person) resolues to leaue Rome. Mahomed going into Asia, died of the Collick, neere vnto Nicomedia, in the yeere 1471. A happy death for the Christians: for Otranto besieged by the Italians, ayded by Matthias, was yeelded by composition, with their liues and goods saued, without attending five and twenty thousand Turkes, which Acomath (pursuing his victory) brought to their succours. Thus Italy was deliuered from imminent danger, and the Pope assured: B we will now leaue the rainge of Baizet, second successor to Mahomed, to continue our worke in the West.

CHARLES the eight, the 56. French King.

His raigne will not hold vs long, but after the Duke of Orleans league, the motiue of five yeares warre in Brittanie ended, by the Kings marriage with Anne the eldest daughter to Francis Duke of Brittain, we shall be transported beyond the Alpes, to take the possession, which René King of Sicile, and Charles Earle of Maine his brother, had by their testaments left to Lewis the xi. to the rights they pretended to the realme of Naples: vpon the way we shall see him entertained by Lewu Sforce, in the Towne of Asti; then hauing received the Forts of Florence, with the City of Pisa, from Peter de Medois, hee enters Rome, notwithstanding the gain-saying of Pope Alexander, and hauing vsed there in the rights of a conquerour, he treats an accord with the said Pope: receiues from him the title of Emperour of Constantinople, with the inuestiture of the realme of Naples: and consequently causeth him selfe to bee crowned King of Sicile. And to augment his honour, hee makes his passage, maugre the forces of all the Princes and Potentates of Italy, raigne.

1483- at Fournoue: and laden with glory and spoiles, returns triumphantly to seeke some rest in France, after his weary toyles. But alas! when as in the greene and vigorous season of his life, he shall meditate of a second voiage for the recouery of his Realme of Naples (as easily lost as wonne) and when as the Easterne parts liued in hope to haue the Christian Church restored by him, oppressed now vnder the Turkish tyranny; Death vniust and vnseasonable, according to man, shall with himselfe cut off all his goodly designes, the which hee had laid in the beginning of his flourishing youth, to carry him to the fruition of a better rest. The iudicious reader may iudge, if wee haue reaped more honour and profit in the getting, then shame and hurt in the losse of so many Estates lying farre from vs. Charles came to the crowne at the age of thirteene yeeres, delicate, weake, sickly in his youth, mild, gracious, deuout, but wilful in his humors. Lewis had bred him vp at Amboise, attended on by few seruants, not visited by any, without any instruction, but bare reading, not willing to helpe nature by art. Yet the weaknesse thereof hath oftentimes more need of a prop to support it, and a spur to pricke it forward, then of a bit to restraine it. Did he feare that learning should impair his health, or corrupt the good seeds which nature had planted in his minde. He was content, that according to his fathers humor, his sonne should learne this only sentence in Latin. He that cannot dissemble, cannot rule. But he did him wrong: for, he was inclined to the reading of French bookes: and hee came no sooner to the crowne, but they found in him a desire of knowledge, which made him to haue a taste in the Latin tongue. But as the aptest time of his age was slipt away without profit, so did hee salute the Muses but a farre off: weake of body, but of a good wit, capable of counsell, and succceptible of the helpe requisite for the gouernment of a firme and solid State. His minority was the cause of a quarrell, betwixt the Duke of Orleans (a yong prince and neresst to the crowne) and the Earle of Beauieu, for the Regency, which caused his coronation to be deferred vntill the next yeere: after the which an assembly of States should determine of the administration of the King and Realme. The princes of the bloud attending this sollemnity, hauing bene so often wronged by Oliuer le Daim, Daniel his seruant, and Doyac, who had wholly gouerned the deceased King, did without the Kings priuity (whose yong yeeres with-held him from gouernment) informe of their insolencies, proud carriage, vniust murders, thefts, extortions, and other crimes, which they had committed vnder the authority of Lewis the eleuenth, and by a decree of the Court, make Daniel to forfeite both body and goods, and his master likewise some few daies after. Doyac whipped at the corner of euery street, lost one of his eares vpon the pillory, at the Halles in Paris, then hauing his tongue peared with a hot iron, he was conuicted to Mont-Ferrant in Auvergne, where he was borne: there they cut off his other eare, and whipt him likewise. Moreouer, the excessiue rewards which Lewis had giuen to some persons, were reuoked, and they constrained to make restitution. To teach meane men, raised by the bounty of Kings, that man is mortall, but the memory of indignity is immortal with great men.

Charles his disposition, and education.

The Duke of Orleans and Earle of Beauieu contend for the Regency.

Oliuer and Daniel hang-ed.

Doyac whipt, and lost his eares.

Landays gouerns the Duke of Britany insolently.

At the same time the Duke of Britan was wholly possessed by Peter Landays his Treasorer, (of whom we haue formerly spoken) by whose flanders and suggestions he had suffered his Chancellor Chauuin, to die miserably in prison, of hungar, and cold: beeing a very honest and a reuerend man. Landays was the sonne of a poore Taylor in the suburbs of Rachapt, at Vitry in Britan, as it appeareth in his proces, quicke-witted, and busie-headed. His first access to the duke was in the quality of a Taylor, and after he vsed him to carry his loue letters, the said duke being of a very amorous disposition. In the end he makes him master of his wardrop, and finally his Treasorer generall; then he begun to manage the Treasor, iustice and affaires of State at his pleasure, hee did preferre Officers by his letters without the dukes appointment, and place or displace whom hee pleased: proud, treacherous, reuengefull, implacable to such as had offended him. Presumptuous, declaring such Noblemen of Britan, as could no longer endure his arrogancy, guilty of high Treason, for that they had attempted against his person, forfeites their goods, banisheth their persons, and arming his maiesty to their destruction, the which they could not auoide, but by a generall pardon and remission.

In the end their patience is moued. John of Chalon prince of Orange, sonne to one of the dukes sisters, and John of Rieux Marshall of Britan, the principall of his Court, hauing

A hauing laied a plot, with the other Barons of the country, at all aduentures to seize vpon Landays: they enter the castle of Nantes, beeing secretly armed, seeke for Landays, and find him not, being gone to Pabotiere, a house of his vpon the Loire, nere vnto Nantes. The Duke is amazed at this insolent proceeding, and beleeueth it is some practise against his person. One of his seruants goes vp to the batlements towards the towne, and cries out aloud: That they seeke to force the duke. The archers of his gard storme: the Officers and gentlemen of his house flie thether, the people troupe together. They plant such Artillery as they finde in the towne against the castle, readie to batter downe the gate. The vnder-takers (who had not foreseene so dangerous a consequence) shew forth the duke vpon the batlements, and cause him to speake. He assures them, that they haue not attempted any thing against his person: and to satisfie the multitude, Philip of Montrauban enters by agreement, he aduise the Noblemen to absent themselves for a time, in the meane time the people would be pacified, and the Dukes wrath appeased. Landays on the other side hauing escaped a troupe that was sent to surprize him in his house, saues himselfe through the ditches of his garden, alone, and on foote: and so in the night recouers the castle of Poence, and giues the Duke notice of his aduenture. The duke sends a Conuoy for him, and is more ruled by him then before. So Landays assembles all the Officers and men of counsell in Britan: he sends to the Vniuersities of Italy, laies open the violence done to the Duke in his owne house, by his vassalles and subiects, and demands what punishment this offence deserues. The assembly answered, as Landays desired: that they found them guilty of high treason, yea in the highest degree, and therefore deserued death and losse of goods. A decree followes, with condemnation of death, houses beaten downe, woods cut vp at the waist, with all the rigours which men condemned for such a crime might deserue. They flie into France, and offer their seruice to the countesse of Beauieu, the Kings sister, complayning of the insolencies of Landays, without making further mention of their quarrell with the Duke. Landays discouers their retreat, hee vnderstandes of the discord betwixt Lewis Duke of Orleans, and the said Lady, and causeth his maiesty (by letters written to Lewis) to accuse the disobedience and treachery of his nobility, who acknowledging Anne for Regent of the Realme, deprived him of the honour and right that was due to him rather then to a woman, as the first prince of the bloud: he exhorts him not to relinquish his iust title, and promisseth to assist him with his best meanes. The Duke of Orleans had against his minde (as we haue heard) married Joane the yongest daughter of Lewis the eleuenth, deformed and vnfit for conception, and followed the onely aduice of the Earle of Dunois, sonne to John bastard of Orleans, a man of great fore-sight, aduised, a good and a valiant capitaine.

This Earle did presently forecast, that (by the meanes of Landays, who did so secretly inuite Duke Lewis) forsaking Joane, he might marry with Anne the eldest daughter of Francis Duke of Britan. This hope drew him soone to Nantes, where hauing heard the complaints of the French, and contented them with words and promises, without any meaning to accomplish them, moued rather with desire to gouerne the state, he returns into France, to assist at the Kings coronation at Rheims, whereof the day approached. There were present at the Kings coronation, the Dukes of Orleans, Alençon, Bourbon and Lorrain, the Earles of Beauieu, Angoulesme, Vendosme; la Roche sur-Yon, Montpensier, Longueville, Foix, Dunois and those that were fled out of Britan; the prince of Orange, John Lord of Rieux and Ancenis, the Earle of Aumale, Poncet de la Riviere (who was created Maire of Bourdeaux) the Lord of Vrfe (who was made master of the horse) and others of their troupe, all which brought him with pompe to make his entry into Paris, and to prepare for a generall parliament to be held at Tours, with more free access then had bene vsuall, yet not so effectually as was expected: euery one seeking rather to maintaine his priuate authority, then to procure the peoples ease. The Pragmatick Sanction was restored, to vse it as they had accustomed. The Constables sword was giuen to the duke of Bourbon: the gouernment of the Kings person to his sister, a cunning woman, and some-what of her fathers humor: but the name of Regent was forbidden to them all, to preuent ialousies. There was a counsell erected of twelue, by whom matters should be dispatched in the Kings name: of the which Lewis duke of Orleans should be president.

Landays causeth his maiesty to inuite the Duke of Orleans against the Countesse of Beauieu.

The Duke of Orleans comes into Britan, the Kings coronation.

A league made by the Duke of Orleans.

Lewis is discontented with this device, seekes to hold his ranke, hee pretends that being the first prince of the blood, the Regency belonged vnto him; hee assists at the Counsell in parliament, and in the assemblies in towne, and notwithstanding the last will of King Lewis, and the decree of the Estates, yet will he by force haue the name and effect of Regent. But our Kings who may not (to preiudice the elder, or for want of issue, their next kinsman, being a male and legitimate) dispose of their crowne: haue they not then power to commit the gard of their children, being yet pupills, and the Regency of the Realme to whom they please? Moreouer was it reasonable that he which was not yet five and twenty yeeres old, who liued vnder his mothers wing, who by right had yet need of a gouernor, should be declared capable for the gouernment of this Realme? So, want of yeeres depriued him of grandfather of the same dignity, during the phrensie of Charles the sixth. This discontent is nourished by a new accident: Lewis playing one day at Tennis, where the Ladies were present, there fell a stroke in controuersie, the which Anne iudged for the aduerser part. Lewis otherwise moued, casts out some word, importing a lie. Anne discontented herewith, causeth it to be decreed in counsell, that the Duke should be committed prisoner: hee is aduertised thereof by John Louen (or Louaine) a gentleman of his house, and so retires to the Duke of Alanfon. The Duke of Lorraine was come to demand the Duchy of Barre, (the which Lewis the eleventh had held) and the Earldome of Prouence, which he pretended to be his, as sonne to the daughter of René King of Sicilia, Duke of Aniou, and Earle of Prouence, and by consequence, the next kinsman to Charles Duke of Aniou (who by transference, on and testament had made Lewis the eleventh his heire) yet was she but nephew to René, and sonne to Charles of Aniou, Earle of Maine his brother. Barre was restored, and the Lorraine had a hundred men at armes entertained, with thirty sixe thousand frankes for foure yeeres, during the which they should looke into the title of the said Earldome. During this terme, some well acquainted with the Estate of Prouence, produce certaine testaments of Charles the first of that name, brother to Saint Lewis, and Earle of Prouence by his wife, and of other Kings of Sicilia, which had beene of the house of France, by the which, the house of Lorraine was not only excluded from the succession of Prouence (not liable to the daughter, while there remained a sonne of the race) but that also the Realme of Sicilia, and all other Seigneuries possessed by the house of Aniou, belonged to the King. That King René having regard to the said testaments, had at his death preferred his nephew Charles, before the said Duke of Lorraine, sonne to his daughter.

The Duke of Orleans greeued to be thus excluded from his pretensions, and that Anne alone gouerned the King her brother, practiseth the dukes of Bourbon, Alanfon and Britan (the chiefe support and refuge of the discontented French) the Earle of Angoulesme, John Vicount of Narbonne, Francis Earle of Longueville, and many others. Alain Lord of Albret, hoping (by the meanes of Lewis, whom hee found to haue great credit with the Duke of Britan) to marry with Anne, the eldest daughter of the said Duke (having not duely examined the heart of Lewis) enters easily into this faction.

Thus all things threaten a horrible and pernicious warre, but more in shew then effect. Lewis with his allies assembles some troupes, and thinking to put them into Orleance, the Inhabitants giue him to vnderstand by the Lord of Ioyeuze, deputed there on his behalfe, that he might well enter with his household, but not with his souldiars. Boifgency was then his retiring place.

Anne and the twelue counsellors, cause him to be besieged by Francis Earle of Vendome, Lewis his brother, Earle of Roche-sur-Yon, René duke of Lorraine (whom the said Lady had wholly won vnto her, knowing him to be resolute, vehement, and of faction) and Peter of Rohan, Lord of Gie, Marshall of France. In the end this warre was pacified by this agreement, that the Duke of Orleans should come to Court, and inioy the place that belonged vnto him: but Francis Earle of Dunois (the Dukes right hand) a busie body and the first author of the trouble, should retire himselfe into the county of Ast, belonging to the said Duke, or to what other place hee pleased without the realme. Must Lewis then bring his confederats in disgrace with the King, and now abandon them? Behold the Duke of Bourbon and the Earle of Angoulesme leading 300. Lances, eight thousand foote, and about eightene hundred gentlemen of Auvergne, Bourbonnois, Forest, Beau-seulois and Angoulesmois,

Agoulesmois, and Alain: eight or nine thousand fighting men. If Lewis had attended them in some place of strength, how dangerously had he shaken the new estate of Charles, not wellsted during his minority? But he had too good a minde to teare out his own bowels, in their persons, whom the law in time should submit vnto him, and dismember the crowne, which he should weare in his turne. Anne, to disperse this storme, causeth the Earle of Beauieu her husband, to encounter their troupes, and forceth the Duke of Orleans to march in person, against those that came to his seruice. They were all Frenchmen: and as they were lightly armed, so were they as lightly disarmed: the Marshall of Gie, and the Chamberlane of Graille, shall easily reconcile them. Alain being stoppt in his passage of Garonne, at Saint-Basille, by the Earles of Vendosme, and Roche-sur-Yon, was admitted to the same accord, vpon charge to furnish the King a hundred men at armes for his seruice: the which hee deliuered vnder the command of Saint Cyr, and Forsais. They are all dispersed: the King at Amboise, Lewis at Orleans, Alain in Bazadois, and all the rest to their houses: the Vicont of Foix, and Peter his brother being Cardinall at Nantes, vnder colour to visit their sister, wife to the duke of Britan. They find their brother in law much incensed against his Nobility, & they resolute to defend themselves. But as both armies were ready to ioyn, an accord is made by some mediators: that considering the dukes age and weakenesse of iudgement, the State should be gouerned by the aduice of his next kinsmen, and friends. Landaïs is reiect-ed, and stormes: he drawes letters patters in the dukes name, and declares all those of the dukes army, that had entered into capitulation with the enemies troupes, guilty of high treason, forfeiting all their goods as traitors: he carries this patent to the Chancellor Francis Chrestien, to be sealed, and brings a commandement from the duke to that effect: the which the Chancellor refused to doe. Behold Landaïs hath purchased two enemies for one, and both haue sworn his ruine, but they must countenance it with iustice. They depute the Lord of Pont-Chateau to summon the Chancellor to do iustice vpon Landaïs, to appoint Iudges for his triall, and to force him to appeare. They make informations against him, wherevpon they decree to apprehend him. It is bruted throughout the towne, that Landaïs by sentence should be committed prisoner. The people runne by heaps, they fill the castle-yard, and wil not depart vntill Landaïs be deliuered. He saues himselfe in the dukes chamber. The Nobility doth force the Chancellor to repaire to the castle and to demand this man. The duke being constrained, deliuers him, but vpon condition that hee should not be vsed contrary to Iustice, and commands vpon paine of death, that he suffers no outrage be done vnto him, vnder colour of Iustice.

The Nobility being aduertised of his taking, posts to Nantes, and offer themselves vnto the Duke, like humble subiects, suing for his fauour. Landaïs proceesse being made with that of John of Vitry, one of his seruants, by certaine Comissioners, they were hanged. This done, the people were pacified, and the Nobility, by the intercession of the Earle of Cominges, returned into fauour, and obtained letters of pardon. Then returns the Earle of Dunois to his towne of Parthenay in Poitou, but without the Kings permission. The King (that is to say, the twelue vnder his authority) suspect his returne, and (fearing least the duke of Orleans had sent for him, or that he practised some new worke) sends for the duke. He sends backe the messenger with promise to follow, and vpon a second charge by the Marshall of Gie, doubting the humour of the Countesse of Beauieu, and moreouer mad at his ill vsage, keeping him as it were confined within Orleans, without liberty to go forth in safety; he parts from Orleans, vnder colour to goe a hauking: he takes the way to Fontenay, and from thence to Nantes, whether the Earle of Dunois went to meet him. This departure was presently knowne, and Parthenay was sodenly besieged, taken and razed, with many other places in Guienne, which belonged to the Earle of Cominges, and others that were in Britan. These men slept not. A league is presently made vnder the dukes of Britan and Orleans, whereinto there enters the prince of Orange, Francis of Lauall, Landaïs of Dinan and Chasteaubriant, John Lord of Rioux and Earle of Aumale Marshall of Britan, the Earles of Angoulesme and Dunois. The duke of Lorraine who finds no great satisfaction of promises, is easily drawne into it. Maximilian King of Romaines giues his consent. Charles opposeth Lewis of Bourbon, Earle of Roche-sur-Yon, great grand father to the duke Montpensier last deceased, and makes him his Lieutenant generall in this warre:

A league made by the Orleannois.

1487. with Lewis of Bourbon the yongest brother of the Earle of Vendosme, he giues them for assistant, maister Lewis of Tremouille Vicont of Thouars, who had married Gabrielle of Bourbon, sister to the said Conte Lewis.

Francis Duke of Brittain had no great reason to bee a Sanctuary for these mutines, and by receiuing them to draw all the forces of France vpon his decayed age, attending nothing but his graue. But supposing to protect him-selfe from the Kings surprises, hee must ruine his Country, his Nobility, and his subiects. But then fallies out an other accident. The Lords lately reconciled grew in ieaousie, that the French were come to reuenge the wrong done vnto their Duke: or else with their ruine and the Dukes to make their peace in France. They desired to send them home for two respects; the one to content the King and his Sister, the other for that they should not grow in any such credit with the Duke, as in the end he might employ them against them-selues, wishing in a manner for Landais, to oppose him against them. Moreouer they feared James Guise, a Captaine of the Dukes men at armes, and in good credit, Nephew to Landais and his seruant, least he should seeke some reuenge for his Vncles death. If it should be so, how could they subsist? The King discouers this secret ieaousie, and findes a good expedient, to thrust them on to their owne mutuall ruines. To this end he sends Andrew of Espinay Cardinall of Bourdeaux, and the Lord of Bouchage, with instructions to Rieux Marshall of Brittain, and commission to offer them men and meanes to expell the French out of Brittain.

The best aduised discover the Kings intent, that accepting of this offer, they make the way open for the King to enter into Brittain. But in the end they agree: That hee should not send into Brittain for this succour, above foure hundred lances, and foure thousand foote, and that at the Barons request. That the King should pretend nothing to the Duchie, whilest the Duke liued. That hee should not beseege nor take any Towne, Castell, or Fort within the Country: That when as the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of Dunois and others should take nothing without paying. That when as the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of Dunois and others should retire out of Brittain, the King should be bound to withdraw his forces. And for the Brittons: That the Noblemen of Brittain should arme with him, and accompany his armie to expell the French. The confirmation of these Articles is seconded with foure hundred Lances, and fiue or sixe thousand men led by the Lord of Saint Andre, who enters Brittain on the one side: the Earle of Rochefur-Yon on an other, and the Vicont of Tours on the third. All the Country is sodenly filled with French-men at armes, and the Orleanois are amazed, being vnfurnished both of force and counsel to resist. The Earle of Dunois being of more iudgement then the rest, considers, that the company of a hundred Lances belonging to Alain of Albret, was a part of those foure hundred commanded by Saint Andre: that it was conuenient to winne him, and with this dessein to put him in hope of the marriage of Anne of Brittain. An inuention according to the necessity of the time, but this was not the Earles intent, who laboured to winne her for the Duke of Orleans, neither the Prince of Oranges, who vnder hope of this alliance, had drawne the Arch-Duke Maximilian into this league, whereby hee should enter into Bourgogne, with a mighty army led by the Duke of Lorraine, whilest that he him-selfe should annoy the King in Flanders and Picardy. But great shewes and small fruits. He was so poore and needy, as the King might easily disappoint all his practises and stratagems. Now are we deeply ingaged in warre. The Duke of Brittain (accompanied with Lewis of Orleans, the Earles of Dunois and Cominges, the Lords of Montmorency, Joyeuz, du Lis, St. George, Dampierre and Beauuau) tooke a view of his army at Malestroit, consisting of six hundred Lances, and sixteene thousand foot, good & bad, ill armed and ill trained: whilest the French and Brittons being ioyned together, take Redon, & (to terrifie Rennes) they spoile the country euen vnto Meçay, besiege Ploermell, batter it, and in three daies take it, spoile & ransom it. The Dukes army marched to succor this towne, when as Maurice of Mene being great of body & courage said, whether go we my friends? Our Duke is onely governed by the French, by whose persuasions we march against the French, who at their first encounter will betray him to their nation, whereof I am well aduertised. Were we not better to remaine in our houses with our wives and children, then to be thus led by the humors of others? a speech of great consequence. He was of the best allied in Brittain, issued out of the house of Guerlesquin, & had well seru'd Lewis the xi. as gouernor of Guise and Captaine of a hundred men at armes in the wars against

A against the Flemings: a man of valour and counsell, and well aduanced by the said King, hauing the proffits of La Ferte-Bernard, Aiguesmortes, Benurage and Gorlonniere: but very inconstant in his changing of parties. At this speech they all scatter: so as of sixteene thousand, scarce the fourth part keepe the field: the Duke amazed here with, leaues Malestroit, and recouers Vennes: but he was pursued so speedely, as he loofeth his baggage, being faouored in his retreat by the Prince of Orange, who had posted from Nantes to his succor, very hapily: for other-wise he had beene beleeged and taken. Vennes being beleagard, yeelds for feare. The Duke at his departure had left two thousand eight hundred horse in it, vnder the command of Coetquen Lord Stuard of Brittain, and of Amanury of Moussay; and for Captaine of the towne James le Moine, who vnable to maintaine the sege, retired in hast. Coetquen went to Dinan, where he commanded; La Moussaye with his horse to Nantes, where the Duke was, and the Kings army did bend that waies. Adrian de l'Hospital a Captaine of men at armes, meetes him vpon the way, defeated him, kills a great number of his troupe, and takes many prisoners: some six hundred recouer Nantes. This was about Whitson tide. The Duke thus pressed, being weake in his person, and weake in his subiects: being diuided, weake in friends, weake in those who had ingaged him in this warre for their quarrel, sends the Earle of Dunois and Oliuer of Coetman (who soone after fell to the French and was made gouernor of Auxerre) to craue succors from Henry King of England. But to increase his misery, Henry was not yet in quiet possession of his realme, crossed by some remainders of Richards party, the which he must suppress. The King resolved to beseege the Duke in Nantes, he comes in person to Ancenis, thether come the associat Brittons, repenting their indiscretion, for that they had taken townes, and spoiled the country, contrary to their promise; and their owne lands suffered the like extremities. Thus Nantes was beleeged the 19. of Iune, well battred, well assailed, and as well defended. The deputies of England were foure times shipped to crosse the seas, and foure times put backe, by tempest of wether. Instead of English, they brought fifty thousand Brittons of the commons, greued to see their Duke beleeged. The Kings army, either holding themselves vnable to fight with them, or neglecting them as frutelesse forces, or doing it of purpose, the sooner to furnish the towne, gaue them free passage, and holding it likewise impossible to force a towne well furnished with commanders, men and victualls, they raised the sege the sixt of August, to go without losse of men to Dole: the which was taken and spoiled without resistance, the Brittons and other soldiers were put to ransom.

During the sege of Nantes, Peter of Rohan Earle of Quintin, of the French faction, surprised Montcontour, and summoned Guingamp, a passage for succors that came to the Duke from the Bishopriks of Treguer, Leon and Cornouaille. John of Coetman Lord of Chasteaugui, Captaine of the Towne, was at Nantes. He flies thither, and furnisheth the place with men sufficient to defend it, and hauing intelligence that Plusquelice with about fifty Gentlemen, Bretons of the Kings army, spoyling the country and drawing the Nobility to their party, dined in the Abby of Begar, hauing called together the neighbour parishes, and assembled some troupes, he charged them, ouerthrew them, and led them all prisoners to Guingamp: where the Iudges of Goello and Guincamp, by the Dukes expresse comandement, began to informe against them, and had finished their proccesse, if some friends and kinsmen had not found meanes of delay, vntill the Dukes death ended that proceeding. This prise gaue courage to the Capitaines of Dinan. They assemble about fiue thousand men, and beseege Montcontour. But the Vicont of Rohan, and the Earle of Quintin, offering to succour it, and moreover the sege of Nantes requiring force and expedition, they retire to Rennes, to ioine with the other forces, consisting of six or seauen thousand men. At the same instant Yvon of Rocerf, Lord of Bois de la Roche, and Peter Long Lord of Kaeruegues (inticed with the great welth which the Earle of Quintin had left in his Castell,) assemble some soldiars with many peasants, and beseege Quintin: they take it, and against the composition sworne, spoile the towne and Castell, and (in hatred of the Earle, who followed the King) burnt it to ashes. The Earle by meanes of his subiects recovered it soone after: and Gouquet captaine thereof before, expelled them againe, and spoiled the towne. But to what end serued this cruell stratagem, seeing that Rocerf had a house in the country, and the Earle good meanes to be reuenged: as he was a yeare after, by 1487. by the taking of Rocess himselfe, and the spoile and burning of his house? The Phrigiens A grow wise too late; sayeth the Prouerbe. The Nobilitie of Brittanie finding their error, by drawing the Kings forces into the countrie, to their owne ruine, they send to the Duke: protesting to be no way associat with the King, but to defend themselves against the French that were neere his person, who they doubted had bene drawne in to preiudice them: they offer to serue him hereafter, and against all men, so as he will pardon them. The Duke receiues them, and grants his letters of abolition, deliuerie and restitution of all their goods and dignities, as before the warres, namely, to the Vicount of Rohan, to the Lords of Auagour and Rieux, (lately put from the office of Lieutenant generall, and Marshall of Brittanie) as well for themselves as their assistants. Rieux enjoyed it, but the rest persisted in the Kings seruice. In the meane time the Kings armie prepares to go into Base Brittanie, and to beseege Guingamp: but the Marshall of Rieux changing his partie, makes them to change their proiect. Rieux was at Ancenis, wonderfully perplexed to see the French entred the Countrie, by a breach which the Nobilitie of Brittain had voluntarily made them, deuising some meanes to repaire these confusions, drawne thereunto by his reception into grace. The Earle of Cominges going Ambassador to the King, passed by Ancenis, and confirmed Rieux in this good resolution, perswading him to go vnto the Duke, with assurance that he should be graciously receiued. Rieux thinking to strike two strokes with one stone, sends Francis du Bois to the King, who at that time was at Pont de Larche: giuing him intelligence that the Duke of Orleance, the Prince of Orange and others retired into Brittanie, were willing to leaue the Countrie, so as they might rest safely in their houses, without touch for that was passed. Which beeing concluded, he beseeched his Maiestie to retire his men at armes, according to the treatie he had signed with his owne hand. Anne hearing this proposition. My friend (said she vnto the gentleman) say vnto my Cousin the Marshall of Rieux, your master, that the King hath no companion and seeing he is entred so far, he will make it good. The Earle had no better satisfaction. An answer discovering the kings intention, which was to incorporate this Dutchy to the crowne: the which caused the Marshall to yeeld to his Prince without dissembling. He drawes some fouldiers from Nantes in October, & deliueis his town of Ancenis into their hands, swearing they should keepe it for the Duke. In the end Francis of Lauai, Baron of Chasteaubrian, sonne in law vnto Rieux, suffers him to enter the Castel, holding him to be the kings seruant. Being the stronger, and lodging his troupe within the towne, he commands, (seeing that the King had broken the contract) all those that would not sweare fidelity and seruice to the Duke, to retire the next day with bag and baggage. Could he beill receiued of his Maister, carrying with him the deliuey of two so good places? The Prince of Orange hauing ioyned with some Germane succours, sent by Maximilian, and lead by Baldwin, Bastard of Bourgongne, and some three thousand men of the countries of Cornouaille, Leon, Treguer, and Goello, resolved to besiege Quintin, where the Brittons (ioyned with the French that were commanded by the Barron of Pont-Chateau) did wonderfully annoy Guingamp: who being in a towne vnfit for warre, left the place, and gaue the Prince meanes to campe before La Chaise a Castell belonging to the Vicount of Rohan, but weakened by the losse of many of his men, part of them going daily to the French, and part disbanding by reason of the winter; he retired his army to Montcontour, resolute to take a view, and to punish such as were departed without licence. Yet notwithstanding all his care, and the Dukes seuer command to the gentlemen, to returne to the Campe within two daies, vpon paine of the losse of their goods and honours, and to others of corporall punishment, those few forces which remained, vanished sodenly.

Rieux results from the King.

Ancenis and Chasteaubrian were led to the Duke.

Competitors for the heire of Britanny.

Thus the Duke wauers, betwixt hope and feare, fortified on the one side, but weakened on the other, seeing his estate incline to ruine. He had two pillars, which in his conceit might raise him, or at the least support him; Anne and Isabel. The Prince of Orangewood Anne, for Maximilian; Rieux, the Lady of Lauai, and the greatest part of the Nobility, for Alain of Albret. The first promised greater conditions, yet the King had incombred him much in Flanders, supporting the Garois against him, so as he could not succour his pretended Father in Law, neither with his person, nor his subiects; hauing small credit amongst them, and lesse mony: for that they would not assist him to preiudice the King.

A Alain (whome others call Amand) had some forces in hand; and fed with this plausible hope, he brought about a thousand men out of Castile, and three thousand Gascons. The Duke would willingly haue made two sonnes in lawe of one daughter, and vrgent necessity forced him, (like vnto Charles of Bourgongne) to promise her to many, whom he could giue but to one: euen as Erichonius satisfied his gluttonie and continuall hunger, whereunto Ceres had condemned him (hauing cut downe her groue) by the many sales of his daughter Marsya. In the end Anne is promised to Maximilian, who should come to marrie in Brittanie, and withall, he should bring great troupes of men to succor the Duke against the oppression of the French. But he abuseth no lesse then he is abused. Hereupon Alain comes with his Castilians and Gascons. At his first arriuall he went to salute the Duke at Nantes, and then his mistresse, thinking to haue the greatest interest in her loue. But oftentimes two braue Grey-hounds courting of a Hare, a third crosse them, and carries away the game, as wee shall soone see. The Marshall of Rieux beeing arriued, gaue his consent in fauour of Alain, at the Countesse of Lauais request, sister in law to the said Alain. It was no time now to leaue this Marshall (newly reconciled) idle. The Duke giues him the charge of his armie, with commission to take Vennes, where Gilbert of Grassai, and Philip of Moulin, (of whome wee shall make mention in the battaile of Fornoue) commanded. He marcheth thither, batters it, and takes it by composition, the third of March. Then Saint Cir and Forrais (who led the hundred men at armes of Alains companie) declared themselves Brittons by their Capitaines commandement, building friuolously vpon this marriage: yet some of the companie retired to the King. The Kings armie wintered, but Lewis of Bourbon aduertised of the raking of Vennes by Rieux, requites him by the surprize of Ancenis and Chasteaubrian, places razed neere the riuier, to make the sege of Fougères more easie, on the one side, being a frontier towne, and of good defence, and on the other side, that of S. Albin le Cormier. The Brittons armie had bene eightene moneths in field without rest, to make head against the French, but now they must shew what courage is in them. The Duke of Orleance, Alain of Albret, the Earle of Dunois, the Marshall of Rieux, the Lord Seales an Englishman, (commanding some three hundred men of his nation, sent by Henry King of England, by the meanes of the Lord Manspertuis) the Seignior of Leon, eldest sonne to the Vicount of Dunois, the Seigniors of Chasteaubrian, Crenetes, Pont l'Abbe, Pleisis, Baliczon, Montigni, Balues, Montuel, and other Capitaines of bands, go forth of Nantes, with an intent to raise the sege. Their armie was 400. Lances, and 8000. foote, (besides 300. English, and 800. Germanes, sent by Maximilian) with good store of Artillerie, for this great rabble armed, and tumultuously assembled by the Earle of Dunois, had bene in a manner all sent backe, as an vnprofitable burthen vpon the earth.

But the matter is of importance, the French are not so easily forced to rise, and if an occasion of battaile be offered, shall they accept it? The Marshall of Rieux (best experienced in matters of warre) with some others, are not of that opinion: for to what end (say they) should we hazard the estate and countrie, vpon an euent which may be auoided. If we loofe the day, by what meanes shall we releue our selues? The Souldiers that shall remaine after the ouerthrow, will want courage, and change their minds: the people would bee amazed, the Townes stand in suspence, the Conquerour would become master of the Countrie, and take all Townes he should attempt without resistance. It were best to temporize, and to in campe at Rennes, beeing well furnished with victuals and things necessarie, and in the meane time, to keepe the enemy occupied, forcing him to lie in field, tiring him with their horsemen, and cutting off his forrage, or else to lodge the armie in the frontier townes, to shutte vp the victuals, and attend the winter: which beeing come, the enemy shall haue no means to lodge abroad, but must of force dislodge: and in the meane time, we shall see what profit will grow by the leagues of the Kings of England and Castile; of the Arch-duke, and the Duke of Lorraine; all which giue the Duke great hope, to countermine the Kings practises in Brittanie. The rest (rashly thrust on, partly by a young and boiling humour, partly with desire to make triall of their forces) make answer. That the souldiers are wearied with this long bearing of armes without effect; that hauing now an opportunitie to do well, they obseue a great ioy in their resolutions, the which it was more fitte to nourish then to quench: that their forces were vnited alkogether, and asked nothing but employment; and that delay 1488. lay would make them leaue their Ensignes by litle and litle. In the meane time, Fougeres was at the last gaspe; a towne of importance, and one of the keyes of the countrie, that to leaue it in this extremitie, were to shew a manifest prooue of cowardise to all the rest. To conclude, they say in a manner, that to temporise, were to play the cowards. The first opinion was most probable, but the vehemencie of the Earle of Dunois, and the heate of yonger heades carried it. All march: but see the pittifull first fruites of their first lodging at Andouille, a village vpon the way from Rennes to S. Albin, a contention fals betwixt the duke of Orleance, and the Lord of Albret, a man of great reuenues, father to John the last of that name, King of Nauarre: but his mistresse did not affect him, a good scholler in dissembling to vse the power of Albret, for the benefit of the Duke her father. The Duke of Orleance did flie a higher pitch, and by the mediation of the Earle of Dunois, was very farre in fauor with Anne of Brittain: Alain discouers some good shewes of Anne, to the Duke of Orleans, whereupon they grow to so bitter words, as the day approching they were readie to fight. But the enimie beeing at hand, was it now time to contend, to the preiudice of a whole armie? But now the foresight of the Marshall of Brittain, doth pacifie all vpon this diuision: they receiue two seuerall aduertisements. Saint Aulbin of Cormier was battered by the French with three batteries, and yeilded by composition, with their liues and goods saued: a small towne, but furnished with a very good Castle, but at that time vnfurnished of men, victuals and munition, and Fougeres yeilded vpon the like accord: S. Aulbin was commanded by William of Rosneuen, an ancient Captaine, who had had a commaund of men at armes vnder Charles the 7. and Lewis the eleuenth, but in the warres betwixt Charles the 8. and the Duke of Brittain, he returned to serue his naturall Prince. The Brittons arme marcheth to recouer this place, and the French to preserue their conquests, when as behold there riseth a mutinie among the Brittons. It is secretly murmured, that the French Commanders their associats, had intelligence with the heads of the French armie, the which suggestion did euen then hazard all, and if the Brittons had beene farther off, without feare of charge, they had easily disbanded. The Duke of Orleance, and the Prince of Orange aduertised of this conceit, had great paine to worke any other impression. What do they? to giue an assurance of the contrarie, they leaue their horses, and sweare all to fight on foote with the Brittons and Germanes. A more bold then wise resolution, but necessitie did force them to appease this mutinie which tended to sedition.

The order of the Brittons
armie.

The order of the French.

The battaile of
S. Aulbin.

They order their troupes to fight. The Fore-ward to the Marshall of Rieux: the battell to the Lord of Albret, with some horse to couer his flanks. The Rere-ward to Chasteaubriant, and on either side, their carriages of artillerie and baggage to couer some of their foote, being fauoured on their flanke with a small groue betwixt Saint Albin, and the village of Oranges. And to make the small numbers of strangers seeme great, they attire twelue hundred, (some say, seuentene hundred) Brittons, with cassocks bearing a red crosse, the English liuerie. Lewis of Tremouille in the absence of Lewis of Bourbon his brother in lawe, commaunded the Kings armie. He giues the fore-ward to Adrian del Hospital, an old French Captaine, and famous in this warre: he takes the battaile to himselfe, and giues the rere-ward to the Marshall of Baudricourt, pressed by a more sudden charge then he expected. Gabriel of Mont-fauois with ten or twelue horsemen, sent out to obserue the Brittons countenance makes report of their good order.

The two armies approach, the artillerie thunders, and kills many men of either side; a skirmish continues about two houres, which giues the French leysure to order their battaile. The two fore-wards ioine, the Brittons endure the shooke so couragiously, as the French yeeld to the resolute valour of the Marshall of Rieux, who goes to charge the battaile: and at the first they kill Claude of Montfort, a braue Captaine, sent by the King of England to succour the Duke, and the Lord Scales, a valiant Knight, with some others of the foremost rancke. Blaise a Germane Captaine, to couer himselfe from the French artillerie, changeth his quarter, marching byas-wise with his battalion, like vnto a Croisant: but hee is sodainly charged in flanke by foure hundred French horse, broken, and many of them slaine. At the same instant, two hundred horse charge those which had the baggage in charge, and force them to retire. The Brittons horse that flanked the armie, growes amazed, and leaues the foote naked. They charge them, and force them all to giue way, and all flie, some here, some there, there, the Brittons horse into the wood, and likewise their foote. The Duke of Orleance, and Earle of Dunois fighting vnhappy on foote, do what possibly may be expected from such gallant Princes, but the Duke flying among the Germanes was taken in the wood, the other seeing this generall ouerthrow, tore off his blacke crosse, the liuerie of Brittain, and hid himselfe among the dead bodies: an Archer (that had beene of his company) knew him, and both of them were led prisoners to S. Aulbin, whence the Duke of Orleance was soone after carried to the great Tower of Bourges. The Marshall of Brittain, and the Lord of Albret saued themselves in Dinan by the swiftnesse of their horses. All the counterfeit English with red crosses were slaine without remission.

The Lord of Leon (sonne to the Vicount of Rohan) Pont l'Abbe, the Lord Scales, (an Englishman issued from that braue Talbot) Montfort (kinsman to the Prince of Orange) with sixe thousand souldiers of their armie were slaine. Mosen Gralla (a name fauouring of the Iewe) Lord Steward to Ferdinand King of Castile, and chiefe of the Spanish troupes, was taken prisoner. Of the French, James Galeot a Neopolitane, a valiant and renowned Captaine: and others to the number of a thousand or twelue hundred men, but few of any mark. This was on Monday, the 28. of Iuly: a day of great import for the State, the which did wonderfully shake the Dukes affaires, beeing troubled in mind, and his subiects tired with toyle and terror, whereof doth follow practises of places, yeelding vp of Townes, and finally, euery one frames himselfe to follow the Conquerors fortune: a day eternizing the happy memorie of that Noble Knight, Lewis of Tremouille, great great Grandfather to Claude Lord of Tremouille last deceased, Duke of Thouars, Prince of Talmond, Earle of Guignes, &c. and of the noble Princeesse, Charlotte Katherine of Tremouille, Princeesse of Conde, Countesse of Taillebourg, Baronesse of Suiile, Craon, Boufiniers, S. Hermine, la Chaise, in the Vicountie, &c. mother to the most high and mightie Prince Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, and first Peere of France, &c. hauing at the age of 25. or 26. yeares, by his incomparable valour and vertue, wonne the honour of so memorable a victorie. The next day, the Lord of Tremouille turnes towards Rennes, summons the towne, and (to terrifie the Inhabitants) hee lodgeth his armie in the Villages of Acigne, Chasteaugiron, Veru, S. Suplice, and others thereabout. The Heralds returne an answer: That the King had no right to the towne, and that he wrongfully made warre in Brittain; That notwithstanding his forces and happie successe, God the guardian of their right, might do vnto him, as he had in former times to King John before Poitiers, and to Philip of Valois at Crecy. That if Tremouille come, he shall find twentie thousand men to resist him. So the armie leauing Rennes, marcheth to Dinan, vnder the command of the Vicount of Rohan, Amaulry of Mouffay, Gouverneur of the towne, compounds at the first summon, to deliuer it into the Kings hands, vpon the accustomed conditions in like cases: to commit the guard thereof to whom he pleased, and the inhabitants to sweare vnto the King: which done, the French armie should retire. On the other side, Guy the fifteenth of that name, Earle of Laual, causeth some French troupes to enter by night into his Castell of Vitré, and so they became masters of the towne: and by the same meanes he drew his brother Francis Lord of Chasteaubriant, and Montafiant to the Kings partie. The Baron of Pont-Chasteau, brother to the Vicount of Rohan, followed the example of Francis of Auau-gour, the Dukes base sonne, who had alreadie deliuered the towne and castle of Cliffon into the Kings hands; and the greatest part of the Nobilitie followed the same course. Hereafter we shall see a ciuill warre, rather then a forraigne. And for the last worthie exploit of this armie, Tremouille besegeth S. Malo, both towne and castell, one of the strongest places in Brittain, beautified with a goodly hauen. It was able to hold out against the forces of a mightie armie, as well for the seate thereof, as for the fortification: but they easily enter into composition. The Kings affaires aduanced thus, as the Dukes declined: his Maiestie beeing at Angiers, he propounds in Councell whether he should proceed to an absolute conquest of the Duchie, lease vpon the dukes person, and his daughters, giue them some pension, and marry them at his pleasure. He wanted no fire-brands in Court, to kindle these combustions, disperfed throughout all Brittain. My Lege (say they) if you once get the father and his daughters into your hands, you shall easily obtaine the whole countie, without striking stroke, and reduce the Nobilitie at your discretion. Guy of Rochefort Chan-

proposition in Councell.

1488. Chancellor of France, a iust man, and of a good conscience, shewes, That the Duke of Orleans recetrete into Brittanie, had bene the chiefe motiue to draw downe the Kings forces. That his Maiestie hauing now the said Duke in his power, the cause ceasing, the effect shold cease, That the Duke was somewhat to be excused, if by the bond of alliance and affinitie, he had bene intangled in the disgraces of these Noblemen, fledde vnder the shadow of his wing. Moreouer, the King had no iust cause to pursue his owne vassall with such violence, to ruine his estate, to inuade a pupils patrimonie, and to spoile her of her Grandfathers inheritance. If the King were not satisfied to haue the chiefe motiues of these confusions in his power, he armed himselfe with a transport made to K. Lewis, by the Lord of Bouffac and Nicole of Brittanie his wife: that he must then examine the titles, and appoint men to looke B into the rights of the one and the other: if the Kings pretensions were iust, it was in him to put them in execution: if not, the people would exclaime against this violence, and God the protector of the oppressed, would soone or late, raise vp some to reuenge it: for the peoples voice, is the voice of God, who cries to Princes; Doe right to the needie and Orphelins: do iustice to the afflicted and poore. This aduice made the Lords of the Councell pause awhile, and many in the end conclude: That it was more conuenient to agree vpon Iudges, to decide this controuersie iudicially. Doubtlesse God holds the hearts of men in suspence, and makes them yeeld to what he pleaseth: But our Countesse of Beauieu was not well pleased with this resolution, hoping to haue the Earledome of Nantes for her share. They let the Duke vnderstand what the Councell had decreed. The crosses, distemperatures, age, and weaknesse of iudgement, hindred the apprehension of his affaires, yet will hee deale surely. He chargeth the Earles of Dunois and Cominges with offers and submissions to the King, the King referres them to Verger to consider thereof: a house belonging to the Marshall of Gyé. Behold there growes great pretensions. The King pretends the proprietie of Britanny, by reason of the grant made by Bouffac. The Vicount of Rohan had not renounced his interest. He descended of Mary of Brittanie, sister to Marguerite the Dukes first wife, the onely heire of Francis the first, and Mary preceded the Duke that then was, in degree of blood. But the pittie was, she was a woman.

Pretendants
for Brittanie.

As for the pretended rights and grants of Bouffac, they answered: that the matter had bin fully decided by the treatie made at the Abbey of Victorie, and many others. To the Vicount of Rohan: That it was ended by the contract of marriage, testaments, and ordinances of Dukes their Predecessors, and decrees of Parliaments. But the King hauing two strings to his bow, like a Conqueror, grew wilfull, and his sister Beauieu more then he. If one failed, the other was ready bent. Charles demands the ward-ship of the Dukes daughters. It was of purpose, that obtaining this ward-ship, hee might marrie Anne at his pleasure, being twelue yeares old, and her sister seuen. This might not be; the Nobilitie would neuer haue endured it. Moreouer, Charles discouers, that forraigne Princes repined thereat, and were readie to imbrace this quarrell. They must therefore agree vpon Iudges, and a certaine place. Yet leauing nothing of his conquests of Brittanie, and being seized of some townes won by their swords, let the Iudges determine what they will, we will do what we please. In the end they E draw Articles: the King accepts them, and sends them to the Duke being at Coyron vpon Loire, where the Duke remained. He signes them, some willingly, the rest by force: enioying this happinesse in the end of his daies, to haue changed this wretched warre into a publicke rest.

The Duke
dies.

new and strange demands,

So, a peace is concluded, and sworne on either part, the one and twentieth of August. The King promiseth to call home all his men at armes, and the Duke to dismisse all strangers: he promiseth to giue the King for hostages, the Lord of Montafiant, Rainfort, and the sonne of the Lord Stewart of Brittanie: and within a certaine time, to assemble the Estates of the Countrie, and to make them confirme this treatie. But Francis the second of that name, Duke of Brittanie, oppressed with griefe, melancholy, and age, and fore brused with F a fall: fallies sicke and dies the ninth of September, leauing the Marshall of Rieux guardian of his daughters, the Earle of Cominges for an assistant, and Francis of Laual, Ladie of Chateaubriant for gouernesse.

Presently after the Dukes decease, the King sends Ambassadors to Anne the new Duchesse, who giues her to vnderstand, that the Kings intention was to maintaine the treaty

A treatie made betwixt his Maiestie, and the Duke deceased: but to make it more firme, it was expedient for her to yeeld in three points to the King. The first: That seeing they were allyed vnto the King, reason would, that he should haue the guard, or wardship, and during their minoritie, the disposing of their lands and Seigneuries. The second: That Commissioners appointed should decide their controuersie, touching the principallitie of Brittanie, by the first day of Ianuarie next ensuing: and in the meane time, neither the one, nor the other, should carrie the name nor the authoritie of Duchesse, nor receiue the oath of fealtie. The third: That all strangers should voide the countrie, as was contained in their contract. Anne makes answer: that she desires to keepe the treatie betwixt the King and her deceased father, without any other conditions: And for confirmation of her words, she calls a Parliament the 29. of December following, as the Duke was bound, to haue them ratifie the conuentions of peace. In the meane time there were robberies, taking of ransomes, massacres, thefts, depolation of the Countrie, sale of townes, euen as in open warres. The Vicount of Rohan laboured to winne the townes by sweet words, and amiable letters, he shewes vnto them the miseries of this warre, farre from any end, by the decease of their Duke: that at his request, the King had retired his armie, attending, if the Nobilitie and commons, would put themselves into the hands of the said Rohan, vnder whose commaund his Maiestie meant they should remaine, otherwise he was readie to reduce the obstinate to reason by force. Rennes, Guincamp and others (to whom he had particularly written) answer: That neither they nor the rest, can or ought acknowledge any other commander then the Duchesse: to whom during her fathers life, (and since his decease) they were bound by oath. Moreouer, they were aduertised that the King was resolu'd to entertaine a peace with their Princeesse, in the same manner as had heene accorded. They beseech him to rest satisfied with this answer, vntill they be informed of the Duchesse intention, of the Councels, and the Marshall of Rieux: and in the meane time, to haue the good of the countrie, and the peace in recommenda- tion.

New troubles
by the Vicont of Rohan.

This answer puts the Vicont into choller, and the Earle of Quintin his brother thrusts him on, being desirous to be reuenged for the often taking, and spoiling of his towne. He goes to field with his troupe, and neere vnto Pontrieu he encounters some men gathered together, with an intent to go to succour the Duchesse: he doth charge them, defeats them, and kills a part of them, being abandoned by some Gentlemen that conducted them: then he takes and sackes Pontrieu and Chateaulin vpon Trieuf, and so makes his way to Guincamp. He summons Chero and Gouicquet Capitaines, to yeeld the towne. They answer, that they will not obey him, so long as there shall be a Duke or Duchesse in Brittanie. Vpon this refusall, he sends a Capitaine called S. Pierre; Seneshall of Tholoufa, and La Forest to be-leaguar it: who being repulsed out of the suburbs of Treguer, takes them of Montbareil and Pontauquen, spoile and burne them; and Rohan being arriued, hee takes the suburbs of S. Croix: then he lodgeth in Monthareil, from whence he discouereth the whole towne so plainly, as he might shoote point-blanke into the market place: he burnes a part of the suburbs, and lodgeth his artillerie; he plants another batterie in the Iacobins garden, to batter the curtain of the wall betwixt the ports of Rennes and Fontani, and he makes a breach but not sufficient, yet he giues an assault, and is repulsed. The next day he changeth his batterie, and plants it at the vpper end of the Friars garden: he plays a whole day, beates downe a part of the wall, betwixt the Ports of Montbareil and Treguer: he offers a second assault, but it was as valiantly defended as assailed. Gouicquet thrust into the thigh with a pikey is carried out of the fight. The night brings counsell, and those which had withstood two assaults, will be vnable for the third, being now weakened of one of their chiefe supports, who was made vnable to serue, by reason of his hurt: morning being come, a truce is granted, to take aduice of their Duchesse. Rohan presseth it, and the Capitaines seeing their men decayed in number, as well by the taking of the suburbs, as at the two assaults, compound for tennethousand Crownes to the Generall, to retire his armie, and to receiue them into his protection, promising to furnish victuals & munition for the seerge of Conquer, the which he had charge from the King to beseege, and for want of present money, by reason of the losses sustained by the warre, to giue hostages. But this parle was fruitolous. During which time Capitaine Brijfel declares himself for the French, seizeth vpon the gate of the tower Quencile, & brings Fougères taken.

1489. brings in the Earle of Quintin, (who gaped onely for reuenge of this place) hee takes and spoiles the Towne, and ransomes the inhabitants, and amongst them Captaine Chero: Gouiques saues him-selfe at la Roche de Rien. This chanced the three and twenty of Ianuary, after fīue dayes siege. Conquet yeelds vpon their approach, and Brest followed, a most strong place, and the key of all the Country.

The pittfull estate of Brittany.

Thus Ploermel, Chasteaubriant, Malestroit, Vitre, Fougères, S. Malo, Dinan, S. Aulbin, Guingamp, Conquet, Brest, and other places, are in the Kings power. The Nobility disposed for the most part of their best places, shroud them-selues vnder the conqueror: there is small hope of succours. The English are diuided amongst them-selues: the King of the Romaines hath worke at home, and those small succours that come from both, preuaile nothing: there is no money in the treasury, the Souldiers are not paid, the Crowne is worth eight Frankes: Anne is forced to sell of her reuenues for the maintenance of her house: and to aggrauate these mischiefs, her counsell is greatly diuided about her marriage. The Marshall of Rieux, and the Lady of Laual, hold for Alain of Albret, but shee will none of him. She protests, that what soeuer she had done in her fathers life, was in respect of him, being loth to disobey him, or to giue him discontent; and causeth the said protestation to be signified vnto him. The Chancellor and the Earle of Cominges, support her against the Marshall: he flies to armes, and besiegeth the Chancellor at Guerrende, (being seized of Annes person, to keepe her from falling into his hands, who would marry her against her will, where he pleased,) but he could not enter. All these confusions made an easie way to the King, for the execution of his enterprises. Being thus oppressed, he sends to her allies, the Kings of England, Castile and Romaines: the English succour her (and in a manner beyond her expectation) with an army of nine or ten thousand men, vnder the command of Cheney Maister of the horse, accompanied with the Comptroller, and Ambassador of England: not for any hatred he bare vnto the King, but for feare of too mighty a neighbour, if hee vnited this goodly Prouince to the crowne. The Marshall of Rieux, (hauing an other meaning a part, seeking to tye the English commanders vnto him, and to draw them to his faction) sends the maister of the horse of Brittany, and the Lord of Kaeroussi, to Penmarch, to receiue this Ambassador, and to offer him a conuoy to go to the Duchesse, (who to haue this army neere vnto her person, makes it to land at Croisic, a port neere vnto Guerrende.) And to haue the people at his deuotion, Rieux giues out, that the Earles of Dunois and Cominges, the Chancellor and others, had laid a plot to deliuer the Duchesse to the French King. Anne fortified with this new supply, goes to field, desirous her selfe (being a Virgin) to affront the Marshall of Rieux, if he presented him-selfe: and being preuented of her entry into Nantes by the Marshall, she retires to Rennes, to giue order for the recouery of Guingamp. For this effect, shee assembles some troupes, being assured that the French garrison could not be sodenly releued, the Kings army being imployed farre off in the conquest of the Townes of base Brittain. These troupes were seized of Pontrieu, & to stop the courtes of Guingamp, had sent some Gentlemen, with a number of the common people. Those of Guingamp, incounter them, charge them, ouer-throw them, & kill many of the chiefe Gentlemen of note, William of Rostrenen Lord of Breledi, Tuon of Ploesquer Seigneur of Katergabin, Tuon of Lesuersault, Kaerlot, Pontglou, Kaermechriou, Botloy, Pregent the eldest sonne to the Lord of Lanchriou, and an infinite number of the commons. They presently take Pontrieu, sack it, and burne it. This was the 7. of April. The next day, Gouiques being aduertised that about 1500. men of the English army, appeared at the Isle of Brehat, he went vnto them, and so wrought with the commanders, as they landed at Pontrieu. The French hauing notice hereof, being about 1500. horse, being loth to ingage their honours in a place not to be held, without succors, and ill furnished with victuals and munition, they set fire of many places of the towne, carry away what they can, exact 12. thousand crownes of the inhabitants, and retire them-selues, leading eight hostages, for the security of fifty thousand Frankes, granted by the inhabitants to the Vicount of Rohan. This English army was presently followed by another of Spaniards, commanded by Don Diego Peres of Sarmiento Earle of Salmas, consisting of 2000. men at armes, & a great number of foot. Now Anne is strong, fortified with two new armies, and the king feares, that in steed of inuading another mans country, he shall be forced to defend his owne. To preuent all danger, he fortifies his

Spanish.

A frontiers, and sends Francis of Luxembourg, Vicount of Martigues, and Charles of Marigni, to Henry the 7. King of England, to draw him from the alliance of Brittain, considering his bond vnto the King, by whose meanes he was installed in the royall throne: but they were fruitlesse admonitions. The King calls for his Nobilitie, and all his companies of men at armes, and resolues to enter Brittain with the greatest forces of his Realme. In the mean time he puts two thousand 4. hundred foote into Chasteaugontier and Prouence: John of Bellay with his companie of fortie lances into Brest: into Conquet Claude of Montaulon, and Bongars a Captaine of foote, with artillerie, victuals and munition: and foure thousand French and Swizzers were distributed into Dinan, Fougères, Saint Malo, and Vitre. But this was not sufficient to assure these places: a man of seruice doth oftentimes import more then the whole bodie of a towne. He therefore practiseth with John of Quellence, Vicount of Fou, Admirall of Brittain, by the meanes of the Vicount of Rohan. This Admirall armes some ships, to keepe the Brittons from beseeing of Brest by sea, and Maurice du Méné (of whom we haue made some mention) with the Lord of Chastell (newly reduced to the Kings seruice, by the Lord of Kaerisac) tooke the guard of the sea coast, to hinder the enemies landing. In the meane time the Brittons lodge their strangers at Lamballe, and assemble all into one bodie. The Marshall of Rieux, impatient to haue beene left Tutor vnto Anne by testament, and not to haue her in his possession, being too weake to take her by force in regard of Alain, he seekes to the English, and sends Sourdeac to Henry, to let him vnderstand, that Albret might assist him much in the recouerie of Guienne. That it were good to binde him vnto him by the marriage of Anne of Brittain, and to sequester those from her that were opposite. If he please, he hath the meanes to draw her into his Captaines power, vnder color to perswade her to visit these great & goodly succors, that were come to serue her. Yet could he not preuaile in this point. She had already conceived some ielousie of the English for her Treasurer (carrying them fixe thousand Crownes, which they had required, attending their pay) had discovered, that they treated with the Kings men, and that they were now in speech of a truce. Being moued herewith, she doth aduertise Henry, and beseecheth him to giue order, beleeuing that this dealing was not with his consent. She complains moreover, that the Marshall of Rieux detained Nantes from her, kept her reuenues, placed and displaced her officers: beseeching the King to command the Lieutenants of his army, to giue no support nor fauor vnto Rieux against her, but to pursue him as a rebell, and disobedient to his Princesse, attempting against her and her authority. Henry won by the Marshall, assures the Duchesse of the continuance of his great loue, and that he will answer at large to that which her Ambassadors had propounded, by some that he would send vnto her. In the meane time he desires his army shold go to Rennes to the Duchesse, or that she might go to them, to the end she might visibly see, if those forces were sufficient to succor her. And he giues her to vnderstand by Tusbourne Secretary of State, that he had sent his army to succour her against all men, and especially against Rieux: so as the armie, with the commanders may come to her to Rennes, or that she may go to the army, as she shall thinke best. A grosse policie, easily discovered at the first sight, that this was but a practise to put her and the chiefe of her Council into strangers hands, to rule her at their pleasure. Anne finds this condition of hard digestion. And Henry fearing lest this distrust should make her to sue for an accord with the King; aduise, that the surest meanes to fortifie the Duchesse party against the French, was the Marshalls reconciliation with her: and wrought therein so politickly, that by mediation of John of Coetman and other Noblemen of Brittain, an accord was made betwixt the Duchesse, the Earle of Cominges, and others of that partie, with the Lords of Albret and Rieux, and the Lady of Laual: so as in the beginning of Ianuary all quarrels were pacified, and all were vnited in the common seruice of their country. During this treatie, the Marshall well informed that Brest and Conquet wanted both munition and victuals, went to beseege the fortresse of Brest by land and sea with threescore Britton ships: and the English went to Conquet. The King knowing how much these places did import, sends S. Pierre and Chazeron with 5. thousand foote, to ioyne with the forces of Rohan, Saint Andre, the Seneshals of Tholoufa and Carcassonne: and to draw forth part of the Garrisons of Vitre, Fougères and Dinan, and five and twentie shippes by sea, which put all the gallies of Brittain to flight; and after their example, the army at land retires so hastily, as they leaue part of their Cannon, wherewith

was freed from the feege of the English. Winter approched, and the cold and rainie weather forced both armies to leaue the field. And therefore a new truce was concluded, during the which, Iudges should be appointed to examine the interest of all parties: who for that effect should be sent to Auignon, a neuter towne, and they should name a neuter Prince who (according to the report of the Iudges) should decide the controuersie. Maximilian was chosen. Doubtlesse it was a folly to spend much in spies, and want good intelligence. The King beeing vpon the point to consummate his mariage with the Arch-dukes daughter, relyed on him. But in whose fauour should he giue sentence, beeing in no good rearmes with the king: and hoping on the other side to ioyne vnto his ordinarie titles; the qualitie of Duke of Brittain? Charles and Anne send their deputies vnto him, who are referred to Francford. The Iudges come and pronounce a sentence, but not definitiue: That the King should deliuer all such places as he held, vnto the Duchesse, except S. Aubin, Cormier, Dinan, Fougères, and S. Malo, which should be sequestered into the hands of Maximilian; and the Duke of Bourbon: to yeld them vnto him to whom the Duchie should be adiudged: and all Frenchmen that bare armes, should leaue the countrie, and the Duchesse likewise should dismissthe English and other strangers. Taking a new assignation at Tournay, to iudge definitiue of the cause, but all this was but to winne time, Maximilian makes his peace with the King, for his owne regard, whereby many places he held in Flanders were deliuered: and during these treaties, Isabell the sister of Anne of Brittain dies at Rennes the tenth of Iune.

Anne remaining sole heire, the King of Romaines loue increased, and the Duchesse desired to be supported against the King made her willingly to yeeld. And for that Maximilian could not go in person, he deutes the Earle of Nassau, wolfgang Baron of Polhem in Austria, James Comdebaux his Secretarie, and Lopian Steward of his house, with authoriti to treat, and conclude the marriage and to wed the said Duchesse. Notwithstanding the truce, no man will leaue his hold, neither will the King giue ouer the places he holds, nor the Duchesse dismissthe her strangers, but some part of them, and puts therest into garrisons. Shee sends not to Auignon, fearing perhaps the surprize of her writings. The garrison of Nantes runnes ouer Poictou, Aniou, and other Countries. The Kings troups commit the like acts of hostilitie. Some Germaines enter into Brittain. The Chancellor of Montauban goes to sollicite in England. Charles will haue Anne first to discharge her English and Castilians. Anne replies, that in like sort he ought by the treatie of Francford, to yeld her her places, and to leaue the other foure townes aboue mentioned, as newters. Shee imputes the spoiles of Nantes, to the former diuisions betwixt her and the Marshall of Rieux, and promisseth that hereafter the like insolencies shall not be committed. That the Germaines coming was onely to force some of her subiects to obedience. That the Chancellors going to the King of England, was to agree vpon the charges due for the succors hee had sent. That in truth, seeing the King to make new preparations to the preiudice of their treatie, she had giuen the Chancellor commission, to treat for some succors of men. The King is discontented herewith, so as Guement and Coetquen her Ambassadors returne with no other answer but a new assignation at Tournay. In the meane time the King armes, and makes great preparations at Pont-See. Anne serueth him with the same sauce. Shee sollicites the Kings of England and Castille, and her new spouse, to ioyne their forces, and to inuade France with a mightie armie. He that cannot circumuent his enimie with the Lions skinn, must vse the Foxes. Charles is aduertised of this new alliance of Austria and Brittain. The neighbourhood is dangerous, beeing thus fortified. He must auoide this, and by some meanes get that for himselfe, which an ill neighbour pretends. He therefore sends to treat with the Duches, but she cannot affect him, that had shewed himselfe so violent an enimie. Yet he finds another expedient. Alain of Albret was frustrate of his hopes, and this deniall had mightily discontented him: he was therefore easily drawne away. The Duke of Bourbon gouernes him so absolutely for a time, that vpon certaine promises and other preferments, he winnes him for the King, who promisseth to deliuer him the towne of Nantes, wherein he might do much, being armed with the Marshall of Rieux fauour. The effects follow: Aline surprizeth the castell of Nantes, and in hatred of Annes disdain, he spoiles the Tresurie of the Dukes of Brittain, in the which were all their pretious stones, and the Duchesses Jewels, and deliuers

New causes of warre.

King Charles seekes to haue Anne to wife.

1490.

A deliuers both towne and castell into the Kings hands, yeelding him the right hee pretended to the Duchie, by reason of his wife Francis of Brittain, daughter to William Vicont of Limoges, a yonger brother of the house of Ponthieure, for a pension of six hundred pounds a yeare, issuing out of the lands of Gaure, neere Tholousa, where vnto the Chamber of Accountants at Paris, with the Kings Proctor generall, and the inhabitants of Gaure opposed, maintaining, that there was no recompence due to the Lord of Albret for that seruice, seeing he had none. The King (who was in Sentinell) marcheth thither in person with his army, the fourth of Aprill, hoping now to finish this warre, and to send home the English. He marcheth, with an intent to besiege Anne in Rennes, whether this new terror had drawne her. But they had so sodenly pestred all the approches with numbers of trees cut off the neere forest, as they were forced to giue ouer that enterprize, to vndertake the siege of Guingamp, being the Key of base Brittain. The inhabitants were reduced to extreme pouerty, hauing lodged the English army almost a yeare, who for want of payment, had spoiled them of all their goods, and left it ill garded with men for defence. Lieutenant for the King, had this charge, who sent Adrian l'Hospital before, with part of the armie, to beleager the place. At his approche the inhabitants demanded a composition: the Lieutenant receiues them, with assurance of life and goods. But in his absence, hee cannot saue the towne from spoile.

Then fell out the appointment for Tournai: Anne sends sixteene Deputies, who find the gates shut against them, and no lodging but in the Suburbs: the King disdaining this treaty, hauing intelligence of the marriage of Maximilian with Anne: fore-seeing, that from this stock might spring a plant, which here-after might crosse his estate. Maximilian was now much moued for the taking of Nantes: the Emperour Frederick his father held a Diet at Noremberg; to prouide some meanes to recouer this losse, and to encounter the French forces. The Princes of Germany promise him twelue thousand Laufquenets, which the Colonell George of Terreplaine should bring to him by August following. The King of England should augment this army with a leuie of six thousand English. But the discord that fell out betwixt these two Princes, and the tediousness of the Germaines, who are wonderfull heauy, gaue the King meanes to effect his desire, and to supplant Maximilian. At that time the King freed the Duke of Orleans from prison, and by the same meanes the Prince of Orange and the Earle of Dunois were reconciled vnto him. These men were great meanes to put the King in Maximilians place, being onely married by a Deputy. The Counsell found no better expedient, to pacifie all these quarrels and troubles. But the Duchesse was strange: what meanes is there (saith shee) to loue a Prince, who these three yeares hath made such cruell warres against mee? beeing a pupill and vnder age? who detaines my townes vniustly? who spoiles my subiects? doth out-rage and kill my officers, vpon refusal to pay him my rents and reuenues? who (notwithstanding former transactions passed betwixt vs) spoiles my Country, makes desolate my townes, and hath sought tyrannically to seaze vpon my person. It was needfull to imploy many great personages to pacifie this discontented minde. The King sends the Duke of Orleans to that end, who cunningly doth practise the Marshall of Rieux, the Chancellor of Montauban, and others of the Counsell, with the Lady of Laval (gouernesse to the Duchesse,) and other Ladies her familiars, who both publicly and priuately lay before her, her fore-passed dangers, the miseries in the which her subiects had bene plunged through warre, the neighbourhood of so mighty a King, who would continually oppresse her, and the farre distance of Maximilian, a poore Prince, full of affaires, and of small credit, who hath no meanes to raise her, neither could he euer succour her with aboue two thousand men. That shee had no better meanes to purchase rest to her selfe, and peace to her subiects, then by imbracing the alliance of King Charles, whereby she should not onely recouer her places, but of a Duchesse of Brittain, should become a peaceable Queene, and well-beloued of the whole Realme. If they were both married, it was but by Attorneys: finally, in such accidents, the Church doth willingly dispence with such couenants not personally performed, to preuent the miseries that grow by warre.

Maximilian was fatre of, vnacquainted with these practises, no man sought to preuent it: and these perswasions did ring dayly in the eares of Anne, so as in the end shee yeelds to follow

They were wonderfully toyled and wearied with the warre, the people turmoyled, the Nobility impouerished, the Clergie oppressed, some townes taken, and some waivering: and moreouer they did see a great Prince demand their alliance with force, and the chiefe Noblemen inclined to the French faction. These reasons made it seeme more conuenient and to be preferred before the slow succors of Maximilian.

A small peace in Brittain by a cary of

Thus was Anne Duchesse of Brittain persuaded, and a peace concluded and ratified by a happy and pleasing treatie of marriage, by the which (to maintaine the subiects of the Country in peace that were armed for either side) it was said. That all exploits and offences committed and done upon assurance, or otherwise, during the warres on either side, should bee forgotten, and remaine without reproch to any, as remitted, abolished, and recompensed: every man should returne to his home, and all soldiers depart the Country. A wife aduice to maintaine these two Countries in loue and concord. The City of Rennes yeelds at this happy composition, where the King entred in Nouember, vpon the assurance and conduct of the Duke of Orleans, with his simple traine, and without any men at armes, (for so it was agreed) to see the Duchesse and to ratifie the treaty, making the Prince of Orange (for that he had beene a chiefe instrument in this businesse) his Lieutenant generall in Brittain: then he tooke the way to Langeais in Touraine, whether Anne was conducted by the Chancellor Montauban, Coetiquen Lord Steward, and by the Lord of Chateaubriant, and the marlor age was consummated the sixteenth day of December. The Articles of the contract are to be seene in the Originalls. If this marriage were pleasing to God or not, let vs leaue it to the iudicious reader: so it is, that of three sonnes they could not bring vp one. Soone after Francis of Orleans Earle of Dunois died, the chiefe fire-brand of this warre, and likewise the principall motiue of this peace. From him are issued the Dukes of Longueville; and a little before John the second Duke of Bourbon was decessed without Children, to whom succeeded Peter Earle of Beauieu, who here-after shall bee Duke of Bourbon, the eleuenth of that name.

The praefices of the English
vpon Brittain.

This yeare was borne Gaston of Foix, Duke of Nemours, sonne to John of Foix, Vicont of Narbone, and of Mary of Orleans; one of the greatest Captaines of his age, who shall giue ample testimony of him selfe in the warres of Italy, which now approach. There died also at Rome, Peter of Foix, Cardinall, brother to the said John, and Vncle to Queene Katharine of Navarre. Henry of England, wonderfully incensed at this marriage, sought by all therime of Nauarre. Henry of England, wonderfully incensed at this marriage, sought by all secret praefices to surprize some of the chiefe places of the Prouince: and at the first retreat of his army out of Brittain, hee caused it to make an offer at Port-blanc, and some other ports, but they were still repulled by the faithfull care of the Noblemen of the Country: namely by the Chancellor of Montauban, of Bartrand d' Aigne, and other sea Captaines. Thus the Englishmen seeing their attempts like to take none effect, bent their course to go towards Calais, in the company of their King: who was making warre in the County of Guines, whilest that Maximilian should enter the Realme with forces on the other side: then they besieged Boullen by sea, being kept from landing by the Lord of Cordes, and the bastard of Cardonne, Captaine of Arras, with such small forces as they could suddenly oppose.

to Maximilian.

But oh Bastard! whilest thou repellst this common enemy, how preiudiciall shall thy ablenche be from Arras? Foure young gallants (saith the history) make false keyes to the gates, and giue Maximilian intelligence, bringing him by night into the towne, vnkowne to Carqueleuant, Lieutenant to Cardonne. Some write that one of those, in whom hee trusted for the opening of the gates, made this stratagem. But (how soeuer) he was taken in his bed sleeping at his ease; and for a second token of base cowardise, he yeelded vp the Castell, without attending the succours that came vnto him. The towne was spoyled; without sparing of the Churches, or the Traitors houses. A worthy reward of their treachery. Thus wee preferre our Conquests. A while after they attempted Amiens. A shame to the soldiars, that a woman should heare the first brute, and that by her advertisement to the watch, in ringing the great Bell of Beffroy, should put the towne in armes. And as the first aduice came from a woman, so are they honorably qualified in the History. To haue borne weapons and armes with their husbands, who by the care and command of Rabempré and of Anthony Clabauts Maire of the towne, did their duties so well (euery one repaying to the

A quarter, which had beene formerly assigned him) as the enemy returned amazed. A duty which made them as famous, as their descendants infamous, by the notable treachery they committed in our daies. Henry loued peace, and was imbarke more at the instance of his subiects (least they should thinke him more gracious to the French then the ancient quarrells of both nations required) then for any desire he had, to haue the King his enemy, to whom he had a great and strict bond, as we haue heard. The chiefe cause of his grudge was a great summe of mony, which he said he had lent to the decessed Duke of Brittain. The King hauing discouered it, commands the Lord of Cordes to treat with him, and paies him the mony and so sends him home satisfied into England. This peace made Maximilian willing to be reconciled. Moreouer the Princes of Germany laboured in this pacification, and the affaires of the Empire, (in the which his father had associated him, since the year 1486.) began to call him. The Suisses laboured it, and the people, especially those of the Lowe-Countries (as well through the French warres, as by their owne priuate diuisions) were so toiled, as they detested the warres. In the end, a peace was concluded for foure yeares onely, by the means of the Duke of Bourbon, the Prince of Orange, and the Lord of Cordes. So he receiued his daughter Marguerit againe, with the counties of Artois and Bourgongne, receiuing the reuenues and homages, and the King keeping the castles, to place garisons in them, vntill the end of foure yeares. Behold this estate doth now enioy a happy rest, by the vnion of this goodly and great Duchy, to the Crowne of France, and by a peace confirmed with Henry and Maximilian. But as Charles had enlarged his Diadem, with this new acquisition, so the vrgent importunity of his Shoolemaster, Lewis of Amboise, Bishop of Albi, and of Doctor Maillard, made him to restore the counties of Roussillon, and Parpignan (too religiously) vnto Ferdinand King of Arragon, the which Lewis the 11. his Father had gotten, hoping by this meanes to tye the Spaniard to a perpetuall peace. What should Charles do then with his Nobility and his youth, he being young, vigorous and of no idle complexion? Now a great deffiance makes him to cast his eyes beyond the Alpes, and drawes him to the conquest of goodly and rich Estates. But let vs examine the causes and proceedings farther off.

Peace with Henry.

And with Maximilian.

We haue said before, that Rene Duke of Lorraine was in Court, and demanded restitution of the Duchy of Bar, and the County of Prouence. During his aboad, the Realme of Naples being reuolted, the Nobility and the three estates of the Realme, put them selues vnder the Protection of the Church, as holding of it in fee. The Pope sends for Rene, to inuest him in the Realme, vpon some right which he pretended. The Gallies of Genoa attended him: the Cardinall of Saint Pierre was there to conduct him, and some from all the Noble-men of the country prest him thereunto where they expected him so long, as the Pope was forced to make an agreement with Ferdinand, being assisted by the Florentins. Vpon assurance of this accord, which the Pope, the Venetians, the King of Spaine, and the Florentins had sworne, and were bound to see obserued, the Barons of the realme returne home to their houses, and were all taken prisoners. The Prince of Salerne chiefe of the house of Saint Seuerin escapes, and three of his Nephewes with him, sonnes to the Prince of Bisignan, who retire them selues to Venice, and demand of the Seigneury what refuge they would wish them to choose, to the duke of Lorraine, or to the kings of France or of Spaine. The Venetians answer. That the Duke of Lorraine was a dead man, vnable to support so heauy a burthen. That the King of Spaine was already strong at sea; and the realmes of Naples and Sicile would make him too mighty, that they had liued in good correspondency with the Kings of France, who in former times had possessed the said realmes. The delais of the Lorraine being but poore, made them thus to qualifie him; for he wanted neither courage nor valour. They were iealous of the Neighbourhood of a mighty Prince, and did not consider that to call in a King of France to these Estates, was the meanes to ruine them. So they passe into France, where the affaires of Brittain held them about two yeares in their pursute. One called Stephen de Pers, a man of base fort, who had serued the King well in his infancy, as a grome of his chamber, and now made Seneball of Beaucaire and President of the Accoumpts of Paris, and the Generall Brissonnet, afterwards Cardinall, ruled their Maister.

was fatal: He wanted all necessarie things. The King was young, & weake of complexion, he hath few good Commanders, and fewer wise men: no money, and himselfe wilfull, the best was, he had a gallant Nobilitie and young, but ill commanded, nothing obedient, and too wilfull, like to their head, the which notwithstanding purchased to the King an immortall glorie. The leading and returne of this armie doubtlesse was the worke of heauen. Before his departure, Charles requires ayde and counsell of the Venetians. Aide we cannot give you (say they) for feare of the Turke, yet were they in peace with him, and the Turke then raigning, was of small reputation: As for counsell, it were presumption for us to counsell so wise a King, assisted with so good counsell, notwithstanding we will helpe you rather then hurt you, and you shall be very welcome. In truth GOD will haue vs confesse, that neither the wit nor policie of man can dis-appoint that which his eternall providence had decreed. This succeeded otherwise then that commonweale expected. First they conceiued not, that the King would undertake this voyage in person, moreouer, they hoped to be reuenged of this house of Arragon, whom they hated exceedingly, imputing it to Ferdinand, as the meanes to drawe downe Mahomet Othoman, who conquered Constantinople, and had done many outrages to the Venetians; and Alphonso sonne to the said Ferdinand had stirred vp the Duke of Ferrara, to make that chargeable warre against them, the which had almost ruined them, and had sent a man to Venice to poyson their cesterne, with many other complaints which they framed against this house. But the chiefe motiue was, for that by their meanes they could not extend their dominions, as well in Italy as in Greece. Thus they thought to vse the King as a scourge to whip their enemy, but not to ruine him, and by their shipwracke to haue means to seaze vpon some townes in Apulia lying vpon the gulfes, as it happened.

This was one motiue to transport the French forces beyond the Alpes. Another was, that Bonne a daughter of Sauoy and widow to John Galeas Duke of Millan, a woman both without honour and iudgement, was chiefly governed by a Secretarie of her, named Chico bredde vp in that house, and by her Caruer, Antonio Tascino. Chico to assure the estate of the young Duke John Galeas, sonne to the said John, had expelled all his fathers breethren, vnto the sonne, and amongst the rest Lodowicke Sforze, and Robert of Saint Seuerin, sonne of a bastard Daughter of the house of Saint Seuerin: Tascino (who had a great interest in his Ladies bed and fauour) calles them home with her consent. Being returned they take Chico, and against their promise to offer him any violence, they put him in a pipe, and dragging him through the citie of Milan, send him prisoner to Paulia, where he died, and they modestly dismissed Tascino. Lodowicke and Robert freed from these two obstacles, fortifie themselves neere the Duchesse, and euen then did Lodowicke practise to vsurpe the Duchie of Milan. For the first fruites of this proiect they sequester the two sonnes of Bonne and lodge them in the Castell, and cease vpon the Treasure (which was then held to bee the greatest in Christendome.) They make three keyes, whereof she kept one, but they had the guard of all. They force her to renounce the Wardship, and Lodowicke was made Tutor. This was not all, the Castell was carefully kept, and the Captaine went not without the turne-pikes. Lodowicke and Robert were not admitted, but with one or two followers. But two great Princes cannot raigne long together in one State without ialousie. Lodowicke supplants Robert, and puts him from all gouernement.

Thus Lodowicke commaunds Milan absolutely, and Robert serues the Venetians: yet Galeas and the Earle of Caiazzo, children to Robert, shall returne and doe Lodowicke good seruice in the State of Millan. Then beganne Lodowicke to increase in authoritie, grauing the Dukes picture on the one side of their coyne, and his owne on the other, not without the muttering of many, namely, of Isabel the wife of Alphonso Duke of Calabria, sonne to Ferdinand King of Arragon, as proude and haughtie a woman, as her husband was weak of iudgement and without courage. This repynning made Lodowicke to hasten his resolution. And thus he proceeded: when the Duke went forth of the Castell, his brother remained within, and Lodowicke conducting him home, the Captaine did vsually come forth vpon the bridge to receiue him. One day among the rest, Lodowicke staies him purposely a little without the bridge, to draw forth the Captaine, whom Galeas and the Earle of Caiazzo seaze vpon, and on such as followed him.

They within draw the bridge, Lodowicke lights a candle, and sweares to cut off their heads that

A that were in his power, if they yeeld not the place before the light be burnt: the which they do. He enters, and placeth men at his pleasure: he puts the captaine in prison; and arraignes him, vpon colour that he meant to deliuer vp the castle to the Emperour. He staies some Germanes, and makes them beleue, that they treated in fauour of the house of Austria, which of old time pretended some right to the Duchy: yet afterwards both he and they were set at liberty. Lodowicke is now maister of the fort. He must seeke meanes to maintaine this vsurpation: yet least he should grow too odious, he makes all dispatches in the name of John Galeas duke of Milan his Nephew, a duke in name only, but he in effect. In the meane time Isabel sollicitis her father and grandfather, to reuenge the iniustice and tyranny of Lodowicke. Lodowicke vnderstood well, that this act would offend many princes: that his insolent and not accustomed exaction of money made his name odious to all the subiects of the Duchy: and that Ferdinand King of Arragon with his sonne Alphonso would not faile to imbrace the quarrell and right of John Galeas and of their Isabel. To crosse them, he cunningly (to the preiudice of the ancient confederacy of the Estates of Italy) makes a league betwixt the pope, the Venetians, and John Galeas duke of Milan his Nephew (arming himself alwaies with that name) for their common defence, and namely of Lodowikes gouernment, vpon condition, that the Venetians and the said duke should either of them send presently two hundred men at armes to Rome, and greater forces (if need were) for the recovery of such places as were detained from the church by Virgilius Vrsinus, in fauour of Peter of Medicis his kinsman, associat with Ferdinand, and Alphonso. And more to crosse their estates, Lodowicke (who could not subist in the midt of their vnited forces) sends an honorable Ambassage to the King, whereof the Earle of Caiazzo was the chiefe, assisted by Charles of Balbiano Earle of Belzoiofo, and Galeas of Saint Seuerin, who had married a bastard of Lodowicks: who greatly vrge the title he had to this goodly and pleasant country of Naples. They easily drew the King to taste a vaine glory of Italy, perswading him by great offers of seruice, succors of men, money, and munition. But before we passe the Alpes, let vs examine the estate of Italy, and the right which our Charles pretended. Since the declining of the Romaine Empire, Italy neuer enioyed a more happy prosperity, then about the yeere 1490. A long peace had made the most barren places fruitfull, it abounded in people, riches, great men of itare, and good wits, in learning, industry and military fame, such as that age could produce, beautified with the State of many princes, not subiect to any other command but of themselves.

Laurence of Medicis a Citizen of Florence, was a great meanes to hold things in this prosperous Estate, a man of a quiet spirit, experienced in affaires, iudicious, of great authority about all his fellow citizens, and (for that he gouerned pope Innocent the eight, his kinsman absolutely) renowned throughout all Italy. He knew that the greatnesse of other Potentates, would mightily shake the common-weale of Florence, and therefore he sought by all meanes to hold them equall, by a generall obseruation of peace. Ferdinand of Arragon, King of Naples, a wise prince, and of great reputation, did much affect this publike quiet, but he had worke at home: Alphonso duke of Calabria his eldest sonne, being much discontented, seeing that John Galeas Sforze, duke of Milan his sonne in law, should carry but the naked and simple title of duke, vnder the oppression of Lodowicke his vnkle. But Ferdinand hauing yet a fresh impression of the late reuolt of his subiects of Naples, not ignorant that at the first motion they would open their armes to the house of France, considering the affection which most of his subiects bare vnto it of old, feared least the diuisions in Italy should draw the French to inuade the Realme of Naples: preferring a present benefit before the indignation of his sonne, desiring rather to vnite himselfe with the other Estates, especially that of Milan and Florence, to countermine the Venetians greatnesse, being then fearefull to all Italy, puffed vp with the late ouerthrow of the duke of Ferrara, father in law to Lodowicke, after a long and dangerous hazard of their estate. Lodowicke was in the same predicament with the rest: and moreouer peace was farre more necessary then warre, for the preservation of an authority lately vsurped. Herevnto that commendable inclynation to peace which he found in Laurence of Medicis, did moue him. And considering, that in regard of the inueterate hatred betwixt the house of Arragon and the Venetians, they should hardly make any firme league betwixt them, he therefore concluded, that Ferdinand and his

the death of Laurence of Medici.

So Ferdinand, Lodowike and Laurence continued the alliance cherefully which they had renewed in the yeere 1480. for five and twenty yeeres: all the meaner Potentats in a manner leaning vnto them: to whom the Venetians greatnesse was wonderfully suspected, managing their affaires a part, not imparting their counsells to the body of the common league, watching onely opportunity to grow great by the publike discords. Being all thus vnited, they were too strong for the Venetians; yet were they full of enuy and mutuall ieaousie, one prying still into an others estate, and continually making designs, so as they could not long liue in true and faithfull friendship.

The death of Laurence of Medici was a great cause of the breach of this generall peace. An vnseasonable death for him, having not yet liued foure and forty yeeres comple: for his country, the which (by his wisdom and iudgement) flourished most happily in all the benefits which a long peace doth vsually bring forth; and for Italy, as well by reason of the affaires which he did wisely manage, to the generall good of the whole country, as also for that he was a notable instrument to temper the diuers humors and ieaousies which sprang vp dayly betwixt Ferdinand and Lodowike, and to quench the flames which might easily cause a generall combustion.

by Peter of Medici.

This peace being well shaken by his death, was presently quite broken, not so much by the death of Innocent, who by his sloth was growne vnprofitable as well for himselfe, his friends and the publicke, after he had retired his armes, the which he had displaied at the instance of the Barons of Naples, as by the succession of Roderike Borgis, who was then called Alexander the sixth, a Spaniard, chosen vnder the factious discords of Ascanius, Sforza brother vnto Lodowike, and Iulian of Saint Pierre, buying the suffrages of many other Cardinalls, partly with ready money, & partly by promises of Offices and benefices. He was subtile and quicke-witted, excellent in counsell, vehement to perswade, and a great man of state. But (saith the Originall) his vertues were surpassed by his vices, dishonest in manners, no sinceritie, no shame, no truth, no faith, no religion in him: but an insatiable covetousnesse, an immoderate ambition, a cruelty more then barbarous, and a violent desire to aduance (by what means so euer) his children, which were many in number. Peter the eldest sonne of Laurence of Medici, was successor to his goodly honors, but not to his fathers good humors. Peter suffered as much from Laurence, as that Hector drawne dead at a chariots taile, from Hector returning victorious, honored with the spoiles of Achilles.

At his entrance to the government, following an aduice directly contrary to his father, without any other counsell then of Virgilius Vrsinus, of whose humor Peter depended (both their Mothers being of the family of Vrsins) hee made so strict a league with Ferdinand and Alphonso, as Lodowike (a vigilant and subtile man) conceived presently that the Florentine forces might easily be drawne to preiudice him, in fauour of the Arragonois. This ieaousie was laied open by this accident. The confederats according to their custome, must send to congratulate and acknowledge the new Pope. Lodowike had wisely aduised, that all the Ambassadors should enter Rome together in company, and likewise into the consistory before the Pope, and that one should speake for them all: for (said he) by this manner of proceeding we shall make knowne to Italy, that there is not only a singular loue and league betwixt vs, but also so firme a coniunction, as we shal seeme to be but one body and one Principality. Ferdinand approved this aduice. Peter did not publicly gainsay it, but in priuate he could not digest it, being one of the Ambassadors chosen for the common-weale of Florence, hauing resolved to beautifie his ambassage, with a proud and stately traine. He considered, that entering into Rome, and presenting himselfe to the Pope in troupe, his traine would appeere farre lesse stately in so great a company. And therefore he caused the King of Naples to frustrate this designe, as not to be done without confusion. But Ferdinand loth to displease one to please another, doth aduertise Lodowike, that he did not recall his first consent, but at the instant request of Peter of Medici.

There was yet an other reason, which made Lodowike to suspect some secret intelligence betwixt Peter and the Arragonois. Francisco Cibo bastard sonne to Innocent, after his fathers death had retired himselfe to Florence, to Peter of Medici, brother to Magdalene his wife.

A wife. Being planted there, Virgilius Vrsinus bought of him, by Peters meanes, Languillare, Ceruete, and some other places nere to Rome, for forty thousand ducats. The money was in a manner all lent him by Ferdinand, of purpose, to the end that Virgilius being his kinsman and entertained soldiary, growing great about Rome, he might reape the more profit. Ferdinand found no better foundation for his safety, then to tie all or the greatest part of the Noblemen, within the territories of the Church, to suppress that Hydraes head, if it should rise too high. This he labored more carefully, doubting that Lodowikes authority would proue great hereafter with the Pope, by the meanes of Cardinal Ascanius his brother.

B The vanity of mans conceites must needs discouer the weakenesse of his iudgement. Of two mischiefs Ferdinand did choose the greatest, and grounding vpon a light profit, he did not foresee, that he layed the way open to his owne ruine. For the Pope discouering the Arragonois intention, and pretending that by the alienation of these small places lying in his iurisdiction, done without his priuity, they were by right forfeited to the Apostolike sea. He exclaimes and complains against Ferdinand, Peter and Virgilius, protesting to omit no meanes that may serue for the defence of his dignity, and the rights of the Romaine sea. Lodowike embraceth this occasion, and seeing the pope to study of some great reuenge against Ferdinand, he feeds his passions, by the loane of forty thousand ducats and three hundred men at armes, leuied vpon the common treasor. Yet apprehending new troubles, he aduiseeth Ferdinand, to perswade Virgilius, to content the pope by some honest composition, to preuent the inconueniences and scandales this diuorce might breed, and counselleth Peter to follow the domestical example of his father, and to bee a mediator, as he had bene, betwixt Ferdinand and him, rather then a fire-brand to kindle diuision: but he talked to a deaffe man. Ferdinand promisseth to doe it, but he ruined with one hand, what hee raised with the other: he secretly sollicitis Virgilius to take possession of those townes and not to yeeld the Pope any thing, but some certaine summe of money, by meanes whereof he should remaine peaceable Lord of the said places, promising to warrant him from all troubles.

Lodowike findes hereby, that it behoues him to fortifie himselfe with new supports and new alliances. He hath a good opportunity: the disdaine of Alexander against the King of Naples, and the affection the Senat of Venice seemed to haue to the dis-union of this league whereby their proiects had so long bene made frustrate. But the Pope loued his children deerely, and contrary to the custome of others (who called them Nephewes, as a more modest name) he impudently called them sonnes. He hoped to obtaine one of the bastard daughters of Alphonso, for one of his bastards sonnes (graft crab vpon crab, and you shall neuer reape good fruit) and whilest this vaine hope possessed him, he opened his eares rather then his heart to Lodowikes motion. Ferdinand gaue his consent, but Alphonso hated the ambition and pride of Alexander. The pope being thus frustrate, turnes all his thoughts to Lodowike, moued partly with disdaine, and partly with feare, seeing Vrsinus, by the exceeding great fauours which hee receiued from Ferdinand and the Florentins, to bee growne mighty in all the territories of the Church.

The Venetians had yet fresh in memory, the leagues made against them in the warre of Ferrara, in the which Sixtus had intangled them: and yet to withdraw them, he employed both his spirituall and temporall power. They had no more confidence in Alexander. Yet the policy of Lodowike did in the end worke this league; betwixt the Pope, the Senate of Venice and the Duke of Milan, in the moneth of Aprill 1493. Thus Lodowike is fortified on the one side: but he had an other meaning then the Pope or Senat of Venice: and foreseeing that he could not long build vpon the foundation of this new alliance, he resolves to assure himselfe by forraigne forces, seeing that both his owne, and his friends in Italie were doubtfull vnto him. He therefore conuertis his thoughts on this side the Alpes, seeking to draw the King to seize vpon the ancient inheritance of the house of Aniou. But let vs see by what right? Urban the fourth gaue the Realmes of Naples and Sicilia (vniuently detained by Manfroy bastard sonne to Frederick the second) to Charles Earle of Prouence, and of Aniou, to hold in fee, being brother to Saint Lewis, who obtained this title that was giuen him by armes. Charles the second succeeded his father, who left it to Robert his sonne, and this man died without heires. Ioane daughter to Charles duke of Calabria (deceased before his father) enjoyed the succession. Being disdained not so much for her sex, as for the lewdness of her life: she adopts Lewis duke of Anjou brother to King Charles the wife for her sonne, and then died of a violent death. Lewis passing thither with an army, died of an ague in Apulia, seeing himselfe almost in possession of the Kingdome: so as the house of Anjou reaped no profit by this adoption, but only of the Earldome of Prouence, which was continually possessed by the successors of Charles the first. Notwithstanding Lewis of Anjou sonne to the first Lewis, and afterwards the grandchild of the same name, thrust on by the popes, as often as they had any quarrell with the Kings of Naples, haue often (but infortunatly) invaded this Realme. By the death of Ioane the Realme was transported to Charles of Durazzo issued likewise from Charles the first, to whom Ladislaus his sonne succeeded: who dying without issue left his sister Ioane the second for his heire: and vnfortunate name in that place, whose indiscretion and impudency of life made them purchase the name of Wolues. Lewis the third, making warre with the helpe of Martin the fifth against Ioane, (leaving the government of the Realme, to those to whom shee had abandoned her body) she adopted for her sonne and sole refuge, Alphonso King of Aragon and Sicilia. Afterwards hauing reuoked her adoption, vpon colour of ingratitude, shee adopted the same Lewis: who employing his forces for her against Alphonso expelled him the Realme: but he died the same yeere, leaving Ioane in quiet possession the remainder of her life. Then dying without children shee instituted René Duke of Anjou, and Earle of Prouence for heire, being brother to the said Lewis her adoptiue sonne. This institution displeasing some Barons, who said that the will was forged by them of Naples, they called backe Alphonso. Hence sprong the warres and factions betwixt the Angeuins, and the Aragonois, nourished so long, by the couetousnesse of popes, who according to the oportunitie of times, haue oftentimes granted their inuestitures diuersly. Alphonso carrying it by force, and dying without lawfull heires, left Ferdinand his bastard to succeed, as a purchased estate, not belonging to the crowne of Aragon. John sonne to René assisted by the chiefe Barons of the countie, came to assaile him, but the happines and valour of Ferdinand giues him the repulse. René furuiuing his sonne John, and dying without an heire male; names Charles his brothers son for heire, who dying without children, resigned all his inheritance to Lewis the eleuenth. Charles was but two and twenty yeeres old, little experienced in affaires, couetous of glory, and thrust on with a warlike desire: he often neglected the wholesome counsell of the wisest, namely James of Grauille, Admirall of France, preferring the aduise of some of base quality that possessed him, corrupted by the Neapolitaines that were retired for reliefe, and by the Ambassadors of Lodowike. The Nobility of France, commended the wisdom of Lewis the eleuenth, who refused to accept of the Geneuiois when they offered themselves, being alwaies loth to attempt any thing vpon Italy, being both painefull, & fatal to the Realm. They knew Ferdinand to be a wise prince, rich in money, and of great fame, and his sonne Alphonso to be valiant and well scene in the art of warre (but these were but shewes, and all their reputation turned into a ridiculous smoake.) That for the government of warre, and state, the Kings counsel was but weake, and their experience small that had most credit with him. He must haue a huge masse of money, and there was not any in his treasury. Moreover they objected the subtilty, and policy of the Italians: that Lodowike himselfe for a light profit would breake his faith. That he would be loth to see the Kingdome of Naples, in the French Kings power; finally to make any conquest beyond the Alpes, were to vn furnishe the Realme both of men and money.

Lodowike.

All this was but to cast oyle into a fire already kindled. Charles reiects all aduice of peace, and without the priuity of any but de Vers and Brissonnet, he agrees secretly with Lodowikes Ambassadors: That an army passing into Italy for the conquest of Naples, the Duke of Milan should giue him passage through his country, he should accompany him with five hundred men at armes entertained: hee should suffer him to arme what shipping he would at Genoa; and before he should march, hee should lend the King two hundred thousand Ducats. On the other part. The King should defend the Duchy of Milan against all men, and should especially maintaine Lodowikes authority: & during the warre, he should maintaine two

A two hundred lances in Ast, a City belonging to the duke of Orleans, so supply all necessities in the Duchy. This he signed with his owne hand, and promised moreouer vnto Lodowike. That going to the Conquest of Naples, he should giue him the principality of Tarentum.

But did not Lodowike feare the power of so great a King, lately fortified with three goodly prouinces of Bourgondy, Picardy and Britan, the which his father Francis Sforce would haue doubted, if a poore Earle of Prouence, had conquered the realme of Naples? and did he not apprehend him who had publickly protested, that he would neuer suffer the oppression of his cousin? for Charles and John Galeas were sisters children. Doubtlesse now the time was come, when as that should be verified which Lawrence of Medecis spake a little before his death, vnderstanding of the vnion of Britan to the crown. That if the King of France knew his owne forces, Italy should suffer much, and the publicke predictions of Friar Ierofme Savonarola, whereof we will speake hereafter.

The King now takes his way to Lions, to assemble his forces, and diuides them into two armies at land, and at sea. In that at land were about sixteene hundred men at armes, two Archers to a Lance, sixe thousand Archers on foote, sixe thousand crosse-bow-men, sixe thousand pikes, eight thousand Harguebusiers carrying two-hand swords, twelue hundred expert Canoniers, sixe hundred maister Carpenters, three hundred masons, two hundred men to cast bullets, to make coale, cordes and cables, foure thousand carters, and eight thousand horse for the artillery. The army at sea consisted of eightene galleies, sixe galeons, and nine great shippes. The chiefe Commanders that did accompany the King, were; Lewis Duke of Orleans Lieutenant generall for his Maiestie by sea, the Earle of Angoulesme, the Earle of Montpensier, the prince of Orange, the Duke of Nemours, John of Foix Vicount of Narbonne, the Earles of Neuers, Ligni, Boulongne, Bresse, the Lord of Albret, Lewis of Tremouille Vicount of Thouars: the Marshalls of Gié, Rieux, and Baudricourt: the Lords of Crusol, Tournon, Pienes, Silli, Guise, Chandenier, Mauleon, Prie, Montaillon, d' Alegre, Bonneual, Genouillac, Frainzeles, Chaufmont, Chastillon, Palice, Vergis, d' Hospital, Beaumont, Myolans, Mathew bastard of Bourbon, the bastard of Bourgonne, with a great number of Noblemen, and voluntary gentlemen. The Lord of Cordes (so famous in our history, for his singular valor, wisdom, and loialtie) died at Bresse, three leagues from Lions. The Lord of Vrfe, master of the Kings horse, prepared all things necessary for the flecte at Genoa.

The voiage to Naples.

army.

Some infection transported the King from Lions to Venne, from whence the Duke of Orleans parted for Genoa, and there the voiage was fully concluded: for vntill that time the dissuasion of the best aduised, and the defect of the chiefe finewes of warre, had held them in suspence: for that a hundred thousand frankes, borrowed vpon great interest, in the banke of Soly at Genoa, could not long maintaine the ordinary charge of his house. Yet fifty thousand Ducats lent him by Lodowike Sforce, and the liuely impression of the Cardinall Saint Pierre (the fatall instrument of the miseries of Italy) did somewhat reuiue the fainting courage of Charles. What shame (saith he) what infamy, to giue ouer so honorable a resolution? an enterprife published throughout all the world? the Popes amazement? the terror of Peter of Medecis? the ruine of the Aragonois? who can stay the violent descent of this army? euen vnto the marches of Naples? Doth hee doubt the want of money? At the feareful thunder of his artillery, yea at the least brute of his armes, the Italians wil bring vnto him: and the rebels spoiles shall feed his army: what shadow then? what dreame? what vaine feare doth cause this inconstant change? where is that magnanimity? where is that courage, which did but euen now brag to ouer-run all the forces of Italy vnited together? In the end, the King marcheth the 23. of August, leaving Peter Duke of Bourbon, his brother in law, for Regent: who conducted the Queene from Grenoble into France.

Doubtlesse, wee must obserue a singular and fauourable prouidence of God, in the conduct of this voiage, vnderaken vpon borrowed money: but where God workes, all things are easie. For a third prooffe of his need, being at Turin, the King borrowed the Jewells of the Duchesse of Sauoy, daughter to William Marquesse of Montferrat, and widow to Charles Duke of Sauoy, and pawned them for 1200. Ducats: and for a fourth, being at Casal, he pawned the Jewells of the Marquise, widow to the Marquis of Montferrat, for the

At Ast the King was toucht with the small pockes, and a feuer, which did hazard his life, but within sixe or leuen daies hee was recovered. Thether came Lodowike Sforze, and Beatrice his wife, daughter to the duke of Ferrara, to salute him, and withall came very fauourable newes.

Ferdinand was lately deceased. Alphonso his sonne had two armies in field, one in Romagna, towards Ferrara, the which Ferdinand his sonne duke of Calabria commanded, accompanied by Virgil Vrsin, the Earle of Petilliano, and John Iaques of Triuulce, who afterwards serued the King. This army had to incounter them the Earle of Caiazzo, and the Lord of Aubigni a Scottishman, who stopt their passage. The other at sea, led by Don Frederick brother to Alphonso, accompanied by Obietto of Fiesque a Geneuois, and others, by meanes whereof they were in hope to draw the city of Genoa into their faction. But the Bayliffe of Dijon entring with two thousand Suisses, assured it for the King. Obietto with three thousand men had taken Rapaille, twenty miles from Genoa. The two Saint Semvins brethren, and John Adorne brother to Augustin Gouvernor of Genoa ioyned with the duke of Orleans, and a thousand Suisses charged them, ouerthrew them, and slue a hundred or six score: (It was much in that age, for then their warres were not bloudy) tooke some prisoners, and al that escaped were stript by the duke of Milans people: so as Frederick could neuer gather them againe together. A disgrace which did much distaste the Florentines, being alwaies more inclined to the house of France, then to that of Arragon, and encouraged the King to proceed, animated thereunto, by the persuasions of Lodowike. My Lord (saith he) doubt not of this enterprise: there are three great parties in Italy: you hold the one, that is Milan: the other stirs not, those be the Venetians: you haue no businesse but at Naples, hauing conquered that realme, if you will giue me credit, I will assist you to become greater then euer was Charlemagne, and wee will expell the Turke out of Constantinople. Hee spake well, if Christian princes had bene well vnited.

Finally, Charles makes his entry into Pauia, in quality of a King, vnder a canopy, the streetes hanged, and the people crying, God saue the King. Then grew there some ialousie, they would haue the King rest satisfied with the towne for his lodging: but in the end, the castle was opened vnto him, where he did visit John Galeas his cousin, being sicke, and at the point of death: not without great compassion of such as thought the course of his life would be soone cut off, by the notable treachery of his vnele.

Placentia receiued him as willingly as Pauia, and thither newes was brought of the death of the duke of Milan, leauing a sonne and a daughter. Lodowike posting thither, with promise to returne, vsurped the Duchy absolutely with the title. Thus all Lombardy marched at the bruite of this French army, some for loue, and some for feare. They held our men to be religious, loyall and full of bounty: but couetousnesse, robberies and other insolencies of souldiers, made them soone to alter their conceits, and the horror of the artillery (whose thunder was yet strange vnto them) amazed them. The Florentine, a cunning dissembler, had sent twise vnto the King, before he parted from France: at the first came the Bishop of Rhegium, and Peter Soderini: of whom they only demanded passage, and a hundred men at armes maintained: at the second time, Peter Caponi, and others, who made answer, that by the commandement of King Lewis the eleuenth they had renounced the alliance of John of Aniou (if he were associate with Charles of France in the warre of the common-weale) to enter into league with Ferdinando of Arragon, and therefore they could not rashly leaue it. But in either of these troupes, there was still some enemy to Peter of Medici, who gaue the King intelligence of the peoples desire, lifting vp their hands for the recouery of their liberty oppressed by Peters government, enuied euen by his neereft kinsmen, and the best families, as the Caponi, Soderini, Nerli and others.

And for a second baite, Lawrence and John de Medici, cousins to Peter, came secretly to the King at his departure from Placentia, vowing great loue in generall to the house of France, and much hatred to their kinsman, against whom Charles was greatly incensed, for the excuse he made to his Ambassador, which was sent from Arr: That the chiefe Citizens were in their houses in the country, and could not so speedily returne him an answer, but they should shortly let him vnderstand their resolution, by speciall Ambassadors.

The first overthrow of the Arragonois.

Great practices against Peter of Medici.

In the meane time they arme ioyntly with the Pope. The King must not leaue Tuscany and the Estate of the Church behinde him as his enemies. The army passeth the Appennin at Pontreme vpon Magre, the which diuides Liguria (which is the country of Genoa) from Tuscany and is vpon the marches of the Florentines country, of purpose to force them to plant the Standard of France vpon their walles, or else to take the weakest places to winter in.

The second exploite of the Kings army, was at Fiuzane, a towne taken by force, sackt, and all mercenary souldiers, with many inhabitants slaine. A hard stratagem, for men, who (as we haue said) made warre rather in pompe and brauery then with blowes.

Serezane was sufficient to withstand, yea to ruine a great power: Serezanelle was more strong, a fort built vpon the hill about the towne: but the Florentines diuisions had hindered all necessary prouision, but men. And indeed they were loth to make warre against the house of France, of whom they had of old time depended: and the rather for that they were forbidden to trafficke, and their men banished out of all France, by the especiall aduise of Caponi. The armie could not continue there, the countrie is straight and barren, compassed in by the sea and mountaines, no victuall but what was brought from farre, and great store of snow. But the way must be laid open to Pisa, and if they had neglected the first place that resisted, what village but would haue held out? Paul Vrsin led some horse, with three hundred foote (meaning to put them into Serezane) who are incountred, beaten, and in a manner all slaine or taken prisoners, by some troupes of the forward going to forrage beyond Magre. This terror made the Florentines to protest publicly, That they would no longer incur the Kings displeasure, nor the Duke of Milans. Whereupon they send fiftene or sixteene citizens; and offer the King free entry into their city, whose onely designe was to expell Peter of Medici.

Peter practised (by the meanes of Lawrence Spinola his factor in the banke at Lion) the Earle of Bresse, and Myolans the Kings Chamberlaine, Gouvernor of Daulphiné. They procure him a safe-conduct, and at the first treaty he graunts the King all his demands. That the forts of Serezane, Serenazelle and Pietro-saincto (the keyes of the Florentine dominion of that side) those of Pisa, and the port of Liurorne, should be put into the Kings hand, who should be bound to redeliver them after the conquest of Naples. That the King should receiue the Florentines into his alliance and protection, vpon the loare of two hundred thousand ducats, and the assurance of these promises should be concluded in Florence. A facility which discouered a wonderfull feare and trouble of minde: for the King would haue bene well satisfied with more easie conditions.

Lodowike was present at this Capitulation, who to reape some benefit of Charles his conquests, obtaines from his maiesty for thirty thousand ducats; a transport for him and his heires, of the possession of Genoa: (which the King some yeeres before had granted to John Galeas Duke of Milan) yet discontented that Charles would not giue him Pietro-saincto and Serezane in gard (which places hee demanded as forceably taken away by the Florentines from the Geneuois, and had serued him as a meanes to lay hold of Pisa) hee returned to Milan, and did neuer after see the King, leauing notwithstanding Galeas of Saint Seuerin, and the Earle of Belzoiozo nere his maiesty.

Thus by the configuration of these strong places, the ports of Romagna are opened vnto the King, he enters Luques being very honourable receiued by the citizens; crying God saue the King of France Augustus. From Luques he goes to Pisa, Galeas of Saint Seuerin, following the instructions giuen him by Lodowike Sforze (who did not foresee that the like accident would be the cause of his ruine) called the chiefe citizens, and aduiseeth them, that rebelling against the Florentines, they should craue liberty from the King: hoping by this meanes that hee should one day draw Pisa vnder the duke of Milans command, to whom they were subiect, before the Florentines held it; this was in the same yeere that the Venetians conquered Padoua. Through this aduice the people troupe together, men, women, and children: they flocke the next day about the King going to masse, crying with open throat, Liberty, Liberty, beseeching him with hands lift vp, and teares in their eyes, to free them from the Florentines oppression, by whom (say they) they were most tiranously intreated. Rabon a Councillor of the parliament of Daulphiné, & maister of requests, said vnto

The Florentines offer the King free entry into their City.

1494- the King, that their demand was iust, and that it was a pittifull thing to see the hard subiection A that did oppresse them. The King (who did not cōsider the importance of this action) breaking the treaty of Serezana, and that he could not giue liberty to a towne that was not his, into the which he was receiued only by curesie, rashly lets slip these words: I am content.

Prick forward a strong headed horse, and he will runne at randon. This multitude doth presently change their cry of liberty, into cries of ioi, and running to the bridge vpon the riuier of Arne, they beat downe the Mazorco (this was a great Lion, planted vpon an high pillar of Marble, with the armes of Florence) and cast it into the riuier, and in the same place they set vp a King of France, holding a sword in his hand, and treading this Mazorco vnder his feete. But oh the lightnesse of Italians! few yeeres after, at the entry of the King of Ro- B maines, they shall deale with the King as with this Lion.

This ignominious and rash wound, giuen to the estate of Florence, by Peter of Medici, contrary to the example of his predecessors, without the aduise of the citizens, and without any decree of the Magistrates, had wonderfully incensed his fellow citizens. Being returned to Florence, to prepare his lodging for the King, going the ninth of November, to enter the palace of the Seignurie, to treat of the Kings arriuall, behold James Nerli, a yong man, Noble and rich, with other Magistrates, being armed, offer him the entry alone, but denieth it to all his followers. Hee retires home to his house, and resolues to get that by force, which he could not willingly obtaine. He armes, and causeth Paul Vrsin to approach with his troupe, the which was in the Florentines pay. The State proclaimes him a rebell: C the people flie to armes, and cries liberty. Peter recouers the gates, and with him were the Cardinall Iohn, and Italian his bretheren: they flie to Bologna, and from thence to Venice. Peter had no cloake, but one of his groomes: being hated of his fellow citizens, did dained of his domesticall seruants, his house spoiled, with losse of aboue a hundred thousand Ducats in moueables: and to increase his misery, a factor of his at Venice, refused him for the value of a hundred Ducats in cloth. A notable example, of the inconstancy of worldly affaires. Thus by the rashnesse of one yong man, lately equall in a manner to great princes, the house of Medici fell for that time, which vnder colour of ciuill administration, had gouerned the common-weale of Florence three-score yeeres peaceably, and with a respected authority. D

Charles entred the next day triumphantly into Florence, himselfe and his horse armed, and his Lance vpon his thigh. The Florentines were not ignorant of his discontent, for that they sought to crosse him in his enterprife, and that many of his followers, thrust on by couetousnesse, gaped after nothing more, then the sacke of so rich a city, hauing first of all resisted the power of France, and that others also did solcite the restitution of Peter of Medici, especially Philip Earle of Bresse. And although the city might worthily iustifie that violence, whereof Peter and his complices were the onely motiues; yet did they wisely foresee, that the King would not let slip this opportunity, to become their Lord. But being vnable to stop this violent streame by any force, they had secretly filled their chiefe houses with resolute men, receiued their entertained captaines into the city, and did giue E order, that euery man, both within and without, nere the city, should arme at the sound of the palace great bell. Thus fortified with men, they stand stiffly vpon the tearmes of composition. Oft times wee loose the eeble by ouer-gripping. The fauour they did see some beare vnto Peter: the insupportable summes of money that were exacted, the absolute Seignury of Florence which the King demanded, as hauing conquered it by the law of armes, considering in what manner hee entred, made them refuse these rigorous demands, with a firme resolution to mainteine their publike liberty with the perill of their liues. Thus they grew angry on either side, and for a conclusion of the last conference, the Kings Secretary reading the articles which his Maiesty would resolutely haue concluded; behold Peter Caponi, one of the foure deputies for the city (a violent man, and one of the mightiest families in the State) puls the articles from the Secretary, and teares them. F Seeing you demand of vs (saith he) so outrageous condicions, you shall sound your Trumpets, and we our Belles.

This audacious brauery did moderate the excesse of their demands; for how lamentable had it beene, to haue fallen to any tragicall decision of their controuersie. The King calls Peter of Medici and his bretheren expelled Florence.

His miserable estate at Venice.

The Florentines fortifie themselves in their houses for feare of the King.

A calls him back, and containing him selfe within the bounds of reason, passeth this capitulation. That the City of Florence, should be a friend, confederate, and in the perpetuall protection of the Crowne of France. That at the end of the enterprife of Naples, the King should yeeld vp (without any charge to the Florentines) Pisa, Liurne, Pietrosanta, Serezane, Serezanelle, and all other places taken or retolued: and in case of demiall they might recouer them by force, that they should giue the King fifty thousand Ducats in fifteene dayes, forty thousand in March, and thirty thousand in Iune following. They should pardon the Pisans their rebellion, and other crimes. They should free Peter of Medicis from banishment and confiscation; vpon condition that hee should not approach within an hundred and fifty miles of their confines: nor his bretheren nearer then a hundred miles. This accord was sworne vpon the great Altar, in the Church of Saint Iohn at Florence. But matters succeeded otherwise, as we shall see: so the Florentines changed their red Lillie into a white.

Two dayes after, the King parted towards Sienna, a City well peopled, seated in a fertile country, in ancient time rich, mighty, and the second City in Toscare, which yeelded in many factions to the stronger party, so as they enioyed more the name then the effects of liberty. They tooke off their gates for the Kings entry: notwithstanding the City being suspected of him, (for that it had beene alwayes at the deuotion of the Empire) hee left a garrison, and tooke his way to Rome. Aqua-pendenté and Montfiatconi, (places belonging to the Pope,) receiued him with royall pompe, and laid the way open to Viterbio. The C Florentine fortes which the King held, and the garrison left in Sienna, made the Venetians and Milanois to feare, that he would hardly end his conquests with Naples. To prevent this common danger, they treat of a new confederacy, and had concluded it, if Rome had made that resistance to the King which many expected. Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, the Popes forces, Virgile Vrsin, and the remainders of the Arragonois army, had resolved to campe at Viterbio, and there to make head against the King; but the roades which the Colonis made (who had taken Ostia from the Pope, and hindred the passage of victualls to Rome by Sea) hauing put all the country about Rome in alarme, beeing iealous of the Popes integrity, who began to hearken to the French demands, made him to retire, leauing the way open for the King to enter into Viterbio by the fauour of the Cardinall of Saint D Pierre, and the Colonis, and so into the territories of the Vrsins.

The Pope is now wonderfully perplexed: he knowes himselfe to haue beene one of the chiefe motiues of Charles his voyage; and since, without any offence, hee hath opposed his authority, his counsell, and his armes. Hee imagines, that the assurance hee shall draw from the King, shall be no firmer then his to the King. Hee sees the Cardinals Ascanius, S. Pierre, and other his enemies in credit about the King. Hee feares that this prediction of Sauonarola should now take effect. That the Church should bee reformed by the sword. Hee remembers with what infamy he came to the Popedomme; his government and his life controules him. The Cardinalls Ascanius, Saint Pierre, Colonne, Sauelle, and aboue fifteene others, vrge the King to suppress a Pope so full of vices, and abhominable to all the world, and to proceed E to a new election. He hath no sufficient forces to withstand the stranger. Alphonso droopes; Ferdinand is weake. Vergilus Vrsinus Generall of the Arragon armie, Constable of the realme of Naples, allyed to Alphonso, (Iohn Iourdaire, sonne to the said Vrsin, hauing married a bastard daughter of Ferdinand the father of Alphonso) bound to the house of Arragon for so many respects, had of late consented, that his sonnes should giue the King passage, lodging and victualls within the territories of the Church: and leaues him Campagnana, and other places for his assurance, vntill the armie were past the territories of Rome. The Earle of Pettillano, and all the rest of the family of Vrsins, followed the same accord. And now Ciuita-uecchia, Cornette, and in a manner all about Rome, is in the power of the French. All the Court, all the people, are troubled, they demand an vnity. F Being thus troubled in minde, he sends the Bishops of Concord and Terne, to the King: but hee seeks to compound both for him selfe and Alphonso. The King had not aduanced his armes euen to the gates of Rome to that intent. Hee sends the Cardinalls Ascanius and Colonne, Lewis of Tremouille, and the President of Gannai, to the Pope, who in an humour brings Ferdinand with his army into Rome, and suffers them to fortify the weakest places. But where is the meanes to defend it? Ostia cuts off their victualls. The Cardinals being T t 3 arriued

Hee sends the Cardinall of Saint Seuerin to the King, being at Nepy, and treats no more but of his owne affaires. And that which vrgeth him most, the King is come to Bracciano, the chiefe towne of the Vrsins: the Colonois haue many of the Gibelin faction within Rome: the Earle of Ligny (cousin germaine to the King by his mother) and the Lord of Aligre were ioyned vnto them, with fise hundred lances, & two thousand Suiffes, to spoile the country beyond Tiber, and to keepe Ferdinando within Rome. But hee was more amazed when as about twenty fadomes of the wall fell downe of it selfe, the which inuities the B King, and forceth the Pope. But he feares the Cardinals hatred, and the ruine of his estate. The King frees him of this doubt, and doth assure him, by the Marshall of Giè, the President of Gannai, and the Seneshall of Beaucaire, that hauing meanes to make his passage by force; he is notwithstanding moued with the same reuerence that his predecessors haue alwayes borne to the Romaine sea, that entring peaceably into Rome, all their controuersies should be conuerted into amity and friendship. Hee yeelds, and first he obtaines a safe-conduet for Ferdinando, to passe safely through the dominions of the church. Thus the King entred Rome with all his armie, by the port of Saint Mary de Popoly, in like manner as he had done into Florence: euen as Ferdinando Duke of Calabria passed out at Saint Sebastians gate, the last day of this year. The Pope fraught with feare and distresse, shuts him- C selfe vp into the Castle Saint Angelo, whilest he should treat with the King. And for that hee refused to deliuer the castle vnto the King, the artillery was twife drawne out of the castle of Saint Marke, where the King was lodged: yet the presents and promises of Alexander preuailed much with some of the priuie Counsell, and the King of his owne disposition, was not inclined to offend the Pope. But what needes there any Cannon to batter a place, which opens of it selfe, fiteene fadom of the castle wall, (saies the original) fell at the Kings arriuall. In the end the Pope giues the King the forts of Ciuita-uecchia, Terracine, and Spolero (yet this was not deliuered) To hold them untill the Conquest of Naples, and grants impunity to the Cardinals, and Barons that had followed the King. Zemir Ottoman brother to Baiazet, the second who since the death of Mahomet their father (being pursued by D the said Baiazet) had saued him-selfe at Rhodes, and from thence being led into France, had bene put into Pope Innocents power: for whose gard Baiazet paid yeerely forty thousand ducats to the Pope, that by the greedinesse of this summe, they should bee the lesse willing to yeeld to any prince, that might make vse of him against him. The King desired to haue him, to make him an instrument of the warre, which hee resolved against the Turke; after that of Naples. But Alexanders holynesse, aduised the Turke to stand vpon his gard, and to prouide that this yong king preuaile not in his enterprise: for a recompence hereof, Baiazet (although he detested the Popes impiety) sent him two hundred thousand crownes, by George of Antie, the messenger of this aduice, intreating the Pope to free him of this feare. It was generally beleueed, that hee was poysoned, and dyed within few dayes after E that Alexander had deliuered him. Moreouer it was said: That Cæsar, Cardinall of Valence the Popes sonne, should follow the King three moneths, as the Popes Legat, but rather to be a pawne of his fathers promises.

The Popes impiety.

By meanes of this accord, the Pope returnes to the Vatican, the Pontificall Pallace, where the king made his filiall submission, obtaines two Cardinalls Hatts, the one for the Bishop of Mans, being of the house of Luxembourg; the other for Bisconnet Bishop of S. Malo, and for him-selfe the title of Emperour of Constantinople; and a promise to inuest him in the realme of Naples, without any prejudice to an others right, and then he cured many of the Kings euill. And to shew, that as eldest sonne of the Church, hee had as great iurisdiction, as the Pope within Rome, hee caused three seates for Iustice to be made, and executi- on to bee done of some that were guilty of a sedition made in the Iewes streete.

Ferdinand was no sooner parted out of Rome, but the hatred which the people bare to the house of Arragon, discouered it selfe. The tyrannous oppressions of Ferdinand father to Alphonso were yet fresh. The Isle of Iſchia flowed yet with the bloud of foure and twenty Princes and Barons which had returned vpon his word, who beeing imprisoned after

A after the reuolt of Arragon, Alphonso (to make his coming to the crowne famous) 1495. caused to be slaine, amongst others, the Duke of Sessa and the Prince of Rosane, who had married the sister of Ferdinand his Father Ferdinand had bin a man without faith, 2 The cruelty of Ferdinand and Alphonso dessembler, cruell, violent, a great exactor, infamous, a rauisher of women, and irreligious, (witnesseth the Bishopricke of Tarentum, the which he sould to a Iew for thirteene thousand ducats, for his sonne, who he had sayd was a Christian.) Alphonso had the same qualities: and moreouer he was dissolute, impious, and wicked. Herevnto were added the old reliques of the Angeuin faction, which might helpe much to breed an alteration. Thus the people of Naples rise: Aguila and Abruzzo aduance their enfeignes: Fabrizio Colonna, keeps all B in awe about Albi and Taillicouffe, and all the rest of the Realme was ready to rebell. But that which most imports, the furies of his owne conscience torment him. He thinks that the ghosts of these murdered Noblemen appeere vnto him, that the trees and stones sound into his eares the names of France. He sees his subiects ready to reuenge the bloud shed against his fayth. Thus, vnable to withstand both a foraine and a home-bred enemy, he causeth his sonne Ferdinand to be crowned, whose young yeares had yet giuen no cause of scandall; and with foure light Galleis, laden with all kindes of wine, (whereunto hee was much giuen) seeds to gardin withall, some Iewels, and a litle money, he fled to Marare in Sicile, where he sodenly changed his horrible excesse into a Monkish life, assisting the religious at al houres of seruice, both day and night, liuing in abstinence, almes and prayers: but C oppressed with the hemroids and grauell, he died, being ready to shut himselfe vp in a monastery at Valentia the great.

Alphonso crownes his sonne and flies.

This flight made the Kings way more easie, and verified the saying of Pope Alexander. That the French were come with wadden spurres and chalke in their harbingers hands, to marke out their lodging without any difficulty. Alluding it to the prickes of wood which pages and lackeys put in the heeles of their maisters shoes, when they ride vpon their moyles. And in truth, our Frenchmens backs were not much ouer-heated with their armes in this expedition; not any one place staying the King about a day, but the Castelles of Naples. The King going from Rome comes to Vellitre, from whence the Cardinall of Valentia (his fathers right sonne) stole from his maiesty. From Vellitre he comes to Montfortin, a towne D belonging to the Church, strong of situation, yet was it battered and taken in few houres. All that were found in armes were slaine, except the three sonnes of James Comte a Romain gentleman Lord of the towne; who preferring the hatred he bare the Colonois, before his honour, had left the Kings pay to follow Alphonso. These with some others being retired into the Castle, yeelded them-selues prisoners vpon view of the Cannon. Mont-Saint-Ian, a towne belonging to the Marquis of Pescara, seated in the same plaine, vpon the confines of the Kingdome of Naples, strong both by art and nature, fortified with three hundred strangers, and fise hundred inhabitants, which were resolute to defend their state, yet was it one day befeeged, batted, assailed and taken in the Kings presence. Seauen hundred and six men were slaine in the fury of the fight, and but thirty French: and to terrifie the rest, E it was burnt.

We are now ready to enter. The Arragonois must shew his courage. Ferdinand the new King assembles all the forces he can, hauing fifty cornets of horse, and fixe thousand choise foote, vnder the most expert Capitaines of Italy, and camps at Saint Germaine. The place is of easie defence, on the one side an high and inaccessible mountaine, on the other side the waters hinder the approach, and in front is the Garillan, a riuer vnease to passe: and not farre off is the passage of Canello, a mountaine which of necessity they must passe: It is the keye of the whole kingdome, here must they fight, or giue way. But this army was daunted, without courage, and without force: the name of the French had amazed them, and the captaines, partly desirous of innouation, partly greedy of better intertaynment, wauered in F their faith and courage. The Marshall of Giè appogeth with three hundred Launces, and 2000. foote, but terror goes before him. In this amazement both Canello and Saint Germaine are shamefully abandoned, and eight peeces of great artillery are taken to thunder hereafter in fauour of the French.

The first entry of the French into the realme of Naples.

Capoma was sufficient to receiue the army, which marched after the forward, rather like trauellers then men of warre, without order, without commandement, and without obedience, 1495. obedience, the souldiars gaping after nothing but spoile. The situation is very strong, hauing Vulturno before it (a riuer very deepe in that place) but their resolution was like to that of Saint Germaine: and to increase it, as Ferdinand made account to defend it, and by that meanes to hold Naples and Caiette. The Queene his Grandmother sends him word, that since the losse of Saint Germaine, there was so great a tumult at Naples, as all would be in vpror if he came not speedily. He goes, and promiset to returne the next day. But John laques of Triuulce (to whome he had giuen the towne in gard) comes with some gentlemen of Capua to the King being at Calui: he presents him the towne and his seruice, and makes an offer to bring Ferdinand. The King accepts the Capuans offer, and the comming of Ferdinand, vpon condition that he retaine no portion within the realme, but should content himselfe with such meanes as he should giue him in France. In the meane time the soldiars sacke Ferdinand's lodging and his stable: the men at armes disperse themselues in diuers places; Virgilius and the Earle of Petellano craue a safe conduit from the King, and retire with their companies to Nola, Ferdinand thinking by this iourney to haue assured the Neapolitaines, returnes at the time prefixt, when as the Capuans aduise him not to set forward, seeing they were other-wise resolved. Auerse (a towne betwixt Capua and Naples) lends their keyes to the King, and the Neapolitaines determined to follow them.

Ferdinand retired into the castle, knowing that five hundred Lansquenets ment to take him prisoner: he giues them the mouables of the said Castell, and as they were busie to diuide it, he slips from them, sets the young Prince of Rosane at liberty (whome by loue or force he carried with him) and the earle of Popoli: he causeth the ships that remained in the port, to be burnt and sunke, and saues him selfe with the Queene, Don Fredericke his vnkle, his daughter Ioane, and some few seruants, in the Ile of Ischia: and whilest he was within sight of Naples, he often repeated this goodly Oracle, If the Lord keepe not the City, the watch-men watch but in vaine.

The whole

Naples conquered by Charles.Charles makes a royall entry into Naples.

Thus all wauer at the Conquerors fame, and with such cowardise, as two hundred horse vnder the command of the Earle of Ligny going to Nola, tooke both it, Virgilius and the Earle of Pertilano, without resistance, being retired thither with 400. men at armes, attending the safe-conduit they had obteyned from the King, being amazed like to the rest of their army, and from thence they were led captiues to the fort of Montdragon, and all their men stript. In the meane time the Neapolitans Ambassadors come with their keyes, desiring a confirmation of their ancient exemptions and priuileges. The King enters the twenty one of February, and is receiued with such exceeding ioy, both of great and small, of all ages, all sexes and al qualities, as euery one runnes as to their dearest redeemer, from a hate-full and insupportable tirany. Thus Charles (without planting of tent or breaking of launce) in foure moneths, and a halfe, with an admirable happinesse, came, saw and ouercame. They say commonly, that the poyson lies in the taile, and that the hardest part to flea of an eele, is the taile. The perfection of the victory consisted in the taking of the Castles of Naples. The tower of Saint Vincent, built for the defence of the port, was easily taken. The new castell, the lodging of their Kings, seated vpon the sea, strong by nature and by art, plentifully furnished with victuals and munition, and manned with five hundred Lansquenets, but abandoned by the Marquis of Pescara, to whome Ferdinand had left it in gard: who seeing the garrison bent to yeeld the place, had followed Ferdinand, and was after some small defence yeelded, vpon condition to depart in safety, and to carry what they could away. And see here the first and greatest error which the King committed in this exploit, himselfe wanting experience, but his minions and fauorits no couetousnesse. He gaue al these victuals and other moueables, to the first that begged them: who furnished themselves with the munition, wher on the preferuacion of the towne and place depended. The Castell de l'Ouo, built vpon a rocke, hanging ouer the sea, being battered with the canon (the which might onely inda-mage the wall, but not the rocke it selfe) compounded, if they were not releued within a certaine time, and after foure and twenty daies siege, it was deliuered into the Kings hands.

The King made his entry into Naples the 12. of May, in an imperiall habit; and was recei-ued as King of France, and of both Sicilies (whereof the realme of Naples makes a part) and Emperour of Constantinople. But herein he made no iust accompt with him that giues and

A and takes away Kingdomes. The Barons and Commonalties sent away their Captaines and troupes dispersed into diuers parts of the Realme. Those which depended most of the house of Arragon, do first turne taile. The Caraffes, who enioyed forty thousand Ducats of inheritance: the Dukes of Melfe, Grauina, and Sora. The Earles of Montorio, Iundi, Tripalda, Celano, Monteleon, Merillano, and Popoli, come to do their homage, and generally al the Noblemen of the Realme, except Alphonso Aualo, Marquis of Pescara, the Earle of Acre, and the Marquis of Squillazzo, whose liuings the King gaue away. Another rigour which shall be a great cause of the following reuolts.

Calabria yeelds willingly to the Lord of Aubigny, sent thither with a small troope, except the castell of Rhegium: but they wanted meanes to force it, the towne held for the King. Abruzzo yeelds of it selfe. Apulia erects the Standard of France, except Turpia and Mantia; who notwithstanding had planted the Flower-de-lis, yet refusing any other command, then of the King himselfe: who had giuen them to the Lord Perfi d'Alegre, and they returne to their first master. The castles of Brundisium and Gallipoli, were neglected with too great confidence: but they shall serue shortly as a leuaine to stirre vp a masse of rebellion. The rocke of Caiette well furnished with all things necessarie, yeeldes at discretion, after some light assaults. Tarentum, Otrante, Monopoli, Trani, Manfredonne, Barle, and in a manner all other strong places yeeld at the first brute. But some holding themselves wronged, for that they had in a manner disdained to heare their deputies: others, for that they had sent

C no man to receiue them, will soone returne to their first demand. The Isle of Ischia remained yet, and Ferdinand vpon the first intelligence of the yeelding of the castles of Naples, had abandoned it to Ianicke d'Auala, brother to the Marquis of Pescara, both most faithfull to their Prince, and was retired into Sicile. The King sends thither his armie at sea, the which was cast by a tempest vpon the Isle of Corfe: yet in the end they anchored vpon the realme, but after the last act of the expedition. This armie holding it selfe too weake to force the fort of Ischia, would not assaile it, and therefore the King resolved to send into Prouence and to Genoa for more shippes, and to assure the sea, the which Ferdinand scowred with fourteene gallies ill armed. But prosperitie doth oftentimes make vs become insolent, and without considering the consequence, we easily let matters passe at aduenture. Our French are now well lodged, they dreame of nothing but feasting, dancing, and turneys: and the greatest about the King haue no other care, but to make the victorie profitable to themselues: without any regard, neither of the dignitie, nor profit of their Prince, who not satisfied with the conquest of these goodly and rich estates, determines to aduance his victorious forces. Let vs leaue them glutted with ease, pleasure, and good cheare, and let vs make an escape into the East, to see how he had sped there, if the Pope had as well vnited the Poten-tates of Italie, to ioine their common forces with our Charles, as he now stirres them vp to crosse his new conquests.

Mahomet the 2. left two sonnes, Baiazet the 2. of that name, and Zemin, (they name him diuerfly, Zemin, Zizim, Gemin and Geme) both resident in their gouernments when the father died. Baiazet in Capadocia, Zemin in Licaonia. Their absence sets the Baschaes and Captaines of the Ianisaries at discord, about the succession, so as they fell from words to armes. Hereupon the Ianisaries proclaime Baiazet Emperour being absent: Isaac and Mesi-shes, chiefe Captaines of the Turkish armie, being then at Constantinople, set Corchut the sonne of Baiazet in the throne of his ancestors: they deliuer him the forts and treasure, that vnder colour of his nonage they might manage the affaires of the Empire at their pleasure.
Baiazet posts thither, and by great bribes doth pacifie and winne the hearts of the Ianisaries, and of their Captaines, incensed against him through the malice of some Noblemen. So Corchut being yet very young, yeelded him the Crowne willingly.

F Zemin on the other side, was called by his friends and partisans, holding him to be a man of greater courage, and better execution then his brother, being more fit for his booke, whereunto he was more addicted, then vnto armes. Pyramet Caraman King of Cilicia, and Caiibbey Sultan of Egypt, incite him to warre against his brother. But he was vanquished in three batailles, by Achamat Bascha, and despairing, fled to the great Maister of Rhodes, leauing his mother and two twins, a sonne and a daughter in Carras, whom Baiazet caused to be murdered. Many Princes of Europe demanded Zemin, as Lewis the eleuenth French King, and Matthias King of Hongary, hoping by his meanes to ruine Baiazet: but this was a good pigeon in the Popes Doue-houfe. Innocent the eight would haue him, hoping that Baiazet his brother would giue some notable summe of money to redeeme him, or else to keepe him from any other, that might vse him as an instrument to crosse his new Empire. Alexander, successor vnto Innocent, (a monstrous man in life, monstrous in his election, and monstrous in his death.) I haue horror to read, and more to report, what writers do testifie, intreating the curious reader, to see them rather in the Originalls them-selues) being forced to deliuer him to Charles the eight, and so disappointed of his yearly pension of forty thousand Ducats, which he receiued for the gard of him: corrupted by the money of Baiazet, he caused him to bee poisoned: either greeued for the losse of his pension, or enuying the glory of Charles: or else fearing, least if things should succeed happily for him against the Infidels, hee should turne his thoughts and forces, to reforme the abuses and corruptions which had long before crept into the Church.

A while after the flight of Zemin, Baiazet caused Acomath to bee strangled, for that (growne proud and fierce, by reason of his wealth) hee practised to ruine Baiazet, and to transport the Empire to Zemin. A happy death for the Christians, of whom Acomath was an vniust and cruell oppressor. Baiazet freed by the death of these two men, hee turned his forces against the Christians, and subdued Valachia. Then he vanquished Caraman, reducing his Principality into the forme of a Prouince. After that hee marched with his army into Asia against the Sultan Caithbei, who had succoured his Brother Zemin with counsell, men, victuals and money. The Sultan defeated the Turke in two great batailles, the one was giuentneere to Adene in Cilicia, the other neere to Tarsis: in the which he tooke both the Commanders of the Turkish army prisoners, Mesithes Paleologue, and Achomat Chersogole, sonne in lawe to Baiazet, and slew about three-score and ten thousand Turkes.

This check made Baiazet to change his climate, and leauing Asia, to passe into Europe, where his aduersaries were not so strong. Hee tooke Durazzo, neere to Valone, and wonne a great battaile vnder the command of Cadi-Bascha, against the Sclauonians, Hongarians and Croations, who were ouer-throwne in the large plaines of Croatia, neere to Saue, about the yeare 1493. But Iohn Castriot, sonne to that braue Scanderbeg, recovered that which Baiazet had vsurped: forcing him to accept of such conditions as he propounded. Moreouer Cerf-Vichin defeated him in battaile in Croatia, and expelled him the Country.

Then all those nations which lye betwixt Valonne and Constantinople (being from the one to the other about eightene dayes journey) languished vnder the burthen of the Turkish tyranie, Albanois, Sclauonians, and Grecians, hoping for their deliuey, by the meanes of our Charles. But what could he do, seeing those that should second the resolution of this young Prince, were the first to ouer-throw his desseignes by their secret practises? Charles notwithstanding the death of Zemin, sent the Archbishop of Durazzo into Greece, an Albanois by birth, hauing an enterprife vpon Scutari, with Constantin a Greeke, afterwards gouernor of Montferrat, who had intelligence within the Towne: the Venetians haue no sooner knowledge of the death of Zemin, but to gratifie Baiazet, they will haue the honour to giue him the first aduice: for the effecting whereof they command, that no ship should passe by night betwixt the two Castels, which are at the entry of the gulf of Venice. This was the same night, when as the Archbishop should depart with many swords, bucklers, and iaelins, to arme those with whom he had intelligence. But hee is taken, and shutte vp in one of those Castells: his instructions are viewed, whereby the Venetians informed of the fact, send to aduertise the Turkes in the places adioyning. In truth our French had not yet learned to know him, who guides our hands to fight, and our fingers to the battaile. Attending a strange and sodaine Catastrophe, they must plant the bounds of their victory in the Realme of Naples. Let vs now see the issue of this journey. Wee haue left King Charles at Naples, seeking his delights, and his people hunting after profit, neglecting to expell the Arragonois out of those few places which held yet for them. In the meane time the peoples loue and fauour, (who loue not a stranger, but in their need) decreased.

The King had in his bounty freed the Realme of about two hundred thousand ducats by yeare: yet matters were not managed with that order and iudgement as was requisite: hee content in the

ples.

A heard not the petitions and complaints of suters, but left the charge thereof to such as ruled him: whose incapacitie and couetousnesse confounded all. The Nobilitie were not regarded, their seruices were not recompenced; they had no access to the King: no distinction of persons; no gratuitie but by chance: mens courages that were estranged from the house of Arragon, were not confirmed: no restitution of goods and offices to the Angeuins, and other Barons, which had beene banished by old Ferdinand: preferments were giuen to such as purchased them with money, and other extraordinarie meanes: to many the were giuen without reason, and taken from others without any cause: the townes which were not wont to obey any immediatly but the King, were giuen for the most part to Frenchmen. Things most insupportable to subiects, who had beene accustomed to the wise and well ordered gouernement of Kings of the house of Arragon, and had hoped for better in the change of this royaltie. These things did wonderfully blemish the reputation of the French. On the other side, there was no care to keepe the faith ingaged, for the restitution of the townes and fortresses to the Florentines and the Church. A pretext which serued as a principall ground for the following League.

In the meane time, Alphonso and Ferdinand lately Kings of Naples, lay before the Venetians the dangers they incurred by this new purchase to the Crowne of France. The King of Castile is in doubt of his Islands of Sicile and Sardinia. The Emperour is ialous, and they giue him falsely to vnderstand, that the King desired his Imperiall Crowne. The Duke of Milan could neuer belecue, the King should find so great facilitie in this expedition, or proceed so farre with his forces. He was vnable to defend his estate newly vsurped. But another feare possesseth him, the seruitude that hangs ouer his head, and all Italy. The Pope opposeth, and the Turke at the Popes instance, threatens the Venetians, if they declare not themselves against the King. The Venetians, hauing seene the violent course of this happie successe, that the King, like lightening, had runne through all Italy: that he had seazed vpon Pisa, and other forts of the Florentines, that he had left a garrison in Sienna, and done the like in the territories of the Church. They imagined, that his proiects had a further reach then the realme of Naples, and hold anothers danger to be their owne. To preuent it, they conclude a League, (for three intents, said they, to the Lord of Argenton, the Kings Ambassador at Venice.) To defend Christendome against the Turke: for the common defence of Italy, and for the preseruacion of euery ones priuate estate. They conclude by secret articles, to aide Ferdinand of Arragon, for the recouerie of the realme of Naples, who with great hope of the peoples loue, was readie to enter Calabria. That at the same instant the Venetians should attempt some sea townes of the said realme: The Duke of Milan (to cut off all succours that might come from France) should seeke to surprise Ast, where the Duke of Orleans remained with small forces. And the confederates should giue the Emperour and the King of Spaine a certaine summe of money, to inuade France with a mightie army. The Florentines had iust cause to forsake the King. He had not settled them in the possession of their places. He preferred the counsell of such as supported the Pisans before the Florentines, or his faith, perswading him that if these were restored they would vnite themselves to the other Potentates: yet would not they enter into this League, desiring rather to recouer their places from his hand that did enioy them. The Duke of Ferrara dissembling, would not signe it, yet was he content that his sonne should accept the pay of an hundred and fiftie men at armes, and the title of Lieutenant generall for the Duke of Milan. This League concluded, made the Courtiers desirous to returne into France, thrust forward rather by an inconstant lightnesse, then any wise consideration, or loue to the Kings honour and good: Leauing many important affaires vndecided, and the realme not wholly conquered: some chiefe forts, either not taken or not furnished, gaue an entrie to the Arragonois. We do oftentimes contemne an enemy ouer whom we haue an aduantage. So the Castels of Caieto, Rhegium, Brundisium, Gallipoli, Mantia, Turpia, Otrante, and other townes neglected, made the way to a generall reuolt. Now the confederates march to field, to ioine their forces, meaning either to beseege Charles within Naples, or to fight with him in his returne. They must therefore resolue either to defend the realme, or to leaue a good guard, and so depart before this great storme fell vpon them. The Spanish fleet landing at Rhegium, had furnished it, and assured it for the Arragonois. Mantia, Turpia, and Otrante seeing the

League,

1495. League, and that they had not regarded them, plant the Arragon Ensignes, and receive the A garrisons which Don Frederick had sent them. The Venetian fleet commanded by Anthony Grimaldi, appeared vpon the coast of Apulia. In the end all the realme begins to make the open demonstration of a new will. But see, hee that was euen now the peoples terror, the Iudge of an others life and estate, the hope of the East, stands in feare to bee controuled, A scourge to abate the presumption which his victory had bred. The King leaues Gilbert of Bourbon Earle of Montpensier, for his Viceroy, a hardy and valiant Prince, but faith the History, Not wise, he did not rise before noone. And for the defence of the Realme, two thousand five hundred Suisses, a part of his French footmen, eight hundred French Lances, five hundred men at armes Italianes in his pay, some commanded by the gouernour of Rome, some by Prosper and Fabrizio Colonna, and by Anthony Sanelli, Captaines well preferred in B the distribution of places and offices within the Realme, especially the Colonnes. Prosper had in the Duchie of Tracette, the City of Fundi, Montfortin, and about thirty other places. Fabrizio had the countries of Albi and Taillecouffe, which Virgile Vrsin did formerly enioy. The Lord of Aubigni, a braue and wise Knight, was made Gouernour of Calabria, and had the Earledome of Acri, and the Marquisate of Squillazzo given him. The Prince of Salerne was restored to the office of Admiral, and he of Besignan well aduanced.
Steuens de Vers, some-times groome of the Kings Chamber, and after Seneshal of Beaucaire, obtained the Duchy of Nola, the Captainship of Caieto, and other commands, with the office of great Chamberlaine, & Controuller of the treasor within the realme, well affected to C the gard thereof, but too weake of iudgment to beare the burthen and care of so great affaires. Don Julian of Lorraine (greatly commended for his gouernment) was made Duke of S. Angelo. Gratian des Guerres, a valiant Captaine of great reputation, had the gouernment of Abruzzo: Gabriel of Montfaucon (of whom the King made great accompt) had Manfredonia, but having receiued it well furnished with victuals, and in a Country abounding with corne, he so deuoured his prouision, as after foure dayes siege, hee was forced to yeeld vp the place for want of victuals. The King left George of Suilli at Tarentum, who carried him-selfe there with much honor. Hee died there of the plague, and the Towne held D for the King, vntill that famine forced them to change their party. In Aquila, the Baylife of Vitry was commended to haue well discharged his duty. Such was the order the King left in the Realme of Naples, whereof followed a horrible disorder: for the greatest part of other Captaines, appointed in diuers places, applied to their owne priuate profit such commodities as they found within their places, for the defence whereof the King had greatly weakened his forces. So returning but with nine hundred men at armes, two thousand five hundred Suisses, seauen thousand men in pay, and fiftene hundred men of defence, chosen out of his traine following the Court, he parted the twentieth day of May, taking his way to Rome, and his armie at sea to Liurne. The Pope made some shew to reconcile him-selfe with the King, and the King laboured to diuide him from the league. In the end a bad conscience made him go to Oruieto with his colledge of Cardinals, a thousand light horse, two hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote, leauing a sufficient garrison in the Castell E of S. Angelo, and the Cardinall of Anastasio for Legat in Rome, to receiue the King, who refusing the Vatican, lodged in the suburbs. And the Pope vnderstanding, that hee appro-ched to Viterbio, (although he had giuen some hope of an enter-view betwixt Viterbio and Oruieto), yet he went from Oruieto to Perugia, with an intent if the King tooke that course, to recover Ancona, and so retire himselfe by sea into some place of safety. Yet norwith-standing the Kings iust cause of discontent, he redeliuered him Ciuita-uecchia & Terracine, reseruing Ostium, the which he left in the hands of the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, Bishop of that place. The territories of the Church were not spoiled by his army, onely Toscanelle, which refusing to lodge his forward, was taken by force & sack. But we must leaue records of our indiscretion in all places. His enemies troupe together and during a fruitlesse stay of F six or seauen dayes at Sienna, we giue them leifure to ioyne their forces. Moreover the Florentines summon the King of his faith and promises, and to draw him there-vnto the more willingly, (besides the thirty thousand ducats which they were ready to pay, as remaining of their gift) they offered to lend him three-score and ten thousand Ducats more: and to assist him in his passage with three hundred men at armes, vnder the command of Francesco Sacco, a braue

A braue captaine, and faithfull to the King, and with two thousand foote. Three reasons should moue the Counsell to accept hereof. The want of mony, the increase of their army, and that which did most import, the discharge of the Kings faith and royall oath: yet a firebrand must first kindle, and in the end fire all Italy.

The Earle of Ligni, young and vnexperienced, (yet fauoured of the King his cousin) laboured for the Seigneuries of Pisa and Liurno, and the Sienois required him for their Lord promising him an appointment of twenty thousand Ducats by the yeare, vpon condition he should entertaine three hundred foote for the defence of the place, taking away the ordinary gard, which the order of Monte Nouo (in whose power the gouernment of the city B was wont to be) held in the Palace.

The King (becing young) preferred the counsell of young men, before the marshall of Gie, the President of Gannai, and others well aduised: and agrees, that he should take the city of Sienna into his protection, binding him-selfe to defend all that depended thereon, except Montepulciano, wherewith he would not deale, neither for the Florentines nor the Siennois. But what were the fruites of this conclusion? but the shamefull expulsion of this garrison, and of the Lord of Lisle, whome the King had left there for Ambassador, by those of the foresaid order, who soone after recouered their ancient authority by force. Then liued at Florence, Friar Ierosime Sauonarola, of the order of Saint Dominick, in great reputation of a holy life, and a graue preacher, who by his sermons had greatly confirmed the Florentines affection to the King: hee had long time foretold and preached the Kings comming into Italy, saying: that hee was sent of God to punish the tyrants of Ital: that nothing could resist him, that he should enter Pisa, and such a day the Estate of Florence should die. And in truth Peter of Medicis was banished that day, and many other things fell out as he had foretold (amongst others the death of Laurence de Medicis) and he said he knew them by reuelation: that the Church should be reformed by the sword. He likewise affirmed: That not withstanding the great fires of the Venetians, the King should returne without any great danger to his person: that he should be incountried upon the way, but the honour should be his, had he but a hundred men in his company. That G O D which had conuicted him in his going, would gard him in his returne: but for that hee had not dischargd him-selfe in D the reformation of the Church, as he ought, and had winkt at the thefts and insolencies of his troupes, that God had pronounced a sentence against him, and he should haue his chastisement. The which he him-selfe did signifie vnto the King in plaine tearmes: adding, that if he would take pity of the people, and restraine his men from doing ill, and punish the offenders, as his duty required, God would reuoke, or mitigate his sentence. To conclude, that he should not thinke to be excused for saying: I doe no euill. A lesson for Kings. That the faults they suffer in their subiects, are so many burthens layed vpon their owne backs, to pleade one day against them, before his Maiefty, to whome they like to all other men, are accountable. And moreover:
that the peoples voice, is the voyce of God.

In the meane time, the Venetians and Lodowike Sforce make great preparations to stoppe E the Kings passage: or at the least, to keepe him from attempting against the Milanois. And for the better effecting of their desseigne, they entertaine John Bentiuole, at their common charge, who ioynd the city of Bologna to their League. Lodowike armed tenne gallies at Genoa, vpon his owne charge, and foure great shippes, at the common charge of the Pope, the Venetians and of him-selfe. And to surpriue the Towne of Ast (as he was bound by the Capitulation,) he leuiued two thousand foote in Germany, (having lately drawne Galeas of Saint Seuerin into this action) with seuen hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote.
By meanes of these forces he promised to him-selfe an assured conquest of the City of Ast.
He sends the Duke of Orleans three insolent conditions: that hereafter he should no more surpe the title of Duke of Milan, the which his father Charles had taken after the death of Phillip Maria viscont. That he should not suffer any new forces to come from France into Italy. That he should send those into France that were in Ast. And for the assurance of these things, he should deliuer the said town into the hands of Galeas Saint Seuerin, who should keepe it faithfully for the King. A wretched man, who by a proud ostentation, thinkes to amaze a noble courage, and cannot instantly hide the basenes of his owne. But by the aduice of the Lord of Argenton, Ambassador for the King at Venice, the Duke of Orleans had from the beginning furnished

Suiſſes, and hie hundred men which Lodowike Marquis of Saulces had ſent. The Duke of Bourbon had leuied this army to ioyne with the King vpon the Theſin, and to helpe his paſſage: But the Duke of Orleans imploied it in the Marquiſate of Saulces, to take Galfinieres, the which Anthony Miris, of Saint Seuerin held. And although he had expreſſe commandement from the King, to lay aſide all enterpriſes, and goe to meete with him, yet did he accept the offer made him by two Opizins, gentlemen of Nouarre, who hated Lodowike Sforce.

He paſſeth the Pau by night, at the bridge of Sture, accompanied by the Marquis of Salu-ces, and was let into Nouarre by the conſpiratours, without any reſiſtance. In this place the Duke of Milan tooke his greateſt delight, being moſt pleaſant of all others for hauking, B and hunting. This ſtratagem had bene dangerous in another of meaner quality, ſeeing the queſtion was to ſuccour the Kings perſon, whome the French eſteemed no leſſe then a Kingdome. But ſeeing the Duke of Orleans had thus begun, why did he not proceed? Milan opened her armes, Pruis offered it ſelfe, and to that end he ſent twiſe vnto him. Lodowike (as deſiect in aduerſity, as proud in his proſperity,) ſhewed the baſeneſſe of his courage. The Nobility and People deſired nothing more then the ruine of this houſe of Sforce.

Milan and Duchy ready

againſt Lodowike

The Venetians had let the King vnderſtand, that if hee made warre againſt the Duke of Milan, they would ſuccor him with all their meanes. Thus Charles foreſeeing, that by the taking of Nouarre, he ſhould ſoone haue the enemies vpon him, and that the duke of Orleans ſhould need ſuccours: he goeth on from Sienna to Piſa. Then Sauonarola comes to him C to Poggibonſe, and the next day to Caſtel Florentine, and vſing (as he was wont) the name and authority of God, he declared vnto him: that if he yielded not to the Florentines the places wherunto he was bound by oth, he ſhould be rigorouſly puniſhed. The King excuſing himſelfe vpon that which he had promiſed to the Piſanes, to maintaine them in liberty, before he had taken any oth in Florence, gaue both the Monke & the Florentine Ambaſſadors hope of reſtitution, after his coming to Piſa. At Piſa, the Citizens teares both of men and women, (beſeeching them that lodged in their houſes, to intreat the King, not to ſuffer them to fall again into the Florentines tyranny) made Charles to forget the promiſes and oth he had taken vpon the altar of Saint John at Florence: but moſt of all, the importunate ſute of the Earle of Ligni, that the King would leaue him Piſa and Liurne at his deuotion. Thoſe which D had impugned this reſolution in Sienna, did likewiſe contradiſt it in Piſa: for (ſaid they) if by the oppoſition of enemies, any diſorder ſhould chance, or any difficulty to paſſe through Lombardy, we ſhould haue a ſure and ſit retreat at Piſa: whereas, if we reſtore them to the Florentines, when as they haue recouered all their places, we ſhall finde them as inconstant as the other Italians. Moreouer they gaue the King to vnderſtand, that for the ſafety of the realme of Naples, it were expedient to hold the port of Liurne, for if the eſtate of Genoa ſhould change for the Kings good, he ſhould be in a manner Lord of all the ſea, from the port of Marſeilles vnto that of Naples.

A diſhonorable enterpriſe
vpon Venice

Finally, the King changed the captaine of the Cittadell, and left one called Entragues, a man (ſaith the Originall) ill conditioned, ſeruant to the Duke of Orleans, (whome the Earle E of Ligni had recommended) with ſome foote-men of Perri Entragues wrought ſo, as he had Pietraſanta, Morrton, and Libreſacta, neere vnto Luques. Serczane was giuen (by meanes of the ſaid Earle) to a baſtard of Rouſſy his ſeruant, and Serezanelle to another that was at his diſpoſing. Thus the King did willingly weaken his forces the which he muſt diſtribute into theſe places, to make his fauorits great. And as he ſuffered himſelfe to be too eaſily carried away by the rath counſell of thoſe he fauored, behold vpon a hope giuen him by the Cardinals of Rouere and Fregofe, Obietto of Fieſque, and other baniſhed men, on a ſodaine alteration at Genoa, he ſends with them (againſt the aduice of his counſell, who did not approve the weakening of his army, for if he ſhould win the battaile, Genoa would yeeld of it ſelfe, but if he loſt it, he had then no need thereof) Philip Earle of Breſſe, afterwards Duke of Sa-uoy, the Lords of Beaumont, Polignac, and Ambeiou of the houſe of Amboiſe, with ſixe ſcore men at armes, and fise hundred croſbowmen, newly come out of France, ſending after them the company of men at armes of Vicelli, and thoſe men which the Duke of Sauoy had ſent, fortified by the army at ſea, reduced to ſeuē galleys, two galeons, and two barks, commanded by Milans gouernour of Daulphine, to countenance that at land.

A But how eaſily doth man deceiue himſelfe in his owne conceits? All theſe that went to take, are taken, euen at the ſame place where we haue ſeene our men defeat King Alphonſes troopes, and by the ſame men that they had beaten. John Lewis of Fieſque, and John Adorne, were led Captiues vnto Genoa, where they loſt the fruit and honour of a famous battaile, in the which they might haue done good ſeruice.

But who will not thinke the predictions of Sauonarola to bee very true. That God would guide the King by the hand into ſafety; taking away his enemies iudgement, not to moleſt him in the moſt painful ſtraights of his voyage? Our French are now betwixt Luques and Pietreſancte, inuironed on the one ſide by high mountaines, and on the other, by deepe marſhes and bogges. They muſt paſſe a cauſe, which a Cart ſet croſſe, with two peeces of

B cannon might eaſily garde. Pontreme, lying at the entry of the mountaines, was held for Lodowike by three hundred foote. The Marſhall of Gie arriuing with the foreward, they preſently open the gates in fauour of Triuulce, vpon promiſe to ſaue their liues and goods.
But alas the Suiſſes had not yet forgotten, that when as the armie paſſed to Naples, ſome forty of their companions were ſlaine there in a tumult! For this cauſe, they fall furioſly vpon them, kill all the men, ſack the towne, and burne it, and all that was within it, the Marſhall not being able to preuent this diſorder. The bloud being inflamed, it transports vs beyond the bonds of reaſon, but as it growes cold, it returns to his right place. Theſe Suiſſes doubted ſome puniſhment: or at the leaſt, that the King ſhould grow in diſlike of them for this out-rage, committed both againſt the lawes of armes, and nations. But what? an vnbridled deſire of reuenge, a military fury hath transported them: they are ready, though

C not to make ſatisfaction, yet to repaire it, by ſome notable ſeruice. And ſee, an opportunity is offered. The army ſtaid on this ſide the vally of Pontreme, in extreame want of victuals: and the artillery could not paſſe theſe troubleſome ſtraights, without great toyle, and loſſe of time. And this gaue the enemy leaſure to make one vnited body of all his forces. The Suiſſes come and doe voluntarily offer to paſſe it by force, ſo as the King will pardon them: the which hee doth. Leauing the valley, they muſt mount vp a very ſteepe hill, where their Moyle did creepe vp with great difficulty. Theſe men perſorme the worke of horſes of burthen: they couple them ſelues by two and two, and ſo vnder-take the worke, a hundred or two hundred at once, as the burthen required, and one being weary, another ſup-plied his place.

notable peece
of ſeruice.

The foreward was lodged at Fornoue (a ſmall, but a good village, ſeated at the foote of the mountaine, entring into Lombardy) where he had the enemy in front: without doubt they were in great danger, if they had then charged them. But their deſire to ſwallow vp this armie in the middeſt of the plaine: giuing the King meanes (who lay fiftene French leagues off) to ioyne his troopes, laide the way open to ſhame and conſuſion, imagining, that to charge our French on this ſide the Mountaines, were to cut off all retreat to Piſa and other places of the Florentines. And on the other ſide, to fight with-out attending their men, were to doe them wrong, ſeeing that their foote were not excellent. If they miſ-carried, they ſhould purchaſe reproach with the Seigneurie of Venice. Some light ſkirmiſ-hes made the Marſhall retire into the higher part of the Mountaine. Here-vpon the 1495. Their armie camped at the Abbay of Guaruole, about a league from Fornoue, vpon a little hill on the right hand of the Kings armie. The King had no other forces, but what hee brought from Naples, whereof we haue made mention at his departure. He must passe neere the enemye (beeing halfe a League off, and a smal brooke called Taro, betwixt both.) There was no likelihood, that this great multitude should part without the hazard of a battaile. To trie their resolutions, the King (who desired onely to passe quietly into France) causeth the Lord of Argenton, lately Ambassador at Venice, to write vnto the aboue-named Commissaries, that he desired to confer with them. They promise to meet the next day in a conuenient place betwixt both armies. The night was terrible in raine, lightning, and thunder, a fearefull prediction of the day following.

Their

Monday morning, the King armes himselfe complete, and mounted vpon his Sauoyard (a horse which Charles Duke of Sauoy had giuen him) faire and goodly; manning him, with all agilitie, blacke of colour, and answerable in proportion to him that was mounted thereon: he shewes himselfe to his troupes, with a cheerefull countenance, well coloured, and a speech contrarie to his custome, strong, resolute, and wise, an assured preface of the honour he should winne that day. Putting his armie into battaile, he placed in the forward 350. French Lances, and John Iaques of Triuulce with his companie of an hundred Lances, and three thousand Suisses, the chiefe hope of the armie, commanded by Engelbert brother to the Duke of Cleues (who did fight on foote, with the Baylife of Dijon, that had leamed of them) and to second them, three hundred Archers, some cross-bowmen on horse-backe of his guards, whom he commanded to leaue their horses, and the most part of his force; conceiuing that the fore-ward should be charged with the chiefe of his enemies forces. His Maiestie was in the Battaille, hauing about him seuen or eight young Noblemen armed like him selfe (for the confederates had sent to discouer him by a Herald, vnder colour of some demand) and for counsell he had the Lord of Tremouille. The Earle of Foix commaunded the rereward: the baggage, by the counsell of Triuulce, was left without guard, exposed to pillage, to keepe the enemy occupied with that baite. Thus the armie marched, when as Luke and Melchior the Venetian Commissaries were readie to parte. But the troupes were now in alarme, the Captaines encouraged their men to fight. The nearenesse of both armies calles them from words to blowes, they beginne by skirmishes, the Cannon thunders; but with more noyse then effect. The Marquis of Mantua, his vnkle Ralph of Gonzagua, the Earle Bernardin of Montone, with a Squadron of sixe hundred choice men at armes, a great troupe of Stradiots, and other light horse, with fise thousand foote, passe the Taro vpon the backe of the French reere-ward, to charge them behind: leauing on the other banke, Anthony of Monfetre a bastard of the Duke of Urbins, with a great Squadron, to passe at the first call: ordaining moreover, that at the first shooke, a part of the light horse should charge in flanke, and the rest of the Stradiots should follow, to set vpon the baggage. The Earle of Caiazzo, with foure hundred men at armes, and a great number of foote, passeth likewise to charge the fore-ward, leauing in like sort on the other banke, Annibal Bentiuole with two hundred men at armes, to supply when he should be sent for. And for the guard of their lodging, two great companies of men at armes, with a thousand foote, the Venetian Commissaries reseruing a supply for all euents. Thus the French armie is enuironed on all sides, so as beeing broken, no man might hope for safetie: and the King, who to strengthen the fore-ward, had weakened the other two parts, was forced to leaue the Knights he meant to make to some better leysure, and to turne his backe to the fore-ward, and his face to the enemye, approaching neere the Reere-ward. The Stradiots fall vpon the baggage, they wound, kill, and spoile, and the Marquis is at blowes with the reere-ward, who at the first charge breake their Lances, and then valiantly they ioine pel-mel with their battle-axes, swords, and other short weapons, the Marquis performing the part of a most valiant and vigilant Captaine, and his troupe of most resolute men at armes. The king was brought rashly into danger, his followers beeing disperfed here and there in the conflict, assisted with few about him but Masheu bastard of Bourbon, and Philip of Moulin a gentleman of Solongne, noted for that they had beene seene very neere vnto the King in this conflict. The King did afterwards greatly fauour this Philip, hee made him Keeper of the great Seale, gaue him a companie of men at armes, the gouernement of Langres, and a great summe of money, according to the

On the other side, Anthony of Monfetre appointed by Ralph to succour when he should be called, keeping his stand (for that by reason of Ralphs death no man called him) the French tooke their field at large, and doubting their courage, they doubled their blowes, so as by the death of some, and the wounding and flight of others, the Marquis his troupe opprest with the rough charge of our men at armes, in the end turned their backs, and were chased and beaten euen to the riuers side, without taking of any prisoner, or care of booty, our French beeing loathed of this filthy gaine, by that common voyce flying amongst them. Companions remember Guinegasse, where the greedinesse of spoile had taken from them the better part of a notable victory. At the same instant the Earle of Caiazzo led his troupes against the fore-ward: but this was but a countenance, for euen as they couched their lances, seeing some of his troupe vnhoisted, John Piccinin, Galeas of Corregge and others fainted, and breaking of them-selues, they had meanes to recouer their battaile. The Marshall of Gié seeing on the other side of the riuier another regiment of men at armes, prepared for the battaile, he keepees back his men, the which was held of some to be rather an act of cowardise, then of discretion; but by such as preferre reason before danger, wise and iudicious. The Suisses tooke about twenty of these run-aways, and slue them.

The Marquis of Mantoua gathered together the remainders of this ouer-throw, and the Earle of Petillano (being prisoner vpon his word, since the taking of Capoua) flying in this tumult to the Italians campe, kept them from a more shamefull rout. For the whole campe talked of a retreat, and the high way from Placentia to Parma was couered with men, horses and carts that retired. Then the King going to his fore-ward (which had kept their stand) propounded vnto his Captaines, whether he should charge the enemy in his lodging? E Triuulce and Vitelli counsellled him therevnto, and Francis Sesto (whom the Florentines had sent to conduct the King vnto Ast) thrust him forward: But the passage of Taro being vn-easie (by reason of the raine fallen the night before, and the day of the battaile) the companies being weary, the night approaching, and the King content to haue had the aduantage in so doubtfull a fight, did moderate the heate of the pursute, causing them to lodge at Medefane, a village halfe a league from the place where the battaile was fought. So this battaile ended; a memorable day, being the first of a long time, that had been obstinately fought in Italy with blood-shed, and slaughter, (for in former times the Italian combates, were rather pleasant shewes then battailes) famous also for the great numbers of Comanders that were slaine, the small number of conquerors, in regard of the huge multitude of the vanquished. F There were numbered some fise and thirty or forty French horsemen slaine, and some foure score groomes of the baggage. The Stradiots carried not away (of all their booty) but fise and forty of the best horse, which were the Kings and his Chamberlaines: of Italians three hundred and fiftie men at armes, amongst the which, there were seauen or eight of the house of Gonzagua; Raimundo Farnese, Bernardin of Montone, aboue sixe score Gentlemen of the Marquis his company, and so great a number of others, as they were esteemed to be three thousand five hundred, and not one prisoner. Let vs remember, That the eternal God scatters the counsels of nations, and brings to nought the practises of men. And in another place: That the King is not saued by a great armie, neither doth a mightie man escape by his great force. The King stayed the next day at the same lodging, and departed on Wednesday the eighth of the moneth, without any sound of Trumpet, busying the enemy vnder colour of a parle, fearing them that feared him. But if he could haue made profit of his victorie; and turned head against them, who were yet amazed, as their owne commanders did confesse, all had fought for their saletie by flight. And if he had displayed his colours in fauour of little Francis, sonne to John Galeas Duke of Milan, the name of the vsurper was so odious to all the Duchie, and the name of their lawfull Lord so pleasing, as the people had easily confirmed Lodowicke into the Castle of Milan, and consequently the Venetians had lost most of the places they possessed in Italy: so readie is that nation to follow the victors happines. This was the counsell of Triumui: but the King would not attempt any thing vpon the right which the Duke of Orleans pretended to the Duchie, beeing now in possession of Nouarre. Moreouer, God which had giuen him the honour of a victorie, would take from him all cause of presumption, depriving him of the principall fruites that depended thereon.

This so happie a victorie, opened a passage for the King, yet was he to encounter a world of difficulties; steepe and craggie mountaines, rough valleys, dangerous forests, riuers hard to passe, want of victuals, and behind him the Earle of Caiazzo had passed the riuier of Taro with two hundred Lances, to cut off them that lingred behind. The riuier of Treby gaue the first obstacle with some terrour: for about ten of the clocke at night, the riuier swelled so high, as it was impossible to passe it before five in the morning, the souldiers wading about breast high. The King did wisely to dislodge without brute, being (besides the enemies army) so neere to Lodowicke Sforces strong garrisons, hauing a great number of horse, and twelue hundred Lanquenets, lodged in Tortone and in Alexandria and five hundred others with the foresaid Earle, who were entred into Placentia fearing some alteration.

Truly Charles did daily feele the truth of Sanonroles predictions: That he should endure much, but the honour should be his. The riuier of Scriuia was kept by Gaspar of S. Senerin, furnished that the Kings meaning was onely to passe, he retired to his charge, furnished the army with victuals, came vnto the King, and excused himselfe, for that he could not lodge him within the towne: the which he kept for Lodowicke. After a shower comes a Sunne-shine, saith the Prouerbe. The King is now in a friends countrie, at Nice belonging to the Marquis of Montferrat, and from Nice to Ast. Then the great armie of the league, which had followed him into the countrie of Tortone, hauing no more meanes to annoy him, went to ioyne with Lodowickes troupes before Nouarre, the which was in great want, for the Duke of Orleans had gouerned the victuals hee found therein very ill, and had neglected to furnish it as he might haue done, considering the fertilitie of the countrie. He had of late retained the supply of seuen thousand five hundred good fighting men, sent to the King by the Duke of Bourbon: and contrarie to his Maiesties commandement, hee hath taken places from Lodowicke: and now in stead of succouring, he demands succours, for want whereof he shall be forced to yeeld what he hath gotten.

But Charles had other worke. Naples is in danger: Ferdinand sought all meanes to recover it; and hauing presented himselfe with Gonzalve Fernand of the house of Aguilars, of the territorie of Cordoua, with fixe thousand men neere vnto Seminare, after the taking of Rhegium, he had fought to draw the whole realme into rebellion, if the Lord of Aubigni, Gouernour of Calabria, had not by his vigilancie and valour slackt the heate of the peoples rage. And the quarrell had beene ended by the death or imprisonment of Ferdinand himselfe, if John of Capoua, brother to the Duke of Termini, (whom Ferdinand had brought vp a page) had not performed the part of a most faithfull and loyall seruant, who leauing his horse, lost his life to saue his master, Ferdinand hauing his horse slaine vnder him. Gonzalve fled through the mountaines to Rhegium: Ferdinand to Palma, lying vpon the sea neere to Seminare, and from thence to Messina. Ferdinand grieved with this disgrace, will once againe trie the hazard of armes. He is well informed, that all the citie of Naples desires him greatly: many of the chiefe, both of the Nobilitie and people, call him secretly. And therefore therefore before the brute of this ouerthrow in Calabria should alter this good humour, he parts from Messina with three score vessels with top-masts, and twenty lesse, furnished more for shew and brauery, then for any good seruice, hauing no forces proportionable to so high an enterprize. The peoples fauour and desire supplied his want of men. The townes of Salerne, Melfe, and Caue, display their Ensignes, and he houers about Naples, attending some mutiny in the city. But all was in vaine: the Vice-roy had in time manned the approaches, and suppressed the rebellion which began to breed. But according to the aduice of some, he should haue armed such ships as were in the harbour, with souldiers and men of execution, and haue charged the enemy, who being strong in shipping, and weake in men, was retired to Ischia.

The conspirators faint not, but seeing their practise discovered, make a vertue of necessity. They call backe Ferdinand, and intreate him to land, to giue both force and courage to those that would rise in his fauour. Hee approacheth, and lands at Magdeleine, a mile from Naples. Here the Vice-roy shewed no lesse courage, when hee should most feare, then hee had shewed himselfe fearefull, when as resolution was most necessary. Hee leads in a manner all the garrison out of the city, to disturbe his landing. The Neapolitans imbracing this occasion, flie to armes, troupe together at the soūd of the bel, seize vpon the gates, and proclaime Ferdinands name in all places. Our French are now in danger on all sides: shall they attend the forreine enemy, or shall they goe to charge them within the city? They haue no meanes to enter by the same way they came forth: all are armed, all is barred vp. There is no other access but by the port ioyning vnto the new castle: but the way is long and hilly, and they must goe about a good part of the towne walles. But during this march, Ferdinand enters, and riding through the city, the people receiue him with great cries of ioy: the French hauing recovered the castle, seeke to winne the heart of the city; but being repulld with crosse-bowes and small Artillery, and finding the entrie of euery streete well manned, the night likewise approaching, abandoning almost two thousand horse, good and bad vpon the place, hauing no meanes to keepe them within the fort, vnfurnished of provisions, all put themselves into the castle, despairing euermore to recover the towne.

Presently Capoua, Auerse, Nola, the castle of Montdragon, and many other places follow this example; and the greatest part of the Realme turnes to Ferdinand. Some one must needs pay for all. Caiete hauing taken armes for Ferdinand, the French garrison enters the towne with fury, makes a horrible slaughter of the rebels, and sacks it. The Venetian army at sea, besiegeth Monopoli, a city of Apulia, both by sea and land, giues a hot assault, they take it by force, and the castle by composition, and afterwards the towne of Pulignan. Charles aduertised of these reuolts, beeing parted from Ast towards Turin, hee sends away Peron of Basche his Steward, to hasten an army at sea, from Villefranche neere vnto Nice, the which carried two thousand fighting men, with store of victuals, vnder the command of the Lord of Arban, a valiant capitaine, and well experienced at sea, yet very vnfortunate in this expedition: for hauing discovered Ferdinands fleet about the Isle of Poreze, consisting of thirty saile, and two great ships of Genoua: they presently turne taile to the enemy, leauing him a small Biscaine ship for a pawne, and recover the port of Liouorne, where the capitaine could not stay the greatest number of his souldiers from landing, who tooke the way to Pisa.

In the meane time, the Arragonois imploies all his forces against the new castle, the castle de l'Ouo, and other forts held by the French. And to make the way the more easie, hee fortifies the Hippodrome, mans the Mont Saint Herme, and Puiffaucon, and assailes the Monastery of the crosse. But being at the first greatly annoyed by the Artillery, hee conuerts his force into pollicy, which proues vnfortunate for the Author. There was in it a Moore, sometimes seruant to the Marquis of Pescara. The Marquis sounds him, and hee promisseth to giue entrance. For this effect, he mounts in the night by a Ladder, set to the Abbay wall, to conclude of the conditions, the maner, and the time, but he discovered not another Paris, who lying behind the battlements of the wall, cut the throate of his Achilles with a Crosse-bow. The Marquises death was repaired by the reuolt of Prosper and Fabricio Cplonnes, who notwithstanding the great aduancements they had from the King (carried away with a light beleefe, spread abroad by certaine lying letters of Lodowicke Sforze, that the turne to Ferdinands pay. The castles thus beleaguered, the sea shut vp by Fernands fleet, famine encreasing daily, and all hope of forraigne succors cut off by the voluntary route of Arbans navy, made the viceroy to yeeld vp the new castle to Ferdinand, after three months siege, with promise to goe into Prouence, if he were not releued within thirty daies, departing with bag and baggage: and for assurance of this capitulation, hee gaue for hostages, Tues of Alegre, la Marche of Ardenne, la Chapelle of Aniou, Roquebertin, Catelan and Jenlu: this was the sixth day of October. If any releefe came vnto them, it must be of those forces that were disperfed within the realme. So the Lord of Perfi d' Alegre, brought the Suiffes, with many of the companies of men at armes, accompanied by the prince of Bisignan, and diuers others Barons persisting yet in their fidelity. Ferdinand aduertised hereof, opposeth the Earle of Monteleone. They incounter at the Lake of Pizzale nere to Eboli, where our French had a reuenge of that braue flight of their army at sea. For the Earles forces exceeding Perfi in number, slie at the first approach, without any fight, leauing Venancio sonne to Julio of Varane Lord of Camerin prisoner, but being not pursued (for that our men came to an other end) they retire without any great losse to Nola, and after to Naples. This victory thrusts forward our men to the execution of their designe. Ferdinand (to hinder their approch) casts vp a trench from Mont Saint Herme, to castle d' Ouo, and plants artillery vpon the hils adioyning, the which doth greatly indomage the French, and takes away all meanes to enter the castle. This side wanting fresh water, made them retire in disorder, leauing behind them some peeces of artillery, and part of the victuals had brought for the releefe of the castles, being discontented with the small endeouour the besieged had vsed to receiue them.

Nouarre.

He that giues ouer, looseth the game. The Viceroy frustrate (by this dislodging) of all hope of succours, leauing three hundred men in the castle Nouo (a number proportionable to the victuals that remained) and a conuenient garrison in that of de l' Ouo, he imbarcs by night with the rest of his souldiars, being 2500. and takes his way to Salerne. Ferdinand complaines that the accord is broken: that it was not lawfull for the Earle of Montpensier to depart sodenly, without taking leaue, and with such a company, before he had consigned him the castles, threatening to bee reuenged of the hostages for this iniury and fraude, the which were yeilded a moneth after the prefixed time, when as the garrisons compounded for their departure, being vnable to endure the famine any longer: those of castle Nouo, vpon condition the hostages should be deliuered: those of de l' Ouo, if they were not suc-coured by the first day of Lent ensuing. But let vs leaue Ferdinand confirmed in his throne, and returne to Nouarre.

Nouarre was at the last cast, they had no more corne, no more horses, but for few daies: some died of hunger, some languished of sicknesse. Mugnes, Brione, Camarian, Bolgare, & other nere places (with the forts built by the French) were taken by force, and the enemy lodged in the Suburbes, were so many block-houses, neither was there any meanes to suc-cure them without a bataille. But how? The King tooke his pleasure at Turin, and at Qui- ers, he had no will to hazard another bataille for one towne onely, which the duke of Or- leans would keepe, and no man would fight but in the Kings presence. The prince of Or- ange (who in matters of warre had great credit with the King) and all the other commanders, desired rather to end the siege by some friendly agreement, then by the hazard of a battaile. Winter approached: euery one sees his store spent, many are sicke, some retire without leaue, others obtaine it. The enemy giues eare to a peace. His army was newly increased by a thousand Reisters, led by Frederick Capelare, of the country of Ferrete, and by eleuen thousand Lanquenets, commanded by George of Aberfing, borne in Austria. The leuy which the Bayliffe of Dijon went to make in Switzerland, was not yet ready. Why then (considering the consent of both parties) are not these great numbers dismissed friendly without force? Some few fought contention, they had the Kings eares open, and their words were Oracles, as Brissonnet Cardinall of Saint Malo, and the Archbishop of Rouan: yet would they not leaue their robes to put on armes, but keepe themselves safe from blowes. The King (say they) must not begin, let his enemy speake first, hee is here in person: The Pope, the Emperour, the King of Spaine, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan are

A such their Deputies. But whilest they stand vpon this point of honor, their teeth grow and their stomacks shrinke at Nouarre. And thus the matter was handled, referuig the honour of both parties. About that time the Marquisse of Monterrat died, daughter to the King of Serua in Greece, leauing two sonnes, whereof the eldest was but nine yeeres old. The Marquis of Saluce, and Constantin vncle to the said Marquis, one of the ancient Noblemen of Macedony (the which Alahomct Ottoman had many yeeres before inuaded) contended for the government of the two pupils. To accord this controuersie, for the safety of the children, and the content of the country, the King had sent the Lord of Argenton to Cafal Ceruas, and the Marquis of Mantoua, a Steward of his, to condole this death. These two fall into discourse, to pacifie both armies without blowes: so as by the Stewards perswasion, Argen- ton writes to the Venetian commissaries, vnder colour to continue the parle they had vpon Taro. Giuing eare thereunto, they impart it to the Duke of Milans capitaines. In the end, by common consent, they meet betwixt Bolgare and Camarian. There were for the King, the Cardinall of Saint Malo, the Prince of Orange, the Marshall of Gié, and the Lords of Pien- nes and Argenton. For the confederates, the Marquis of Mantoua, Bernard Contarin the Comissary of the Venetians Stradiots, and Francisco Bernardin Visconte.

Their chiefe controuersie was vpon the deliuey of Nouarre. Milan holds in fee of the Empire, and therefore the King did vrge, that Nouarre, as a member of the said duchie, should be deliuered to Maximilian, by the hands of the Germane capitaines, that were in the Italians campe, and the confederates would haue him leaue it absolutely. In the meane time, the famine growes so great, as it kills about two thousand of the Duke of Orleans men: and their great necessity required nothing but expedition. But more difficulties growing then could sodenly be decided, they conclude a truce for eight daies, with permission for the duke of Orleans to come forth with a small traine. For the suretie whereof, the Marquis of Mantoua did willingly offer himselfe, as an hostage to the Earle of Foix, after an oth taken, that they should proceed sincerely in the treaty of peace, and that it was not onely to free the Duke of Orleans. The duke beeing come to the King to Verceil, for the prolongation of the truce, vntill a conclusion of peace, all the men of warre came forth, and were conducted into a place of safety, by the Marquis of Mantoua, and Galeas of Saint D Seuerin. So the towne remained in the Inhabitants keeping, with an oth, not to deliuer it to any, but with the consent of both parties. And thirty men were left in the castle, vnder the duke of Orleans authority, to whom they should daily send victuals out of the Italians campe for their money.

Within few daies after, arriued the Bayliffe of Dijon, with his Suiffes, who vnder colour of ten thousand which he thought to bring, the number was doubled, running at the name of the Kings purse. So great a number of men of one nation, was suspicious. The one moiety ioyned with the Kings army nere to Verceil, the other camped apart, fife leagues off. This new supply, reuiued the courage of the duke of Orleans, and of those whose fingers itched.
But to what end were a bataille, seeing that Nouarre had not moued the King, but onely to free the duke, and his seruants that were now deliuered from captiuitie? And what meanes were there to fight with two thousand eight hundred men at armes barded, fife thousand light horse, eleuen thousand Gernains, and an infinit number of other foote, in a campe intrenched with palissadoes, and deepe ditches full of water? a counsell fit for scarlet robes, thrust on rather by their owne couetousnesse, then with any respect of the Kings honour or the dukes. This Cardinall of Saint Malo, did hee more affect his Maiesties seruice, or the priuate aduancement of his house, seeing that his vnmeasurable greedinesse extorted this confession from his owne mouth. That the Duke of Orleans had promised him ten thousand Ducats of rent for his sonne, if he had this Duchie of Milan? Doubtlesse great princes vse good and bad instruments to satisfie their desires, but in the end they abhor the vnlawfull practises of their workemen.

On the other side, this great number of men, newly arriued, who desired nothing but imployment, made the Italians mindes more inclinable to peace. So the Marshall of Gié, the president of Gannai, the Vidame of Chartres, Argenton, Piennes & Moruilliers, hauing conferred againe with the confederates, where the duke of Milan did assist in person, they concluded an accord, more through the necessity of the season, and want of money, desirous

desirous to returne home with the shew of an honorable peace, then with any confidence it would continue. It was agreed; That the King should be serued by the Duke of Milan for Genoa, as of his vassal, against all the world, and in so doing, the duke should furnish at his owne charge, two Ships to succor the castle of Naples (the which held yet) and the yeere following, should serue the King with three, and goe with him in person to the enterprise of Naples, if by chance he returned, and should suffer the Kings men to passe. If the Venetians did not accept of the peace within two moneths, but would maintaine the house of Arragon, he should aide the King against them: and the King should giue him all that should be taken from them. That of fixe score and foure thousand Ducats lent to the King in that voyage, he should forgiue fourescore thousand. And for the expences made at Nouarre, hee should pay the duke of Orleans fifty thousand Ducats, by the moneth of March following. That for the surety of Genoa, the duke should giue two hostages, and deliuer the Chastelet into the duke of Ferraras keeping, as a Neuter, for two whole yeeres, the gard thereof to be paide at their common charge: and in case the duke of Milan should forfait Genoa to the King, the duke of Ferrara should then deliuer the Chastelet to the King, and the duke of Milan should giue two other hostages of Milan. That the duke should not empeach the Florentines, to recouer what belonged vnto them. That Trivulce should be restored to his lands and goods. And that the prisoners, the confederates had taken should bee deliuered. This peace was sworne on either side: the Venetians craue respite for two moneths, to accept or not, and the King transported with a great desire to see his France, resolved to part the next day. But aduertised that the Suisses practised either to assure themselves of his person, or to seize vpon the chiefe in Court, for three moneths pay, which they said was due vnto them, by an accord made with Lewis the eleuenth, that so often as they should goe forth with their Ensignes displaid, they should receiue that payment, he parted from Vercell (into the which many Suisses were gotten) and went towards Trine, a towne belonging to the Marquis of Montferrat. This humor possessed them by the instigation of thole to whom this peace was not pleasing.

practised seize vpon the King.

From Trine, the King sent the said Marshall of Gie, the President of Gannai, and Argenton, to Lodowike Sforze, to moue him to an interview. But he grounded his excuse vpon some speeches which the Earle of Ligni, and the Cardinall of Saint Malo had vsed. That they should take him when he came, to the King to Paulia, yet would he willingly parle with the King, hauing a barre and riuer betwixt them. Hee had heard talke of the parle betwixt Edward and the Constable of Saint Paul, with Lewis the eleuenth. Charles taking this distrust in ill part, receiued his hostages of Milan, and impatient to attend the Geneuois, aduancing to Quiers, he sent Peron de Basche to Genoa, to receiue the two carrakes promised by the treaty, and to arme foure others, wherein he made account to ship three thousand Suisses, to releue the castles of Naples, knowing that the army of Nice had bene altogether vnprofitable. But it was sufficient for the Milanois to promise: hee knew well that hungar would force the wolfe out of the wood, that is to say, that want of victuals would shortly expell the garrisons out of those castles. Moreouer beeing perswaded, the King would hardly repasse the Alpes, hee seekes the friendship of Ferdinand, arming two ships for his seruice.

Charles did then send the Lord of Argenton to Venice, to know if they would accept of the peace, and to passe three articles. To re-deliuer Monopoli, which they had taken from him: to draw back the Marquis of Mantoua, their Lieutenant generall, and all others they had in the Realme of Naples, for Ferdinands seruice: and to declare King Ferdinand to bee none of the league lately made in the which there was onely named the Pope, the King of Romans, the King of Spaine, and the duke of Milan. For answer, they flatly refuse all the Kings demands, as hauing no warre with him, and that their meaning was onely to succour the duke of Milan as their ally, whom the King sought to ruine.

And for the making of an agreement, they offer to bee a meares: that Ferdinand should doe homage to the King, for the Realme of Naples, with the Popes consent: and should pay a hundred and fifty thousand ducats yeerely, and a present summe of money, the which they would lend: for the loane whereof they should haue Brundusium, Ottanto, Trani and some other places in Apulia in pawne: that Ferdinand should giue the King some

A places for safety, to make warre against the Turke, according to the hope wherewith Charles had fed all Chriltendome. The which, if hee would vndertake, all Italy should contribute there-vnto. That the King and they should dispose of all Italy without contradiction: and for their part, they would serue the King with a hundred gallies at their owne charge, and with five thousand horse by land. But this Turkish warre was but a glorious cloake for euery priuate mans couetousnesse. And who can wonder if God did suddenly frustrate our designs, hauing an other ground then wee made shew of? Who will not iudge, but this offer had bene as honorable for France, as the generall losse of the said realme was dishonorable? Charles would willingly haue vndertaken it, and the greatest part of his Counsell did allow it. But Tacitus obserues of Vitellius, That his iudgement was such, as hee found all harsh that was profitable, and tooke nothing in good part but what was pleasing, and that prooued hurtfull. A lesson for Princes, not to trust so confidently to some particular persons, for the gouernment of their affaires, but to impart it some-times to others: neither to aduance any one so high, as all the rest should bee his inferiors, for making himselfe to be feared and respected aboue all (as the Cardinall Briçonnet, his Bretheren and kinsfolke did) hee commonly makes his house great at his maisters cost. But it was the humor of this yong King, fearing (saith the historie) to displease them to whom he gaue credit, and especially such as gouerned his treasure; as the aboue named.

Our Conquerors are now arriued at Lions, in the moneth of October, not greatly carefull of those they had left at Naples, without any intelligence or letters from the King, but onely counterfeited, and nothing but promises for assignations of pay, whereof followed the generall losse of the Realme: who for a signe of their conquest, left them nothing but the possession of a stinking and contagious disease, which afterwards spred ouer all France: the which (being till then vnkowne in our parts, and the Phisitians not acquainted with the cure thereof) lodged many in the graue, leauing many deformed and lame of their limmes, and subiect to continuall aches.

The beginning of the Pocks.

Charles hauing continued two moneths at Lions, he receiued two very troublesome and vnpleasant aduertisements: One was domesticall, the death of his sonne the Daulphin, deceased at three yeares age: A goodly child (saith the Originall) and bold in speech, who feared not those things which other children are accustomed to feare. The other was forreine, the yeelding of the Castles of Naples. The King passed ouer his mourning lightly: for being little both of body and vnderstanding, he began to feare, least the Daulphin growing in these generous dispositions, which they noted in his infancie, should soone blemish the fathers power and authority. A lamentable thing, that so great a Monarke should feare his owne childe lying in a Cradle. But that was certaine, that Charles the seuenth his grandfather had bene iealous of Lewis the eleuenth his sonne. Lewis had terrified his father, and was in feare of his sonne Charles the eight: and now Charles apprehends some decay in his estate by his sonne. Iealousie is a disease which doth commonly infect Princes houses. The other accident was of greater consequence, and toucht him more neerely. But were not these crosseles sufficient to afflict him, but hee must receiue a publike shame by means of a priuate mans couetousnesse?

The Florentines prest the performance of their treaty, sworne at Florence, confirmed at Ast, and afterwards at Turin. Charles writes to this effect to Entragues Captaine of the Citadell at Pisa, and to the bastard of Saint Paul, to restore those places to the Florentines which they commanded. But these Gentlemen are good Marchants, they sell that which they are commanded to giue. Entragues interprets the Kings Letters-Patents according to his owne couetousnesse, and exculeth him-selfe with a secret charge hee sayd hee had receiued, not to deliuer it without the Earle of Lignies hand-writing, in whose name hee commanded Pisa. But this was the chiefe cause, hee must haue money. Florence did not offer any, Pisa must pay it, or else fall into their hands whom they hated to death. To drawe them vnto it, hee hath another wicked practise. Hee sends to the Florentine Commissaries, to bring their armie to the Porte of the Suburbes of Saint Mary, that if the Pisans would not receiue them friendly, he would force them to abandon the said gate, being so commanded by the Citadell, as it could not resist without the Captains sufferance. Hee did not beleue the Florentines should so easily haue taken the bulwarke of the sayd suburbes.

But when as hee sees the assailants enter pel-mell, kill some, and take others prisoners, he turnes his Artillery vpon the Florentines, kills and hurts them, and forceth the Florentines to abandon the place. In the end, prest by the Kings commanding letters, both to the Earle of Ligni, to him, and to all the garrisons, to leaue the said places, he deliueis them for twenty thousand Ducats, and after sels Pietresanta to the Luquois, and Librefacta to the Venetians. And the aboue-named bastard, as good a marchant as the other, sels Serezane and Serezanelle to the Geneuiois. And all to the Kings dishonour, his subiects shame, and the absolute losse of Naples. Saillant who commanded in the port of Liurorne, is commended to haue yeelded the place to the Florentines at the first summons, and Entraques banished the Realme of France, by a decree of the priuie counsell. Yet the Duke of Orleans (his maisters credit) caused this sentence to be repealed. The Pisans being maisters of their Cittadell, razed it to the ground. And rather then they will submit their necks to the Florentines yoke, they implore aide from the Pope, Emperour, Venetians, Geneuiois, Siennois and Luquois. But whilest that Lodowike consults whether he should receiue them into his protection, the Venetians preuent him. So many dogges fighting for one bone, pull one another by the throte, whilest the most politick carries it away.

The King dishonored by twyn of his subiects,

Virgilius Vrsinus in the Kings pry.

The Viceroy in the meane time gathers together the remnant of his shipwrack. And as the reuolt of the Colonnois had greatly weakned the Kings party, so he hoped to repaire it by the meanes of Virgilius Vrsinus, who seeing the Colonnois his enemies newly aduanced to great authoritie with Ferdinand, he accepted of the Kings entertainment, being agreed that he with the hoste of Vrsinus, should make a leauy of fixe hundred men at armes, and with the Vitelli crosse Ferdinands attempts, who by diuers euents laboured vehemently to recouer that which the King held yet. And let vs now see the successe of their affaires. The successe of armes is variable, but God holds them in ballance, and giues the aduantage to whom hee pleateth. Our men had some times the better, and some-times the worse. But this is but a languishing fit. Our French being incamped at Nocera had by an intelligence giuen, taken and slaine seuen hundred Arragonois, going to surpris Gifone, neere to Saint Seuerin: but seeing Ferdinand fortified with the Popes troupees, they leaue Nocera, to take Saint Seuerin, and Gofenze which was lately rebelled against them.

Abruzzo continued firme through the valour of Gratian de Guerres, against the attempts of the Earle of Popoli: and the coming of the Vrsins and the Vitelli, did greatly molest the lands of Moncastin, and the neighbour country of Labour. Calabria (although the long sicknesse of the Lord of Aubigni, had stayed the course of his prosperity) remained yet at the Kings deuotion. The Viceroy had mounted and armed such as came with him from Naples. All these considerations gaue courage to our men, and made the way to a battaile, which the Viceroy and Vrsins greatly pressed. But the want and necessity of money to pay their strangers, doth cast an Apple of discord in the army: eight hundred Lansquenets, for want of pay, go to the Arragonois, who fortifying the enemy, makes our French so much the weaker. Behold a fore blait for a house that threatned ruine. And now comes the blow, which in few moneths shall strike vs dead.

Ferdinand admitted into the league.

He capitulates with the Venetians.

At the first, the Venetians would not receiue Ferdinand into the league of the Pontenates of Italy, to the end that vrgent necessity might force him to yeeld them some-thing, watching so long for an oportunitie, as in the end they finde it. Ferdinand had a great action in hand: hee must hazard all, to become (as they say) a rich Marchant, or a poore pedler. He accords with the Venetians, and in regard of a succour of seuen hundred men at armes, fixe hundred light horse, and three thousand foote, led by the Marquis of Mantoua, and their nauie intertained, which lay then vpon that coast, with a loane of fiftene thousand ducats, he deliuered vnto them, Otrante, Brundusium, and Thrane, and consents they should retaine Monopoli, and Pulignano, which they then held, vpon condition to deliuer them, vpon payment of such money as should bee employed in the gard thereof, so as it amounted not about two hundred thousand ducats. Moreouer, the Pope, They, & the Milanois, sent other companies of men at armes leauied in common. And Lodowike, who would not directly breake the treaty of Verceill, agreed secretly to pay ten thousand ducats monethly towards the warres of Naples. If the Earle of Montpensier were in want. Ferdinand was as needy, and the Venetian succours could not be so soone ready. So the weaknesse of both parties

A parties, being sicke of one disease, kept them from attempting much, yet idlenesse makes the souldiers slothfull. To keepe them in exercise, the Viceroy practiseth an intelligence vpon Beneuent: but he was preuented by Ferdinand, who had notice thereof: he leaues it to take Ferezane, Apice and many other neighbour townes, wanting victualls, and the season approaching to collect one of the most important reuenues of the Realme, which was the custome for cattaille in Apulia, he marcheth to frustrate the enemy: it mounted yeerely to fourefcore thousand ducats. Ferdinand follows, to stay the vice-roys courfe, attending his succours.

At that time there arriues a French nauy at Caiete, of fifteene great shippes, and seuen lesse, wherein they had shipped eight hundred Lansquenets at Saouana, and the troupees appointed for the great ships that should haue beene armed at Genoa. This army takes Itri at their landing, with other neighbor places. Don Baptista Caracciolo had promised to giue him entrance into Sessa, but Don Frederike, Ferdinands vncler, preuented him, committing the bishop and others guilty of this practise to prison. The fury of the warre was in Apulia, and the successe was variable, for both parties lodged in diuers townes, who rather by their ordinary roads, then by any valour, made warre against the poore cattaille. Virgilius Vrsinus and Marian Sauelli had gathered together an infinite number of cattaille, being the custome betwixt Saint Seuerer and Porcine, and Ferdinand with fixe hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and fifteene hundred foote, comes by night to driue them away: who by the breake of day being planted before Saint Seuerer with his men at armes, to make head against Virgilius, if he issued forth, he caused his light horse to driue away about three-score thousand head of cattaille. Sauelli issueth forth of Porcine, to the rescue, but being too weake, he was forced to retire with the losse of thirty men at armes.

A new French fleet in the Kingdom of Naples.

This check drew the Vice-roy against Ferdinand being at Fogge, to recouer both the honour and prey that was lost. Vpon the way he encounters eight hundred Lansquenets, betwixt Nocere and Troy, which went to ioyne with Ferdinand: he charged them, and being obstinate in fight, defeats them, and killes them all, with some losse of his men: and so presents himselfe in battaile before Fogge, but none issuing forth iaued the light horse, he lay in ambush in the wood of the Incoronate, and recovered the greatest part of the cattaille. Then presenting himselfe before Fogge, hee retires to Saint Seuerer: when as the light horse falling vpon those that did driue away the bootie, deprived either party of the greatest profit, for the cattaille beeing disperfed heere and there, were abandoned to the first that could take them. Herevpon the army at sea ioynes with the Vice-roy, and the Marquis of Mantoua with the Arragonois. So the chiefe forces of both armies approach. The French were stronger in foote, and the Italians in horse; which held the estate of affaires in suspence.

Ferdinands Lansquenets defeated by the french.

The King began now againe to affect the affaires of Italy, and hauing made a progresse to Tours and Paris, to performe (saith the history) some vowes which he had made at Four-noue, he returnes to Lions. His owne inclynation drew him naturally to this warre: glorious, for that hee was the first of the Kings of France, after many ages, that had renewed the French armies in Italy. Moreouer, the Florentins, the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, John Iaques of Triuulce, the Vrsins, the Earle of Montoire (sent to that end by the Barons of the Realme of Naples, who yet did carry the flower de Lice, but with more efficacy then all the rest, the Cardinall of Saint Malo, and that Mignon the Seneshall of Beaucaire, gaue him a certaine hope of victory, by meanes of a great and speedy succour: and contrarywise of an apparent losse, if matters were more neglected. Euen those which before had dissuaded this enterprise of Italy, greued now exceedingly to see their conquest so cowardly lost, and the French Nobility to perish, who (vnfurnished of aide) were ready to suffer shipwracke. The Admirall of Grauille alone could not fauor this warre.

These resolutions were somewhat hindred by the warre which the King supported in the county of Rouffillon, from whence the Spaniards made ordinary roades and robberies in Languedocke. Charles of Albon, grandfather to the deceased Marshall of Saint Andrew, defended the frontier, as Lieutenant to the Duke of Bourbon, gouernor of that Prouince, the which was greatly indamaged by the garrison of Saulses, a little towne in the said county, strong of men and situation, and defended by some gentlemen of the King of Castilles house.

house, who were seconded by an army in field, bigger then the French. Albon undertakes to A besiege Saulles, batters it, makes a breach, and gives an assault, and within tenne houres carries it by forces, where hee slew some forty Spanishe gentlemen of marke, and about foure hundred men of defence. A worthy reward for the wrong which the Castilian had done to Charles, who had so willingly restored him the possession of this country; hoping to bind him by this good turne, not to crosse him in his designs, vpon the Realme of Naples, as by the contract of reddition hee had promised. This exploit kept the Snailes within their shells, who vnder pretense and colour to continue their Conquests vpon the *Moore*s, whom they lately ouercame and chased out of Granado, in the end they motioned a truce, the which (being concluded from March to October, for themselves, and such of their faction as would accept of it) diuided the Castilian from the other confederats, attending that a mutuall assembly at Montpellier should end all their controuersies by a firme and durable peace.

hinders the Kings voyage.

Thus Charles freed from this incombrance, returnes more vehemently to his first designs, and to draw his counsell thereunto, hee said, that he felt a diuine inspiration in his soule, which called him into Italy. It was according to the predictions of Sauonarola. In the end it was concluded, that Triulce should returne to Ast, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant, with eight hundred Lances and foure thousand French and Suisses: that the Duke of Orleans should soone follow, and then the King: that thirty shippes should passe the straights into the ports of Prouence, and should bee armed for the passage of Naples, with men, victuals money, and all other munition. A braue designe and a goodly order, if it had taken effect. But it is a great error in Kings, to giue the chiefe places of authority, rather to Church-men, then to their princes, or to Noblemen of merit: seeing that these men haue but one oth, which is to their King, and the other hauing two, they commonly preferre that which they owe vnto the Pope. The Cardinal of Saint Malo, gouerning the Treasure, and in a manner the whole State, did not directly contradict the Kings will (hauing so greatly affected the first voyage) but so slackt the expeditions, delaying the necessary payments, that no prouision was effected. And who would not beleue, but the Pope giuing to this man a Cardinals hat, would likewise drawe him to his faction.

But let vs heare another disturbance, when as euery man supposed that the King would speedily passe the mountaines, he makes a posting voyage to Paris, and to Tours, for three reasons. The first, vnder colour of deuotion: to take leaue (said he) of Saint Denis and Saint Martin, according to the ancient ceremonies of the Kings of France: The second, to bid the Queene farewell, who was resident at Tours: the third, to draw all the cities of the Realme to aide him with money, after the example of Paris, to auoide the necessities of the yeere before. But he did not set downe the fourth, and it may bee more vrgent, the loue of one of the Queenes maides, an importune passion, which doth so restrain all the spirits of man, as he neglects all other cares. Charles departs, and returnes not in foure moneths: hee sends Triulce to Ast, with a small troupe, more to confirme the friendship of Philip, the new duke of Sauoy, by the death of the little duke his Nephew, then for any preparation of warre: and for the prouision of Naples, fixe ships were provided laden with victuals, and laden with hope to bee soone followed by a great army, and to receiue forty thousand ducats due at Florence. This was physick after death: for if they had arriued in time, they had preferred, or at the least staid for a season the losse of the Realme. It Brissonnet were so dull in these Commissions in the Kings presence, Iudge if hee made any hast in his Maiesties absence.

Yet the body of the Neapolitane state was so shaken, as for want of speedy remedy it was ready to fall. The two armies approach, both so tired, as the warre must sodenly end by the ruine of the one. The French were camped before Circelle, ten miles from Beneuent: and Ferdinand, to diuert this siege, was before Franget of Montfort. For the succoring wherof, our men leaue Circelle: but the Lansquenets apprehending a second assault, left the place at random. This was a losse, which did greatly import our men.

They had meanes in shewe to defeat this army, so busie at the sacke of Frangette, as the Captaines aduertised, that there was but a valley betwixt the French and their lodging,

A lodging, they could not in time call backe the souldiars from the spoile to armes. The Earle of Montpensier would haue embraced this occasion. Virgilius Virsinus did vrge it. Perfid' Alegre (by an enuious, or malicious shew of hazard, which they should incur in passing the valley at the mercy of the enemy, loathing the Suisses and Lansquenets, which he commanded, discontented moreouer with the small entertainment they had giuen him when he presented himselfe to succour the castles of Naples) hindred the execution: and moreouer vnder colour of pay (as they say) hee caused the strangers to mutine. Thus the Viceroy forced to found a retreat, went to follow the siege of Cercille, where Camille Vitelli, performing the office of an excellent captaine and souldiar, during the assault, was wounded in the head with a stone, whereof hee died. An accident which causeth the French to abandon both the assault and siege, to retire towards Arriane, and to seeke some meanes to draw the Arragonois to battaile. But they had to deal with cunning temporisers, who knowing our men to bee pressed with the want of meat and money, and foreseeing that the slacknesse of their succors would breed greater discommodities and defaisters, they suffered them to keepe the field, and lodged in their forts, where their commodities could not be cut off.

dies.

Not only the army, but also the other parts of the Realme were greatly distressed: Annibal the bastard sonne of the Lord of Camerin, had of late defeated the Marquis of Bitonte of the French faction, in Abruzzo: for a reuenge, Gratian de Guerres, being in field, ouer-threw the Earles of Selane and Popoli, leading three hundred horse and three thousand foote for Ferdinand. Notwithstanding the losse of an occasion of a victory of Franget, the extreame necessity of all things, the discord of the captaines, and continuall contradiction of Perfi, refusing to obey the Earle of Montpensier, for that (saith hee) he had against reason abandoned the castles of Naples, the disobedience of the soldiars, the discontent of the Neapolitane troupes following the King, not paid, and iniuriously intreated in the diuisions of booties or victuals, the departure of many from the campe, the mutinies of the Suisses and Lansquenets, who cried out tumultuously for their pay, the neighbourhood of many townes, supported by the enemies army, and many defaisters concurring, daunted the courage of our soldiars, ingendred a contempt and hatred in the people, and forced our men to flie from place to place, without any hope of meanes to fight with the enemy, who to spare the blood of his people would not hazard any thing.

ble exploits.

All these difficulties carried our French into Apulia, and as they were busied in the taking and sacking of Arelle, and then to possesse Venouise, a strong towne, and abounding with victuals, Ferdinand takes Gesualde in one day (the which in former time had indured a siege of fouretee moneths) and taking from them all hope of Venouise, hee forceth them to retire to Attelle, and presently campeg before it, desirous to winne a victory without peril and losse of men: and cutting off all the passages, he takes from them all meanes of releefe. But this accident made his designs more easie. The remainder of the Lansquenets, who since their departure from their houses, had receiued but two moneths pay, seeing the time of their entertainment past, they went to the Arragon party. And that which hastened the totall ruine of our men, was the euent in Calabria. By reason of the Lord of Aubignies sicknesse, many of his company were gone to the Viceroyes army. The Earle of Melete, and Albert of Saint Suerin, with many other Barons of the country (servants to the King) lodged at Laine vpon the riuer of Sapri, couered with the castle on the other side of the riuer, against any one that should assaile them vpon the high way, and from some other places belonging to the prince of Bisignan. It is very dangerous to bee too confident, especially in matters of warre. These Noblemen assembled all the forces they could, to charge Gonsalue, who made warre in that prouince, and after the taking of some places was camped before Castrouillare. Gonsalue preuents them, and comming neere the riuer, he causeth his foote to march towards the bridge, which lieth betwixt the castle of Laine and the village. Which bridge was negligently garded, relying vpon the aboue-named places, whilst that he passeth with his horse at a foard two miles aboue, and both should charge our men at one instant. The effect succeeded; he arriues before day, finds them without sentinell, and without gard, chargeth, and breakes them instantly, takes eleuen Barrons prisoners, and almost all the souldiars, who flying towards the castle, fell 1496. among the foote, who had already seized vpon the bridge. This victory laied the way open for Gonsalue to ioyne with Ferdinand with fixe thousand men, and this reliefe was the ruine of our troupes, pressed with three armies, the Arragonois, Venetian and Spanish. So as being no more able to be releued with victuals, nor goe to forrage, neither to haue any passage to the riuier, to water their horses, beeing themselves in great extremity for water, vanquished with so many difficulties and abandoned of all hope, after two and thirty daies siege, they obtained of Ferdinand a truce for thirty daies, and necessary victuals for that time: during the which, none of the besieged should goe forth: Licence for the duke Montpensier to signifie this accord vnto the King, the soldiars, their liues and goods saued, with the which they might retire into France by land or sea, and the Vrsins with other Italian soldiars, whether they would, out of the Realme: Impunity to the Barons and all others that had followed the French faction, and restitution of their goods and offices, so as within fiftene daies they returned to Ferdinand. All this is good, but there follows a very dishonorable promise: That if the Earle of Montpensier be not releued within thirty daies, he shall deliuer Acelle and al that he holds within the Realme of Naples into Ferdinand's hands, with all the artillery. Thus reason yeelds, where force commands.

The time expired, all were conducted to the castle of Stabbia vpon the sea, and the Viceroy was summoned to yeeld vp all the other places, which the King possessed. But pretending that his authority did not extend to the captaines which commanded in Calabria, Abruzzo, Caiete and other places, which the King himselfe (and not hee) had giuen them in guard. The Arragonois making shew to dismisse them, caused them to be conducted (but more properly confined them) vpon this controuersie to Blay, and Puzzol, where (vnder colour that shipping was not yet ready) part of them by the wants they had endured, and part by the indisposition of the ayre, beeing hot and vnholosome, and part feeding intemperately vpon grapes and other fruit halfe ripe: but with more likelihood, hauing (as some write) seasoned their meates, and mixt their wines with drugs insupportable for the stomacke the Earle of Montpensier died: and of fixe thousand men, scarce fiftene hundred returned safe to their country. There is but one hazard to loose al. A battaile (although very disperat) had bene far more honorable and lesse fatall. But let vs rather note the examples and errors of other, then reprove them.

Virgilius and Paul Vrsin, by the Popes commandement (who had sworne the ruine of that house) were shut vp in the castle de l'Ouo: their men (led by John Jordan the sonne of Vrsin, and Bartholmew of Aluian) were stript in Abruzzo by the Duke of Vrbino; and these two commanders called by Ferdinand to Naples, were likewise imprisoned. Aluian escaped soone after; the rest died in prison. Now all things smile vpon the Conquerour, but hee pursues the victory otherwise then wee can doe: and in these garboiles, euery one flies to the stronger, and makes his peace as hee may. Ferdinand sends Don Frederike his vnckle and Prosper Colonne before Caiete, and Fabrizio Colonne into Abruzzo, who receiued Aquille for the Arragonois, tooke the rocke of Saint Seuerin by force, and caused the captaine and his sonne to be beheaded, to terrifie the rest: then hee went and incamped before Salerne, where the Prince of Bisignan made his peace, for himselfe, for the prince of Salerne, for the Earle of Cappacie, and some other Barons, Gretian des Guerres (forced to giue way to this violent streame) leaues Abruzzo, and retires himselfe with eight hundred horse into Caiete, where Don Frederike doth presently inuest him. Gonsalue returned into Calabria, where the Lord of Aubigni (after such resistance as his forces could make) beeing gotten into Groppoli, in the end promiseth to leaue all the Prouince, hauing liberty to returne into France by land. The other captaines (either for that they had filled their bagges with the prouisions of their places, or had by disorder consumed that in few daies, which in time of necessity might haue serued long, or through feare, or impatiency of the discomforts which follow a siege) were forced to yeeld them at the first common.

But shall Ferdinand long enioy the happy successe of his armes? Behold, hauing not yet tasted the sweetnesse of his Conquests, remayning nothing for the recovery of the Realme but Tarentum, Caiete, and few other places, held by Charles of Sanguin, and Mont S. Angelo, where Don Julian of Lorraine commanded, who caused the neighbor counties to feele

A feeble both the greatnesse of his courage, and the weight of his armes, death comes and cuts off both the course of his victories, and the thred of his life, and transports his crowne to three yeeres. Ferdinand, Alphonso, King Charles the eight. Ferdinand the incestuous, hauing married his aunt, sister to Alphonso his father, and Frederike.

King Ferdinand dies.

Frederike leauing the siege of Caiete, comes to enioy his Nephews succession, and those which had before followed the French party, as the princes of Salerne and Bisignan, the Earle of Cappacio and others, were the first to proclaime his name in Naples, and to helpe him to finish the remainder of the warre against our men. Tarentum (besieged by the Venetians) was forced to yeeld through famine, who hauing held it some daies (not without suspect that they would appropriate it to themselves) in the end they consigned it, vnto Frederike, at the Popes intreaty, and the King of Spaine. Caiete might haue held out some monethes, but iudging the King would haue as little care to succour them, as many other places negligently lost, to the preiudice, both of a great number of the Nobility, and also of the crowne, they compounded with Frederike by the means of the Lord of Aubigni, giuing them leaue to returne by sea into France, with bagge and baggage. And consequently, all other places did quite reiect the French command in the state of Naples. And Frederike (hauing obtained the inuestiture of the Realme, from the Pope) was solemnly crowned.

C Thus King Charles was freed from the care he had for the recouery thereof, but the losse and infamy thrusts him on to reuenge vpon the next neighbour. Many Potentates of Italy perswade him therunto: the duke of Ferrara knew well that the Venetians (hauing taken Polesan from him) sought his ruine, and amidst these diuisions he was like vnto a sheepe, betwixt two wolues, that is to say, the Venetians and the duke of Milan his sonne in law, who (preferring his safety and his childrens, before the loue of the duke of Milan) offered the King fixe hundred men at armes, and two thousand foote. The Marquis of Mantoua (being discontented with the Venetians) sell from them with three hundred men at armes. John Bentiuole offered a hundred and fifty men at armes, and the companies which his two sonnes led, with a good number of foot. The Florentines (not to loose Pisa and other places, and to warrant themselves from the wrongs, which the Venetians practised against them) promised eight hundred men at armes, and fixe thousand foote at their owne charge. The Vrsins and the Gouvernor of Rome, a thousand men at armes. Moreouer there was in All eight hundred men at armes, and fixe thousand foote. If all these forces with the French, had ioyntly charged the duke of Milan, either his estate had bene in danger, or hee must haue followed the Kings party, the which obtained, the Kingdome of Naples had bene easily recouered. The duke of Orleans was appointed to this effect; for the King would not directly breake the treaty of Verceil, desiring the Duke should make this warre in his owne proper name. The Duke refuseth to march with other title then the Kings Lieutenant, either iudging his prouisions not well grounded, or seeing the King ill disposed of his person, whose next heire he was, if he miscaried. Thus both the enterprise, and the intelligences which Triunlice, had against the Milanois, were made frustrate.

The Princes of Italy incense the king against the Venetians & Duke of Milan.

The Duke of Orleans refuseth to march against the duke of Milan in his owne name.

There are other actions which succeed as unhappily. The Fregoses being expelled Genoa, by the faction of the Adornes, could not returne without some notable support, who comming to the gates, they hoped with great facility to raise their partisans, to chase away their aduersaries, and to reduce the towne to the Kings obedience. The King vpon this hope, commands Triunlice to assist Baptista Fregose with those forces which hee had in All; and the Florentines with Ottauin Fregose to assaile Lunigiane at the same time, and the riuier to the East, whilest that Baptista should molest the West. This enterprise did much trouble the Duke of Milan: and if it had bene continued, it had produced greater effects in the estate of Milan then at Genoua. For Lewis of Fiesque and the Adornes had brought many men into Genoua, and armed a flecte to sea, at the common charges of the Venetians, of Lodowike, and of Frederike King of Naples. And Lodowike had not yet receiued his Venetians: But in stead of Genoua they went to take Noui, a towne able to containe many men, and the Fregoses held the castle, fit to make warre in the country, and to stoppe 1497. stoppe the passage from Milan to Genoua. The taking of Noui made the neighbour places yeeld to Baptista, and at the same instant, the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, with two hundred Launces, and three thousand foote of Triuulces troupes seized on Vintemille, and presented himselfe before Sauonne, hoping that in disdaigne of the Geneuois, (whose yoake they bare) hee should finde both the Cittizens hearts, and the Cittie gates open. But no signe, no shew of any alteration.

The Venetians
succour the Duke of Milan

John Adorne followed the Cardinall, and forced him to retire into Altaré, a place belonging to the Marquis of Montferrat. Triuulce had another desseigne: and although hee had an expresse commandement from the King, to surcease from making warre against the Duke of Milan, and to second Baptista and the Cardinall, yet did hee seeke by all meanes to kindle troubles in the said Duchie: and if he had bene suffered to proceed, without doubt there had followed some notable effect, vnder colour, to assure the companies that were there had followed some notable effect, vnder colour, to assure the companies that were passed into the riuier vpon the East: that hee thought it necessarie to shut vpp the passage betwixt Alexandria and Genoua, whereas Lodowicke assembled his forces, by the taking of Bourg, and other places of importance in the Countrie. But to obey the Kings will, hee lost a goodly oportunitie to doe great seruice vnto the Crowne. For now the whole Countrie stood at a gaze, some for feare, others being desirous of innouation: and Lodowicke (as tooone as Charles should begin the warre. And to this end they demanded the Lord of Aubigni for their generall, with a hundred and fifty Lances, whereof they should pay a third part. The Marquis of Mantoua, was discharged from the Venetians pay, and should bring to the King, with the Vrsins, the Vitelli, and the Captaine of Rome, brother to the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, fiftene hundred men at armes Italians. He had the friendship of the Duke of Sauoye, and the Marqueses of Saluces and Monferrat. John Bentinole promised to ioyne with his troupes as soone as hee should passe the mountaines. But hee is diuerred by diuers meanes. Some of his fauorits thrust him forward to this enterprise, but with so huge a preparation both by sea and land, and so great prouision of money, as it required a long time. Others entertained him in his delights, and loathed him with all difficulties, and the Cardinall of Saint Malo (according to his vsuall manner) lackt the prouisions of monney. Thus the time was lost, and matters made fruitlesse, being almost brought to their perfection. There were no dispatches for the Lord of Aubigni, no money for the Vrsins, Vitellies, Fregoses: no man passeth into Italy. So all mens mindes growing colde, the Fregoses make their peace with the Duke of Milan. The Vitelli had passed to the Venetians pay, if the Florentines had not entertained them for a yeare. The Florentines them selues (counselled by Lodowicke Sforce, in the beginning of the yeare 1498.) sent an Ambassage to Rome, signifying (although in doubtfull termes) that if Pisa might bee yeilded vnto them, they would ioyne them-selues with the rest, for the defence of Italy against the French. A Florentine policy, but made frustrate by a Venetian shift.

Truce continued with the Spaniard.

About the end of this yeare, the Kings of France and Spaine, beganne their assembly, D promised at the last truce, the which they had transported from Montpellier to Narbone, and afterwards broken off by the Castilians excessiue demands. There they found the same difficulties: The King would referue to himselfe full power to continue his enterprise in Italy, refusing to yeeld to any agreement, wherein it should be comprised. The King of Spaine desired to haue no warre with him beyond the mountaines, which might draw after it many inconueniences, and yeeld him small profite: finally, they continued their truce, not comprehending any of the Potentates of Italy. The Spaniard seeing the King to meditate of a second voyage beyond the mountaines, hoped to perswade him to the conquest of Naples with their common forces, and to take from the Venetians many ports, and other places which they possessed. The vsurpation whereof was very suspicious vnto him. But neither of them had made his account with him, who doth prolong and shorten the dayes of man at his pleasure, and who doth sound the secret thoughts of men. But not able to obtaine this condition of Charles, with all his policie, hee procured it of his successeur, to the great preiudice of his Crowne.

Then expired the two yeares, during the which, the castell of Genoua had bene left in guard with the Duke of Ferrara. The King (pretending the forfeiture and disobedience of the Duke of Milan) demands the possession thereof, offering to lay downe in a third mans hand halfe the charge spent for the guard of the places, according to the treatie of Verceil, and in the meane time, the law should determine, to which of them it should be restored. But the great pursuite of Lodowicke, and the imminent daunger hee feared, if hee should breake with the Venetians, made him to yeeld it vp vnto Lodowicke, vpon restitution made of all his charges for the guard thereof. And the Venetians, to shew that they held them-selues more bound, for that hee had deliuered it to Lodowicke rather then to our Charles, they entertained Ferdinand the Duke of Ferrares sonne, paying him for a companie of an hundred men at armes.

A The Kings desire to returne into Italy increased dayly, and it seemed hee had greater occasions then euer. Experience had made him wise: He remembered the errors he had committed in his first iourney, and obserued them well, hoping (if hee might recouer his losses) to prouide better for the garde of the Realme. His intelligences from all parts called him: hee had a truce with the Castilian: hee had a new league with the Suisses. The Emperour was discontented with the Venetians, and sought his friendship, being desirous to ioyne with him, to seaze vpon the states of Italy with their common forces and charge, imitating the Castilian. Pope Alexander laboured to reconcile himselfe. The Venetians deuised how to estrange them-selues from Lodowick. The Florentines had resolved to free them-selues as tooone as Charles should begin the warre. And to this end they demanded the Lord of Aubigni for their generall, with a hundred and fifty Lances, whereof they should pay a third part. The Marquis of Mantoua, was discharged from the Venetians pay, and should bring to the King, with the Vrsins, the Vitelli, and the Captaine of Rome, brother to the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, fiftene hundred men at armes Italians. Reasons to draw the King into

1497.

D The Venetians, being laboured to yeeld to the restitution of Pisa, seeing there was no other meanes to seperate the Florentines from the French, they couer their couetousnesse with many colours: they claime that this counsell proceeds not of any care they haue to the common good, but from the bad affection which some one carries to their estate. For say they (by their Ambassadour at Rome) the Florentines hoping to enioy the greatest part of Thuscany by the returne of the French into Italy, the reelding of Pisa were not able to diuert them from their naturall inclination to the house of France: but contrariwise, the more mighty they are, the more meanes they shall haue to disturbe the quiet of Italy. Why then haue the Confederates by a common consent promised the Pisans to defend their liberty, and now to violate both their honour and faith? Is this the reward for the exceeding charge wee haue so willingly maintained, when as all the other confederats were so unwilling to disburse any thing for the common good? By what meanes was Italy preserved? with what forces did they fight at Taro? with what armes haue they recouered the realme of Naples? where-with haue they forced Nouarre to acknowledge her first Lord? Can any one denie, but these actions did proceed from a sincere affection to the good estate of Italy? seeing wee were not the neereft vnto dangers, neither are the disorders growne by vs, whereof wee suffer the paine.

oppose against the Florentines.

Whilest these things were treated of at Rome, among the Confederates, not without apparent signes of future diuision: a new humor carries away our Charles to his Castle, which he caused to be built at Amboise: a building of admirable worke and charge, hauing (to that end) brought the rarest worke-men that could bee found, from Naples, and all other parts: and for the beautifying thereof, hee had gathered together the goodliest plots that could bee found in France, Italy, Flanders, and else-where: not able to foresee, that in steed of a proud and stately Palace, hee should end his life in a base and filthy gallery.

Hauiing his minde inclined (besides his building) not only to a second voyage beyond the Alpes, but to reforme his life, honoring the Queene his wiues bed with a chaste respect, whereas many loose allurements had transported his youth. To restraine the pompe 1498. and ambition of the Clergie: to order Iustice, giuing audience twise in the weeke to all A complaints, and free access to any that would desire iustice. Doubtlesse, The King sitting in his throne of iustice (saith the Wiseman) disperseth all ill with his looke: to reforme his house, to dispose of his treasure, to ease his subiects, restraining all taxes (which had bene made vpon his subiects) to twelue hundred thousand Frankes, besides his reuenues: a sum which his estates had granted at his comming to the Crowne, for the defence of the realme. It chanced the seauenth of Aprill, going after dinner with the Queene into the Castle ditches, hee strooke his fore-head against the doore of a gallery, whereas hee meant to see a set at Tennis: this blow being a certaine aduertisement, to driue him to the premeditation of his approaching end, the last pangs of death moued him presently, with a godly and holy resolution, (but wisely conditioned, according to mans weaknesse) the which hee testified by these words, talking with John of Beauuois Bishop of Angers, his Confessor, E touching the faults he had committed in his yonger age: I hope (saith hee) never to commit mortall nor veniall sinne, if I can auoide it. Presently vpon this protestation, hee fell backward, falling into an Apoplexie, where-with hee had bene a little before troubled, which closed his eyes with the sleepe of death, about eleuen of the clock at night.

A notable example, wherein wee read the pittifull estate of Princes, when as death knocketh with an euen hand, both at Kings Palaces, and at poore mens cottages, giuing them an end like to all other men, and the inconstant loue of Courtiers. Behold a King, who commanded ouer so many Prouinces, whom so many great Citties obeyed, who had such numbers of sumptuous Castels at his pleasure, and now building a magnificent house, giuing C vp the ghost, in a chamber neere to a gallery stinking with the Urine which euery one made, as he passed through it, laid vpon a mattresse, such as they could finde out by chance. And before his eyes were shut vp with this last sleepe, euery one forgets the course which this declining sunne had runne, to follow the hope of the Easterne starre, which came to lighten this realme.

His disposition.

Thus Charles the eight liued, and thus hee dyed: an humble Prince, liberall, religious, courteous, familiar, and of easie access; of a good and tractable disposition, small of stature, but of an inuincible courage, louing Iustice and his people, capable of counsell, commended for his great attempts, hauing in his youth purchased so much glory, and giuen so great hope, both within and without Christendome, that if God had granted him a longer life, without doubt he had equalled the fame of the most excellent and rarest Princes. In him failed the direct line of the Kings of France, descended from Philip of Valois, and the Crowne fell to the collaterall line, of the which the neerest and most capable of the succession, was Lewis Duke of Orleans and Valois.

Lewis the twelfth, the 57.
French King.

D NOW behold our France, (hauing, vnder Charles the eight happily breathed after the troubles and confusions which had so long afflicted the State, during the raignes of his Predecessors) takes her rest vnder the protection of a Prince, excellent in bountie of nature, in sweetnesse of manners, in temperance and moderation of mind and affection: finally, in the happinesse and felicitie of his raigne. Who hauing extended his Empire beyond the limits of Gaule, subdued vnder his obedience two of the noblest and mightiest cities of the world, Milan with Lombardie, and Genoua with her two riuers, East and West, together with the Islands of Corsica and Chio: reconquered and diuided the Realme of Naples with the Castilian: but in the end, lost it by his trecherie and disloyaltie: vanquished E the Venetians in that memorable battaile, the fifteenth of May 1509. suppressed the Popes insolence: defeated the Venetians again before Brescia: made a peace with the Spaniard and Venetian, and consequently allied himselfe with the King of England. He shall haue this honour and content, to see his subiects in so great prosperitie, that by the conference of things passed before his time, the Realme was neuer so mightie in armes and men; neuer so plentifull in all kinds of commodities, neuer so fortified with such strong places: and which imports more, neuer so blessed in concord, neuer so void of diuisions, neuer so able to endure a great charge, and to produce noble attempts.

The happines of his raigne.

A godly King, chaste, vpriight, courteous, good to his seruants, gracious to his enemies, mercifull to all men, a friend to Iustice and sinceritie, and enemy to flatterie, liberall, but without oppression of any, loyall, respected in all parts of the world: who in regard of learning, shall open a way which his thrice-worthie successour shall bring to a most happie perfection. But to crowne him with titles of honor, he was called The Father of his people. A King commanding a nation most willing to obey: a people multiplying by millions, in Nobility, Merchants, Trades-men, and the common sort: a people replenishing the towns before half desolate. To conclude, a people testifying the excellencie and greatnes of their Soueraigne.

For

1498. For the greatnesse of a King (saith Salomon) is in the multitude of people, but when his subiects decrease, it is the fall of his Soueraigntie. But let vs see, by the relation of the Historie, the course of this admirable prosperitie: and first of all his rights of Succession, as well to this Crowne, and that of Naples, being King of France, as also to the estate of Milan, by reason of Valentine his Grand-mother.

The genealogie of Lewis the 12.

King Charles the 5. had two sonnes. The eldest Charles the 6. his successor, who was father to Charles the seventh, of whom was borne Lewis the 11. father to Charles the eight, who died without children. The youngest, Lewis Duke of Orleans, married Valentine daughter to John Galeas Earle of Vertus, and first Duke of Milan, by whom he had three sonnes, Charles his successor Duke of Orleans, John Earle of Angoulesme, and Philip Earle of Vertus. The said Charles freed from his long imprisonment in England, had by Mary of Cleues his wife, our Lewis the 12. heire, (for want of heires male in the direct line) of this Realme, and of the dependencies thereof, and so was annointed at Rheims, the 27. of May, 1498. assisted at this solemnitie, by John Duke of Alanson, serving as a Peere in the place of the Duke of Bourgongne, Peter Duke of Bourbon, for the Duke of Normandie, Anthony Duke of Lorraine, for the Duke of Guienne, Philip Earle of Ravastein, in place of the Earle of Flanders, Gilbert of Cleues, for the Earle of Champagne, and Gaston of Foix, for the Earle of Thoulousa: and for the Peeres of the Cleargie, the Bishops that were then resident. Afterwards he received the royall Crowne, in the Abbey of Saint Denis in France, the first of Iuly, and the day following made his triumphant entrie into Paris.

We judge of the inward beautie of a Pallace, by the entrie thereof. Who would not then by these happie first fruites of this raigne, conceiue a constant hope of a heavenly blessing? Lewis, after he had worthily performed the funeralls of his Predecessor, hee first purchased the loue of the Noblemen of his Court, maintaining euery man in his dignitie and state, and the Magistrates in their offices. He applied his mind, to order and to cut off the tediousnesse of suites: freed his subiects of the third part of the Subsidies which oppressed them: yea euen the rights which they are accustomed to pay to their new King, for the charges of his funerall that is deceased, and for his coronation: and for a second benefit to the country, he put the men at armes into their garrisons, reducing them to the ancient discipline of war, which the disordered libertie of troubles past, had much corrupted. This done, by the aid of his best States-men, he made many goodly lawes vpon the abusive charges in the pursute of Iustice: neither did he euer publish an Edict, before it was confirmed by the iudgement of Soueraigne Courts. His decrees contained some limitation of the priuiledges granted in old time to Vniuersities, the which they abused to the oppression of the people. The Vniuersitie of Paris opposeth against the publication thereof, and were readie to make a sedition, many publishing infamous libels, both against the King, and against the Chancellor of Rochfort. The Scholers troupe together, and resolute to abandon both studie and the exercise of learning. John Caue being Rector, forbids the Regents to reade any more, and the Preachers to preach, vntill the Vniuersitie had recovered her ancient priuiledges. The King aduertised of these mutinies, drawes many men at armes into Paris, and sitting in Parliament E confirms the aboue-named ordinances by an Edict. The Rector fearing a checke, keeps all the Scholers within their lodgings, and reuokes the commandement he had giuen. John Standon, a Doctor of Diuinitie, a Brabançon, and one of the chiefe authors of this counsell, was banished the Realme. Thomas Warnet of Cambray, (who preaching, had barkt out some thing against the Kings authoritie) prevented this decree, and banished himselfe. Being thus content in mind, and quiet within his Realme, his thoughts soared beyond the Alpes, and now he takes vpon him the title of Duke of Milan. He was grounded vpon the right of succession. Valentine besides her dowrie (which was the citie and countrie of Ast, with a great summe of money) had obtained this clause expressly in her contract of marriage. That, for want of heires male of Galeas, Valentine should succeed to the Duchie, or she being dead, her next descendants.

The Vniuersitie of Paris mutinies.

Lewis his title to the Duchie of Milan.

This conuention was of no force, but the Imperiall seate was then vacant: and the Pope confirmed it. The Popes pretending (the Empire being without an Emperour) that the administration belongs to them. And seeing, that by the death of Philip Maria Visconte, the masculine line of John Galeas failed, who then should succeed in this goodly estate? many contended

A contended for it, the Emperour Frederik maintained, that it should be vnto the Empire, considering the lines specified in the institution made to John Galias by Hence/ius king of Romans was extinct. Alphonso King of Arragon and Naples, armed him selfe with the testament of Phillip, by the which he was made his heire. But in worldly affaires, the strongest most often carries it. Francis Sforce one of Phillips Captaines, sonne to Sforce Attendule, an Adventurer, a braue and active spirit, had married Blanche, bastard daughter to the said Phillip: and hauing no man at that instant that might resist his violence, hee did so cunningly winne all the greatest families of Milan, as by their support and succour hee soone seized on the state: the which he might easily effect, hauing all the forces at his command, and no competitor. For neither Lewis Duke of Orleans, nor his Children had any meanes to recover this Duchy from Francis, by reason of the great warres which followed in France, by the murder of the said Lewis, and of the Duke of Bourgongne slain likewise at Montereau, vnder Charles the sixt and seauenth, Charles sonne to the sayde Lewis (taken at the battaile of Azincourt, languishing twenty five yeares a prisoner in England, and deliuered by Phillip Duke of Bourgundy,) could neuer obtaine any aide from Lewis the eleuenth, being crossed by home-bred warres from the beginning of his raigne. Moreouer Lewis did alwaies make account to settle his authority, by the suppression of his neere blood. And for this cause our Lewis, his sonne in law, sonne to the said Charles, had no whit the more credit with his father in law, for the recovery of his inheritance. And the sword which he did vntheath against Charles the eight his brother in law, (of whome hee pretended the Regency) and after in the warres of Brittain, tooke from him all meanes to attempt this enterprife, vntill such time as (the King hauing left him in Ast, to crosse the attempts of Lodowick Sforce) he seized vpon Nouarre, but with a fruitlesse euent.

Now is he seated vpon the royall throne of his Ancestors, peaceable within himselfe, and peaceable with his neighbors. Triumpe doth not cease to lay open vnto him the facility to expell Lodowike. To make the way easie, Pope Alexanders friendship, the Venetians, Florentines, and other Potentats of Italy was very requisite. He seekes it by his Ambassadors, and findes that the death of Charles the eight, had bred an alteration in their dispositions. The Pope conceyuing, that the peace of Italy was the decay of his priuate estate, did easily allowe of new troubles. The Venetians (being freed by the Kings decease, from the feare they had of him, for the indignities he had receiued,) did not beleue that a new King would so uehemently embrace the quarrell of his Predecessor: and foreseeing also, that if Sforce were once quiet, he would oppose him selfe against them, for the affaires of Pisa, whereof he did sollicite (but coldly) the restitution vnto the Florentines by the Popes meanes. The Florentines had not yet so much estranged their affection from the French, but there was good

meanes to recouer it. Being thus affected, they all send their Ambassadors to the King. The Pope (who aspired to nothing more then the temporall aduancement of Cesar Borgia his son, being then Cardinal) did willingly embrace this occasion, to plant him in the Kings good fauour, and by some especiall bond to purchase his masters loue. He knew well that Lewis would willingly put away Joane his wife, to marry with Anne the widow of Charles: and euen then hee resolved to exchange spirituall graces for temporall commodities.

He then agrees with the King for thirty thousand ducats, and drawes a promise from him, to aide him presently after the conquest of Milan, to reduce to the obedience of the Apostolike sea, the townes possessed by the Gouernours of Romagna. And for his sonne Cesar, a company of a hundred Lances, twenty thousand Frankes pension, a wife in France to his liking, and Valence in Dauphine, with the title of a Duchy. Then he committed the matter of diuorce, to Ferdinand Bishop of Septa, his Nuncio in France, to Philip cardinal of Luxembourg, and to Lewis Bishop of Alby (some name George of Amboise, Archbishop of Rouan) who vpon report of the protestation made by Lewis to a Notary, the day of his marriage, that his meaning was not to contract any marriage, & that the solemnity which he did celebrate, was only to please the king, whom he knew to be cruel against those, by whom he thought him selfe to be wronged. And moreover: if by chance Lewis, either by the expresse commandement of his father in law, or after, of his brother in law, did lie with his wife, hee did interpose secret witnessse, that should depose of his abstineny. And besides, the Physitians hauing iudged 1499. iudged her incapable of issue, they declared the sayd marriage voyde, and gaue him liberty A to marry with Anne: who contracting her-selfe to any other should haue diuided the Duchy of Britanny from the crowne of France. The Venetians sent to congratulate his coming to the Crowne, and by way of excuse, gaue him to vnderstand, that the controuersies they had with King Charles, proceeded onely of distrust and ielousie, whereof he had giuen them cause, seeing, that not content with the realme of Naples, he had cast his desseignes vpon all Italy.

Troubles in Bourgongne.

The Kings association with the Venetians.

The Florentins did not forget their ancient customes in like cases to the crowne of France, but especially, to put him in minde of their deseruings to the deceased King, solicited therevnto by Lodowicke Sforce, to the end that when the two common-weales of Venice and Florence, should come to treat of the affaires of Pisa, the Venetians practises (whose greatnesse B Lodowicke did much feare in Italy) might be crossed by the Florentines: and they purchasing fauour and credit with the King, he might imploy them, to mediate some accord betwixt the King and him, the which he desired with all his heart. Lodowicke did fore-see the storme, and laboured to auoyde it, but in vaine: for the time of his shipwracke was at hand. Then Cesar Borgia, the new Duke of Valentinois, came vnto the King with the Bull of dispensation: where he was no sooner arriued, but as the sonne of his father, he plaied the first act of a bloody Tragedy, vpon the alliance which the King did contract with the Pope his father. Cesar following the instructions of Alexander, dissembled the bringing of this Bull: iudging C the Kings disposition to be like vnto those, who desire that most, which is refused, to make him the more pliable to his desseignes. But the Bishoppe of Septa, hauing sent intelligence vnto his Maiesty of the truth, the King thinking it sufficient to haue the Bull dispatched, concluded the marriage with Anne, giuing for a portion to his wife diuorced, the Duchy of Berry. Cesar hauing discouered the author of this aduise, caused the Bishop to be soone after poysoned. The peace with other Princes, which might some-what disturbe the projects of Lewis, was no lesse expedient: he therefore concluded with Ferdinand King of Castile, and therby did associate him in the conquest of the realme of Naples: he confirmed that which his Predecessor had with the English, and renewed the alliance with the Suisses, granting them the pensions which Lewis and Charles were accustomed to giue.

Maximilian alone, working vpon the old leuaine of his Ancestors, shewed some bitternesse amidst these contents, casting the coales of diuision in Bourgongne and Champagne, D by the Lord of Vergi Comtois, when as they least doubted it, seeing that Lewis being taken prisoner at the battaile of Saint Aubin, and hauing, about all others, imploied Maximilian for an intercessor to Charles the eight, they thought that Maximilian should reioyce at this new succession, more then any other Prince, and that the discontent he had against Charles (hauing forsaken his daughter, and married with Anne of Brittaines his spouse) had bene mortified by the death of the said Prince. The Emperour was thrust on by the duke of Milan who being perfwaded, that the King busied at home, should haue no leisure to attempt any thing in Italy, or any accord being made betwixt them, he should be comprehended therein. This warre put the realme in alarme: but Lewis opposed so great a power, vnder the command of John of Foix Vicount of Narbonne, his brother in law, as it was quenched as soone E as kindled, by a truce of many moneths, without any mention of Lodowicke Sforce. And to the end that Philip Arch-Duke of Austria, and Earle of Flanders, sonne to Maximilian, might reape the fruites of their reconciliation, he did homage to the King, for the places he held of the crowne: and those of Artois were restored vnto him. In the meane time, they consult at Venice, vpon the tearmes of confederation with the king. The difference was, the holding of Pisa. The Venetians offering all other conditions, would not haue this string toucht; and the King being resolute to haue it restored vnto him in fauour of the Florentines, refused to treat, vnlesse this article might be granted. But the Duke of Valentinois and other Agents for the Pope, the cardinall of Saint Pierre, Triunlee, and all the Italians (who for, their owne priuat intrest perfwaded him to warre) hauing layed before him the losse he should receiue, F by the want of the Venetians ayde, considering their power and meanes to annoy the Duke of Milan, he yeelded without any more speech: that at the same time, as he should innade the Duchy of Milan, they should doe the like vpon their frontiers. That hauing wonne the rest of the Duchy, Cremona and Guairadade should be taken by their common forces for the Venetians, except

A except the breadth of fortse faddome along the riuier of Addé. That after the conquest of Milan, the Venetians should be bound to defend that for a time, with a certaine number of horse and foote: and the King should doe the like for Cremona, and other places which they possessed in Lombardie, euen vnto the marshes of Venice. This conuention tooke all hope from Lodowicke, both of peace with the King, and reconciliation with the Venetians. Beeing thus abandoned, he resolues to defend himselfe, and beginnes by the fortification of Anon, Nouarre, and Alexandria, Townes lying neere to the French, meaning to oppose against their violence Galeas of Saint Seuerin, with the greatest part of his forces, and the rest against the Venetians, vnder the command of the Earle of Caizzo. Hee commaunds Galeas to passe the Pau, with sixteene hundred men at armes, fiftene hundred light horse, tenne B thousand Italian foote, and fise hundred Lansquenets: but rather to defend his places, then to keepe the field, hoping that the prolonging of the warre would breede him some aduantage, for that hee expected an issue of the accord, which hee did mediate betwixt Maximilian and the Suisses: the which effected, hee had promise of notable ayde. On the other side, the King caused Lewis of Luxembourg, Earle of Ligni, to march with Emerard Steward Lord of Aubigni, and John Isques of Triunlee, leading fixe thousand horse, and fise and twentie thousand foote. The Castle of Arazze vpon Tanare, was the first object of their armes, a place kept by fise hundred foote, assailed the tenth of August, and taken within few dayes. Seuen hundred men being lodged in Anon, did likewise suffer it to bee C lost in two dayes, and all those put to the sword that were retired in armes into the Castle. Donat Raffagnin, a Milanois, Captaine of the Castle of Valence, well furnished with men and artilerie, corrupted by the promises of Triunlee, gaue entrance to the French, the same day as hee had by the like treacherie twentie yeares before, deliuered one of the gates of Tortone to Lodowicke Sforce, to the preiudice of Bonne of Sauoy, and of the little Duke John Galeas. All the souldiers were slaine or taken, amongst others, Ottavian brother to S. Seuerin, was prisoner.

The first exploits of this voyage.

The same deluge overflowed (euen vpon the very brute) Basignagne, Yoguere, Chasteauneuf, and Pont Coronée. Anthony Maria Palauoisin yeelded vp Tortone, not attending any assault. Alexandria makes head against the armie, and whilest they presse it Lodowicke D shuts himselfe into Milan, and seeing his estate lost by peece-meales, he flies to those remedies which are vsuall in greatest despaire. Hee inroules all that could carrie armes, assembles the people, dischargeth them of a part of their ordinarie impositions: shewes them with most vehemēt words, "That if happily he had ouer-charged them, not any desire to gather treasure, nor his owne disposition (beeing an enemy to oppression of his subjects) but rather the time and the common dangers of Italy had prest him thereunto: first, to counterchecke the Venetians greatnesse: then, to oppose against the entrie of King Charles. That the fruites which they had reaped thereby, were peace and publike quiet, where in he had happily maintained them many yeares, with a generall increase of riches, beautie of buildings and inhabitants, with mildnesse and moderation of spirit, carefull to administer good and breefe iustice to euery man indifferently. That the merits, and gratious gouernement of his father layed before their eyes, how insupportable would the insolent and proud command of the French be vnto them. That abhorring the rough and vnciuill manners of strangers, they should resolute for the common defence of their liues and cuntry. That the French are but a brunt, which beeing withstood, it should then be easie to resist them. That the Emperour made haft to succour them in person. That Prosper Colonne marched with the troupes of Fredericke King of Naples. That the Marquis of Mantoua, was already in the Countrie of Cremona, hauing pacified all controuersies. That to all these aydes, if they did but ioyne their loyalties and good will, he should find himselfe strong enough to counter all the power of France vnited together. But these admonitions came too late: it was very apparant, that necessitie, and not any good meaning, had forced him to this humility, whereof he had neuer giuen them any testimonie. Thus his ruine approached. The Venetians for their part made warre in Guairadade, and had taken Caravage and other townes vpon the riuier of Addé. The Earle of Caizzo, discontented that his brother beeing younger of yeares and of lesse experience, should be preferred before him in the command of the armie, had secretly passed his word to the King. In the meane time they thunder against 1499. the walles of Alexandria, and Galeas of Saint Seuerin hauing with him twelue hundred light horse, and threethousand foote (not discovering his intent to any Captaine, but onely to Luke Malvezzo) flies secretly out of the towne in the night, after the third daies sege, with a part of his light horse, shewing by the effect, that he had a brauer arme, and was more experienced in iusts, and tournies (in which exercisies all other Italians gaue him place) then in the gouernment of an army. This flight daunted the courage of the beseged, and made the passage easie. The army enters in at the breake of the day, spoiles the garrison, and sacks the towne. The losse of Alexandria, and the following sege of Mortare, opened the gates of Paui.

Milan remains against Lodowike Sforce.

Milan riseth, the Citizens arme, and respect Lodowicke so little, as they giue good testimony of their affection, by the murder of Anthony of Landriano his treasurer generall, committing at noone day from the Castle. Lodowike foreseeing his owne by anothers ruine: being well informed that his gouernment was exceeding hatefull vnto the Milanois, and morouer amazed at the report which Galeas made of the valour of the French men at armes, he sent away his children, accompanied with the Cardinals Ascanius his brother, and of Saint Seuerin, with about two hundred thousand ducats which he had in treasor, (well shortned of a million and a halfe which he made shew of few yeares before) he left the gard of the Castle to Bernardin of Corte borne at Paui, whome he had bred vp young, and three thousand foote, furnished with victuals, munition, and mony, for many monethes: he restored to the Borghomes, gentlemen of Milan, the lands he had taken from them. But was this any bounty, seeing he could not keepe them? and the second day of September he departed for Germany, followed by the Cardinall of Este, and Galeas of Saint Seuerin, with a good number of horse, and foote, vnder collour to hasten the imagined troupes, which Maximilian prepared for him. The towne thus abandoned being loath to be a prey vnto the enemy, who approached towards the walls, prevented their coming, and willingly consented to bring them in, reseruing the capitulation to the Kings arriuall, from whome they hoped, (considering their voluntary submission) to receiue goodly exemptions; and great priuileges. All other places of the Duchy conformed them-selues to the patterne of their cheife Citie.

Cremona affected to the French.

Cremona abhorring the Venetian yoake, stretched out; both armes and heartes to the French: but the King vnwilling to infringe the treaty made with the Senate, they were forced to yeeld to the yoake after some daies sege. Genoua followes this example. The Adornes (to whome Lodowike had giuen the gouernment) John Lewis of Fiesque and the people contend who shall haue most honor in yeelding it to the King, who giues them for Gouernour, Philip Lord of Rauastin, and Baptiste Fregose for his Lieutenant. But force could not take the Castell, by the aduice of Triumlee, gold makes a breach. Bernardin without any other approach, by the consent of the other Captaines, namely of Philippin of Fiesque, bred likewise and brought vp by Lodowike, sells it twelue daies after Lodowike's departure, and receiues for paiement a hundred thousand crowns: some report but ten thousand (yet I should terme this sale the capitulation of a foole, considering the place which he commanded) halfe the moueables in the castell, a company of an hundred Lances, an annuall pension, with many other graces and priuileges. But this infamous marchant, hatefull to all the world, fled from by every man, as vnworthy to hold any ranke amongst men of honor, cast off from all companies, with words full of reproch, confounded with shame, and tormented in his owne Conscience, accusing his villany and base ingratitude, he died of griefe within few dayes after.

Thus all things fore-tell the ruine of Lodowike: his owne indiscretion, the peoples hatred, the cowardlinesse of his Captaines and soldiers, and the treachery of his household seruants, so as in twenty dayes hee is dispossessed of this Noble and mighty Estate which hee had before vsurped. The King receiuing intelligence at Lyons, of a speedier victory then hee expected, departs presently in post, and makes his entry into Milan, granting to the people exemptions of many customes, impunity to all such as had followed Sforce; restitution to the Gentlemen, who through the tyranny of former times had lost their goods: if they were not extant, or not to discontent them that were in lawfull possession; he gaue mony to many to buy them againe; or other lands if any were to be sold: Hee

A repealed by Edict the Regents and professors of learning, giuing to some lands, to others increase of their intertainment, honoured the gentlemen of the countrie with his table, and their houses with his presence. And to make this gouernement more popular, he made John Iagues of Triumlee, a Milanois Gouernour of Milan; giuing vnto him Vigueune and many other things, in regard of his merits and loyall seruice. As the French forces prospered thus in the Duchie of Milan, and the Venetians busied in the countrie of Cremona, the Florentines gaped after the restitution of Pisa: and to obtaine it, they giue vnto Paul Vitelli their Generall, an armie of ten thousand foote, with a great number of horse, with the which (having taken Cascine and other places that supported Pisa) he incamped before the citie the last day of Iuly. An enterprise of difficulty, as well for the strength of the towne, as for the valour and resolution of the Citizens, who willingly would haue suffered any miserie, rather then to haue fallen vnder the Florentines commaund. Hee batters the fort of Stampace, and the wall of either side with twentie peeces of artillerie. Vitelli giues an assault and forceth it, with so great a terror to the Pisans, as abandoning the rampars, euery man seeks to saue himselfe by flight. And if the Generall had pursued it vigorously that morning had crowned him with honour, whereas it prooued the beginning of his downfall: for seeing his souldiers vpon hope of spoile runne together by heapes, hee stayed their heate, causing most of his troupes to retire, and gaue the beseged leysure, (seeing this first brunt past) to resume new courage, and returne to the guard of their rampars. So as whilest he laboured to winne C a victorie, with the least preiudice to the armie that might be, beeing lodged in a countrie, full of pooles and marishes, which lie betwixt the sea and the towne, and the season beeing subiect vnto pestilent winds, a generall contagion infects so many of his men in few daies, as the healthie were not sufficient for a Generall assault, so as he raised the sege against the Florentines will, who promised to renew his troupes with fresh supplies. So as the bad opinion which the Florentine people had conceived of him, increased now in such sort, as being called into Cascine, by the Commissaries of the armie, vnder color of lodging the Companies, they tooke him prisoner, and from thence he was led by the Magistrates commaundement to Florence, and there publicly beheaded. An ordinarie reward for generous minds that subiect themselves to the seruice of a multitude.

Vitelli beheaded.

D During Lewis his aboade at Milan, all the Potentates of Italy, except Fredericke King of Naples, either came, or sent vnto him, some to congratulate, some to purge themselves from suspition to haue bene more affected to Lodowicke then to him, as also to assure their priuate estates. The King receiuing them all graciously, compounded with them according to the qualities of their persons, and the benefite he might reape by them. The Marquis of Mantoua, and the Duke of Ferrara, came in person. The King gaue the Marquis a company of an hundred Lances, and the Order of S. Michel, with an honorable pension. The Ferrarois (beeing in disgrace in Court, since the time that he deliuered the Castle of Genoua vnto Lodowicke) was glad to buy the Kings loue with readie money. John Bentiuole sent his sonne Hannibal: the Florentines had some trouble to make their peace. They had offended all the E Court, for that fearing to incense Lodowicke Sforce, touching the affaires of Pisa, they had held themselves newtters betwixt the King and Lodowicke. Moreover, the death of Paul Vitelli (to whome the Crowne of France was beholding) made the King strange vnto them: and the credit of Triumlee did them harme: who aspiring to the Seigneurie of Pisa, was as much desired of the Pisans, to warrant them from the Florentines oppressions: finally, the King had need of money, and the Florentines paying a fine as the rest did, were receiued into grace, vpon condition: To ayde one another for their common defence, to saue armes in Italy for the King, and the King for them for the reuenerie of Pisa, and some places held by the Siennois and Luquois: that beeing repoesessed of Pisa, they should furnish the King with five hundred men at armes, and fiftie thousand Ducats: paying also vnto the King fixe and thirtie thousand Ducats, which Sforce had lent them, abating that which they had disbursed for him.

The Pope also did not forget himselfe, but vrging the performance of the treatie made with the King, obtaines for the Duke of Valentinois (who hauing married the Daughter of the Lord of Albrer, had repassed the Alpes with his Maiestie) three hundred Launces in the Kings pay, and foure thousand Suisses to be payed by the Pope, to ayde him to make warre in Romagna. The King (hauing settled such order as he thought fit for his conquest:

1500. and prolonged the truce he had with the Emperour, vntill May following) tooke the way to A Lions, leading with him the Grand-child of John Galeas, whom the mother had vnadvisedly deliuered; him he made a Monke. Then he receiued newes of a faire daughter that was born vnto him, the which shall hereafter be wife to Francis the first of that name, and Queene of France. An other accident, but farall, made that season famous. The fall of our Ladies bridge at Paris, drawing after it the ruine of threescore houses, and a great number of persons swallowed vp in the riuer.

The Duke of Valentinois
exploits.

This yeare Italy (beside forraigne and home-bred decisions) felt also the Turkes forces. Basazes Ottoman (beeing expressely drawne by the perswasions of Lodowicke Sforce, hauing no other meanes to be reuenged of the Venetians) assailing with a mightie armie by Sea, such B places as the Venetians held in Greece, he sent sixe thousand horses by land to spoile Friuli, who finding the countrie without defence, expecting no such guests, did spoile, sacke, and burne all euen vnto Liurence: they chained together an infinite number of prisoners, and beeing come to the riuer of Tagliamente, they refused such as they thought fit to carrie with them, and murdered all the rest. In the meane time, the Duke of Valentinois (hauing ioyned the forces of the Church, with those troupes he receiued from the King) tooke Imola (with ease) in the end of the yeare. And in the beginning of the next, (famous for the celebration of the great Iubile at Rome) Furl. But as he marched to other townes, the course of his conquests is stayed by vnexpected accidents, bred by diuers motiues. The most part of the Lombards could not fit with the French humour, and all were discontented, for that C they had not tasted this great bountie of the King, whereby they were promised a generall exemption of all imposts and tributes.

Moreover, the Ghibelin faction (very mightie in Milan) was wonderfully grieved to see Triunlice (chiefe of the Guelfe) preferred to the gouernement: and he by nature factious, proud, and stirring, did much increase this bad disposition, fauouring them of his partie beyond the bounds of reason. This did greatly estrange the peoples hearts from him. He shue with his owne hand some butchers, who according to their common rashnes, refused to pay the ordinarie customes, and withstood the receiuers with armes. Doubtlesse, if such as haue the guard of a mightie estate newly conquered, displease both Nobilitie and People, what may be expected but a generall alteration? Adde thereunto the lightnesse of an inconstant D multitude, alwaies desirous of innouations: now they lament him whom before they hated.
Lodowicke aduertised of these broyles, strikes while the iron is hot, and without any longer feeding himselfe with the Emperours vaine and frustratorie hopes, he makes a sodaine leue of eight thousand Suisses, and five hundred men at armes, Bourguignons, by the helpe (but not entertained) of the said Maximilian, and flies to Coma with all speede, the which being abandoned by the French Garrison, finding the humour of the inhabitants inclined to change, gaue him an easie entrie.

Milan revolts.

Triunlice felt this storme comming, and to auoide it, he demands speedie succours from the Venetians, according to the assocation which they had made with the King, and makes knowne to the Lord of Alegre (who commaunded the French troupes, and the Suisses in E the Duke of Valentinois armie) the necessitie which calls him speedily to Milan. The Venetians send Nicholas Earle of Petilliano, to ioine with Triunlice or Aubigni, and if he were debarred, to spoile the Milanois countrie. The Earle not able to ioine with Aubigni, spoiles the countrie, and then returnes towards the townes vpon the riuer of Adda, to preuent any new alteration. Aubigni departs sodainly with the Suisses, and all the horse, obtaining free passage through the Countries of Parma and Placentia, vpon condition to abstaine from all acts of hostilitie. And comming neere to Tortone, at the perswasion of the Guelfes of that Towne, (who had beene expelled by the rest that were at Lodowickes deuotion) he enters and sackes the whole towne, Guelfs and Gibelins, without any distinction: then he went towards F Alexandria, whereas the Suisses for want of pay, went to Sforces armie.

Suisses revolts.

The losse of Como hauing stirred vp the people of Milan, and the chiefe of the Gibelin Faction, Triunlice leaues within the Castle such forces as the present necessitie could furnish:
he fortified Nouarre with foure hundred Launces, and puts himselfe with the rest into Mortare, thinking that Lodowicke would force it before hee passed, and in the meane time, giuing the King aduertisement of this sodaine alteration, he should haue meanes to stay the enemies

A enemies proceedings. But it chanced otherwise. Sforces armie neglecting both Mortare and Nouarre, flies to the most important, and recouers Milan as easily as they had lost it. Paula and Parina presently set vp Sforces armes. Loda and Placentia had done the like, if the Venetian troupes had not suddenly entred. Alexandria and other places neerer to Ast then to Milan, would not declare themselves, before they had seene the last act of this Tragedie.
The Geneuois refused to returne vnder Lodowickes command; and the Florentines reiect his request, touching the restitution of money which he had lent them, for the which, they had pait their promise vnto the King.

Sforce recouers Milan.

The Marquis of Mantoua sent him his brother, with some men at armes. The Lords of B Mirandole, Carpi, Corregge, the Rosses, those of Verme, and Bobie, with other such wethercockes, follow the wind that blowes: finally, this new Conquerour finds more affection, and ioy at his returne, then he had left at his departure. Milan being recouered, Lodowicke leaues the Cardinall Africanus his brother before the castle, and (reinforced with fiftene hundred men at armes, besides the Bourguignons, and great troupes of foote) he takes Viguen by composition: and the Kings succours, not able to come in time, for the defence of Nouarre, they compound to yeeld the towne, and to depart with all their baggage. But the castle (which holds yet for vs) shall shortly be the meanes of Lodowickes ruine. At Triunlices first summon, the King had dispatched the Earle of Ligni, with a good number of foote, and horse. But he found the two commanders, Triunlice and Aubigni so diuided, as if the King C had not speedily and wisely preuented this pestilent contagion, it had doubtlesse ended with a pittifull and bloudie Catastrophe. Aubigni and Triunlice held themselves equall in power and vertue. The first would haue them presently to force Milan; the other would attend about Nouarre the new armie which the King leauied in Suifferland. If Aubigni set at liber-tie any prisoners taken in warre, Triunlice ransomed them. Finally, what the one built, the other pulled downe: and they tormented one another with continuall riots.

The King aduertised of this dangerous faction, he sends vnto them Lewis of Bourbon, yonger brother to Gilbert, late Vice-roy of Naples, and John of Foix Vicount of Narbonne: but by reason of their young yeares, they were guided by Lewis of Tremouille, Lord of Thouars, beeing accompanied by the Lords of Grauille Admirall of France, Lautrec, and D many others, followed with fiftene hundred Lances, ten thousand Suisses, sixe thousand French, and the Cardinall of Amboise, who was Lieutenant for his Maiestie on that side of the Alpes. Tremouille beeing arriued, treating with these two Commanders, easily drew them (in regard of his Maiesties seruice) to lay aside all rancor, and to become good friends, handling them so wisely, as there appeared no change in their gouernment: but in stead of two, they afterward seemed to be three heads in one hood. Thus vnitied, they resolute to send some companies of light horse vpon the way to Milan, to cut off the passage to foure hundred horse, and a great number of foote that came from Milan: and to preuent Lodowicke of all meanes to get vnto Milan if he were prest, and then they turne the force of their army agains Lodowicke beeing at Nouarre. There were among the Suisses, that were entertained E by Sforce, many Captaines which had serued in the voyage of Naples, and at Nouarre, who complained of their entertainment, not payed at the appointed time. Tremouille deales with them vnder-hand, and vpon promise of a great somme of money, withdrawes them from Lodowicke.

The Suisses, by the perswasion of their Colonels, beginne tumultuously to demand their pay. Lodowicke giues them all his plate, and intreats them earnestly to attend the men and money that came from Milan. But fearing, least by the comming of these Milanois, they should be forced to winke at Lodowicke, and to faile Tremouille, they caused the French army to approach neere to Nouarre, to draw Lodowicke to field, who was loth to ingage himselfe among men whom he fees ill affected to him. They are not deceiued in their hopes. He goes F forth with his army, and puts his light horse to begin the charge. Tremouille makes it good, vntill the Admirall Grauille, and Edmund of Prie arriuing, the Italian troupes giue way, and are put to rout. The Suisses being prest to fight, answer: That they wil not fight against their brethren, kinsmen, & others of their nation, without leaue from their superiors. And approaching this nation, could neither by prayers, nor promises, diuert them from their disloyall intent: A only he got a promise, To set him in a place of safetie. So they agreed, that disguised and armed like a Suisse on foot, he should march in their rankes. But going betwixt two great troupes of men at armes, this poore Suisse disguised, is discouered, in one of their battalions, with Galeas of S. Semersin, Eracasse, and Anthony Maria his brethren, and stayed: the Italians were stript, but the Lanquenets and Bourguignons were sent away without touch, and Lodowicke was led prisoner to Lions, where the King remained: and within two daies after was sent to the great Tower at Loches, where he continued captiue about ten yeares, vntill his death. Behold the ambition and aspiring conceits of him, whom all Italie could not containe, now restrained in a straight prison. And to auoide a greater corasie, he intreates Tremouille that he might not see Triuulce his enemy: who being aduertised, and hasting thither, Sforce (said he with a brauing speech) thou seest the wrongs thou hast done me, are now repayed in the same B measure.

Lodowicke's disposition.

This happened the Thursday before Palme-Sunday. Doubtlesse the circumstances of Lodowicke Sforces miseries are remarkable: wherein we may learne, that the diuine Iustice doth alwaies punish offenders, and takes from them at need, both iudgement, courage, wit, and all other faculties. Let vs obserue in this Tragedie, that Lodowicke beeing fearefull, promising, praying, fighting, and flying disguised is mockt, taken, and finally, dies in a most pittifull estate. A Prince excellent in many perfections of nature, industrious, eloquent, of an high and busie spirit, but infamous for the death of his nephew, couetous, vaine, ambitious, C turbulent, proud, trecherous, impious, cruell, paying a Crowne for euery French-mans head that his host should murder going to the suble. So as it is not strange, if he hath felt the rigour of Gods iustice in his owne person.

And to fill vp the measure of affliction in his family, the Cardinall Ascanius, vpon the bruite of this defeate, flying from Milan to recouer some place of safetie with many Gentlemen of the Gibelin faction, (who hauing affected Lodowicke, dispaired of pardon) refreshing themselves at Riualte, in the territorie of Placentia, Conrad of Lande, Lord of the same place, (his kinsman and ancient friend) sends presently for Charles Vrsin and Sonzin Benzon (Captains vnder the Venetians pay) and trecherously deliueirs vnto them the said Cardinall, with Hermes Sforce, brother to the deceased Duke Iohn Galeas, with most of the Gentlemen D in their companie, who presently conueyed them to Venice: but the Senate, at the Kings instant request (who considered how necessarie it was for the safetie of the state of Milan to haue these men in his power) deliuered both the Cardinall Baptista Picomit, and Hermes, with all other Milanois that were retyred for the same cause into the Townes of Guiradade.

The Cardinall was sent to the great tower of Bourges, vntill that hauing the whole Realme for his prison, he obtained leaue, by the intercession of the Cardinall of Amboise, to go to the election of a new Pope, promising vpon his oath neuer to attempt any thing to preiudice the crowne: and to be a meanes to aduance one of the French Cardinals to Saint Peters chaire. But oh the ingratitude and trecherie of this Milanois! the Colledge of Cardinals inclining to choose the Cardinall of Amboise, he alone by his faction, wrestles the Popedom from the French, to giue it vnto Iulius the second, a Geneuois, in the yeare 1503. Milan beeing restrained from all meanes of rebelling, sues presently for pardon, the which they obtaine of the Cardinall of Amboise in the Kings name, vpon condition to repaire their rebellion, by the payment of three hundred thousand Ducats, whereof his maiestie did afterwards remit the greatest part.

The rest of the rebelling Citties were euery one taxed, according to their abilitie. Thus all the Duchie of Milan was quiet: the Swisses were dismissed, who returning to their houses, seaze vpon Belinzone, lying in that mountaine, the which (not drawne out of their hands, as the King might haue done for a little money, shall hereafter greue the author of this errour, beeing a most conuenient passage to stoppe the Swisses entrie into the Duchie of Milan) and shall giue occasion to liberrall tongues, to scoffe both in publicke and priuate, at the greedinesse of Lewis, whereof these braue Commanders returning into Fraunce, had had more cause to complaine, if the Queene had not supplied this defect with that bountie which the King did owe vnto their merits. Doubtlesse shee did bountifullly 1500.

A bountifullly repaire those errors, which the King did often commit in that respect. And the King restraining his liberty, within the bonds of frugality, would not seeme bountifull with the oppression of his people.

Now let vs see how the remainder of the yeare was employed. The exceeding prosperity of a Prince is suspected vnto other great personages, who feare som diminution in their estates. Maximilian considering how the alienation of so goodly a fee, was preiudiciall to the Empire, and the blame he did incur by suffering Lodowicke to be thus spoyled, who had cast himselfe into his protection, hee dismissed the Ambassadors of France, and Venice, being ready to proclaime warres against them, as vsurping the lands of the Empire. With this

B dessein hee acquaints the Princes Electors with the iniury done to him, to them, and to all the Germane nation, the apparent danger, least their too still patience should make the French King seeke to ioine the Imperiall Crowne vnto his owne, like vnto some of his predecessors. That partly through necessity, and partly through the ambitious desire which the Pope had to aduance his sonne Borgia, Duke of Valentinois, he would willingly winke at these proceedings. This consideration made the King to put off the warre of Naples vnto the next yeare. But as the forces of Germany moue but heauily, so had hee leasure to assist the Florentines, (who had shewed themselves ready in the recovery of Milan for the King: and discharge the oath made by his predecessor, and his owne) with 600. Lances maintained by his maiesty, and seauen thousand Swisses (but payed by their common-weale) and

C diuers companies of French, with artillery and munition necessary for the recovery of Pisa, Pietresancte, Montpulcian, Murron, and other places, vnder the command of the Lord of Beaumont, whome they demanded, but ill chosen for them.

To auoide this storme, the Pisans, Geneuois, Siennis and Luquois, (enuying the Florentines greatnesse) offered the King a hundred thousand Crownes in ready mony, to the end the Florentines should not benefite any thing by the recovery of those places so important for their states, promising to pay him fifty thousand crownes yearely for euer, vpon condition that the Pisans should recouer their liberty by his meanes, and the fortresses of Linorne, with all the territory of Pisa. Triuulce and Fiesque, pleaded for the Pisans, shewing how expedient it was for the King to weaken the Florentines, and some other Potentats of Italy: but

D offering a great summe of mony to the king, they discouered their inward greedinesse, to make themselves Lords thereof. Finally the matter was concluded in fauor of the Florentines. And whilest this army remaynes in Lombardy expecting their pay, the King causeth the Lords of Mirandole, Carpi and Correge to pay their fines, who for twenty thousand Ducats obtayned remission of their rash rebellion. The Marquis of Mantoua, (to auoide the like censure,) humbly craued pardon. Iohn Bentiuole (hauing fauored Lodowicke as the rest,) payed forty thousand Ducats: and the King by this meanes, tooke both him and the city of Bologna into his protection, whilest that the army (to loose no time) tooke Mont Chiarucole in the territory of Parma, belonging to the Torelli fauorers of Sforce: then returning backe, to passe the Appenin, by the way of Pontreme, at Fregoses request they spoiled Aubri Malepine

The Potentats of Italy reconciled to the King.

E Lord of Maffia, with small credit, and other places, although he were in the Florentines protection. In the end the Cardinall of Amboise (performing his promises but badly with the Florentines) receiued (for a summe of mony) the Luquois into the Kings protection, agreeing, that his maiesty should hold Pietresancte in gard, vntill it were decided to whome it did appertaine. The Pisans (being resolved to make a defensie warre) repaire their fortifications: men women and children worke with great affection: and to coole the heate of the French comming to their seege, they made known the affection they bare to the crowne of France, by an autentike instrument sent to the Lords of Beaumont and Rauastein Gouernors for the King at Genoua, who receiued them in the Kings name: and Beaumont summoning the towne of Pisa, had for answer That they desired nothing more then to liue F under the obedience of his Maiesty, and therefore they yielded vnto the King, vpon promise not to deliuer them into the Florentines power. Doubtlesse hee was ill practised in politique and military affaires, to seeke that by force which he might haue without toile or shame.

And was it not a hard thing, to ruine a people which made such shew of tender loue and voluntary obedience to this Crowne. Beaumont campeg before Pisa the 29. of Iune: batters it all night, and some part of the day following, beats downe about three score sadome of

of the wall: and mounts to the assaults both with foote and horse. But he discovered not a deepe and large trench, which the Pisans had made betwixt the wall and the rampar within, so as the breadth and depth amazing our men, they remained vpon the breach, rather as spectators of the worke, then hauing any desire to enter. Strangers speake truly, that wee are but a brunt, and that beeing withstood at the first, wee are easily broken. The quality of the rampiers, the obstinacie of the Citizens, their ancient inclination to the French, ingehders such a familiarity, betwixt the beseegers and beseegeed, as conferring familiarly together, going into the towne of Pisa, and comming out safely as from a friend towne, the soldiars now fall to accusing their Commander of rashnesse, and support the Pisans against their Captaines, so as in stead of assailing them, they them-selues encouraged them to defend and suffer Tarlatin (borne at Castello) to enter the towne with some old soldiars, to receive the command for matters of warre, as hee did euer after, with much honor. This sufferance both of horse and foote, breeds other disorders. They desiring to haue the siege raised, spoiled the victuals that came to the campe: and Beaumonts authority being vnable to stay this insolencie, the Gascons first leaue the armie, in tumultuous manner, and giue example to all the rest of the foote: The Swisses likewise found a retreat, and the horse returne into Lombardy, leauing the Florentines affaires in great confusion and disorder.

The Pisans imbrace the opportunitie, and with one breath take Libresacta, freeing them-selues towards Lucques. And the King complaining, that the Florentines had preferred Beaumont before the Lord of Alegre, would haue sent back his men at armes, to winter about Pisa, that roading vp and downe the Country, they should keepe it, as it were blockt vp, giuing them hope, and promise of a new siege in the Spring. But the Florentines refusing this offer, despairing of any better successe by the French forces, exposed them-selues to the common iniuries of their ill willers the Genouois, Siennois, Luquois, and all others, who desired their ruine. On the other side, the King considering that the Popes vnion with the Emperour would be wonderfull preiudiciall vnto his desseigne for the reuenge of the reuolt at Naples, although he had some reason of discontent against Alexander, who had nothing assisted him during the warres of Milan: yet his Maiesty shewed him-selue alwaies most tractable to second the Popes continuall desseignes, in fauour of the Duke of Valentinois, sending vnto him, (vnder the command of the Lord of Alegre) three hundred Landes, and two thousand foote, accompanied with threatens, To bee reuenged of those that should oppose them-selues against the Popes desseignes, as an iniury done to his owne person. And the Pope likewise promised him both his sonnes person, and his men, when-so-euer hee should recouer Naples. So Borgia (ioyning sixe hundred men at armes, and sixe thousand foote, to the French troupes,) enters Romagna, takes Pefera, Rimini, Brisquelle, and runnes without any resistance throughout all the valley, vntill that Faenza stayed for a time the violence of this streame. He camps before the towne in Nouember, batters it, makes a reasonable breach, and the fift day of the siege, giues a fierce assault, so valiantly defended, as the death of Honore Sauelli, and a great number of his men, slaine at the first charge, forced him to found a retreat, and the snow, falling with an exceeding cold, to raise the siege. The former threats had terrified the Potentates of Italy: and the Kings request vnto them in private, made them abandon Romagna. The Venetians renounced the protection of Peter Astor, Lord of Faenza. John Bentiuole, his vnckle, conteinnes him-selue fearing to incense the King, and the Popes forces; and the Duke of Valentinois, could not endure, that an vn-wailelike people, (hauing no other head but a yong man, of eightene yeares of age) should obscure the fame of his first exploits: he returnes in the beginning of the new yeare, laden with ladders, and seekes to surpris it, but in vaine. Pollicie not succeeding, hee returnes to force, and by the taking of Ruffy, and other places of the country, hee makes the enterprise eatie. A new breach is made, and new assaults giuen: the first without effect, the second gaue hope of victory: but the violence of the Canon which batted in flanke, the incounting of a deepe and large trench, the death of Ferdinand Farneze, with many other men of worth, and the number of the wounded, makes them to leaue the assault. But at length hee carries it. The losse the Florentines had receiued in this assault, and the dispaire of succors, cooled this first heate, and feare making them apprehend hard conditions, if force reduced them into the victors power, they treated to yeeld, their liues and goods saued, vpon condition

Borgia.

A condition that Astor their Lord, should with his liberty choole what retreat he pleased, enioying the reuencues of his patrimony. But poore Astor (oh Borgia who fouer shall read the detestable life and horrible death of thy father, will alwayes iudge thee, a right and worthy sonne of such a father!) being yong and very beautifull, was with goodly shewes and honorable demonstrations of loue retained in the Valentinois Court, and soone after conducted to Rome, where some one (saith the Originall, naming no man, but noting the villaine with his finger) hauing taken his pleasure of him, and glutted his lust, caused him to bee secretly murdered with his bastard brother: and the Pope with the approbation of the Colledge, giues to his sonne Borgia, the inuestiture and title of Duke of Romagna: This estate seemed to him imperfect, with-out the adiunction of the territory of Bolonia. But the Kings expresse commandement, not to attempt any thing against the estate of John Bentiuole (whom he had taken into his protection) caused the Valentinois to content him-selue for that time, with a transaction from Bentiuole, to haue passage and victuals through his country, a tribute of nine thousand Ducats yeerely, a certaine number of horse and foote, and Castel-bologne, (a place vnder the iurisdiction of Bolonia) and so hee transported his forces into Tuscane. Marke here a notable example of a childe to his father. One of the sonnes of Gilbert Earle of Montpensier going to Pozzuolo, to visit the sepulcher of his father, suffred him-selue to bee so much ouer-ruled with passion, as after hee had washed all parts of the monument with his lamentable teares, hee fainted, and fell downe dead vpon the Sepulcher, who had as little sence of those his latest sorrowes, as hee had feeling of so great an error, to giue such liberty to the rage of nature.

a sonne to his

The Florentines are mightily perplexed, they had greatly moued the King by their bad order in the recovery of Pisa, as wee haue heard before, but there springs vp new motives of discontent. The exceeding charge they had beene at, and were still forced to beare for the warres of Pisa; the icalousie of the Popes forces and of his Borgia, made them slack in paying the King the money, which the Duke of Milan had lent them: and the debt which he pretended to bee due vnto him by reason of the pay, made by his maiesty to the Swisses which he had sent against Pisa, whom hee had maintained with his owne money, vpon refusall which the Florentins had made them, vnder colour that they would retire into their Country before their time prefixed: and the King (who sought to empty their cofers, to the end hee might gouerne them more absolutely) demanded it very earnestly. Moreouer they grew more weak by their owne ciuill discords, which troubled them in the popular government, wherein many of the Citizens beeing suspected, either as friends to the Medicis, or desiring an other kinde of gouernment, matters were managed with more confusion then counsell: and to increase their crosses, the King did presse them for the aydes and summes of money promised for the voyage of Naples: pretending; That hee had performed the conuentions they had made together, where-vnto they were bound, seeing that by their owne fault they had hindred the recovery: therefore hee was no more bound to protect them. And in truth Julian de Medicis, beseeching him in person, and at the Popes perswasion, to restore him and his bretheren into their estates, vpon promises of a great summe of money, hee most willingly opened both cares and heart to these offers.

The Floren-

All these considerations drewe the Valentinois into Tuscane, with seauen hundred men at armes, sixe thousand choise foote which Bentiuole gaue him, (the French companies lodging apart, to attend the Kings army which began to march): But hee knew that the King would not bee pleased with this entry in Hostile manner into the Florentines Country, and that otherwise his Army was both weak of men and munition, to force any Towne.

The Florentines also knowing them-selues naked, both of horse and foote, others then of the Country, oppressed with icalousie, feare and diuisions, hee makes this accorde with them: That there should bee a confederacie, betwixt the Common-weale of Florence, and the Duke of Valentinois, with a prohibition not to ayde the rebells on eyther side: and that the Florentines should entertaine him for three yeares at their charge, with three hundred men at armes, and sixe and thirty thousand Ducats yeerely, which men at armes hee should send to them whensoever they had neede, eyther for them-selues, or any other, and should not oppose them.

1501. themselves against him, for the defence of the Lord of Plombin, who was in their protection. A
 But this composition was onely to disarme the Valentinois, and to send him packing. And he well informed of the policie, staying in the same county; spoiled it in reuenge, both by fire, and spoile, most like to an open enemy, tying them with demands, which partly they refused, partly deferred, hoping that the Kings authority should free them from these bonds, which necessity of the time and Borgias force had extorted from them. The King indeed held the rodde, but staied his arme: hee was pleased the Valentinois should terrifie them, but not tyrannize ouer them. For although he would willingly haue seene some other forme of gouernment at Florence, yet an alteration then, would haue bene very preiudiciall vnto him: the King being loth to see the Valentinois aduanced to any other authority, B or by any other forces, then his Maiesties. So, by the commandement of Lewis, hee leaues Florence, and enters the territorie of Plombin, taking Surgeret, Scarline, and the Islands of Elbe and Pianosa, where leauing a sufficient garrison, as well to guard the places, as to molest them of Plombin, he returned towards Rome, to ioyn with the army, that was marching to the conquest of Naples.

Nothing crossed the course thereof, but the alarums which the Emperour had formerly caused. But when one treats with a Prince that is flexible for money, the accord is soone made. The gold of France must now stay the iron of Germany. Philip the Arch-duke might doe much, he was a Prince inclined to peace (and it may be, hee died too soone for the good of France, leauing an heire, whose birth and all the course of his life, hath beepe most fatall to the crowne) and the traffick of his subiects made them loth to heare speake of warre with the French. But that which did most import, the King offered to giue Claude his onely daughter in marriage to Charles, sonne to the sayd Arch-duke, and for a dowry, when they should be both of age, to consummate the marriage (for neither the one, nor the other was yet three yeeres old) to giue the Duchy of Milan. So by the meanes of Philip, and for money, Lewis obtained a prolongation of the truce, in the which the King of Naples was not comprehended, who notwithstanding, by the meanes of forty thousand ducats, and a bond of fiftene thousand more monethly, purchased a promise from Maximilian: Not to make any accord, but to comprehend him in it, and to make warre in the Duchie of Milan, when as need should require, to diuert the Kings forces. There yet remained one scruple, Ferdinand King of Arragon, and of Castile by Isabell his wife, might stirre vp the Venetians, and happily the Pope (both prompt enough to oppose ioyntly against the greatnesse of this crowne.) He was concurrent with our Lewis, in the right of the succession of Naples, for although Alphonso King of Arragon had disposed thereof to Ferdinand his bastard, as his owne proper good, gotten without the rights of the crowne of Arragon: yet Iohn his brother (successor to the Realme of Arragon) and since Ferdinand sonne to Iohn, had alwaies protested of their lawful pretensions to the estate of Naples, as a good, purchased by Alphonso, with the forces, and treasure of Arragon.

And thus Ferdinand King of Arragon temporised like a Spaniard, watching his opportunity, to attempt some great matter for his owne benefit, he did not onely make demonstration of all the duties of a good kinsman to Ferdinand King of Naples, and his other successors, but the better to lull him a sleepe, hee allied himselfe to the said Neapolitain, giuing him his sister Jane in marriage, and consenting that Jane her daughter should marry with young Ferdinand.

This concurrence of two Kings in like desire, caused the one to free himselfe from lets, and crosses, and the other to get a part of that which hee could not compass wholly, and so then to share betwixt them, the conquests of the said Realme, vpon condition: That the King of France should haue the city of Naples, with all belonging to the land of Labour, and the Prouince of Abruzzo: Ferdinand should for his part haue all the lands, and territories belonging to Apulia, and likewise to Calabria, agreeing that euery one should conquer his owne part, without any bond to aide one another, but onely not to hurt one another, and that they should doe homage vnto the Pope, Lewis with the title, no more of King of Sicile, but King of Ierusalem and Naples, imitating the example of Frederick the second, Emperour of Rome, and King of Naples, by his wife the daughter of Iohn, King of Ierusalem (in name but without effect) and of Naples, and Ferdinand in quality of duke of Apulia and Calabria. The

A The capitulation was no sooner concluded, but the King prepared his armie vnder the command of Lewis of Armagnac, Duke of Nemours, sonne to James beheaded at Paris, vnder Lewis the eleuenth, and the Lord of Aubigni, an ancient, wife, and well experienced Captaine.

In the which were Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Pol; brother to Charles Earle of Vendosme, sonnes to Francis of Vendosme, who died at Verceil, Lewis of Bourbon, Prince of Bourbon, afterwards Duke of Bourbon, and Constable of France, Lewis of Bourbon Earle of Montpensier his brother, Gaston of Foix Vicount of Narbonne, the Kings Nephew, sonne to Iohn Vicount of Narbonne, but by reason of their young yeares, obeying B the aboue-named Commanders. The troupes were a thousand Launces, foure men to a Lance, sixe thousand French foote, foure thousand Suiſſes, and the Duke of Valentinois with his forces. The armie at sea, commanded by the Earle of Rauestein, Gouernour of Genoua, consisted of three Caragues of Genoua, and sixteene ships, with many other small vessels, laden with many footmen, so as they esteemed their footmen to be twentie thousand: who by the Popes fauour, and Borgias his sons, passed through all Italy without any resistance.

Fredericke King of Naples, had not yet discovered the secret conuention of the two kings who proceeding plainly, did sollicit Gonsalue (who lay at Anchor in Sicile, vnder colour to succor him) to come to Caiete: and very simply put some places in Calabria into his hands, C as he demanded: but this was but to make the conquest of Ferassands portion the more easie. So hoping (that Gonsalue hauing ioyned with his armie) he should haue sufficient forces to withstand the French, he went and camped at S. Germaine, with 700. men at armes, sixe hundred light horse, and sixe thousand foot, with the troupes which the Colonis brought vnto him, hauing likewise sent his eldest sonne Ferdinand to Tarentum, to commit the Prince of Bisignan, and the Earle of Melete to prison, accused to haue intelligence with the Earle of Caiazzo, who was in the French armie: the which beeing come neere vnto Rome, the Ambassadors of France and Spaine, giue notice vnto the Pope of this diuision made betwixt their masters, with an intent Afterwards (say they) to make warre against the enemies of D Christian religion: and according to the renour of this agreement, they demand a leagar, the which was presently granted. Doubtlesse the more we tecke to shadow and colour an iniustice with goodly shewes, the greater it appeares.

Behold the desseignes of two Kings, discovered and laid open to all the world, and both ioyntly blamed. Ours, for that he had rather draw a corruall into Italy, to whom his enemies and il-willers might see, then to leaue the full possession vnto Fredericke, offering (as we haue said) to bold the Realme of him, and to pay him a yearly tribute. The other, for that, desire to haue a part of the realme, had made him so conspire against a King of his owne blood, whom (the more easily to ruine) he had alwaies entertained with lying promises of succours, blemishing the glorie of that noble title of Catholike King, which hee and his wife Izabell had lately obtained. This league amazed Fredericke, but more the generall mutinie, whereby Saint Germaine and the E neighbour places had rebelled at the brute of the French forces, euen before that Aubigni parted from Rome: so as in stead of keeping the field, as he had pretended, he shutes himselfe vp, meaning to defend his townes. Capoua was the first place of defence that he made choice of, and did fortifie it with three hundred men at armes, some light horse, and three thousand foote, vnder the command of Fabricio Colonne and Rainuccio of Martiane: and leauing Prosper Colonne for the guard of Naples, he lodged in Auerſe. Fabricio had caused the messengers of some Neapolitane Barons of the French faction, to be murdered at Rome, being sent to treat vpon him touching an accord for their masters: and see now, these murderers are reuenged, if not vpon the person, at the least vpon the authours goods. Aubigni in passing, burnes Marine, Caui, and certaine other places belonging to their house: then drawing towards Montfortin, he finds that Iulius Colonne had shamefully abandoned it, leauing by the same meanes, all the other Townes about Capoua, euen vnto Vulturnus, at the Victors discretion.

Rebellion in the state of Naples.

Fredericke aduertised that Aubigni had passed Vulturno, leauing Auerſe, hee retired into Naples. Auerſe, Nola, and other places, yeelding vnto the French, prepared them the way to Capoua.

The lamentable taking of Capua.

The capitulation of Frederike, who of King of Naples is made duke of Aniou.

Gonsalues exploits.

Plombin delivered to the Duke of Valentinois.

Capoua, the which inuested on either side the riuer, and battered fiercely on all parts, endures a hot assault, and repels them with great losse. The canon-shot shakes the strongest walles, and the rough assaults amaze the most resolute, they renew the battery, and all prepares to a second assault. The people mutined, the captaines and souldiers fainted, and Fabrizio Colonne parled from a bastion with the Earle of Caiazzo, when as our men greeted with the first affront, force the breach, ouerthrow the defences, enter it, kill all they meet in the fury, ran some such as they finde after their furie past, and sack the towne. A happy victory, if the horrible insolencie and licentiousnesse of the victors, had not defamed it. Many women, maidens and Nunnes, to auoide this first furie, were retired into a Tower. Borgia would see them, and chose out forty of the fairest, the rest serued as a prey for the souldiers lust, who after sold a part of them at Rome. Fabrizio seeing the towne taken, fled away speedily, but some galloping after, brought him backe prisoner to the campe. Des Hugues of Cardonne, and all the other captaines and men of qualitie, faued their liues by ranfome. Raimacio of Marciane being hurt at the assault, died in the Duke of Valentinois mens hands.

Capoua being lost, it made them loofe all hope euer to defend any place: Caiete yeelds presently, Auerle opens her gates. Naples compounds solenly for three score thousand crownes, payable to the victors. And Frederike beeing shut vp into Castle-Nouo, compounds with Aubigny: To deliuer into his hands within fixe daies, all the townes and forts which were of the Kings portion, only reseruing the Isle of Ischia for six moneths, during the which, it should bee lawfull for him to goe whether hee pleased, but not into the Realme of Naples: To draw what hee would out of the castles of Naples, except the artillery of King Charles, which remained there: that all offences should be pardoned which had bene committed since the first conquest of the Realme by Charles: and that the Cardinals, Collonae, and of Arragon, should enioy the spirituall liuings they possessed within the realme.

Thus Frederike detesting the treachery of the Arragonois, and desiring rather to flieto the Kings protection, he came into France, to accept what his Maiesty should giue him, which was the Duchy of Aniou, with thirty thousand crownes of yeerely pension. An ill aduised resolution, for keeping himselfe in some place of safety, happily hee might during the partialities which shall soone grow betwixt Lewis and Ferdinand haue found meanes to recouer his realme, yet was he happy in his misery, changing a crowne of thornes, a State full of troubles, to a quiet life, and yet honorable: for euen after the French were expelled Naples, hee was still maintained and kept in the same honour, and in the same estate, by the Kings great loue and bounty.

Gonsalues at the same time conquered the portion for his Maister; and although all the country did more affect the French command, yet hauing no man to receiue them in his name, nor to defend them, all the townes did willingly submit themselues vnto him, except Manfredonia and Tarentum, the which after some shew of resistance, did in the end vndergoe the Castillian yoke. Ferdinand, eldest sonne to Frederike, was at Tarentum, with secret commandement from his father, not to come into France, though he should be forced to strike faile. But seeing that both were wholly spoiled of their estates, and that our Lewis did nourish the father, the Castillian might well entertaine the sonne. Gonsalues sends him vnto him, against his sollempne oth taken at the receiuing of the sacrament, To leaue him at his liberty: but some nation preferres the interest of state, before the feare of God and the respect of his owne reputation.

The conquest of Naples, had made the Valentinois returne to his enterprife of Plombin, and James Appian Lord of the towne, hauing manned it with a sufficient garnison, came vnto the King, who long before had taken him into his protection. But whilest hee did sollicite in Court for the preseruatiou of his estate (though without any hope of fauour, by reason of the Kings promises made vnto the Pope, Not to hinder him in his designs) Pandolfo Petruscio deliuered vp the towne to the Valentinois, who by the authority of the Apostolike sea, and the support he had from the King, made it well knowne in Italie, that his excellent couetousnesse had no restraint nor bounds. In the meane time, the King treats a peace with the Emperour very effectually. Many reasons moued him therevnto: the desire to obtaine the possession of Milan: to offend the Venetians, who (the prosperity of this realme being

A being very offensive vnto them) did vnder-hand hinder the conclusion of this peace, and to recouer Cremona with Guaradadda, at the great instance of the Milanois, with Brescia, Bergamo and Crema, the antient appurtenances of the Duchy of Milan, and vlturbed by the Venetians, in the time of Philip Maria Visconti.

For this treaty the Cardinall of Amboise, Lieutenant generall for his Maiesty at Milan, went to the Emperour to Trent, where first they treated of the marriage of Charles the eldest sonne to the Arch-duke Philip, with Claude, the onely daughter of Lewis, the Emperour granting to either of them, the inuestiture of Milan, but not to the Kings heires males, in case he had any: to recouer whatsoeuer either of them pretended to haue bene vsurped by the Venetians: to call a generall Councell to reforme the church, not onely (say they) in the members, but euen in the head. Doubtlesse there is small assurance in the loue of princes, who gape after nothing but their owne greatnesse. Moreouer did wee euer see any thing succeed well with them; who haue coloured their passions with the name of the Church, and the reformation thereof? This is directly, to take the name of God in vaine: And likewise all the malicious practises and schoole-tricks of a Cardinall (whose ambitious spirit gaped after a Popedome) what could they bring forth but smoke for France, and combustion for Italy? Truly the reading of Histories doth teach vs, That the politike gouernment of Priests, is unfortunate and fatal.

This Treaty, hauing onely in shew made way for a peace, was ended with a prolongation of a truce, giuing hope that these things treated on, should soone take effect. And this opinion was confirmed by the comming of the Arch-duke Philip, with his wife (daughter to Ferdinand King of Arragon, and Isabell Queene of Castile) who as appointed to the succession, meaning to goe and receiue the oth of fidelity of their subiects, they passed through Paris the five and twentieth day of Nouember, and from thence to Blois, where the King and Queene remained: and there they concluded the marriage of their children, but man purposeth, and God disposeth.

For with the new yeere, the Emperour brought forth new designs, refusing flatly the inuestiture of the Duchy of Milan to the king, & treating with the Potentats of Italy touching his passage to Rome, to receiue the Imperial crowne, he found the Florentins tractable to the articles which he propounded, considering the hard conditions the King demanded, seeming to be wholly estranged from them, saying, that hee was acquit of the articles accorded at Milan; and they remained still bound. Thus Hermes Sforce Ambassador for Maximilian at Florence, had obtained a promise of the common-weale, to aide him in his voyage with a hundred men at armes, and thirty thousand ducats, when as he should be entred into Italy. But the King fearing least the Florentins dispairing of his loue, should make some accord with Maximilian, in the end he made a new agreement with them, vpon mille conditions: That the King (receiuing them againe into his protection) should defende them against all men, with his owne force and charge for three yeeres following, during the which they should pay vnto his Maiesty forty thousand Ducats yeerely, and it should bee lawfull for the Florentins, to proceed by force against the Pisans, or against any other that with-held their places. The Pisans are againe abandoned to the spoile, and the Florentines resolu'd to vanquish by a generall waste (the fore-runner of famine) that place which they had in vaine tried to subdue by the sword. This passed in Tuscane, when as no man perceiued what followed these garboiles.

But two Nations of such contrary humours, could they liue so neere neighbours, but some seedes of dislike should bring forth fruites of diuision? There sodainly growes great controuersies betwixt our French and the Castillians for their confines. And why doe wee not vse a graue deliberation in our contracts, to make them so strong as nothing may infringe them? Alphonso of Arragon King of Naples, the first of that name, had (to make collection of his reuenues the more easie) diuided the Realme of Naples into fixe principall Prouinces, the Land of Labour, the Principality, Basilicate, Calabria, Apulia, and Abruzzo, whereof Apulia was sub-diuided into three parts: the land of Otrante, Bari, and the Capitanate ioyning to Abruzzo, and separated from the rest of Apulia by the riuer of Lofante, (otherwise called Laufade.) Seeing then that in the diuision, Abruzzo was fallen to the French, had they not reason to dispute the possession, the said Capitanate being

1502. being rather a portion of Abruzzo, then of Apulia? and the matter of greatest importance A was, that not inioying Capitanate they lost the reuenew growing of the custome of cattale, being one of the cleereft reuenews of the realme.

Moreover Capitanate is a corne country, and might easily in a time of dearth famish the land of Labour and Abruzzo, whensoever the Spaniards should forbid the trafficke of grain from Apulia and Sicilia. Hereupon either part drew what hee could out of the reuenews of this custome, feeding still their contentions with new motiues. The Spaniards maintained, that the Principality and Basilicate were comprehended in Calabria, which is diuided into two, the hether & the farther, one high and the other low, & that the vally of Beneuent possessed by the French, was a portion of Apulia. And therefore Gonsalue chafeth the French Magistrats out of Tripald, & sent others to administer Iustice vnder the command, & authority of Ferdinand. All things tended to open diuision. But let vs not flatter our selues. Was it not reason, that they which had deuoured others, should afterwards consume themselves? The chiefe Barons of the country, desiring to quench these first fire-brands of discord, did mediate an interview betwixt the viceroy Nemours, and Gonsalue, who agreed to enioy those places in common, that were in controuersie, and in the meane time set vp the banners of the two Kings, expecting what they should determine.

of Gonsalue.

The viceroy was hot and vehement, and could not endure a brauadoe. Gonsalue (of whom the Spanish and Italian Authors make no lesse account, then of a Furius Camillus, a P. Scipio, or a C. Caesar) had doubtlesse goodly parts of a capitaine. Braue in armes, vigilant, industrious, patient in trauell, stately, prodigally, liberall, not voluptuous, a man of a strong and vigorous complexion. He sometimes by liberality, sometimes by sufferance, gaue liberty to his souldiers, then againe would restraine their insolency imperiously, within the bounds of duty, he loued and honoured men of valour, and very ingeniously did fit himselfe to occurrents, iudging of things to come, with a good naturall discourse, by the comparison of the present, and what was passed, neuer grounding his designs vpon any vncertainty. But all these goodly vertues were blemished with a perpetual dissimulation and treachery, no feare of God, no loyaltie where he felt any profit, being accustomed to say, That a braue souldier must grossly weaue the web of his honor.

His vices.

As Gonsalue then (following the instructions and letters of Ferdinand, who already in D imagination had deuoured the whole Realme of Naples) had sowed the seeds of warre on all sides, the viceroy protests by a publike declaration, that hee will make warre against Gonsalue, if hee speedily depart not out of the Capitanate. And seeing the King of Spaine resolved not to leaue the possession, hee enters Tripalde by force, the nineteenth of Iune, and consequently the other townes which Gonsalue held in that country. They are now imbarked in warre, and the King is at Lions, to prouide necessary things more commodiously to crosse the vniust practises of his aduersary. Vpon this designe hee sends two thousand Suisses by sea to supply his men, and entertaines the Princes of Salerne and Bisignan, with an intent to passe into Italy, if need required.

New broiles in Italy.

Lewis succours
the Florentins.

The new tumults which Vitelloze (impatient of the death of his brother Paul Vitelli, be- E headed at Florence as we haue said) did raise in Tuscane, drew him thither. They begun by the reuolt of Aretzo, against the Florentins, at the perswasion of the said Vitelloze, of the Vrsins, John Paul Baillon, Pandolfe Petrucci and others which desired the returne of Peter of Medicis, into the state of Florence. The Florentins protecting themselves with their new league with the King, flie to him, accuse the Pope and the Duke of Valentinois, to bee the Authors of these stirres: sound forth the imminent danger of the Duchy of Milan, if the a- boue-named (vnited and coniuired to ruine their estate) reduce it into their power.

The King had beene long tyred with the insolency, and ambition of the Pope and his sonne. He did fore-see, that the treaties of accord being broken with Maximilian, the Venetians would soone crosse him, and that hauing open warre with the Spaniard, the inuading of Tuscane, done by the secret practises of others, would proue very preiudiciall vnto him. And therefore he sent foure hundred lances to succor the Florentins, with commandment to Vitelloze and his adherents: Not to molest those any more whom hee had receiued into his protection, the which he declared to all those that should feare to incurre his indignation. In the meane time the Duke of Valentinois vpon the confusions of Aretzo, went

A went out of Rome with his army, and vnder a false pretext to take Camerin, hauing before (to weaken Gualdobald duke of Vrbin, drawne men and artillery from him) leapes into that Duchy, and takes all his estate without any opposition, except the Rock of Saint Leon, and Maiuole, to the great discontent and amazement of Vitelloze, the Vrsins & Petruccio, who by an others ruine began plainly to discouer their owne. This conquest had made the Valentinois to assaile the Florentins, if the commandment made him from the King, or rather the comming of his maiesty, had not diuerted him. Camerin was the object of his armes. He tooke it, and with a barbarous inhumanity caused Iulio of Varane Lord of the said place to be strangled with his two sonnes. The King arriues at Ast, & Lewis of Tremouille comes into Tuscane with two hundred Lances, three thousand Suisses, and great store of artillery,

B for the recovery of Aretzo in fauor of the Florentins. The Pope with his Borgia, foreseeing that the King (beeing incensed against them, as the chiefe motiues of this warre) would spoile Borgia of Romagna, and other places which hee possessed, and that they were too weak to withstand this storme, they returne to their accustomed practises, imputing the rebellion of Aretzo to Vitelloze and his associats, whom they could not (say they) neither by priuers nor authority diuert from this enterprife. And to pacifie the King, the Valentinois sent word to Vitelloze, that if he did not giue vp Aretzo and other places belonging to the Florentins, hee would cast him out by force. Vitelloze was ready to beare the whole burthen, but by what means? considering the weakenesse of his forces, and that the strongest were ready to reconcile themselves, and to leaue him in the mier: he therefore makes no delay, but consignes Aretzo and the other Florentin townes, which the violence of his forces had put into his power, Mont Saint Souin, Chastillon d'Aratz, Cortone and the rest of Valdichiane: all which were presently by the Kings command restored to the Florentins. The affaires of this world require euery man to shroude himselfe vnder the strongest: The King hath no sooner set footing into Italy, but all the Princes and common-weales (according to their accustomed maner) flie vnto him, some to get pardon, some to maintaine their estates, and all in generall to draw his Maiesties forces against the Pope and his sonne. But doth it not commonly fall out, that what many desire, succeeds but seldom? Their priuate interest and respects, are most commonly contrary to their outward shewes, and desires: So the King, not so much moued by the Popes exact diligence (who by all means and mettages, sought to pacifie him, and to returne againe into fauour) as by the Cardinall of Amboisers perswasion (who to entertaine the Pope in vnion with the King, presumed to scale himselfe a ladder, to mount vnto the popedom, and to aduance some one of his house, to be Cardinall) hee happily followed of two waies the worst, fauouring the Pope, and his followers. The wise reader may iudge thereof by the euent of the history.

An otheralliance betwixt the King and Pope.

True it is, the Emperour was a chiefe motiue to draw our Lewis to this accord. His fingers itched, he could not be quiet: and vnder colour of his passage (which hee did so much affect) to receiue his Imperiall crowne of the pope, he might happily trouble the state of Italy, to the Kings great preiudice, and indeed hee had already ient many horse and foot to Trente, making great offers to the pope in fauour of this passage. Moreover, the King was not ignorant, how vnwillingly the Venetians did see the state of Milan, and the realme of Naples in his hands. Adding thereunto, the Imperious threats which foure Cantons of the Suisses made. That if the King did not yeeld them the rights hee had to Belinzone, and giue them Volterre, Schafouze, with other outrageous demands, they would compound with Maximilian. But to ad more crosses, hee must dispute the conquest of Naples by the sword. All these considerations made our Lewis desirous to entertaine the Popes friendship, whereby Maximilians designs were sodainely disappointed. So the King (hauing more liberty to prouide for the estate of Naples) sent a fresh supply by sea, of two thousand Suisses, and ten thousand French, the which ioyned to the Viceroy, who had already taken all the Capitanate, except Manfredonia & Saint Angelo. They camped before Canose, the which Peter of Nauarre yeelded by composition, to depart with bagge and baggage. The taking of this place, did shut Gonsalue into Barlet, without money, with little victuals, and lesse munition. And the French captaines alledging (against the aduice of the Lord of Aubigni) that the army could not all campe about Barlette, for want of water, and many other reasons, they resolved, a part of the army should remaine thereabouts, to maintaine a kinde

After this counsell, the A Viceroy seized vpon all Apulia, except Tarentum, Otranto, and Gallipoli; and then hee returned to Barlet. The Lord of Aubigni entring Calabria with the other part of the army, tooke and sackt the town of Cosenza, with some other places.

But our prosperity lasts not long, we commonly sleepe in the midst of our course. This happy beginning, made our Lewis more carelesse then the cause required, the which if hee had continued, hee might easily haue expelled the enemy (before hee had bene supplied) out of all the State of Naples: but hee tooke his way for France, after hee had treated a new with the Pope, and received the Valentinois into fauour againe, vpon condition, To aide him in the warres of Naples, when neede should require: and a promise from the King, to give the Valentinois three hundred Lances, to helpe him to conquer Bologna for the Church, B and to suppress the Vrsins, Baillon and Vitellozze, against whom the King was wonderfully incensed for the outrages they had done to the Florentines, and for that they had shewed themselves too slacke in the execution of his Maiesties commandments, especially Vitellozze; who had refused to yeeld the Florentines the artillery which hee had taken from Aretzo.

The Valentinois fearefull to the contentments of Italy.

This reconciliation made the Valentinois fearefull to all Italy. And doubtlesse whosoever is neighbour to a cruell and inexorable man, hath need to stand vpon his gard. Moreover a wicked man hauing so firme and strong supports in the Kings counsell, where the Cardinall of Amboise ruled all, how could hee but daily presume to commit new insolencies? The Venetians were wonderfull ielous of Borgia's greatnesse, increasing daily, shewing the King by their Ambassador, how much it did derogate from the honour of the house of France, and the glorious surname of most Christian King, to fauour a Tyrant borne for the ruine of people, and the desolation of Prouinces, disloyall, cruell, thirsting for humane blood, by whom so many gentlemen, and Noblemen had bene so treacherously slaine: who sometimes by the sword, sometimes by poyson, glutted his crueltie vpon his allies, his kinsmen, his brethren, and vpon them, whose age, euen the barbarous Turkes would haue respected.

But the King did not build so much vpon the Popes friendship, as hee doubted his hatred. Moreover, hee thought (being firmly vnited to him) no man should dare to attempt any thing against the authority of his crowne, in the estates of Milan and Naples. The Kings answer was. That he neither would, nor ought to hinder the Pope, from disposing at his pleasure, of places belonging to the Church. The Venetians therefore, forbearing to C cross the prosperity of the Valentinois, for his Maiesties respect, behold, many small brookes ioyned together, make a streame. The Vrsins, the Duke of Grauine, Vitellozzi, John Paul Basilion, Luierot of Fermo, Hermes, for John Bentiuole his father, Anthony Venefre for the Siennois, with many other heads, make an offensive, and defensive league; by meanes whereof, and by the surprize of the castle of Saint Leon, Guidobald recouered all his Duchie of Vrsin. They goe to field with seuen hundred men at armes, and nine thousand foote, but they displease the King, arming themselves with his authoritie, hoping (it may bee) that hee would not bee discontented to haue the Valentinois molested by another.

The Valentinois flies to the King, and speedily provides for conuenient remedies: first hee pacifieth Cardinall Vrsin, by the meanes of Iulius his brother, and by diuers policies did so cunningly practise, first one, then another of the confederates (confused, & troubled with the Kings succours, which the King gaue commandement to the Lord of Chaumont to send to Borgia, with expresse charge, to countenance his affaires by all meanes) that the first which was taken in the snare, was Paul Vrsin, whom hee held to bee a fit instrument to dispose of his companions, and to draw them innocently into danger. But what did these poore Commanders, capitulating with a wicked wretch, whose sweet words were snares for their death, and who must shortly serue as an instrument of Gods wrath against them. Truly whilest they employ the forces (which they had leuiued to suppress him) in his fauour, for the taking of some places, and that they suffer themselves to be lulled more a sleepe with his goodly shewes, and sweet speeches, he prepares for their ruine. After they had by his commandement taken the towne, and castle of Sinigalle: hee comes 1503. A comes thither the next day, with all his companies in order: he causeth them to be taken prisoners, strips their troupes: and to make the last day of this yeere famous, hee strangles Vitellozze and Luierot of Fermo. The first must follow the miserable course of his house, all his other brethren (and according to the order of their ages) being dead of violent deaths. John was slaine with a cannon before Ofime, vnder Pope Innocent, Camillo with a stone before Circelle. Paul was beheaded at Florence. And Luierot felt in his person, the treason whereby he had in a banket treacherously murdered John Frangiane his vnckle, with many citizens of Fermo, to vsurpe the Seigney thereof.

The violent death of Vitellozze and Luierot.

Now we shall see a yeere full of memorable, and famous accidents, begun with the Popes impiety, and treachery, but hee was ignorant what should presently befall his owne person B and state. Being aduertised of his sonnes exploits at Sinigalle, hee calls the Cardinall of Vrsin to the Vatican: who (trusting in his faith, whom all the world knew to bee faithlesse) was lately come to Rome. Being arriued, he is taken prisoner, and with him Rainold Vrsin Archbishop of Florence, the Protonotarie Vrsin, and the Abbot of Aluiano, brother to Bartholomew, and James of Saint Croix a Romain gentleman, whom some few daies after hee caused to be deliuered vpon a good caution: but the Cardinall ended his daies there by poyson: and the Valentinois hearing that the Cardinall was prisoner, hee caused the duke of Grauine, and Paul Vrsin to be strangled. Then hee approached to Siena, meaning to seize thereon vnder colour to expel Pandolfo Petruccio, as an enemy, and disturber of the quiet of Tuscane, C promising, that when he had chased him, hee would presently returne with all his troupes to Rome, without indomaging their territories.

The notable cruelties of the Valentinois.

The Cardinall poysoned. The Duke of Grauine and Paul Vrsin strangled.

The Sienois thinking it no reason, that the whole city should incur so great danger to maintaine the power of one priuate citizen, and Pandolfo desyring rather to accept that with euery mans good liking, which in the end the peoples hatred and the peril of his person would force him vnto; parted out of Siena, leauing the same gard and the authority with his friends, so as his departure bred no alteration in the gouernment. This enterprize displeased the King, for although hee were not sorry, to see Vitellozze and his adherents punished, yet desired hee not their totall ruine, the which with the conquest of so great estates made the Pope, and his Borgia too mighty. Hee desired therefore from this attempt, not so much to obey the King, as finding the taking of Sienna difficult, being a great D towne and strong: conuerting all his forces to the totall destruction of the house of Vrsins, John, Iulius, Francis, Fabian and Organtin, who hauing ioyned with the Sauelli were in Certuette, had taken the bridge of Lamentane, and scoured all the country.

When he had restrained their courses, hee inuaded the possessions of John Jordan, who was then in the Kings protection and pay, bearing armes for his seruice at Naples. The King was greatly moued herewith, and to controule the presumption, & insolency of the Valentinois, hee commands him to forbear to molest the estate of Jordan, and to restrain his excessive couetousnesse, hee procures an vnion betwixt the Florentines, Sienois & Bolognois for their common defence; to take from the Pope & his son, all means to extend themselves any farther into Tuscane. The Spaniard fortifies himself in the meane time, in the realm of Naples, & our affaires decline. The Earle of Melet, the princes of Salerne & Bisiguan, were incamped at Villanoua, & Don Hugues of Cardone (passing from Messina into Calabria with 1600. foot, Spaniards, Calabrians and Sicilians, and a hundred men at armes) marched to succour it, going through a narrow plaine betwixt a mountaine and a little riuer, ioyning to the way with a causey, desyring rather to enter into Villanoua, then to fight. The Earle incounters them beneath the riuer, and not able to draw them into the plaine, hee passeth the water to cut of their way to Villanoua, and to charge them. But very indiscreetly, for being troubled with the causey, they were easily defeated & the towne releued. And behold Manuel of Beauuaide (hauing Anthony de Lenz with him, who of a simple soldiary became a braue captain, and shall win many victories) leading two hundred men at armes, two hundred Genetaires, and two thousand foote, takes Losarne at the second assault, where the Lord of Ambricourt was lately entred with thirty lances, and the Earle of Melete with 1000. foote. Ambricourt was taken, but the Lord of Aubigni, approaching with three hundred lances and five thousand foote, forced the victors to retire to Villanoua, and gaue the Earle means to saue himselfe and to keepe the castle. Aubigni following them in the tayle to the foote of a high mountaine, cut off three score men at armes and some thousand foote, with 13. hundred prisoners, taking 15. Ensignes. But this was with the death of Grigni, a braue captaine, who led the company of the Earle of Caiazzo, being dead of sicknesse a litle after the taking of Capoua. At the same time Porta Carrea brought two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse, and two thousand foote, who dying at Rhegium, left the command of his troupes to Ferdinand Andrada his Lieutenant.

Few daies after, Gonsalue departing from Barlette, set vpon the Lord of Palisse who lodged in Rubos, with a hundred Lances, and three hundred foote, as securely as in an assured peace, and hauing surprisid him sodenly, battred it furiously and made a breach: hee forced him to yeeld the place, and to remaine prisoner with his troupe, and then hee retired safely to Barlette, notwithstanding the duke of Nemours companies lodged for their ease in diuers places about Barlette, whilest Gonsalue endured (with an admirable patience) both hunger and pestilence, within the same city. Moreouer fifty French Lances sent to surprisid some money, which was brought from Trani to Barlette, were defeated by such as Gonsalue had sent for the conduct thereof. All these petty losses were without doubt fore-tellings of a change of our good fortune. But what need was there in the beginning of this so visible a Catastrophe, to hazard a fruitlesse combate, for falling to our disadvantage, it must needs greatly diminish our reputation, and make the whole nation to bee scorned although the honor and valour of a whole country consists not in the combate of a few priuate persons? A trumpet returning from Barlette (where hee had treated of the ranfome of some prisoners) reports some speeches which hee had heard to the preiudice of the French: who ofended therewith, they desie the Spaniards and Italians. Thirteene French, make offer to fight with thirteene of theirs. The field was chosen betwixt Barlette, Andrie and Quadrate. It chanced that hauing broken their lances, with no aduantage to either party; falling to their other armes, a Frenchman ouerthrew an Italian, and aduancing to kill him, hee himselfe was slaine by an other Italian that came to rescue his companion. In the end, after a rough and bloody fight of some houres, the Italians (hauing slaine many of the Frenchmens horses) remained maisters of the field and bodies, leading their enemies prisoners to Barlette.

Troubles by the Suisses.

Whilest a State stands firme, euery one feares to attempt against it, but vpon the first disfauour euery one seekes to pull a plume. Some Cantons of the Suisses seeke to fish in a troubled water, and to obtaine by force, what they could not get by fauour: which was the case of Bellinzzone, the which they had surprisid in Lombardy. To this end they come before Locame, camping towards the wall, vpon that great Lake which stops the descent from the mountaines into the plaine: and the other Cantons seeing the enterprise succeed well in fauour of the first assailants, runne to aide their companions, to the number of fiftene thousand. These were too many mouthes in a straight and barren country, whose fury must soone faint, for want of artillery, victuals, money and horse. The Lord of Chaumont did wisely fore-see all this, who furnishing his castles vpon the mountaines, and keeping his troupes in the plaine, kept this great swarme from comming into open places, whilest that hee assembled all the forces of Lombardie, and the allies of Bologna, Ferrara and Mantoua. The Venetians (being required to send the succors which they were bound vnto for the defence of the State of Milan) sent some companies, but so late as they were vnprofitable. Thus the Suisses wanting victuals, the French hauing sonke many barkes which brought them prouision vpon the Lake, and the Suisses themselues beginning to bee diuided, for that the whole gaine of their armes redounded to them alone that possessed Bellinzzone, they retyned in the end, vpon condition to deliuer what they had taken of the Kings, except Musocque, as not belonging to the Duchy of Milan, and Bellinzzone at a certaine time.

A counterfeit peace with the Spaniard.

Thus ended this great shew, and Philip Arch-duke of Austria, returning from his voyage, armed with authority from his father in Law, and mother in lawe, to make a peace with the King, it was concluded at Blois: That the Realme of Naples should bee inroyed according to the first diuision; but Philip should keepe those Prouinces, for the which they had taken armes. That from that day, Charls his son, & Claude the Kings daughter, should inrite themselues Kings of Naples, and dukes of Apulia and Calabria: and both the Kings portions should be gouerned 1503.

A gouerned in the name of the two children, untill the consummation of the marriage: when as the King should giue his part for his daughters dowrie. This peace was of a happie consequence. Armes were laid aside betwixt two mightie Kings. It bred loue betwixt the Emperour and our Lewis, and new disignes against the Venetians, whom the King desired to annoy: and it may be, the Pope (beeing hated of all the world) had beene forced to vndergo a Councell, a matter which he feared exceedingly. Doubtlesse there is alwaies an Antipathy betwixt bad Popes and good Councells. But this peace was but counterfeit by the Spaniards: yet it seemes not that Philip proceeded therein like a Foxe, considering his quiet spirit, and the alliance he made with this crowne. Lewis and Philip sent presently to proclaime it at Naples, and to command the Captaines: That attending the King of Spaines ratification, and holding what they did possesse, they should abstaine from all acts of hostilitie. The Vice-roy surcealeth: but Gonsalue had his watch-word, how else durst he disobey Philip? Gonsalue answereth, That until he had received commandement from his King and Queene, he might not lay downe armes. He grew the prouder, for that the King trusting in this peace, had neglected things necessary for warres, and kept backe three thousand foote which should haue beene imbarked at Genoua, and three hundred Lances leauied to that end, vnder the Lord of Persi: contrariwise, Gonsalue was newly re-enforced by two thousand Lansquenets, which the Venetians (against the articles of their accord made with the King) had suffered safely to passe by their gulph. The Vice-roy (fore-seeing that he must stand vpon his guard) sends for all the French companies which he had disperfed into diuers parts, and the forces of the countrie, except those which made warre in Calabria vnder Aubigni, but in the assembling thereof, he gaue the first blow to the ruine of the French in the Realme of Naples. The Duke of Attri and Lewis of Ars a French Captaine were ioyned together to go vnto the Vice-roy, knowing well that Peter of Nauarre was so lodged, as he might indammage them beeing diuided. Lewis of Ars finding his oportunitie, passed without attending his companion, and the Duke aduertised that the Nauarrois had taken the way of Matera, to ioine with Gonsalue: followed the tracke of Lewis of Ars. But it chanced at the same time that Rutiliane, (a towne in the Countrie of Bari) beeing reuolted, had called backe the Nauarrois, who beeing vpon this occasion turned from Matera to Rutiliane, incountred the Duke of Attri, charged him, and defeated him, John Anthonie his vnle beeing slaine, and himselfe prisoner.

And to increase these mischiefs, Pretian Prouencal a Knight of Rhodes, was come into the haue of Otranto with foure French Gallies, with promise from the Venetian Magistrate, not to suffer them to be molested by the Spanish fleet, which houered neere-about: who entring soone after into the same port, Pretian (to the end his losse should not benefite the enemies) freed his Galley-slaues, sinkes his Gallies, and saues himselfe by land with his people: another iniurie which shall greatly incense our Lewis against the Venetians. Hereafter all things fall out opposite for our men: but see, their violent heate makes them runne headlong to their totall ruine: Calabria is the meanes. They had commandement from the King to temporize, and onely to keepe themselues from surprize, expecting either a confirmation of the peace, or some greater succours. But what meanes is there to temper the furious courage of the French, the enemies lying so neere them? Manuel of Benaude hauing repaired his armie, and fortified it with five thousand men which Ferdinand had sent him, was ioyned vnto John of Cardone, and the two armies approched within a League and a halfe. Aubigni within Gioie, the Spaniards at Seminare. Aubigni was fortified with foure peeces of Cannon, vpon the riuier side, whereas Gioie is seated to hinder the enemies passage: the Spaniards beeing resolute to passe, they caused their fore-ward (led by Manuel Benaude) to march on directly to the riuier to intertaine Aubigni, who was planted on the other side, vnder colour of some parle, whilest the batteile and the reere-ward passed a mile and a halfe aboute Gioie. Aubigni discouering this cunning stratageme, flies thither in great hast without any artillerie, to charge them before they were all passed, but it was too late. All marched in order of batteile, to withstand our French running thither without order, and almost out of breath. The charge was furious, and the issue doubtfull, fighting with great obstinacie, and no man seemed desirous to turne his backe. Doubtlesse the full decision of controuerfies approched to the confusion of our men: who beeing the smaller number, and hauing lost many in this obstinate incounter, they were in the end forced to giue

1503. giue way to the Spanish horſe, and euery man to ſeeke for his ſafety, as he could. Ambrico A was againe taken priſoner, and ſome other French Captaines, with the Duke of Somme and many Barons of the realme. Arbigni ſaued himſelfe in the fort of Angirole, but being preſently inueſted and vnſupplied of ſuccors, and defence, he was forced to yeeld himſelfe priſoner. Such is the alteration of the affaires of this world. This Noble and valiant Captaine, had but few yeares before, defeated Ferdinand Gonſalue, in the ſame place: and now by a ſtrange alteration, he is charged, defeated, and a priſoner. Moreouer, that the ende of a miſfortune in Calabria, might be the beginning of another in Apulia, Gonſalue being forced by famine, and peſtilence, to abandon Barlette, and to retire to Cirignole, a towne betwixt Conoſe (where the Viceroy remained) and Barlette: the Viceroy (foreſeeing that Gonſalue B puſt vp with this firſt ſucceſſe, would attempt ſome higher enterpriſes) hee calls vnto the Lords of Ars, Alegre, Paliffe, Chandion, Traian Carraciale, and other Commanders. And as he propounded vnto them on the one ſide the enemies forces, growne glorious by many notable victories, and now preſenting themſelues to make triall of a new battaile, on the other ſide, their owne weake troupes diminished and daunted by reaſon of the former diſgraces, aſking their aduiſe, whether they ſhould accept, or fly the hazard of a battaile: many were of opinion to referre it vntill the next day, ſeeing there remained ſcarſe an houre: when Alegre (in a manner alone among many) blamed the feare and cowardice of ſuch as ſought delaies. Then the Viceroy ſaid. For my part, I am ready to fight, but I feare this brave counſellor will reſoſe more truſt in his courſers legges, then in the valour of his arme, when it ſhall be needfull to fight: foretelling the iſſue of the fight, and the flight of Alegre. He therefore puts his men in battaile, and leades the foreward, with Captaine Ars, the battaile he giues to Chandion, and the reerward to Alegre.

It is a friuolous ceremony to call a counſell, and conteme good aduiſe, preferring opinions that doe but reſemble the truth. And what reaſon had our men ſo farre from ſuccors, hauing ſo many enemies in front, to hazard all vpon a ſhew of valour? Seeing the diſcomodity of the way, being barren of water, and the exceeding heate beyond the ordinary of the moneth of May, required reſt. But man cannot auoyd his fortune, when it approacheth hee runnes after it. The Duke of Nemours takes the way to Cirignole, ſending ſome troupes before to ſeaze vpon the place: but the Spaniards being arriued firſt, lodged in certaine vineyards, and intrenched their lodging with a large ditch. The French arriuing, (not able to iudge, whether thoſe they did ſee before them, were all, or a part of the Spaniſh army, for that the light horſe led by Fabrizio Colonne, the Lances of the men at armes, and the ſenell ſtalkes, which were very high in the country, tooke from them all knowledge:) did aſſaile the enemy with great fury. But the ſmoke, and duſt which the Spaniſh Canon raiſed in the aire, blinded our men, who could not come to handy-blowes, by reaſon of the enemies trench. The Viceroy ſeeing to force them by another way, is ſlaine with a harguebus, extinguishing in him the name and family of the Earles of Armagnac, and daunting the courage of the whole army: the which by the death of their Commaunder preſently fled, (being fauoured by the approaching night, whoſe darknes couered their retreat) preferring ſome from death, E and others from priſon.

Chandion (otherwiſe called Chandenier, a Gentleman of Poiſtou, neere vnto Niort) was likewiſe ſlaine, fighting at the ſame ditch: a' Ars ſeeing the moſt part of his men ſlaine, and that Alegre had fulfilled the Viceroy's prediction, curſing the wilfulneſſe of the man, who by his contumacy, at an vnſeaſonable time, had made a ſhamefull breach in the honour of the French nation, and diuerted the Viceroy from the true meanes to make warre: in the end he ſaues himſelfe in Venouſe. Alegre running vp and downe, gathers vp the peeces of this ſhip-wrake, with the Prince of Salerne, and many Barons of the country, whileſt that Gonſalue, following his good fortune, tooke his way to Naples: at whoſe approach the French ſhut themſelues vp into the new Caſtle: and the Neapolitaines the fourteenth of May, F receiued Gonſalue, vpon condition to maintaine them in their rights, and priuileges. Auerſe and Capoua were as light in their change.

But what vrgent neceſſity thruſt our men to this hazard? They had ſtrong places inough to maintaine themſelues ſoure or five moneths, during the which either ſome notable ſuccours, or the approaching winter, might breed ſome alteration. Out of doubt the impaciency of

A of the French, (who cannot temporize) was the cauſe of this laſt loſſe of the realme of Naples, rather than any neceſſity that forced them: yet Lewis of Armagnac had equalled the reputation of the braueſt Captaines that had beene long before him. When as good commanders haue managed an vnfortunate warre, we muſt iudge modeſtly of the iſſue of humane forces, and confeſſe that they haue done their duties: that others might haue incurred the like difficulties: and raiſe our conſiderations higher, to him that placeth, and displaceth Kings from their thrones, as it beſt pleaſeth his diuine providence. The King reſolued to ſend two mighty armies, one by ſea and another by land, to ſaue the caſtles of Naples, Caiete and ſome other places, which yet held good: and to inuade Spaine with two other armies: the one in the county of Rouſſillon, which ioynes to the Mediterranean ſea, the B other towards Fontarabie, and other places lying vpon the Ocean: and at the ſame inſtant with an army at ſea to inuade the coaſts of Catalognia and Valencia. But whileſt theſe were preparing, Gonſalue battered the Cittadell, and Peter of Nauarre made a mine, where hauing giuen fire, the violence of the powder made a breach, by the which the Spaniards (attending in battaile the iſſue of this ſtratagem) enter ſome by the breach of the wall, ſome by ſcalado. On the other ſide the French iſſuing out of the new Caſtle, to expell them the Cittadell, the Spaniards turne head, and repulſing our men towards the raelin, they enter pell-mell with them: and aduancing with the ſame fury to the gate, they force the French to yeeld them the Caſtell. Very happily for the enemy, for the next day there arriued from C Genoua, to ſuccour them, ſixe great ſhips and many other barks, laden with victuall, armes, munition, and two thouſand foote. But this was phyſicke after death, and the worke being ended, this army retyres towards Caiete. The Caſtle de l'Ouo was taken by the like myne.

The French enioyed Caiete yet, with other places thereabouts, and in Abruzzo, Aquila, the rocke of Euander, Roſſane, Matalone, with many other places belonging to the Barons of the Angeuin faction: and Lewis of Ars, being with the Prince of Melſi (worthy doubtleſſe of our hiſtory, ſeeing that Gonſalue hauing offered to leaue him his ſtate abſolute, if he would ioine with the Spaniſh faction, he choſe rather to depart with his wife and children) being fortified in Venouſe, hauing ſurpriſed and vanquiſhed Valentine Benauide with ſome Spaniſh troupes, he annoied the whole country. The conſclusion of this warre conſiſted in the D keeping, or loſſe of Caiete: hauing a very conuenient haven for ſhips that came from Genoua or Prouence. Gonſalue therefore bends his forces thither. But Alegre hauing drawne forth ſoure hundred Lances and ſoure thouſand foote, preferred at the battell, the which he had lodged in Fondi, Iſtri, Tracette, the fort Guillaume and elſe where, enters into Caiete; abandoning the other places to the victors diſcretion, to ſaue that which did moſt import: who hauing battered the wall, made a breach, and receiued great loſſe at two aſſaults, hauing intelligence of the arriual of the Marquis of Saluce (made Viceroy by the King in the Duke of Nemours place) with ſixe great Genoa Carackes, ſixe other ſhips and ſeaſen Gallies, followed by others, carrying a thouſand foote of the Ile of Croſica, and three thouſand Gallions, he retires his men to Naples, well diminished with ſkirmiſhes, aſſaults, and with his retreat, amongſt others of Sancho Armentel, Alphonſo Lopes, Iohn Liſteſtan a Germaine: E but about all Gonſalue grieved for Dom Hugues of Cardone and Rodericke Maurique ſlaine with a cannon ſhot. Theſe ſmall good haps were crowned by taking of the fort of Euander, Aquila and all other palces of Abruzzo, the which drew all Calabria to the Spaniſh obedience. The King in the meane time ſent ſeaſen thouſand foote, and eight hundred men at armes, commanded with the title of generall, by the Lord of Tremouille (who then by common conſent was held one of the chiefe for martiall affaires: but ſurpriſed by ſickenſſe at Parma, he gaue the charge thereof to Francis of Gonzague Marquis of Mantoua) and eight thouſand Swiſſes, to the which the Florentines did ad. hundred Lances: the Duke of Ferrara, the Bolognois and Gonzagua a hundred men at armes, and the Siennes a hundred more: the which being ioyned with thoſe troupes that were in Caiete, made about the number of a thouſand eight hundred lances, French and Italian, and a bowe eightene thouſand foote, beſides the army at ſea, wherein were great forces. For the paſſage of this army by land, the King deſired to bee ſatiſfied of the Popes intention, and of the Valentinois; for the Pope (who made an ordinary trafficke of other mens loſſe and calamity) ſignified, that as a common father (ſayd he) to both parties, hee would remaine a newter, ſuffering either either of them to leaue troupes indifferently in the territories of the Church, hee granted A a free passage to the said armie. And the Valentinois offered the King to ioyne vnto his armie fue hundred men at armes, and two thousand foote, but some letters intercepted from the Valentinois to Gonsalve, discovered the very bottome of his thoughts, capitulating, that Gonsalve hauing taken Caiete, and consequently all the realme of Naples, the Valentinois should seaze vpon Pisa, and then ioyning their forces they should inuade Tuscanie. But as the Pope and his Borgia would serue two masters, and the King pressing them vehemently to declare their minds plainly, behold a strange Catastrophe of the Popes Tragedie. The Pope and Borgia had before-time poysoned the Cardinals of Saint Angelo, of Capoua, of Modena, Vrlin, and many other rich men, whom commonly by their death they disrobed of their goods. They had likewise sworne the death of Adrian Cardinall of Cornete. They B were to suppe coolely in an arbour in a garden belonging vnto Adrian: and for the effecting of their desaigne, the Valentinois had sent before some flagons of poysoned wine, whereof he gaue the charge to a groomme that was ignorant of the businesse, with expresse commandement, that no man should touch them. It chanced that the Pope comming before the cloth was layed, distempered with heate and thirst, called for wine.

The taster, thinking this flagon had beene especially recommended for the Popes owne mouth and his sonnes, filled of this wine to the Pope; And as he was drinking, the Duke of Valentinois comes, to whom (becing desirous to drinke) they gaue of the same flagon. Thus Pope Alexander the sixt, died the next day, the 18. of August: whose immoderate ambition, C vn-restrained arrogancie, detestable trecherie, horrible crueltie, vn-measurable couetousnes, selling both holy and profane things, had infected all the world, verifying in his person That the wicked man labours to bring forth out-rage, but he shall bring forth that which shall decease him: he hath made a pit, and is fallen into it. And, The eternall God searcheth out murders and remembers them. The Valentinois, through the vigour of his youth, and speedie counter-poysons, (becing put into the belly of a moyle newly killed) prolonged his daies, to seele many deaths in his soule not dying so soone.

Hee had often fore-seene all accidents that might happe vnto him by the death of his father, and provided remedies for them all: but he reckened without his host, not supposing to see his father dead, and himselfe at the same instant in extreame danger of death. And D whereas he did alwaies presume after his fathers decease, partly by the feare of his forces, partly with the fauour of the Spanish Cardinals, which were eleuen, to cause a Pope to be chosen at his pleasure, he is now forced to apply his Councils, to the present necessitie. And imagining, that he should hardly at one instant withstand the hatred of the *Colonna*is and Vrsins, if they were ioyntly banded against him: he resolved to trust them rather whome hee had onely wronged in their estates. So restoring to them their lands and possessions, he presently reconciles himselfe with the *Colonna*is, and others of their faction, who by the com-ming of Prosper Colonne to Rome, had already filled al the cittie with ieaiousies and tumults: some fearing lest this reconciliation should draw the Valentinois to the Spanish partie: others apprehending the comming of the French armie. Moreouer, the Vrsins assembled all E their partisans, and thirsting after the Valentinois blood, sought to reuenge the outrages which all their family had sustained. So as in hatred of the deceased Pope and his sonne, they burne the shoppes, and houses of some Spanish Merchants and Couriers at Mont-Jordan.
All the other Barons in the dominions of the Church, by their meanes, returne to their lands and goods.

The Fiscell returne to Citta de Castello. Iohn Paul Baillon chased from before Perugia at the first seege, returns, and by a furious assault takes it. The towne of Plombin receiues her first Lord. The Duke of Vrbino, the Lord of Pelere, Camerin, and Sinigalle are re-established in their possessions. The Venetians assemble many men at Rauenna, and giue cause of suspect to inuade Romagna, which onely remained vnder the Valentinois command, desiring rather to serue one onely and a mightie Lord, then to haue a particular Lord in every F Towne. Notwithstanding all these disgraces, yet both the French and the Spaniard made great instance, to intertaine him, or to winne him to their partie: the French, for that hee might (becing armed) crosse their passage into Italy, if he discovered himselfe in fauour of the Spaniard, and molest them in the estate of Naples: the Spaniard, for they desired to make vfc

A vic of his forces, and to get (by his meanes) the suffrages of the Spanish Cardinals for the election of a future Pope. But the French armie approached Rome, and the King might hurt or helpe him more then the Spaniard, both within Rome, and his other Estates. He therefore passed this accord the first of September, the Cardinall of Saint Senerin and the Lord of Trans, Ambassador, vndertaking for the King, To aide the King with his forces in the warre of Naples, and in any other enterprise against all men, except the Church. And the said Agents bound his maiestie, as well to protect the person of the Valentinois, as all the Estates which hee possessed, and to aide him to recouer those which he had lost.

The Cardinall of Amboise vpon the first newes of Alexanders death, postes thither, to labour for the Popedom, building chiefly vpon Cardinall Ascanus promises: whome two B years before he had drawne out of the Tower of Bourges. But so many ambitious braines, fraught rather with diuisions and partialities, euery one for his owne priuate interest, then assisted with the holy spirit, to whome notwithstanding they giue the first voice of their election, did in the end frustrate both the French and Spaniard, to install Francis Piccolomini, Cardinall of Sienna, beeing old, worne, and sickly: to the which the whole Colledge agreed both for that this neutrall election might disperse the diuers pourtuits of the pretending nations: as also, for that the new Popes infirmitie gaue them hope to proceed shortly to the subrogation of another. To reuiue the memorie of Pius the second his vncke, who had made him Cardinall, he was called Pius the third.

Pius the third chosen Pope.

C Yet this election did not pacifie the troubles within Rome. The Valentinois and the Vr- sins beeing within the walles, fortific in themselves daily with new companies, resolved to obtaine by force, the Iustice which their reasonable demands could not get of the Colledge of Cardinals, when as their partisans should be arriued. This contention did greatly trouble both the Court and the people of Rome, and did mightily preiudice the French affaires: for this vehement affection, wherewith they see the Valentinois supported by France, drew the Vrsins to the Spaniards pay, whose forces were of no small consequence for an absolute vi-ctorie. But the desire the Venetians had to see the King dis-appointed of the Realme of Naples, and the libertie they gaue the Vrsins to leaue their pay, made the world to iudge, that either they had perswaded this family to the Spanish partie, or at the least they had consen-D ted thereunto. And this was another cause of discontent, to be reuenged of them in time.

The Vrsins beeing intertaind by the Spaniard, and reconciled with the *Colonna*is, by the mediation of the Ambassadors of Spaine and Venice, and ioyntly resolved for a common revenge vpon the Valentinois, they fall vpon his troupes in the suburbs: the which (becing vnable to withstand so furious a charge) were forced to giue way vnto their violence, and the Commander to saue himselfe in the castle S. Angelo, hauing likewise with the Popes consent taken the Captaines oath, to depart when he pleased. The tumult beeing thus pacified, it gaue them free libertie to attend a new election: for Pius nothing deceiuing their conceiued hope, of his short Popedom, died the 26. day after his creation. But alas! Alex- ander had serued but as a scourge for that great Iudge; but now he takes his rodde in hand, to E breake Italy in peeces. The Cardinall Saint Pietro, mightie in friends, in reputation and in wealth, was chosen, the last of October, and named Iulius the second: by nature factious, and terrible, vnquiet and turbulent: but stately, a great defender of the liberties of the Church, and a most franke receiuer of the loue and fauour of all those that might aduance him to this dignitie.

The Vrsins &
*Colonna*is reconciled, handle against the Valentinois.Iulius the 2.
chosen Pope.

The Valentinois flight to the castell of Saint Angelo, and the dispersing of all the troupes he had with him, made the Townes of Romagna (which had till then continued constant and firme in his obedience) to call home their ancient Lords, or to imbrace sundry parties.
And the Venetians, good fishermen in a troubled water, aspiring to the command of al Romagna, had seized vpon the castles of the vally of Lamone, of the towne of Forlimpoppe, F of Rimini, Faenza, Montefiore, S. Archangelo, Verruque, Gattere, Sauvignagne, Meldole, and in the territorie of Imola, Tossignagne, Solaruolo, Montbataille, and had easily seized vpon Imola and Furl, if by the new Popes complaints, (whom they had strangely discontented) they had not put their men into garrison. The Venetian vsurpations did wonderfully displease Iulius: but what could he doe, beeing newly aduanced to the chaire, vnprovided of forces, of money, or of any hope of succours from the Kings of France and Spaine, becing

being not yet resolved whose Ensignes to follow? To retaine (in fauour of the Church) A some places which the Valentinois yet held, and to oppose him in some sort against the Venetians (although he loued the Valentinois heeles better then his face) he agrees with him, that he should go to Ferrara and Imola, to receiue such forces as he could leaue. But hee is no sooner parted, but a new desire of command suggests, that it should be good the Valentinois should deliuer vnto him such Castles and places as he commanded, to the end the Venetians should not inuade them in his absence. And to this end, he sends vnto him the Cardinals of Volterre and Surente. Vpon the Valentinois refusall, the Pope being offended, sends to arrest the Gallies, wherein he had embarked at Ostia, and caused him to be brought from Magliana to Vatican, honoured and much made of, but safely guarded. Thus B you see the Valentinois power reduced to nothing, spoiled in a manner of all he had usurped, his troupes stript by the Florentines, and himselfe at this instant so well watched, as he could not go the length of himselfe. But let vs see what becometh of so many great and goodly desaignes of our Lewis. He intends not onely to recouer his losses in the realme of Naples, but also with one breath, to crosse the affaires of Ferdinand in Spaine.

The Valentinois a prisoner

The Lord of Albret, and Marshall of Gié, marched towards Fontaraby, with foure hundred Launces, among the which Peter of Foix Lord of Lautrec, and the Lord of Lescun, so famous in our Historie, made first shew of their vertues, and fūe thousand foote, Gascons and Suisses. And to make warre in the Countie of Roussillon, was sent the Marshall of Rieux, C accompanied with Gaston of Foix, Duke of Nemours, by the death of Lewis of Armagnac, the Vicounts of Paulin and Bruniquer, the Earle of Carmain, the Lords of Montaut, Terrede and Negrepelisse, leading eight hundred men at armes, and eight thousand foote, French, Gascons, and Suisses. And at the same instant an armie was readie at sea to inuade the coast of Catalonia, and the Realme of Valentia: but hee that ouer-gripes himselfe holds little: these were but shewes without effect. For the Lord of Albret being entred into the Province of Guiposcoa, whether that the enemies forces were greater then his, or fearing least the Castillian should be reuenged of the King of Nauarre his sonne, he retired, and went into Languedock to the Marshall of Rieux, to beseege Saules with their ioynt forces.

A truce betwixt Spaine and France.

But the King of Spaine, hauing assembled a great armie at Pargignan from all his realms, and marching in person, with a resolution to raise the siege by some notable stratageme: D our men finding themselves too weake, retired to Narbonne, with a successe contrarie to the Lord of Albons, in the yeare 1496. And the Spaniards after some roades and spoils, on this side the mountaines, content to haue repelled the enemy, concluded a truce for five moneths, mediated by Fredericke, (whom Ferdinand King of Arragon and Castile, sed with hope to restore him to his throne) and Queene Anne moued our Lewis thereunto, onely in regard of that which concerned the affaires of France.

By this truce, the thoughts and forces of these two Kings, are conuerted to the warres of Naples. The French armie hauing passed the territories of Valmontone, and of the Colonnois, marched through the possessions of the Church, with an intent to take in the castle of E Secque. Here our men receiued their first affront. Secque well assailed, was well defended, causing our men to retire: who despairing to winne S. Germaine, take their way by the Sea-coast. But the question was, how to passe Garillan, which was not to be waded through at that season. Gonsalue was incamped on the other side: our French by reason of their Canon, winne the passage of the riuer, make a bridge thereon, and aduenture to passe. The Spaniards repulse them, euen to the midst of the bridge, and by the furie of their shotte, force them to goe to land, hauing lost fūe hundred men French and Suisses, and some hundred drowned: the enemy two hundred, and Fabius the sonne of Paul Vrsin, a young man and of great hope.

It is a matter of dangerous consequence, to attempt to passe a riuer in the face of a mightie armie, and commaunded by a discreet Captaine, if they be not well fortified with trenches. This second disgrace encouraged the Spaniard, terrified our French, and made them loose all future hope. Doubtlesse the most important part of an armie, is a good Commander, and commonly few do willingly vndergo the command of a stranger, if he be not especially fauored by the heauens, and hath won great credit, and giuen great testimonies of his valor. Herein the Spaniards did exceed them: and this defect in the French armie, had bred

A bred great contempt of their generall: and more confusion then concord among the Captaines. So as the Marquis of Mantoua Lieutenant for the King, either thinking himselfe vnfit to gouerne so great an armie, or (as Sandricourt charged him) carrying away with him the Italian forces, that the French might be so much the weaker, or for that hauing receiued this double repulse, he would no farther ingage his honour, parted from the armie, laying all the fault vpon the contumacie of the French.

1503. The Marquis of Mantoua generall of the French, gave ouer the charge of the armie.

All difficulties conspired their ruine, the hard season of the winter, the situation of the moorish country, the continuall raine and snow, want of pay, the impatiencie of the toiles of warre, and moreouer the great suffrance of the enemy, who fortified with a deepe ditch, and two bastions in the front of the enemies armie, continually garded the passage, B whilest that our men wasted them-selues with fruitlesse attempts, and by their vnseasonable stay, the which quailed as much the heate of their courage, as the couterousnesse of the victuals, the ordinary theft of the Treasurers, the dissention of Captaines, and the disobedience of souldiers, vsuall in troopes wanting a vigilant commander, and of authority, and the increase of ordinary diseases did hurt them. Being inuironed with these difficulties, the enemy hath a new supply by Bartholmew of Aluiano with the rest of the Vrsins. And Gonsalue finding him selfe to haue nine hundred men at armes, a thousand light horse, and nine thousand Spanish foote, aduertised moreouer of the disorders and continuall decay of our army, the which being stronger in caualery then in footmen, those being cut in peeces C which they had lately left at Castle Guillaume, were so disperfed, as their lodging contained ten miles in circuit: a grosse error of the Marquis of Saluce, hauing an enemy in front, who could well imbrace all aduantages: he secretly casts a bridge ouer the Garillon, foure miles about that which our men had made at the passage of Suie, where the French kept no gard: he passeth the 27. of December in the night, and possesseth Suie. The Marquis vnderstanding that the Spaniard did passe, riseth sodenly, breakes his bridge, and causeth the army to march towards Caiete. Gonsalue hinders his passage by Prosper Colonne, and the light horse-men, that being molested by them, they should be inforced to march the more slowly: he ouer-takes them right against Scandi, and stayes them with continuall skirmishes, vntill that Gonsalue comes vpon the rere-ward of them. An army that retires with feare, receiues the first stroke of death, when they are skirmished with. Our French were driuen to the passage of the bridge which is before the Moie of Caiete, and whilest the Viceroy staid there to giue the Canon time to passe, the battaile and rere-ward of the Spaniards arriue. Bernardine Adorne, the Lords of Cramont and S. Colombe, with some Cornets of French and Italians, make it good a long time, and fauour the retreat of the foot, vntill that by the death of Adorne and many others, with the wounding of S. Colombe, the rest of these horse-men seeing the troupes to haue gotten some ground, doe likewise take their way to Caiete, alwaies beaten behind, euen vnto the head of two wayes, whereof the one leads to Itri, and the other to Caiete. Here all disband, those which are best mounted save them-selues: the slowest, the wounded, the sick, the Canon, & the munition, remaine at the victors deuotion. D The French defeated quite.

E At the same time Fabrizio Colonne, (hauing passed the riuer with fūe hundred horse and a thousand foote) spoiled the companies of Lodowike of Mirandola, Alexander of Triuulce, Peter of Medicis (who followed the French army) retiring by sea to Caiete with many Gentlemen, and foure peeces of artillery, their barke ouer-taken with a sterme in the mouth of the riuer was swallowed vp in the waues, and all in it drowned. Gonsalue knew well, that so great a multitude of men being retired into Caiete, would breed a sodaine famine, and soone yeeld him the Towne; Hee besiegeth it, and our men not able to dispose them-selues, to endure the tediousnesse of a doubtfull expectation of succours, made the first day of the yeare 1504. famous by this accord with him: To depart with liues and goods out of the realme of Naples, eyther by land or by sea, and that the Lord of Aubigni, and all other F prisoners, should bee deliuered on eyther side.

The realme of Naples wholly lost by the French.

So our French are againe dispossest of the estate of Naples, and exposed to cold, hunger, and to a long and painfull retreat, that although of so great an army, few were slaine by the enemies sword, yet the most part of them which departed after this capitulation, found their graues in hospitalls, market-places and streetes: and of such as tooke their way by sea, few suruiued long the extreame discommodities which they had endured: amongst 1505. amongst others, the Marquis of Saluce, Sandricourt and many Gentlemen of marke. It was better to fore-see all these difficulties, before we part from our houses, then to goe so farre to seeke our graues. Capitaine Bayard returned, admired greatly euen by Gonsalue himselfe, hauing purchased great glory and reputation amongst the French.

The chiefe causes of this overthrow.

Doubtlesse, besides the discord and bad gouernment of Capitaines, the sharpnesse of the time, and impatience of our men in military labours: two things principally had wrested this victory from the King. The one was the long stay of his army in the territories of Rome for the Popes death, io as winter came, and Gonsalue had leisure to practise with the Vrsins before this army entred the realme. The other was the treacherous couetousnesse and theft of the Commisaries and Treasurers, who commonly empty the Kings coffers to fill their owne bagges, to the preiudice of the souldiers pay, and the order they should take for victuals. John Heronot Treasurer, condemned of theft, was publicly executed: Alegre, Sandricourt and others, were for a time in disgrace with the King. The losse of Naples, the death of so braue a Nobility, the infinite numbers of men slaine in these attempts, had filled the realme and Court with great heauinesse and mourning, euery man cursing the day wherein that miserable desire to purchase new estates in Italy, had first entred into the hearts of our Kings of France. The King seeing well how much his reputation would bee blemished with strangers, and how much the losse of so flourishing an army, would weaken his forces, was not without feare: either that Maximilian would alter some thing in the state of Milan, or that Gonsalue (following his course) would imploy his victorious army to the subuersion of the said Duchie: and those which followed the French party in Italy, feared, least in his way he should alter the estate of Tuscane. Without doubt it was likely, that the King, wanting money, weake of men, & the French daunted in courage, and without any desire to repasse the Alpes, would without any great resistance, haue giuen place to the victors violence. But Gonsalue content with the surname of Great Capitaine, which the Spanissh boasting had giuen him, restrained his desires within the limits of this happy victory. True it is, that many extremities kept him back. He did owe much vnto his army, who made great instance to be paid, and put into garrisons. Moreouer, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, to lead his army out of the realme, from whence the enemy was not yet fully expelled. But that which stayed the course of his prosperities, was a dangerous sickness, so D as he could not execute any enterprise in person: hee sent Bartholmew of Alutane, against Lewis of Ars, who during the stay of the army vpon the bankes of Garillan, had seized vpon Troy and S. Seuer, and had put all Apulia into armes.

This stay of Gonsalue, held the rest of Italy rather in icalousie, then any way troubled it. And the Pope (forbearing yet to discouer his desseignes,) laboured to get the possession of such Castles as the Valentinois held at Furli, Cesene and Bertinoire. The Valentinois was content for Cesene: but the Pope hauing sent Don Pedro d'Oniedo a Spaniard, to receiue it in his name, the Capitaine of the place holding the composition of no force, for that the Valentinois was a prisoner, caused him to be hanged. So as the Pope despairing to get it without his liberty, agrees with him. That hee should bee put into the castle of Oltia, with commandement to the Cardinall of S. Croix to enlarge him, when hee had consigned the said castles. This consignment made, the Valentinois escapes with the Cardinals permission, and retires to Naples, from whence Gonsalue sent him afterwards to Ferdinand his King, who confined him prisoner to the castle of Medina del Campo. An act in truth vnworthy the sincerity of a great Prince, but most worthy of this Duke, who not satisfied with the wickednesse hee had formerly done, deuised a new, to trouble other mens estates, and to sowe dissensions throughout all Italy. A prison which did greatly comfort all Romagnia, being freed from the euill spirit, which so tormented it.

A truce with the Spaniard.

A common necessity is usually the mother of a peace, or truce betwixt Princes, that haue long tormented one another. Behold the Kings of France and Spaine, both weary of warre, conclude a truce. Lewis sought it, and Ferdinand accepts it willingly, thinking by this meanes to confirme his new conquests, with more safety, vpon condition: That it should be lawfull for the subjects of either party, to trafficke throughout all their realmes and dominions, except at Naples. The Kings of Spaine haue alwaies treated vpon aduantage with our Kings. Gonsalue doth cunningly make his profit of this clause, placing vpon the frontiers of those

A those places, which the French did yet possesse, (as Rosene in Calabria, Oire in the land of Otranto, Venouise, Conuersan, and the Castle of Mont in Apulia) guards to watch, that no man liuing should conuerse in any place that was held by the Spaniard. The which brought the inhabitants to so great a streight, as resolving to yeeld to the enemy, Lewis of Ars, was forced to retire into France.

But what auails it to auoid one danger, and fall into another? We haue not yet breathed from our trauels past, and see, we now studie on new iarres and confusions. In truth the estate of this world is like a chesse-board, where Princes with a variable change, play most couetous games, sometimes with losse, sometimes with gaine: and oft-times (treating with men in whome there is no trust) they fall out of one mischiefe into a greater inconuenience. At the same time, Ambassadors beeing come from Maximilian and Philip, to confirme that which had bene propounded, by the comming of the bishop of Cisteron, and the Marquis of Final, sent expressly by the Pope for that business: this peace was in the end concluded: "That the mariage of Claude the Kings daughter, with Charles the Arch-Dukes eldest sonne, should take effect: that all the former inuestitures of the Duchie of Milan being disanulled, Maximilian should grant the inuestiture vnto the King, for himself and his heires males: and for want of males, should giue it in fauour of the mariage of Claude and Charles: and if Charles should die before the consummation of the said mariage, to Claude and the Arch-Dukes youngest sonne, in case he married with her: for which possession the King should pay vnto Maximilian, vpon dispatch of the letters patents, threecore thousand florins of the Rhin, and threecore thousand more within sixe moneths after, and euery yeare, on the birth day of our Lord God, a paire of spurs of gold."

All these Princes were wonderfully incensed against the Venetians, by reason of the usurpations made by them in their estates. They make a League for their common defence, and to offend the Venetians, meaning to pull from them what they had vsurped. And for that the promises which Maximilian had vainly giuen to Lodowicke Sforce, were the cause to hasten his ruine: he was a meanes the King should set him at libertie, and giue him some good pension to liue withall in France. But this was a short comfort for Lodowicke, whose turbulent spirit would haue practised some alteration. This capitulation beeing so profitable to all these Princes, the Pope beeing comprehended therein, it was likely it should hold. But there must be stronger bands to tie it: that is, a reciprocall loue, without the which all treaties are fruitlesse. The end of this yeare is famous by the death of Fredericke, sometimes King of Naples, who was deprivied of all his vaine hopes, to recouer his Realme of Naples, by the accord of these two Kings, and by that of Isabel Queene of Castile, a vertuous Princess, noble, wise, and beloued of her subiects.

The yeare following disposed the two Kings and the Potentates of Italy, to lay aside arms: Ferdinand of Aragon hauing new desseignes, and foreseeing that by the death of his wife, Philip his sonne in law would challenge the Crowne of Castile, (as hauing married the inheretrix of the said Realme) desired onely to preserue the realme of Naples, by means of the capitulation lately made. Our Lewis was not altogether freed from doubt, for that Maximilian delayed (according to his vsuall tediousnesse) to ratifie the peace. The Pope desired innouation, but his forces were too weak without the support of some mighty Prince. The last League had put the Venetians in alarme, hauing thereby three mightie enemies against them. To pacifie the nearest, they offer vnto the Pope to restore all they had vsurped, except Faenza, Rimini, and their appurtenances. And the Pope knowing, that the Emperors warre against the Elector Palatin, would hinder his passage into Italy, ioyntly with the King, for that yeare, accepted the obedience the Venetians offered him, in regard of the said places, without making them any shew of a more mild and tractable disposition. The King (for the accomplishment of that which had bene treated of,) sent the Cardinall of Anboise to Hagenau a towne of Alsacia (newly taken from the Count Palatin) where the Emperour did solemnely sweare, and proclaime the articles agreed vpon, according to the which, the Cardinall payed halfe the money, promised for the inuestiture of Milan.

During this ratification, there growes new seeds of dissention in Italy. The Cardinall Afcamin, brother to Lodowicke Sforce, treated with the Ambassador of Venice at Rome, and had also (according to the common opinion) some secret intelligence with Gonsalue: he

The Venetians reconciled to the Pope.

1505. was in shew to intuate the Duchy of Milan, the which they knew to be vnfurnished of French A souldiards: the people inclining againe to the name of Sforce: and (that which made them the more bold,) the King being surprised with so dangerous a sicknesse as the Physicians dispaynting of his health, the Queene prepared to send all her iewels into Britany, if the Marshall of Gie had not placed men vpon the way to stay them: for the which, the king after-wards was as well pleased, as the Queene, by her dislike, sought to bring him in disgrace. Doubles the people should oft times suffer much, if their counsels were not stayed by the prouidence of God. The King recouers his health, and the Cardinal Afcantius dies suddenly of the plague, at Rome, interring with him the desseins of Milan.

The King is freed of one danger. And as God by meanes vnknowne to men, doth change B great stormes into calme sun-shines: our Lewis, who till then had the greatnesse of the Arch-duke Philip in ialousie, fearing to make him his enemy, he finds now that the death of Isabel of Castile doth free him of his feare: for that the Arch-duke (reiecting the testament of his mother in law) deuised to take the gouernment of the Realme of Castill from Ferdinand his father in law, the which could not be done but by their common quarels, and the weakning of their forces, the King (remaining betwixt both, free from troubles,) should thereby fortifie himselfe, with men, mony, and munition, for the aduancing of his desseins.
And the Aragonois, on the other side (forced to seeke a support against his sonne in law,) desiring a peace with the King, he obtaines it, by the marriage of him and Germaine, sister to C Gaston of Foix daughter to his Maiesties sister, vpon condition, that the king should giue her in dowry that part of the Realme of Naples which belonged vnto him: the King of Arragon binding himselfe to pay him within tenne yeares feauen hundred thousand ducats for the charges past: and to indowe his new spouse, with 300000 ducats. Which dowry (Germaine dying in mariage without children) should returne to Ferdinand: but if he died first, it should goe to the crowne of France. A happy conclusion both of a peace, and of the yeare, if it could haue intertayned loue betwixt these two Princes. But it shalbe soone broken, and alwaies our peace with the Spaniards hath bene full of discord.

& Alexander.

Motives of new troubles.

Let vs now open the springs of new warres. The Pope had without the Kings priuity gi-uen all the benefices that were fallen voyde in the Duchy of Milan by the death of cardinall Afcantius and other Clergy men. Moreouer in the creation of many Cardinalls, he had refused to admit into the society the Bishop of Auchx, Nephew to the Cardinall of Amboise, and the Bishop of Baieux Nephew to the Lord of Tremouille. And moreouer he had armed some gallies, to be in a readynesse (as some gaue out) to free Genoua from the gouernment of the French, in case the King died, as some feared, and others did hope. All these considerations, together with the Kings discontent, seemed to breed some diuision with the Pope: yet his friendship was profitable for the king in the warre he pretended against the Venetians against whom he knew the Pope to be ill affected, for the desire he had to recouer the townes of Romagna. He therefore sent the Bishop of Cisteron his Nuntio into France, to propound vnto him many offers, and desseins, for the execution of this common enterprise. Moreouer the Pope seeing him-selfe as it were forced at the Kings instance, to prolong the Cardinall of Amboise his legation in France, and for ialousie he had that this Cardinall aspired by all meanes to the Popedom, he could not resolute to ioyne in all points with the King. But hee knew moreouer that beeing diuided from his maiesty, his coun-cells could not succede happily: in the ende they treat a new amity and league together, and to make the King the better affected, hee giues a Cardinall hatte to eyther of the fore-named Bishoppes, and power vnto the King to dispose of all benefices within the Duchy of Milan.

The more the King confirmed himselfe in the Popes alliance, the more he loathed that of Maximilian and of Philip his sonne: the passage which he pretended into Italy with a mighty army to receiue his imperiall crowne, and to cause his sonne to bee chosen King of F Romans, beeing greatly suspected vnto the King: and the greatnesse of Phillip (who by capitulation had sent his Father in Law Ferdinand backe into Arragon hauing already so apparently estranged the Kings loue from him, as hee gaue Claude his daughter in marriage to Francis Earle of Angoulesme (the next heire to this crowne, after the Kings decesse without heires mals) at the sute & supplication of al the parlaments of his realme. The which serued

A serued for an excuse to Philip. And the more to diuert Maximilians passage into Italy, the King sent men to succour the duke of Gueldres (a great enemy to Philips prosperity) and to molest his Prouinces of the Low countries in his absence. As these things passed, the Pope (burning with desire to restore vnto the obedience of the church, all such places as had bin taken away) intreated the King (according to their agreement) to aide him in the recovery of Perugia and Bologna. This request was very pleasing vnto the King: it was a meanes to tie the Pope, whom they had in some ialousie in Court, to haue bene priuy to some practise, which Ossanian Fregosa had made to dispossesse the King of the Seigneury of Genoua.
Moreouer Bentiuole Lord of Bologna, seemed more affected to Maximilian then to him: and John Paul Baillon, the vturper of Perugia, was in disgrace with the King, hauing refused B to ioyne with his army, when it was vpon the Garillan.

sonne Phil p.

Notwithstanding the protestation which the Venetians made vnto the King, to take The Popes armes for the defence of Bologna, if the Pope did not first make them grant of the rights exploits, of Faenza belonging to the church, did some-what diuert him, referring the execution to another time. Yet the Pope (being vehement and peremptory by nature) goes out of Rome with five hundred men at armes, and giues notice of his comming to the Bolognois, commanding them to prepare to receiue him, and to lodge 500. French lances in their country, wherof he had yet no assurance. Then Baillon fearing his comming, goes to meet the pope, and deliuers him the forts of Perugia and Peroufin. In the end by the perswasion of the Cardinal of Amboise, the King commanded Charles of Amboise Lord of Chaumont, to as-C sist the pope in person with five hundred Lances, and three thousand foote, amongst the which were Gaston of Foix the Kings Nephew, and duke Nemours: Peter of Foix Lord of Lautrec his cousin, the Lord of Palisse and others. Bentiuole and his children amazed at this sodaine arriuall, beseech Chaumont to bee a mediator, and to procure them some tollerable conditions, who dealing with the pope, obtained leaue to depart safely out of Bologna, to remaiue in what part hee pleased of the Duchy of Milan, to sell and carry away all their mo-uables, and to enioy the reuenues they possessed by any iust title, without any molestation.
Thus Bologna returned to the obedience of the church, and the pope hauing giuen the Duke of Nemours a sword enriched with precious stones, amongst the which there was one D Diamond of inestimable value, eight thousand ducats to Chaumont, and ten thousand for his men: he conuerted all his thoughts to annoy the Venetians. At this time died Philip the Archduke, of a feuer, within few daies, in the city of Bruges, yong of yeeres, strong and healthfull of body, leauing an heire (the fatall scourge of the French Monarchy) who within few yeeres shall mount vpon the Theater of our History, to act many and diuers tragicall parts. And the duke of Valentinois, to finish the last act of his Tragedy, hauing slipped downe with a cord from the fort of Medina de l' Campo, and sought for refuge with John of Albret King of Nauarre, brother to his wife, was in the end slaine before Viane, fighting for his brother in law: too honorable a death for such a tyrant.

Chaumont was no sooner returned, but there sprung vp a new occasion to imploy his forces: the Genouois taking occasion, not of any desire they had to rebell, but onely of ci-uill discords betwixt the people and the Nobles (the which doe often transport men beyond their first resolutions) did sacke the Noblemens houses, and did tumultuously create a new Magistracy of eight popular men, whom, to authorise them the more, they named Tribunes of the people: they seized by force vpon Spetie and some other townes lying vpon the Easterne riuier. The Lord of Rauastein beeing absent, flies speedily to Genoua, with a hundred and fifty horse, and feuen hundred foote. The King had sent vnto them Michel Riccio, a Doctor, banished from Naples, to perswade them to seeke rather the mildnesse of his mercy, then to trie the rigour of his forces. But a mutinous people is like vnto a wilde horse, which runnes furiously, vntill some downefall stay him: for in steed of giuing eare to his counsell, they goe to besiege Monaco, lying vpon the sea, in a commodious place, and of F great importance for the city of Genoua, they create Paul de Nose, a diier of silke, Duke of Genoua, beate downe the Kings armes, and set vp Maximilians: they take Castellar, a castle built about Genoua on the mountaine: and against their faith, cut the French mens throates that were in Garrison.

So the King imputing that to the Genouois as a rebellion, which they had done by ciuill discord,

discord, marched himselfe in person, followed by eight hundred Lances, eightene hundred A light horse, twelue thousand foote: and an armie at sea, consisting of eight Gallies, eight Galleons, and many Foists and Brigantines: he raiseth the siege at Monaco, takes the Bastion which they had built on the top of the mountaine, forceth the Geneuois to yeeld to his mercie, disarms them: and the 29. of Aprill, enters into Genoua, in complete armour, with his sword in his hand, vnder a Canopie, accompanied with all his companies of men at armes, and Archers of his Guard: who (at the pittifull crie of the people, demanding mercie of his Maiestie) he grants them pardon, paying an hundred thousand Ducats in ready money, and two hundred thousand more to be payed at certaine dayes, for the charges of this expedition, and to build a Cittadell. And in token of his absolute authoritie, hee commaunded that the money of Genoua should from that time be coyned with the stampe of France: and then he ended all this Tragedie with the death of Demetrius Iustinian, one of the chiefe Tribunes, who by his examination laid open all the practises and hopes the Pope had giuen them: and soone after by the death of Paul de Nove the new Duke of Genoua, with three-score others, which he put into the hands of the Magistrate.

In the meane time the Pope (who found himselfe farre engaged in the rebellion of Genoua) seemed discontent: he accuseth the King, that he had periwaded Bentsuole to surpris Bolonia, meaning to declare himselfe afterwards an enemy to the Church, and by violence to install the Cardinall of Amboise in Saint Peters chaire, pressing the Emperour and the Venetians to make warre ioyntly against the King. Maximilian had (in a Diet held at Constance) got the consent of the Princes of the Empire thereunto: and the King, to preuent this storme, which threatened him from Germany, and to free both the Pope and the Venetians from ialousie, soone after the taking of Genoua, he dismissed his armie, and himselfe had presently returned, if the desire of a parle with the King of Arragon his nephew had not stayed him. Sauone was appointed to that end, where hauing promised respectiue a mutual preferuation of loue and good intelligence, they treat of the reformation of the church, by meanes of a holy and free Councell, and to reconcile our Lewis with Maximilian, and they two to assaile the Venetians with their common forces.

Moreouer, the Pope had sent the Cardinall of Sainte Croix, for Legat to Maximilian: & the Venetians, Florentins (whom the King would not receiue into his protection, against the passage of Maximilian, but with this clause, Excepting the right of the Empire) and all others that depended of themselves (except the Marquis of Mantoua, had sent their Agents to this Imperiall diet of Constance, some for desire of innouation, some for hope, others for feare. Which things troubled the King: especially the Ambassage of the Cardinall of S. Croix, whom he knew to be alwaies desirous of Maximilians prosperity. In the end, the conclusion of this diet (the which the Pope attended wauering betwixt hope and feare, sometimes desiring Maximilians comming into Italy, and sometimes apprehending the memorie of ancient quarrels betwixt the Emperours and Popes) was, That they should giue vnto Maximilian to attend him into Italy, eight thousand horse, and two and twentie thousand foote, entertained for sixe moneths, and that the companies should be in field weere vnto Constance, by the midst of October. Upon this conclusion Maximilian demands passage of the Venetians, through those countries which they held in Italy. They graunt it, so as he come without an armie, else not. But they excuse themselves vpon the necessitie of the league they haue with the King, and vpon the conditions of the present time: yet notwithstanding, except that which they should be forced vnto by vertue of the said alliance, for the defence of the state of Milan, in fauour of the King, they would not oppose themselves to any of his aduancement. And in truth, being loath to offend Maximilian, or to giue to the King occasion to presume too much, they did not seeke vnto him for any new league, hoping it may be, that Maximilian leauing their frontiers in peace, would turne his forces either against Bourgongne, or against the Duchies of Milan and Genoua.

To preuent all inconueniences, the King had sent great troupes of horse and foote towards Milan, and did leuie (with the permission of the Catholike King his nephew) two thousand five hundred Spaniards, five hundred Launces in Bourgogne vnder Tremouilles command, foure hundred French Lances, and foure thousand foote, ioyntly with the Venetians, to preuent any alteration that might happen towards Trente: and to distract the Emperours forces

Emperour.Maximilians
forces defeated.A truce betwixt the Em-perour and Venetians.

A forces into diuers parts, he fauored the Duke of Gueldres, who molested the Country of Charles, grand-child to Maximilian. And to begin his voyage, Maximilian being come to Trente, caused a proclamation to be publicly made, the third of February: That hee was resolu'd to passe in hostile manner into Italy. And from that time leauing the name of King of Romans, tooke vpon him that of chosen Emperour. But this was to brag of mountaines, and to bring forth mol-hilles. He goes from Trente with fiftene hundred horse, and foure thousand foote, not of that number which had beene promised him at Constance, but of the ordinary traine of his Court, and leuied in his owne territories, and the Marquis of Brandebourg with five hundred horse and two thousand foote. But there was no reason the seruant should bee more happy then the maister. The Marquis returnes, hauing onely presented him-selfe before Rouere, and demanded in vaine to bee lodged within the towne. And Maximilian hindered by many trenches which the Mountainers of Siague had made, retired back foure dayes after his departure. If he had gone back to take a greater leape, (as the Proverbe saith) it had beene a good signe, but to turne his back, it was a disgrace.

Behold an open warre, and the Venetians are netted with these weake beginnings: But conquests of Villages, are like bonfires of Straw. Maximilian taking the way of Friul, for the commodity of the passage, and the country being more open, with fixe thousand men leuied in those marches, he did runne about forty miles into the Venetian territories: hauing taken certaine villages of small moment (performing the office of a simple Captaine, rather then of an Emperour) he returned towards Iusbruch, to engage some Jewels, and to make prouision of money by some other meanes, which failing, had caused eight thousand Suisses to leaue his pay, whereof five thousand went to the King, and three thousand to the Venetians. And to increase the mischief, Maximilian had left nine thousand foote and horse at Trente. Bartlemew of Aluiane (sent by the Venetians to succour Friul) seized vpon the passages of the Valley of Cadore, by the which the Germaines might saue themselves: he charged them, slew about a thousand, and tooke all the rest (in a manner) prisoners. So the carefull valour of Aluiane made vaine the former exploits of Maximilian.

It is all one to be well or ill beaten. The Venetians put in practise this common saying, not without some offence to the King, who did not willingly behold the prosperous course of their victories, in regard of his owne desseignes. They were forced to take armes, and before they lay them downe, they take from the Empire Trieste, Portonon, and Fiume: then passing the Alpes, Possionia. On the other side, the Germaine armie towards Trente, had put to sword three thousand Venetian foote, set to garde mount Bretonic. The Bishop of Trente encouraged by this small stratagem, with two thousand foote, and some troupes of horse, went to besiege Riue Trente, a great bourgh vpon the Lake of Garde; but as hee did batter it, two thousand Grifons, which were in the Germaine Campe, fell into a mutinie by reason of their pay, and spoile the victuals of the whole Campe. So all being in disorder without respect of command, and without obedience, the Grifons being gone, all the rest of the armie (being about seven thousand men) were forced to retire. Thus ended all these great shewes, and Maximilian hauing rashly giuen credit to the Popes suggestions, reaped nothing for his indiscretion, but shame, losse, and contempt. Being thus perplexed, he seekes to with-draw himselfe out of the country, and finding the Venetians well disposed to make an end of this warre, and to preferue (by meanes of a truce) the places which they had conquered in these garboiles: he easily obtaines a truce for three moneths, whereby they laide downe armes, to resume them soone after, but with more dangerous effects. This was the xx. day of April. In corrupted bodies, the remedies we apply to diuert one inconuenience, do commonly ingender another, more dangerous. So the truce (made betwixt Maximilian and the Venetians, wherein they had exceedingly neglected the King) in steed of quiet and rest which they expected, bred more horrible calamities then the former warres. The Venetians sought it by their insolent manner of proceeding. The Emperour studied by what meanes hee might repaire the infamy and losse hee had lately receiued: and now they incense him more, receiuing Aluiane into Venice, in a triumphant manner. And the King found him-selfe much wronged, for that presuming to name him in this truce, and to comprehend him as an adherent, they had notwithstanding provided for their owne safety, and left him charged with the cares and troubles of the warre: seeing that in their fauour he had opposed 1508. opposed himselfe against Maximilian, as we haue seene. The Emperour being then so weak. A ly assisted by the forces of the Empire, and finding his owne too feeble, deuised to vnite himselfe with the King against the Venetians, as the onely remedy to recover both his estates and his honour lost. Moreouer, this new disdaine reuiued in the King the ancient remembrance of the wrongs he had receiued by them in the warres of Naples, and since in diuerse other accidents: thrust forward with an exceeding desire to wrest out of their hands Verona, Cremona, and many other townes possessed of long time by the Dukes of Milan.

 And the Pope crossing them, possessed with that first desire to recover those places which they vsurped of the Church, taxing them that the banished men of Furl had of late dayes, by meanes of their Senate, sought to enter into the said towne, discontented moreouer, by the Venetians had, (in contempt of the authority of the Sea of Rome) giuen the Bishoprick of Vincenza, to a Venetian Gentleman, contrary to the collation which the Pope had made to his Nephew Sixtus, he perswaded the King against them, desiring rather to re-maine a newter in the midst of these contendants, and be a spectator, then to invade. In the end (vnder a colour to treat a peace, betwixt the Archduke Charles, sonne to Philip, and the Duke of Gueldres:) they must meete at Cambray. For the King, came the Cardinall of Amboise: and for the Emperour, Marguerit his daughter Gouvernессe of Flanders, assisted in this treaty by Matthew Lange, a trusty Secretary to the Emperour: and for the King of Arragon, an Ambassador of his. The ninth of December they conclude a peace betwixt their Maisters, and a perpetuall league against all men, euery one to recover from the Venetians the places which they had taken from them, and to spoile them of the territories of the Church vsurped by them: whatsoeuer we treat, the Church must be one, but more with a colour, then any deuotion. The Emperour did solemnely confirme this new league. The Arragonois feared the increase of the King his Vncles greatnesse, and preferred the safety of the realme of Naples before any thing which the Venetians enioyed: yet dissembling his conceits, hee performed all solemnities required. The Pope was more scrupulous: hee had sent his commission, but had not yet consented. Many considerations moued him therevnto: a desire to recover the Townes of Romagna, and a disdaine against the Venetians. Moreouer he feared to incense the King, reiecting this association: yet hee held it a very dangerous thing for him, that the Emperour should extend himselfe in Italy. Thus troubled in minde, he resolues, for the mildest course, to obtaine a part of his desires by an accord, rather then all by warre. Hee lets the Venetians vnderstand, that the storme which threatened them by the vnion of these Princes, would prooue farre more tempestuous, if they forced him to giue his consent. That yeelding willingly the places they had taken from the Church, it should make him refuse to ratifie the treaty of Cambray, made in his name, but without his approbation: without the which their alliances would easily turne to smoake; if they refused, hee would pursue them with spirituall and temporall armes.
 Oft times, those which haue the name, the age and countenance of wise men, conclude to the ruine of their country. The Venetians at this time follow the worst aduise. And the Pope ratifies the treaty the which hee had deferred vntill the last day assigned for the ratification. The King armes and passeth the Alpes in person, followed by the Princes of his blood, Charles of Bourbon Earle of Vendosme; Charles of Bourbon afterwards Constable of France, sonne to the Earle of Montpensier, Lewis of Bourbon, Prince of Roche sur-Yon.
 René Duke of Alençon, and his sonne Charles the Duke of Longueuille, Gaston of Foix Duke of Nemours, Peter of Foix Vicount of Lautrec, Lewis of Tremouille Vicount of Thouars, the Earle of Montmorencie grand-father to the Constable that now liues, the Lords of Palisse, Andouins, Grandmont, Curton, Boissi, Coligni, Estouteuille, and almost all the Nobility of France, which followed (as to a certaine victory) with ioy and courage, amounting to forty thousand fighting men, besides three thousand horse, and six thousand foote, which Chaumont brought out of the Duchie of Milan, and the troupes of Anthony Duke of Lorraine, who accompanied his Maiesy in this voyage. The King hauing passed the Alpes, sends Monior his Herald presently to proclaime warre against the Senate of Venice. And for that the Pope complained that the time specified in the capitulation expired without any effects of warre, the King commands the Lord of Chaumont to begin.
 He therevpon passeth the riuer of Adde, the fifteene of Aprill, and camps before Treui, the Venetian Stradiots or light horse, Vitelli de Citade Castello, Vincenz of Nalce, and other Senators, and with them a hundred light horse, and a thousand foote: then hee repasseth Adde, to attend the Kings coming at Milan. The Emperour was gone into Flanders, to require a leauing of money, from the subiects of Charles his grand-child, a testimony that he could not begin the warres within forty daies after the King, as his promise was.

 The Venetians prepared, and seeing a great part of Christendome armed against them, they seeke to dissolue this vnion by reasonable offers. But the Pope could no more accept that which hee had before desired. The Catholike King had not credit enough to diuert the rest. The Emperour full of disdaine, would not so much as see Iohn de l'Esioille their Secretary. As for our Lewis, they hoped for nothing from him, but by the sword. They therefore entertaine two thousand men at armes barded, foure fighting men for euery Lance: 3000. light horse and Stradiots, fifteene thousand foote, of the flower of Italy, and 15. thousand others chosen out of their territories, they arme many vessels to garde the banks of Romag-na, the townes of Apulia, the approaches of the Lake of Garde, Po, and other neighbour places, fearing to bee molested by the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantoua their enemies. But behold bad signes, and prodigious fore-runners of losses, wherevnto (besides the threats of men) the Venetians shall be shortly subiect. A Barke carrying ten thousand ducats to Rauenna, was drowned. The castle of Brescia was fiered with lightning, the place where the charters of the common-weale did lie, was sodainely ruined. And that which did most terrifie them, their great counsell beeing assembled, fire tooke their Arcenall, whereas the salt-peter did lie, and burnt twelue gallies, with a great quantitie of munition.
 Moreouer hauing entertained Iulius and Rance Vrsins, and Troile Sauelli, with fiue hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote, the Pope commanded them vpon greuous censures (as dependants of the church) not to depart out of Rome. And presently hee did publish in forme of a monitory, a horrible Bull, containing, The vsurpations the Venetians had made in the sea of Rome, the authority they did arrogate to the preiudice of the Ec-clesiasticall liberty, and the popes iurisdiction. To giue Bishoprikes and other spirituall liuings being vacant: to decide spiritual causes in secular Courts, and other things belonging to the censure of the church: specifying moreouer, all their disobediences past, and admonishing them: To yeeld vp within foure and twenty daies next ensuing, the townes of the church which they possessed, with the fruites receiued since they enioyed them, vpon paine to incurre, not onely the censures and curse of the citie of Venice, but a lo of all the territories vnder their obedience, and of all others that should receiue any Venetian, declaring them guilty of high Treason, and detested as perpetuall enemies to all Christians, to whom he gaue power to take their goods in al places, and to make their persons slaues. Against this Bull, they cast forth a writing about Rome, containing (after a long protestation against the Pope and our Lewis) An appellation from the monitory, to the next Councell, and for want of humane Iustice, to the seete of Iesus Christ, a most iust iudge, and the soueraigne Prince of all.
 The Venetian army beeing assembled, made their beginning famous by the recovery of Treui, after the retreat of Chaumont. But it was dismall to the conquerour: for during the heate of the spoile, the King (who came to releue it) passed the riuer of Adde with his whole army, without any let, the ninth day of May. And Triualsee seeing the army past: This day (said hee) O most Christian King, haue wee wonne the victory. The King lodged within halfe a league of the Venetian campe, and (holding it more glory, if of himselfe, without the assistance of any other, he ended this warre) hee drew the enemy by all meanes to a battaile.
 The enemies desiegn, was to keepe themselves close in places of strength, to flie the necessity of fighting, and to keepe the French from attempting any matter of importance. So both armies continued a whole day, one in view of an other. The next day, the King stood foure houres before the enemies lodging, with his troupes in battaile, and tooke Riualte, in their view, without making any other shew, then to want courage to come to fight. Necessity must then force them to it, hunger driues the Wolfe out off the wood. The King (to cut off the victuals that came to them from Cremona and Crema, raiseth his campe, to lodge at Vaile or at Pandin: and the Venetians (to ingage their enemies in the like difficulties) resolute to follow them at the heels, and alwayes to lodge in places of advantage. There were two wayes to the said places. The one was longer and lower, which going bias against the river of Adde, was in forme like a bow: the other shorter & higher, but straight as a line. The King takes the lower, the enemy the higher, Chaumont led the foreward of the French, Aluiane the Venetian. They approach neere vnto Agnadel, when as Aluiane being forced of necessity to fight, plants sixe peeces of artillery vpon the causse of a brooke which was then almost dry, which parted the two armies, and his foote in the vineyards adioyning to it, and comes resolutely to charge our foreward. The combat was long and doubtfull; for that by reason of the stocks and branches the French horse could not fight commodiously. And now the Suisses begin to wauer, when as the King sending Charles of Bourbon to encourage them, and aduancing him-selfe with his bataille into a more large and open place, hee redoubled the shock, fauoured by his artillery: the which the enemy could not discouer by means of certaine small trees and bushes. So as after an obstinate fight of either side, about three houres, the Kings presence not suffering any one to faint, and the Suisses returning to their first heate, the Venetians wonderfully spoiled by the horse, and Cannon, and hindred by the raine and haile which beate in their faces, began to yeeld both in courage and force: and finally resolute to sell this victory to the French very deare, failing rather in force then courage, they desired rather to loose their liues, then their honours, by turning of their backs.

The exploits of the Popes
army.

The Earle of Petiliano (with whom was the greatest part of their forces, incouraged with a squadron of their owne men flying, grieved that Aluiane had contrary to his aduice, presumed to fight, and thinking that his indeauours would preuaile little to obtaine the victory) desired rather to saue the rest of the armie, then to see all, lost by the rashnesse of an other. The Earle Bernardin du Mont, was slaine, and some men at armes, and about ten thousand foote. Bartholomew of Aluiane was prisoner, and hurt in the eye, and twenty peeces of great artillery lost. Of the French, no men of marke, but some five hundred foot were slaine. The King caused the dead to be buried, and for a trophie he built a Chappel in the place of bataille, the which hee named Saint Mary of Victory. So ended the battell of Agnadel, or Guiradadde, or (as others call it) of Vaile the 15. of May. This happy victory purchased the King the next day Carriage, and then Bergamo, Brescia, Crema, Cremona, Pisqueton, Pesquiere, and other places, whereof the King would not accept one, but vpon condition, that the Venetian Gentlemen, that were within any of them, should yeeld themselves prisoners vpon ransome. On the other side, the Pope with foure hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horses, eight thousand foote, and the artillery of the Duke of Ferrara, tooke Ceruia, Solarole, Bresquille, all Valdelamone, Granarole, all the Townes of the territory of Faenza, Rauenna, Imola, & all the townes of Romagna, but more through fauour of the Kings victory, then by his owne forces. The Marquis of Mantoua recovered Asole and Lunate, which the Venetians had vsurped from John Francis of Gonzagua his great grand-father. And the Duke of Ferrara, Polesine of Rouigne. In Istria, Christopher Frangipan inuaded Pisfine and Diuinie. The Duke of Brunswike entring into Friul, for the Emperour, tooke Feltri, Bellone, Trieste, and then Verona and Padoua returned to the obedience of the Empire. The Earles of Lodron seized vpon some Castles and Villages in their iurisdiccions, and the Bishop of Trent got for his share, Riue de Trente, and Agreste. The King of Arragon making his profit of an other mans paines and charge, recovered Brindes and Tarentum. So euery one pulling his plumes, the Crowe (according to the Prouerbe) remained almost bare. Such are the fruites of a battell wonne in a Country not fortified. This check had abated the naturall pride and haughtinesse of the Venetians, but their ruine toucht the hearts of the Italians diuersly. Some were well pleased, for that with-out any obseruation of faith or equitie, (thrust on with an insatiable ambition and couetousnesse,) they made profession to seaze vpon all, that opportunity offered them. Others began to sigh, lamenting the generall calamitie of Italy, ready to yeeld to the seruitude of a stranger. The Pope was one of the first that grieved at this great fall, and fearing the Emperours power and the Kings, hee deuised how to crosse their affaires, and to take from them all meanes to ruine this common-weale, the ancient seate of liberty.

A seate of liberty. Hee accepted of the Venetians Ambassage and submission, and reuoked the sentence by the which they were excommunicate. The which gaue them a beginning of hope, but more when they see the King content to haue recovered his owne, and not to exceed the limits of the capitulation of Cambray. And that which reuiued their spirits, certaine banished men, newly restored at Treuifo by the Venetians, to make the memory of this benefit famous, troupe together, plant the banner of Saint Mark in the Market place, and expell Leonard of Dreifine, who without any armes or force, had received the city in the Emperors name, they bring in seuen hundred Venetian foote, and consequently, all the forces they had assembled in Sclauonia, and Romagna.

B Without doubt Treuifo alone repaired the Venetians honor, and the chiefe cause of this accident, as also to put the Venetians in more hope, was the negligence and ill government of the Emperour, who during the course of so many victories, had made shew but of his name onely, and these importune delaies had caused the King to take his way towards Milan, to returne speedily into France. The Kings dislodging of his army, gaue courage to the Venetians to recouer Padoua, which they knew to be vnfurnished of men for the defence thereof. Andrew Gritti one of their Commisaries, had assembled two thousand men of the country, with three hundred souldiers, and some horse, and finding by chance the port of Codalungue halfe open, by reason of some carts laden with haye, that were lately entred, hee seized thereon without noyse, and kept it, vntill the companies lead by Chualier C Voipe, Zitole of Perugia, and Lassance of Bergamo were ariued, who held it almost an houre before that any alarme was giuen in the Towne. This reprimall made the way to recouer Legnague, a very commodious towne, to annoy Vincenza and Verona.

ans begin to recouer their looses.

One of the ancients sayd, that we must reuerence fortune, else she will shew her selfe terrible. Hereafter she leaues the Emperour, and returnes to the Venetians. The Marquis of Mantoua lodgeth in the Isle of Etscale, in the country of Verona, attending the preparatiues which the bishop of Trente, gouernor of Verona made, to besiege Legnague. Luke Malnezze with two hundred light horse, & Zitole of Perugia, with eight hundred foote, and fiftene hundred of the country, besides the garrison of Legnague, entring one morning into the said Isle, surprized the Marquis his troupes sleeping, spoile them, leading the Marquis with his Lieutenant Boisi (Nephew to the Cardinal of Amboise) prisoners, leauing a lesson to commanders in the warre, to bee vigilant, to weigh their owne forces, and not to contemne their enemies. On the other side, the Venetians in Friul recouered Valdesere by force, Bel-lone by composition, and fortified themselves in the Vincentin, by the taking of many other places, as of Sersaule, a passage of great importance, the which Maximilian recouered soone after, with the like cruelty vpon the Italians, as the Italians had vsed vpon the Germans at the taking thereof; for hauing not yet assembled sufficient forces to goe to field, they make small attempts, besieging now one bourgh, then another, with small honor and reputation, for the quality of an Emperour: solliciting notwithstanding all his confederates, to vnite their forces for the taking of Venice. But who should haue reaped the profit? The pope would neither haue the Emperour nor King possesse it: and the Catholike King detested this enterprize as vniust and dishonest, moued therevnto, not with the loue of vertue, but with enuy, the which he bare to the greatnesse of our Lewis his vnckle, who hee thought should haue the greatest benefit by this conquest.

The Marquis
of Mantoua surprized by
the Venetians.

Whilest that the Emperour filled all Italy, with a vaine feare of his force, he sent the prince of Anhalt with ten thousand men into Friul, who at his entry tooke Cadore with a great butchery of those that defended it, and the duke of Brunswike (whom the Emperour had likewise sent) did put to route eight hundred horse and five hundred foote, which John Paul Gradenigo Commisary of Friul, brought to the succor of Ciuitall of Austria, which the Germans besieged. Christopher Frangipan did also defeate the Venetian officers followed by the forces of the country, he wasted the country, and seized vpon Chasteauneuf, Fiume and Raspruche. And the Venetians sending Angelo Trevisan generall of their army at sea thither, recouered Fiume and Raspruche. To conclude, by sundry prises, and reprises, mens goods and liues were continually in prey.

The Emperour hauing now assembled all his forces, prepares for the siege of Padoua. Besides the forces of the Empire, hee had seuen hundred French Lances, commanded, by by the Lord of Palisse: two hundred men at armes, which the Pope had sent him. Two hundred more from the duke of Ferrara, vnder the command of the Cardinall of Este: fixe hundred men at armes vnder diuers Italian captaines, eightene thousand Lansquenets: fixe thousand Spaniards, fixe thousand aduenturers of diuers Nations, and two thousand foote, which the sayd Cardinall brought vnto him for the Duke: with so wonderfull a preparation for peeces of batttery and munition, as the issue of this siege held at Italie in suspense. The Emperour had already taken Limini, neere vnto Padoua, by force, when as there chanceth a signe of happy successe for the Padouans and Venetians. Philip Rosse, and Frederike Gonzagua of Boffole, went with two hundred light horse, to gard the artillery that came out of Germany: fixe hundred horse issuing out of Padoua, hauing intelligence thereof, charge them in the night, defeate them fixe miles from Vincenza, and take Philip Rosse.

And in exchange, Maximilian hauing extended his companies about twelue miles off from Padoua, to bee assured of the commodity of victuals and pasture, takes by assault and sackes the bourg of Este, Monfelic and Montagnane, ouerthrowes three thousand peasants at the bridge of Bouolente, and carries away a great prey of cattaille, which they had gathered together. At length after many delaies (which gaue the Padouans leysure to fortifie and furnish themselues with victuals) hee is planted before the towne-walles, the fifteenth day of September. As for the defence of Padoua, the Venetians had furnished it with fixe hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horse, and fifteene hundred Stradiots or Albanois, commanded by captaines of great experience, the Earle of Petillane, Bernardin of Montone, Anthony Pie, Luc Maluette, Iohn the Gree, and twelue thousand choise foote, vnder the charge of Denis de Nalde, Zitole of Perugia, Lafance of Bergamo, Saccocio of Spoleto, and many other of meaner quality, and ten thousand foote, Sclauones, Greekes and Albanois. And why should not two and twenty thousand foote, and three thousand fixe hundred horse defend Padoua, with that multitude of Venetian youth, who (to make prooffe of their valour and piety to their country) had willingly thrust themselues into the towne, seeing they could not haue forced them in field, within any small trench? Padoua was furnished with great store of all kinde of artillery, victuals and a great number of peasants, who continually labored in the fortifications.

The fortifica-
doua.

The ports and other fit places were furnished with bastions without, and euery vault vnderneath full of barrells of poulder, to blow vp such as did assaile them. And within round about the city a palissadoe, or fortification of piles, trees and peeces of timber, fortified with a deepe ditch fixeene sadome broad: flanked with Casemats and small Towers full of artillery: and behinde the ditch a rampar of the same bredth, round about the towne, except some places where they could not plant any artillery, and before the rampar, a parapet of feuen cubits high, to couer them that should defend the rampars.

Behold all the Imperiall army is now planted before Padoua, but this was not to attempt a towne besieged, but rather an army camped in a towne which made head against an army, holding the field. The artillery thunders eight daies together, and preuailes so much, as it seemes they need not to shoot any more. They giue an assault to the bastion, at the point of the port of Codalungue.

The Spaniards and Lansquenets (seconded by some men at armes on foote) winne the bastion, and plant two Ensignes: but both the fortresse vpon the ditch, the valour of the defendants, the abundance of instruments for defence, artillery, stones, wild-fire, and all other kinde of offensue armes, force them to abandon it in hast, many remaying dead or wounded, so as the army being ready to assaile the wall (the bastion beeing wonne) he retired and disarmed without any farther attempt. Maximilian despairing of victory by these preiudicial beginnings, after seuentene daies siege rayseth his campe, and passing (in his retreat) by Vincenza and Verona, receiues their oath of fidelity, hee then dismisseth almost all his army, and tooke the way to Trente, determyning to make a truce with the Venetians for some monethes. But growne proud with this prosperity, seeing his associats to aide him so coldly, and supposing that a surceasing of armes would bee preiudiciall vnto them, they prepared to recouer Vincenza, Ciuitelle, Bassan, Monfelic, Montagnane, Este, Polesine and in the end to make warre against the Duke of Ferrara.

A But hee that vndertakes too much, repents sometimes. Desire of reuenge is a dangerous Counsellor, and the resolution not to endure a wrong either done, or pretended to be done, grounded rather vpon passion then reason, is commonly the cause of the Authors ruine. Alphonso duke of Ferrara recouering of Polesine, had (in hatred of the Venetian name) wonderfully spoiled the gentlemen houses of the country, hee receiued the towne of Este from Maximilian in fee, and Montagnane in mortgage. The Venetians (building the motiues of their disdaine thereon) send their Generall Angelo Trevisan with seuentene galleies, and a great number of other smaller vessells, towards Ferrara, and a good number of horse by land, to second their army at sea, the which beeing entred into the riuier of Po, and hauing burnt Corbole, and some other villages neere adioyning, they spoiled all the country, euen vnto the Lake of Scure, and without difficulty recovered all the territory of Polesine. To withstand these violent courses, the Ferrarois plants his artillery vpon the banks of Po, to stop the passage of this army, and forceth Trevisan to cast anchor in the midst of the riuier, behind a small Island right against Pulicelle, a commodious place to molest the Ferrarois, and there he fortifies himselfe with two bastions vpon the banks, the one on the side of Ferrara, and the other opposite, whilest that other vessells assailing the duke of Ferrares country in an other part, take Comache.

The Venetians make warre against the Duke of Ferrara.

The duke strengthened with a hundred and fifty Lances, which the Lord of Chastillon brought him, and two hundred men at armes, which the Pope sent him (discontented that the Venetians had invaded this Duchy, without respect of the superiority which the church hath ouer it) fauored with the knowledge of the country, and the nature and opportunity of the riuier, hauing brought his cannon to the banke opposite to the enemy, beeing couered with a strong caufey, after an assault giuen to the bastion, where his men had the worst, hee saluted the Venetian ships so furiously, as some not able to resist, yeelded: others fiered with the shot, were miserably burnt with the men that were in them, others sinking, escaped the enemies hand, and the Generall sauéd himselfe by flight in a cock-boate, is galley-flying, shooting and defending it selfe, was in the end lunked.

To conclude, the riuier being full of bloud, fire and dead men, fifteene galleies came into the dukes power, some great ships, many foistes, and other small vessells in great number: threescore ensignes taken, and two thousand men slaine. This army defeated, Alphonso sent presently Hippolito Cardinall of Este his brother, against that army which had taken Comache: but the losse of the other hauing forced them already to retire, the Cardinall imploied his forces to recouer Loreto, which the Venetians had fortified.

This done, the Pope desirous to tye the duke of Ferrara vnto him, to the end that acknowledging the good he should receiue by his intercession, he should depend more vpon him, then on the King, against whom hee laied the foundation of great hatred, was a meanes the Venetians should yeeld Comache to the Ferrarois, and should no more molest his estate. And to reconcile them with Maximilian, he sends Achilles de Grassi, bishop of Pefera, his Nuncio vnto him. But through the Emperours excessiue demands, and the Kings Ambassadors crossing it, Achilles returned without effecting any thing. The season made them proceed coldly in matters of warre, vntill the end of this yeere. Maximilian and Ferdinand had contended before the King for the gouernment of the realme of Castille: the first for Charles his grand-child, the second building vpon his wifes testament, as wee haue seene before. In the end, the Cardinall of Amboise (not considering how much this accord did preiudice the Kings affaires) drew Maximilian to consent, that the Catholike King, in case he had no heires male, should be gouernor of the realmes of Castile and Naples, vntill that Charles his grand-child should come to the age of fixe and twenty yeers, and should pay vnto the said Charles forty thousand ducats yeerely, fifty thousand to Maximilian at one payment, and should aide him according to the treaty of Cambray, to recouer that which belonged vnto him. A conuention which gaue courage to Ferdinand to encounter the Kings greatnesse: the which, in regard of the realme of Naples he alwaies feared. Doubtlesse ambition did so blind the eyes of this good Cardinall, as hee could no more discouer this grosse policy, then fore-see that death prepared him a biere in stead of a pontificall chaire. In the end of this yeere died the Earle of Petillane, Generall for the Venetians, old and of great experience in martiall affaires.

Although they proceed slowly in matters of warre, yet princes mindes were distracted A with many distemperatures, especially the Emperours, who despairing to get the victory of the Venetians by his owne proper forces, perswaded the King to attempt the recovery of Padoua, Vincenza and Treviso, receiving a sufficient recompence. The King knew well, that whilst the Venetians possessed a foote of land, hee should still bee subiect to continuall charge, and dangers. But hee was diuerted from repassing of the mountaines, by the sickness of the Cardinall of Amboise, to whom only hee committed all his affaires: fearing likewise, least a new army should wholly withdraw the popes affection, who long before deuised, by what meanes he should dislodge the French out off the Estates of Italy, and fearing (as wee haue said elsewhere) least the King (being armed) should dispossesse him of his chaire, to place the Cardinall of Amboise in it, he labored to draw the English from the Kings friendship, hee practised to ioyne with the Suisses, by meanes of the bishop of Sion, to the preiudice of this crowne, and protected the Venetians.

In truth, wee may behold three princes act three diuers personages vpon this Theater. The King of a faithfull alie: the Emperour of a weak, and the Pope of a disloyall. In the end, the King (the better to supply the affaires of Italie) goes to Lions, with an intent to pacifie the Pope, or at the least, to keepe him from being his enemy. To this end hee sends Albert Pie Earle of Carpi, with commission to offer the Pope both the Kings forces and authoritie in all occurrents, to impart vnto him the affaires that were now handled: The requests which the Emperour made vnto him, and to leaue it to his discretion, to passe or not, into Italy: were not these sufficient submissions, to pacifie any discontented minde?

Contrariwise, Iulius receiued the Venetians into fauour, and the foure and twentieth day of Februarie gaue them full and absolute remission. Hee still sollicit the English to take vpon him the title of protector of the sea of Rome, against the French King, against whom (said he) if he made warre, many others (to whom his power was odious) would take armes. But hee drew the Suisses with more efficacie to the protection of the church, paying a thousand florines yeerely to euery canton. The boldnesse and presumption wherewith they refused to renew their alliance with our Lewis (but vpon condition to augment their pensions) had iustly displeased the King: but this vnreasonable repulse shall prooue very preiudiciall to this crowne. The King in exchange allies himselfe with the Valaisans and Grisons, who binde themselves to giue passage to his people, and to deny it to his enemies, and to serue him for pay, with such forces as they could make. The Pope fortified with this new alliance, bends all his thoughts to support and raise the Venetians, to reconcile them to the Emperour, and by their rising to pull downe our Lewis.

But the Popes alienation serued only to kindle new fires in Italy. The Emperour and the King discontent with the shewes, which the pope made in fauour of the Venetians, vnited themselves more strictly together: and the duke of Ferrara gaue the King occasion to aduance his forces, for the protection of his estate: for the duke hauing set an impost vpon all the marchandise that passed by the Po to Venice, the pope commanded him to free it, as not being in the disposition of the vassall to impose a tribute without the liberty of the Lord of the fee. And in case hee disobeyes, he denounceth warre against him. The duke thus threatened, flies to the King, who had before taken him into his protection, giuing thirtie thousand ducats; his estate also importing the King much for his affaires of Lombardie: yet loth to contend with the Pope, for the duke of Ferrara hee propounded conditions, whereby the Pope might rest satisfied of the interest, which the church, and hee, pretended against the duke.

In the end, as the Pope (the more hee sees himselfe sought vnto) shewed greater signes of bitterness, the Lord of Chaumont enters into Italie with fiftene hundred Lances, and tenne thousand foote: to whom the duke of Ferrara sent two hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse, and two thousand foote. At their first entrie, they take Polesine, Montagnagne, and Esté. Then the prince of Anhalt, Lieutenant to the Emperour, passing from Verona with three hundred French Lances, two hundred men at armes, and three thousand Lanquenets, ioyned with Chaumont, and ioynedly together, they march against Vincenza.

1510.

A The Vincentins abandoned by the Venetians army, which retired towards Padoua, fled to Chaumont to obtaine some reasonable conditions of the prince, who wonderfully moued with their rebellion, would not receiue them with any other condition, but to haue their goods at pleasure, and their liues saued. These victories were fruitlesse, without the taking of Legnague, the which the riuier of Adice diuides into two parts, wherof the lesse is called Porto. This riuier is diuided into many branches about Legnague, passing the last branch, they incounter some footmen, set to gard Porto. Out men charge them, repulse them, kill a great number, chase the rest, and enter pel-mel with them into Porto. The taking of Porto made the meanes easie, to batter the towne on either side the riuier, for the effecting wherof Chaumont sent capitaine Molare with foure thousand men, and sixe peeces of artillery, who hauing in a manner battered downe the bastion, which was vpon the cause, at the point of the towne, the Venetian Commissary retired himselfe into the castle, and the capitaine which commanded the bastion, yeelded to depart with bagge and baggage. The bastion taken, the towne was sackt by Molare, and the castle battered, yeelded the next day, vpon condition, that the Venetian gentlemen remayning Chaumonts prisoners, the soldiers should depart with white wands in their hands. At this time died the Cardinall of Amboise, vnle to the Lord of Chaumont, a man of a great spirit, and long experience in affaires, but with the seruice of his master hee did not forget the content of his owne private ambition.

C Ciuitelle, Marostique, Basciane, Feltre, l'Escale, and other places thereabouts (abandoned by the Venetians) opened their gates vpon view of the cannon. To conclude, all places whereas the armies passed, were exposed to takings, and retakings, sacking and burning; and all persons were at the victors mercie. Manslice remained yet. The towne is seated in a plaine, and the castle on the mountaine compassed in with three wals, wherof the lower required two thousand men, for the defence thereof. By reason then of a new conuention betwixt the King and the Emperour, that his army should continue yet a moneth longer in Italy, and that the extraordinary charge, about the payment of the companies, which the King had till then defraied, should afterwards be payed by the Emperour, and the footmen also for that moneth, and in consideration of fiftie thousand crownes, which the King should adde to fiftie thousand others, that he had formerly lent the Emperour, Verona with the territories thereof should remaine in pawne to his Maiesty, vntill it were satisfied: Chaumont besieged it; Seuen hundred foote, and some companies of horse hauing vpon their approach abandoned the towne, kept the first wall. Hee batters it, and makes a breach in diuers places. The French (followed with fiftene hundred Spanish Lances, newly arrived, vnder the command of the Duke of Termini) mount to the assault, chase the garrison, and skirmishing with them, they enter pel-mel, within the other two walles, and so into the castle, the most part being slaine. Such as were retired into the dungeon, yeelded: when as the Germanes setting it on fire, burnt both the place and the men, so as, of this number few escaped, either the fury of their armes, or of the fire. The towne was likewise consumed to ashes. This done, a new commandement from the King, calles backe Chaumont, with his army, into the Duchy of Milan: which the Pope beganne to disturbe. Moreouer two armies of diuers nations ioyned together, to make private conquests: hardly can the commanders remaine long vnited in one will. And the Germanes (who can doe little alone) lodged in Lonigoe.

Wee haue hether to scene, that Pope Iulius designs tended, not onely to restore the church to her pretended Estates, but also to expell the French out of Italie. His first proiect was effected; And now many considerations draw him to the second: The Venetians are partly restored, and all at his deuotion, hauing reuoked their censures. Hee is strictly allied with the Suisses. He knowes well, the Arragonois will bee alwaies glad to see the Kings greatnesse diminished, to haue the better meanes to settle himselfe at Naples: He findes the Emperours forces, and authority to bee feeble. He is not out of hope to draw the King of England into armes. And that which feeds this couetous passion, hee is well informed, that the King hath no will to make war against the church, and that at all euents, it shall bee in his power to make peace with him, and this is the last helpe the Popes haue alwaies relied on. But with what colour may Iulius arme against our Lewis? The King wil not

The Suisses forsake the alliance of France, and ioyne to the Pope.

A French army enters Italy.

1510. give ouer the protection of the Duke of Ferrara, and Iulius desires exceedingly the possession of his Duchie, grounded (although the Seigncurie of Comache, from whence Alphonso drew the salt, belonged directly to the Emperour) vpon the discord for the salt pannes, and customes which Alphonso leuied vnlawfully, and without the leaue (said he) of the Lord of the Fee. This was a crosse deuice to cloake his couetousnesse. To colour this, hee vrgeth the King againe to renounce the protection of the Ferrarois: vpon his refusall, hee protests to flie from the treatie of Cambray: that hee will not ioyne with him, neither yet bee opposite vnto him, and that without tying himselfe to any person, he will hereafter seeke to maintaine peace in the Church. But on Saint Peters day, hee discouers in effect the motions of his mind: that day the rents due to the Apostolicke Sea are payed: hee refuseth to accept those of the Duke of Ferrara, alledging for his reasons, that Alexander the sixth marrying his daughter Lucrece, could not (to preiudice the Sea) reduce foure thousand Ducats to an hundred. And the same day (having before refused to giue the French Cardinals leaue to returne into France) aduertised that the Cardinall of Auchx was gone to field with his dogges and nettes, hee sent to pursue him, as after a fugitiue, and held him prisoner in the Castell of Saint Angelo. And to winne vnto him the Catholike King, against the most Christian, hee graunts him the inuestiture of the Realme of Naples, vpon condition, to pay the same rent which the auncient Kings of Arragon had payed, and entertainment for three hundred men at armes, for the defence of the Church, when it should be demanded.

At league betwixt Ferdinand and the Pope against the King.

But behold a strange turbulent spirit, who attempting at one instant to assaile Ferrara, Genoua, and Milan, toyles himselfe infinitely to bring forth paine and confusion. The Ferrarois offered to giue him the salt made at Comache, and to bind himselfe, there should be no more made: yet proceeding against him, as against a notorious offender, hee sends his troupes led by the Duke of Vrbino, into the territorie of Ferrara: who at his first arriual, and at the onely summons of a trumpet, takes Cente, Pieue, Bagnacaul, and Lugo. But as hee camped before the Castell of Lugo, Alphonso comming with his people and some French companies, the Duke of Vrbino raised the seege, leauing three peeces of Cannon behind him (it is a dishonour for a Commander to loose his Artillerie) and retired into Imola, giuing Alphonso means to recouer that which they had taken from him in Romagnia. But the army of the church was no sooner refreshed, but they take the same places, and likewise Modena.

He sent eleuen Venetian gallies against Genoua, whereof Grille Contarin was Generall, and one of the Popes, in the which were Ottavian and John Eregose, Ierome Dacie and many other banished men. And by land Mark Antonie Colonne with an hundred men at armes, and seauen hundred foote. About the same time fixe thousand Suiſſes (in the beginning of September) passing by Bellinzone, camped at Vareſe, where foure thousand more ioyne with them: but this prooues but a fire of straw. Iulius hoped that Genoua beeing assailed both by sea and land, it would breed some infallible alteration; that the greatest part hating the French command, would easily maintaine the name of Fregose, and that the French amazed with this alteration at Genoua (beeing likewise prest by the Suiſſes) would recall into the Duchie of Milan, all such companies as they had both with the Emperour and the Duke of Ferrara: that by consequence the Venetians would recouer Verona, and he enioy Ferrara, and then with their vnited forces inuade the estate of Milan. But he reckoned without his host: let vs now see the proceedings of these armes. They shut those gates against him which he expected to find open. Chaumont at the first brunt of the enemies approach, had manned Genoua with some companies. Preian Pronoucal was entred the port with fixe great Gallies, the sonne of John Lewis of Fiesque, with eight hundred men of the countrey, and a Nephew to the Cardinall of Finall, with no lesse number, was come into the Towne, for the King, and these together preuented all insurrections. So the Pope and the banished men, frustrate of their chiefe hope, retire to Rapalle. And Colonne foreseeing that he should hardly recouer any place of safetie by land, for that the commons were risen, hee shipped himselfe in the Gallies with three-score of his best horse, and sent the rest by land to Spetie, who for the most part were spoiled vpon the Marches of the Genouois, Liquois and Florentins. On the other side, the Suiſſes which camped at Vareſe, vnder color (as they said) to go to serue the church, found in the end, to their losse, that they did but serue the ambir 1510. A ambition of one priuat man. Chaumont hauing manned all the passages with sufficient forces, sends Triumke to Mont Brianſe, that with his troupes and the helpe of the country men he might keepe the Suiſſes from seizing on the passage and hee him-selſe coasting along by them, and still skirmishing with them, with his horse and foote, and many field peeces, cuts of their victualles, and performing the duty of a good Captaine, without hazarding of anything, he annoyed them at the passages of Riuers. To defeat a poore, but a warlike nation, there is nothing but blowes to be gotten: and in loosing they hazard an estate. In the end, besides the continuall charges of the French army, oppressed with want of victuals and mony, they free our men (who are not accustomed to spend much in spies) of the doubt which troubled them, that is, whether they would passe to Ferrara by the Duchy of Milan, or turne by the hilles vnder Como, Lecque, Bergamo and Brescia, or else by the Guiradade, through the territory of Mantoua: for taking their way by the high places of Como, they went to luge at the bridge of Trese, where (brought to extremities for want of bread and mony) they retired by troupes to their houses. Whilest the French were elsewhere busied, the Venetians (making profit of their absence, and of the Germans retreat) recouer (without toile) Eſte, Monſelice, Montagnagne, Marostique, Basciane and Vincenza. Legnague staid their victories, but Verona ouerthrew them. They beseege it with eight hundred men at armes, 3000. light horse and tenne thousand foote, besides an infinit number of peasants, and batter it from a mountaine opposite, beeing counter-battered and wonderfully spoiled by the artillery from the town. But the Venetians desire was great, to conquer this city, and the valour of the beseege was no lesse to defend both their honors and liues.

They had foure hundred French Lances, three hundred Spaniards, a hundred Germans and Italians, siue hundred French foot, and foure thousand Germanes, which the Prince of Anhault (dead some few daies before) had left there: a thousand foote, with some cornets of French issue forth in the night, put them to the sword that kept the artillery, cloyed two peeces, and carried them away, when as Zitole of Perugia flying to the rescue, and being slaine with almost all that followed him, Denis of Nalde arriued: who recouering the prey, repulſed and beate them within their walls. But the Venetians daunted with this checke, seeing no rising of the people, as they expected, aduertised of the Suiſſes retreat, and that Chaumont came to succour them, they retired to Saint Boniface. The warres continued in Friul and Istria, with the accustomed insolencies and cruelties on either side, but more to the ruine of the country, and buildings, then of the people. At the same time, the Marquis of Mantoua came out of prison, at the Mantouans sute to Baiaxe Prince of the Turks, in whole loue the Marquis had many yeares held himselfe.

The Pope was not growne wise, neither by his owne, nor other mens losses: his vnfortunate attempts had nothing daunted his hopes: and they found the prouerbe true, to their cost: Hee that hath a companion hath a Maister. A witte blinded with presumption: who (seeing his practises now discovered; the port of Genoua furnished with a strong army, the town provided of all things necessary for defence) hopes to obtaine that now which he could not get when the port was disarmed: he perſwades the Venetians to a second attempt. They come to Genoua with fifteene light gallies, three great, one galleasse, and three Biscaine shippes. The French fleet going out off the hauen, with two and twenty light gallies, after they had giuen order, that the contrary faction should not rise, met with them at Porto Venere: where by the thunder of their cannons, and by the tower of Codisa, they forced them to retire to Ciuira-uecchia, whence the Venetian fleet parting to recouer the gulfe, a tempest cast siue gallies vpon the coast of Messina: the others beaten and brused, were driuen vpon the coast of Barbary, and in the end recouered the port of Venice, halſe lost. The army which came by land, led by the Arch-Bishoppe of Salerne, brother to Ottavian Eregose, by John of Safatelle, and Remiar of Safate the Popes captaines, seeing the fruitlesse attempts of the fleet at sea, in stead of Genoua, went to take Fanane in the mountaine of Modena. A small recompence for so many vaine attempts.

This disgrace did rather increase the Popes obstinacy, then make him faint. He might easily obtaine a peace of the King, and with such conditions, as might well content a conquerour. The King was content to referre the Duke of Ferrares cause to iustice, and gaue power to the Pope, to name such Iudges as he pleased. But Iulius (following the 1510. holy Oracles, loud cursing and cursing followed him: and for that he tooke no pleasure in blaspheming, it forsooke him.) Seeing the King yeeld to so reasonable conditions, he impudently demands, that Genoua be set at liberty, and with such bitterness, as the Duke of Sauoies Ambassador (offering his Princes intercession for their place,) he puts him in prison, and tortures him as a spy. He comerts all his thoughts against Ferrara. The Venetians thrust him forward, fearing (least in the end, loosing the hope of his desseins) he should be reconciled to the King. And the King (sufficiently informed of the Popes bad affection, resolves to defend the Ferrarois, and both by spirituall, and temporall armes, to crosse the Popes insolencies.

In the end of September the Pope comes to Bologna, with an intent to assaile Ferrara, both by water, and land; the Venetians on the one side, and he on the other, perswading himselfe, that at the same of his forces, the people would rebell against Alphonso. But the Venetian companies hauing brought many barks by the riuier of Po, into the territory of Mantoua, to make a bridge, the Duke of Ferrara with the French forces, set vpon them vnawares, tooke them, and many vessels in certaine chanel of Polesine, with the Venetian Comissary. Then was there discovered a practise which the Venetians had in Brescia, for the which the Earle John Maria of Martinengue was beheaded there. This stay of the flecte did nothing discourage the Pope, but perswading him selfe that his owne forces were sufficient to conquer Ferrara, he assembled them all at Modena, vnder the Duke of Vrbino being Generall, the Cardinall of Paury, John Paul Bailon, Marc Anthony Colonne, and John Vitelli, Captaines of authority, whilest that Chaumont incamped right against them at Rubiere and Marfaille, trying them with daily skirmishes: he gaue the Ferrarois meanes, with the Lord of Chastillon, to recover Polesine, Final, and Cente. Hauing sackt and burnt it to ashes, he went to ioyne with Chaumont, euen as three hundred men at armes, many light horse, and foure thousand Venetian foote, came to winne the passage of Po, and to ioyne with the Popes forces, hauing already taken Ficqueroles and Stellate on the other side, and forced Alphonso to goe to the succour of his country. Thus the two Venetian flectes, hauing free passage vpon Po, did greatly annoy the Ferrarois territory, by daily inroades and spoiles: when as the Duke issuing out of Ferrara, put to route that flecte, which was entred the riuier of Po, by Primare, and came vnto Adria: the other which consisted of foists and small vessels, being entred by Fornaces, and come to Puliselle, seeking to passe into the riuier of Adice, by a riuier adioyning they found the water so low, as they could not enter, but were so battered with the Ferrarois attillery, as they abandoned their shippes, seeking to saue themselves and their Cannons.

Conclusion is made by the French Church against the Pope.

The Pope seeing hee could preuaile nothing by his temporall forces, he flies to the spirituall: excommunicating Alphonso of Este, and all those that were, or should come to his succour, namely Charles of Amboise, with all the chiefe of the French army. This furious course made the King to assemble all the Prelats of his realme at Tours, with the most famous Doctores of all his Vniuersities, as well in diuinity, as in the ciuill and cannon lawes, who resolve vpon eight notable conclusions against the Pope: That it was not lawfull for the Pope to assaile any temporall Princes, by force, in their territories not belonging to the Church. That it was lawfull for any such Prince, for the defence of his subiects and country, not onely to repell this iniury by force, but also to inuade the territories of the Church possessed by any such Pope, not with an intent to hold the, but to the end (the Pope being dispossessed thereof) should haue no more meanes to molest his estate: seeing the Pope had, through the aide of the said Prince, recovered the same lands, vsurped before by certaine tyrants. That for so manifest a wrong and uniuert attempt, any such Prince might withdraw him selfe from the Popes obedience, for the defence of his temporall Estate, seeing hee had stirred vp many other Princes and common-weales, to inuade the dominions of the sayd Prince, who deserued reward and loue of the Apostolicke see. That this subtraction being made, they should obserue in France the common and ancient law, and the Pragmatique sanction, enacted at the councell of Basill. That any such Prince might by force defend another Prince his confederate, and of whome he had lawfully taken the protection, for those Seigneuries which he had long enjoyed, & with a iust title, seeing this confederacy had bin made with the consent of the said Pope, who as the chiefe was comprehended therein: & that this Prince allied, according to the forme of the league, had giuen aide for 1510. the recouery of the patrimonie of S. Peter: that the Pope pretending any thing due for any rights belonging to the church of Rome, & the Prince on the other side challenging to hold of the Empire, and should referre this controuersie to the censure of indifferent Iudges, as equitie required, that in this case it was not lawfull for the Pope, without further knowledge of the cause, to make warre against any such Prince: the which if he did, the said Prince might oppose his forces with other Princes his confederates, so as that right had not bene possessed by the Romane Church within an hundred yeares. That if the Pope would not accept this honest and lawfull offer, but contrarie to order and right, should giue sentence against any such Prince, maintaining his right not to depend vpon the Church: neither he nor any other by opposing, should incurr the censure of that sentence, seeing that Prince had no free access, neither to go, nor send to Rome to defend his rights. That if the Pope vniuertly (the due course of law not obserued, should by maine force, pronounce any censures against any such Princes, their allies and subiects resisting in such a case, the sentence were of no force, neither could it by any meanes bind.

These conclusions taken, the King (according to the resolution of the Councell) sent Ambassadors to Iulius, in the name of the French Church, to admonish him by brotherly and spirituall correction, that leauing his desseignes, he should attend to peace, concord, loue, and charitie, and reconcile himselfe with the fore-said Princes: vpon refusal, they should summon him to call a generall Councell, according to the decrees of the holy Councell of Basill. That his answer heard, things should be ordered according vnto reason. In the meane time, fortie light horse, and fife hundred foote (hauing at the first summons of a Trumpet, yeelded Carpio to Albert Pie), were incourted by foure thousand foote, ledde by Pulisse, defeated, and in a manner all slaine. And Chaumont desirous to charge the Church forces, before they should ioyne with the Venetian companies, and three hundred Spanish Launces, which Ferdinand had sent him, in consideration of the inuestiture of Naples: but not able to draw them, but to some light skirmishes, by the perswasion of the Bentiuoles, hee turned his forces against Bologna, where the Pope remained sicke, both doubtfull of the peoples faith, being beleeged, and so discontented with the long stay of the Venetians, as hee protested publicly to Ierome Donat their Ambassadour, that if their succours entred not the next day into Bologna, hee would agree with the French. And at that instant sent hee John Francis Pic, Earle of Mirandole, to treat with the Lord of Chaumont. Chaumont not to alter this good disposition, vnderstanding the Kings pleasure, keeps his troups within their lodgings, and sent backe the Earle with these propositions: That, Alphonso of Este, and all those the Pope had comprehended in his censure should be absolved: That in regard of the Venetians, nothing should be done contrarie to the treatie of Cambray: That the controuersies betwixt Alphonso and the Pope should be decided within fixe moneths by Iudges chosen by their common consent: That Modena should bee restored to the Emperour, Cotignole to the King, and the Cardinall of Auchx set at libertie: and that the giuft of all Benefices within the Kings dominions should bee according to his nomination.

But Chiappin Vitelli entring into Bologna with 600. Venetian light horse, and a squadron of Turkes, which they had in pay, made the Pope to sing another note, That there was no meanes of accord, if the King did not absolutely abandon the defence of the Ferrarois. And Chaumont seeing that, neither by the treaties of peace, nor by force, he preuailed any thing, the people of Bologna holding themselves quiet, and at the Popes deuotion, being also afflicted with the winter, and want of victuals, he returned to Chasteaufranc and Spiliberre, the which he had lately taken. Chaumont is no sooner gone, but the Pope strangely incensed, exclaims against the King to all Christian Princes, as thirsting after his blood & the territories of the church, hauing caused him to be beleeged with all his Cardinals and Prelats in Bologna: & returning to his former course with more vehemency, he sends his troups to field, augmented by fife hundred men at armes, sixteene hundred light horse, fife thousand foote, and three hundred Spanish Launces. But whilest this armie sojournes about Modena, some squadrons running towards Rhegium, being defeated by the French, they lost an hundred horse, & the Earle of Marelisque was taken prisoner. Moreover, the Duke of Ferrara with the Lord of Chastillon incamped vpon the Po; betwixt Hospitalet & Bondin, opposit to some other Venetian 1511. Venetian companies, that were on the other side of the river: they sunke nine of their vessels, A and forced the rest to returne to Venice. These small victories were crost by taking of Saffuole and Forminge, whilest that Chaumont refreshed himselfe within Paugia, and Aubigne at Rhegium. These conquered townes incensed Julius more violently against Ferrara, the which he knew was well furnished with men, and things necessary for defence: and the French through the continuall toyle of the warre, were tired both in bodies and mindes. And presuming to make the enterprise more easie, he went himselfe in person, the 2. of Ianuary, before Mirandola, aduertised that Chaumont had made an escape to Milan, drawne thither (as they said) with the loue of a young Gentlewoman. A journey which did greatly quail the courage, and hope of them that defended Mirandola, who see themselves abandoned, not so much by the negligence, as by the dissention betwixt Chaumont and John Iaques of Triuulce, (who then was gone into France:) whereby it may be, he was not much displeased to see the Earles of Mirandola (grand-children to Triuulce, by reason of Francis their mother, his bastard daughter) deprived of that place. In the end, after all the duties that might be performed by men besieged, despairing of succours, seeing a breach made, and the water of their ditches so frozen, as it bare the souldiers, they obtained in the end (by the intercession of the Cardinalls which assisted the Pope) to depart with bagge and baggage: vpon condition that Alexander Triuulce Gouvernour of the towne, and all the Captaines, should remaine prisoners: and to redeeme the towne from sacke, which he had promised to his souldiers, they should pay a certaine summe of money.

After the taking of Mirandola, two things were propounded in Councell by the French: whether they should assaile the enemye, or beseege Modena or Bolonia, to draw the Popes forces out of the Estate of Ferrara, and by that meanes to draw them into a conuenient place for a battaile. Great Captaines hold it for a firme maxime, and experience hath alwaies taught it, That we ought neuer to vndergo the hazard of a battle, but for some great advantage, or when as vrgent necessitie doth constraîne. This was the aduice of Triuulce, newly returned to the campe, and accordingly resolution was taken to go to Modena. But let vs obserue a Spanishe trick. The policie and secret aduertisements of Ferdinand did more harme to the King his vnkle, then the Popes open force. He thinks this to be a meanes to pacifie the Emperours spleene, and to sow some diuision betwixt the King and him. Modena was held time out of mind, to be a fee of the Empire, and the house of Este had not enioyed it but by the Emperours inuestiture. Ferdinand then aduiseeth the Pope, to the end the French should not haue it, to restore it to the Emperour, as a towne of his Iurisdiction. So Vitfruch Maximilians Ambassador, hauing receiued it in that forme, gaue notice vnto Chaumont, that Modena did no more belong vnto the Pope, but to her ancient and lawfull Lord. And to enioy this restitution quietly, Vitfruch and Chaumont agreed together, that the French forces should not offend Modena, nor the territorie thereof: and during these gauboles betwixt the King and the Pope, it should fauour neither partie.

Then died Charles of Amboise, a Captaine, whom the name of the Cardinal of Amboise his vnkle, and the gouernement of the estates of Milan and of the Kings armies held in great reputation in Italy: a faithfull seruant to his King, but (to beare so great a burthen) he wanted a longer experience in the art of warre: seeing that after the death of his vnkle, through that defect he was become contemptible to his souldiers: to whom (to keepe them the better at his deuotion) he gaue too much libertie, John Iaques of Triuulce, as Marshal of France tooke vpon him the command of the armie, attending the Kings pleasure, and inflamed with an honest ambition to performe something worthie of his vertue, hauing in the moneth of May gathered together twelue hundred Lances, and seuen thousand foote, he besieged, tooke, and sacked in one day the towne of Concordia, and won Chasteaufranc by composition. Then approaching Bolonia, he so amazed the Pope, as hauing founded the Bolonois minds, and drawne from them an oath of fidelitie, he left the Cardinal of Paugia there, and retired to Rauenna. He is no sooner gone, but the people looking to the preservation of their priuate and present estates, and seeing themselves surcharged with two armies, they take armes and hinder the Cardinal of Paugia from bringing in of any forces. The Cardinal fainting, and fearing the armed multitude should seeke reuenge for their honourable citizens, whose heads he had lately cut off, as fautors to the Bentiuoles, flies in the night disguised

The Legates flight being knowne, the people began to sound out the name of Popolo, with great mutinie and tumult. Laurence Ariosto, Francis Rimuchio, and other Captaines of the towne, affected to the Bentiuoles, runne to the gates of S. Felix and Lamas: breake them downe, call the Bentiuoles, and receiue them into the towne. The Duke of Vrbino aduertised of the Legats flight, and of the peoples rising, dislodged in the night, (leaving most part of his tents and pavilions standing) with all his armie, except such as for the guard of the camp were on the other side of the river towards the French, to whom he gaue no intelligence of his departure. The people vnderstanding of his retraite, and the peasants comming downe from all parts, with great cries and shoutes, pursue them, take fifteene peeces of great artillery, and many lesse, the Duke of *Vrbino*s standard, their munition and baggage. The soldiars had time to saue themselves, whilest that Raphael of Passi, one of the captaines of the Church made a stand at the bridge of Rene, vntill that by the taking thereof, and route of all his people, the whole army had a free passage to Bolonia. A victory extraordinarily happy, hauing in one night conquered a great city, and without perill or fight broken a whole army. The Bishoppe Vitelle held the Cittadell, and Vitfruch, posting thither in the night, perswades him to deliuer it into the Emperours hands: but three thousand Ducats which the Bolonois gaue him, made him to open the gates, the people hauing recovered it, to free themselves both from subiection, and the iealousie of nations, and also from the feare they had, least the King should retaine it, they ruined it to the ground. The Duke of Ferrara making his profit of this victory, recovered Cente, Pieue, Cotignole, Lugo and other townes of Romagnia.

At the same time, the Emperours and the Kings Deputies, assisted by the Cardinalls of S. Croix, S. Malo, Baioux, Cosense, Albret, and many others, publish a counsell at Pisa, for the first of September, the which was lately returned to the obedience of the Florentines. To crosse this counsell, the Pope (following the aduice of Anthony de Mont of Saint Samson one of the 8. Cardinalls newly created at Rauenna (appointed a generall counsell the first of May, at Saint John de Lateran in Rome. And to keepe the Kings forces quiet, he collourably gaue eare to a peace, which the Bishoppe of Tiuli, his Nuncio, and the King of Scots Ambassador treated for him with the King, and the Cardinalls of Nantes and Srignon with the Pope. But these practises of peace are broken by the Popes infirmity, the which hauing brought him euen to the pits brink, gaue him yet respite to stirre vp long calamities. Julius is no sooner freed from the danger of death, but hee makes a new league with the Senate of Venice, and the King of Arragon against the French: to maintaine (said hee) the vniou of the Church, to defend it from apparent Schisme, and to recouer all such places, as mediately or immediately depended on the Church.

A new league against the French.

The first of September was come, when as the Cardinalls Attournies, in their names, do celebrate the acts appertaining to the opening of the counsell of Pisa. And the Pope much incensed, that the florentines had yielded to the celebration of this petty counsell (as he termed it) in their estate, declared Florence and Pisa subiect to the Ecclesiasticall censure, by vertue of the Bull of the Councell which he had caused to be published, and he pronounced the aboue named Cardinalls fallen from the dignity of Cardinal, and subiect to the punishments of heretikes and Scismatikes. The Florentines and Pisans appeale from this curse to the holy councell, (not of Pisa, but to erre least in their termes) of the vniuersall Church: and by the magistrates commandement, the Priests continue the publike celebration of diuine seruice in their Churches. The pretext to reforme the Church was goodly and of great profit. But oh pleasant reformers! the Authors of this Councell, thrust on by their owne priuate ambitious desseignes, vnder collour of a generall good, contended of their own priuate interest, so as euery one might plainly see, that whosoever should be chosen Pope, would haue no lesse neede of reformation, then those they now undertooke to reforme. So as euen at their first entry the Cardinalls tried both the contempt and hatred of the commons. They call the clergy to assist in the Cathedrall Church at the first session. No one appeares, the Priests deny their ornaments to the Cardinals offering to celebrate the masse, and shut the Church doores, so as the Cardinalls fearing they should not remaine safe at Pisa, vnlesse they were backt with forreign forces, and the Florentins vnwilling to admit any, remaine

The Council
transported to

remembering the Pisans rebellion vnder Charles the eight they decreed to haue the Council A transported to Milan. They found the like difficulties at Milan. The Clergy abstaine from saying seruice, as before accused persons: the commons curse them, and laugh at them in open streets, namely at the cardinall of Saint Croix chosen President of the council, whom euery one noted to be the Author of this assembly, hoping by fauor thereof to make him-selfe a foot-stoole to climbe to the Popedome. This refusal of the Milanois made them againe to transport the Council to Lions. Where Iulius being suspended from his Popedome, and prohibitions made throughout all France, not to send any mony to Rome, nor to bring any Bulls from thence, he did not onely excommunicate all the French, but also graunted Bulls of pardon and remission, to any one that should kill a French-man: giuing the realme B of France (and that of Nauarre, in hatred of John of Albret allied to the King, and at the perswasion of Ferdinand King of Arragon, who had long gaped after some occasion to lay hold of it,) in prey to the first conqueror. So this council did nothing but increase their spleenes and kinde new troubles. But as the King had an intent to assaile Romagna, or to maintaine the warre in anothers country, attending his owne comming in person the next spring with all the forces of his realme, behold sixteene thousand Swisses, with seauen field peeces (new raised by the cardinall of Sion, vnder the authority of Iulio) enter by Varese and Galere, and from thence they send a trumpet to desie Gaston of Foix, Duke of Nemours, who with the Council of Triuulce commanded the French armies, as Lieutenant Generall C to the King his Vncle. Gaston (hauing speedily assembled seauen hundred horse, and such foote as the vrgent necessity would suffer him, the companies beeing diuided into sundry garrisons) presents himselfe before Galere, with much artillery.

The Swisses goe forth in bataille: yet vnwilling to fight in so open a place, they retire to Busti. In the meane time the compaines of men at armes, and foote, come from all parts to Milan. Capitaine Molare with his Gascons came from Verona, and the Lanquenets from Carpi, who reuiued the spirit of the Milanois, being somewhat daunted by this sodaine descent. And the more, for that certaine letters were surprisid which the Swisses had written to their Lords, that they had no newes, neither of the Pope, nor of the Venetian army. So as hauing found some difficulty to passe the riuer of Adde, they tooke (as in their first journey) the way of Como, and so euery one to his home. Shewing, that for want of conduct, assistance and paiement, they do commonly terrefie more then hurt.

Warre in Romagna.

After the Swisses retreat, behold all the townes the Ferrarois held in Romagna were exposed in prey to the Spaniards, being ioyned to the forces of the Church, who assembling at Imola, a thousand men at armes, eight hundred Generaires, and eight thousand Spanish foote, with many Barons of the Realme of Naples, vnder the command of Fabrizio Colonne, their Generall; and for the Pope eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and eight thousand Italians, vnder Marke Anthony Colonne, John Viselli, Malateste sonne to John Paul Baillon, Raphael of Passy, and others, all subiect to the command of the Cardinall of Medicis, Legat in the army, resoluing to beseege Bologna. The Duke of Nemours had put into it, (besides the inhabitants and some horse and foote entertained by the Bentiuoles) two thousand Lanquenets, and two hundred Lances vnder Odet, sonne to Peter of Foix Viconte of Lautrec, Tues of Alegre, Anthony of Fayet, Peter Terrail, surnamed Capitaine Bayard, and in the meane time assembled all the forces of Italy together at Final, to preserue Bologna from the enemy. Already a hundred fadome of the wall neere to Saint Stephens gate were layed euen with the ground, the Tower at the gate was already abandoned, and the Spaniards had planted an enseigne vpon the wall, when as the beseegeed placing their Cannon in counterbattery, and hauing slaine some of them that were mounted, they forced them to retire in disorder.

chance.

These first attempts had troubled the people, if Gaston had not sodenly re-enforced the Towne with a thousand foote and a hundred and fourescore Lances. The beseegeed thus fortified, a strange successe doubles their courage. Peter of Nauarre hauing set fire to a mine which he had made at the port of Chastillon, where there was a chappell, both the wall and the Chapell leaped so into the aire, as the army without defcoured the towne plainly, and the soldiars prepared to defend the assault, but both the wall and Chapell falling down, settled in the same place from whence the violence of the fire had forced them. Doublelesse

A Doublelesse the Bolonois had reason to make a miracle of this accident, and to beleue, that this fall vpon the same foundation, was a manifest testimony of Gods assistance. This happy successe brought Gaston to Brescia, whether the Venetian army marched, to effect some intelligences: but perswaded by the Captaines of Bologna, that his absence would double the enemies courage, hee parts from Final, and marching all night (notwithstanding the snow, and violent windes) entred the citty in the morning, with thirteene hundred launces, six thousand Lanquenets, and eight thousand French and Italians, before the enemy had any notice thereof: who being assured of the truth, retired their artillery secretly, and tooke the way to Imola. In the meane time Andrew Gritti, generall of the Venetians (perswaded by Count Lewis Auogare, and the most part of the Country men) had taken the Towne of B Brescia by assault, where James of Aillon Lord of Lude kept the castile still. People newly conquered do commonly the like in all occasions. Bergamo (the two castles excepted) Or-ciueche, Orcinoue, Pontuique, and many places there-abours, obey the victors. The Duke of Nemours leauing three hundred Launces, and foure thousand foote in Bologna, posted with all speed to Brescia, and hauing intelligence that John Paul Baillon lodged in the Isle of Elcale, with three hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horse, and twelue hundred foote, he goes to charge them with three hundred Lances, and seuen hundred Archers; hauing ouer-taken them (as they were ready to passe the riuer of Adice) at the tower of Magnanin, he chargeth them, defeats them, and kills almost a hundred horse, takes many prisoners (amongst others Gui of Rangon, and Balthazar Signorel of Perugia) disperfed all his foote, (whereof the most part were drowned in passing) and takes two Fauconeux which he had. The next day, in an encounter, hee defeated Melager of Furl, Capitaine of the Venetian light horse, the commander remaining prisoner: so continuing his dessein, hee arriued at Brescia nine dayes after his departure, besieged it, takes it by force, and sacks it. Doublelesse this braue Prince did hazard his owne ruine, if hee had not, with great iudgement and order, commanded, that no man should looke to any spoile; before the towne were fully at his command. And he did so well put it in practise, as the first that made shew to abandon his ranke was slaine by his companions. But who doth vie such discipline at this day, when as being greedy of booty, they loose so goodly occasions? Our French lost

the French.

C some men at armes, & many foot: but the enemy lost about eight thousand: some being inhabitants armed, some Venetians, who were five hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, two hundred Stradiots, and eight thousand foot. Frederick Contarini Comissary of the Stradiots was slaine. Andrew Gritti, Anthony Iustinian, John Paul Munfron and his sonne, the Cheualier Volpe, Balthazar of Scipion, one of the sonnes of Anthony of Pie, Count Lewis Auogare his two sonnes, and Dominique Busche Capitaine of the Stradiots were prisoners. Count Lewis and his children (the chiefe authors of this rebellion) were afterwards beheaded. A reuolt deerely bought by this citty, which yeelded not to any other in Lombardy, in Nobility and dignity, and in wealth (next vnto Milan) it exceeded all the rest.

This chastisement made Bergamo and the other reuolted Townes, to call back the French whom they had lately expelled. These prizes and reprises; conquests and happy successe, prolonged the stay of the French in Italy, and yet they did nothing settle their affaires, seeing what they enioyed, was rather a charge and expence to them, then any profit. But behold strange crosses both by land and sea, do here-after bandy against the happinesse of our men. They giue the King intelligence from Rome, that Henry the eight King of England (notwithstanding his promise) was ioyned in league with the Pope, and it was confirmed by writing, that a Galeaffe laden with wines, corne, and other prouision, arriuing in England from the Pope, had exceedingly altered Henry, with the Nobility, Clergie, and commons of England. That he should with his army at sea inuade the coasts of Normandy and Britanny, and send 8000. foote into Spaine, to begin warre in Guienne ioyntly with the Arragonois. And they made already great preparations of men and shipping in England, and likewise of ships in Spaine, to passe into England.

A new league
against the King.

F Moreover the Emperour was altered and changed in his affection, complaining that the King (contrary to the capitulation of Cambray) did hinder the advancement of the Empire in Italy. Hee required that Renée the Kings youngest daughter should be promised to Charles his grand-child, giuing him Bourgongne in dowry: and that the Lady should then 1512. then be presently deliuered into his hands and custodie. That the controuerfies for Ferrara, A Bologna, and the Councell should be referred to him. And moreover, hauing made a truce with the Venetians for eight moneths, he protested, not to suffer the King to increase his estate in Italie: But these were but bare shifts to couer his bad intent. Besides, the Cantons of the Suisses were so incensed against this Crowne, that although the King sought to winne their loues with store of gold, yet the perswasions of the Cardinall of Sion (whereby wee may see that Cardinals haue beene alwaies dealers in matters of State) had newly made them graunt to the confederates a leauie of fixe thousand men. And the Pope, to straine all his strings against our Lewis, fearing lest his extreame rigour should induce the Florentins to follow the Kings fortune, to the prejudice of his desseignes, he reuokes, without any suit, the censures whereunto he had bound them.

To quench this fire before it flamed farther, the King commanded his Nephew to march B with speede against the confederates armie, of whom he promised himselfe the victorie, being amazed and yet the weaker, and then to assaile Rome and the Pope with all violence, desirous that this warre (to seeme the lesse odious) should be made in the name of the Coun-cell called first at Pisa, and that a Legat deputed by the Councell, should receiue the conquered Townes, in the name thereof. The Cardinall of Saint Seuerin was appointed Legate of Bologna in the armie. So the Duke of Nemours furnishing all places with men necessary for defence, gathers together all the forces the King had in Italy, he makes a troupe of fixeteene hundred Lances, fixe thousand Lansquenets, fixe thousand Gascons, and eight thou- C sand French and Italians, to whom the Duke of Ferrara added an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse, and a great quantitie of good artillerie: Gaston hauing left his at Final by reason of the bad way. The enemies armie was 1400. men at armes, a thousand light horse, seauen thousand Spaniards, and three thousand Italians newly leuiued.

The French
army in Italy.

Gaston thrust forward aswell by the Kings commaund, as by his owne valour and desire of Glory, was desirous to see if the enemy would willingly trie the hazard of a battaile: They on the other side temporized, attending their Suisses, and that the English and Spaniards beginning warre in France, should force the King to call backe all, or the greatest part of his troupes: and yet coasted alongst the French army, least the townes of Romagna should bee left in prey, and the way layed open to go to Rome, lodging alwaies in strong places, neere D to some strong towne, which might serue them for a retreat at neede. So the Duke of Nemours (not able to cut off their victuals through the commoditie they had of the townes of Romagna; nor force them to fight, without great disadvantage) goes and incampes before Rauenna, hoping they would not be so base minded, as to suffer such a cittie to bee lost before their eyes: and by this meanes an occasion should be offered to fight with them in an equall place.

The enemy discovering this purpose, sends Mark Anthonie Colonne to Rauenna, with three score men at armes of his companie, Peter of Castre with an hundred light horse, Sala- zar and Parades with fixe hundred Spaniards. The towne is seated betwixt two riuers, Ron-que and Montone, which descending from the Appenine hilles, straighten themselves neere E vnto Rauenna, with so small a distance, that on either side they passe close to the walles, then ioyning together they runne into the sea three miles from thence. Gaston incampes himselfe betwixt the two riuers, and plants his artillerie, some against the tower of Ronconne betwixt Port Adrian and Ronque, and some on the other side of the riuer of Montone, whether almost halfe his troupes were passed to batter in diuers places, and to hold the riuer at his will. He batters the wall, makes a breach of thirtie fadome, chooseth tenne out of euery companie of men at armes to couer the foote: diuides his armie into three squadrons, and giues a furious assault, although they could not mount but with ladders, the wall remaining yet about three yards high. Those within maintaine it valiantly, and fighting the space of three houres, in the end they repulse our men with the losse of three hundred foot and some F men at armes, with a great number hurt: amongst others the Lord of Chastillon, the master of the Ordinance, and Spimensc, who beeing hurt with the Artillerie from the Towne, died within few dayes after. In the meane time the cittizens amazed, and fearing a more dangerous charge, treated of their yeelding without the consent of Mark Anthonie Colonne, when as behold, the enemy comes, marching to their succour, who campes at Moulinache three miles

A miles from Rauenna, fortifying themselves with a trench, such as the shortnesse of time 1512.
would permit, leauing an entrie of about twentie fadomes.

Gaston raiseth the siege, turns the mouth of the Canon towards the enemies, an on Easter day the eleuenth of Aprill, passeth Ronque, leauing his rereward led by Tues d'Aligre vpon the riuers side towards Rauenna, to succour the armie at neede, to make head against those that should issue out of the towne, and to keepe the bridge which they had made vpon the riuer of Montone: then disposing of his troupes, he giues the auant-guard to the Duke of Ferrara, the battaile to the Lord of Palisse, and the Cardinall of Saint Seuerin, who great both in mind and bodie, couered from the head to the foote with most glittering armes, performed the office of a Captaine rather then of a Prelate. Gaston reserued to himselfe no pri-uate charge, but would be free, to see and succour in all places, the beautie of his armes; his cassocke, his cheerefull countenance, his eyes full of vigour, and sparkling for ioy, made him very apparent. The enemies seeing our French passe the riuer, were ranged in battaile. Fa- brice Colonne led the fore-ward, the Cardinall of Medicis, Legat of the Councell of Late-ran, the battaile: but (a fatall signe) in a peacefull habit: Carnagial a Spanish Captaine, the reere-ward. So the two armies approaching one to the other, stood immouable about two houres, the enemies beeing loth to abandon the circuit of their palissado. The Spaniards artillerie thunders, and at the first volley ouerthrow many French.

The French answers, but with a greater losse to their horse. Peter of Nauarre hauing caused the foote to couch flat vpon their bellies, Fabrizio cries, presseeth and importunes, to go to the battaile, and not to suffer them to be consumed by the Cannon. The Nauarrois contradicts, presuming that the more the danger increased, the more famous would the victo-rie be which he expected. But the Canon had so scoured their men at armes and light horse, as they could no longer keepe their ranks. There might you see men and horse fall dead to the ground, heades, armes and legges flie into the aire, when as Fabrizio cries out: Shall we die shamefully here, by the obstinate and malice of a villaine? Shall this army be consumed, with- out the death of any one enemy? must the honour of Spaine and Italy be lost for the pleasure of a Nauarrois? Speaking thus, he presseeth out of the trench with his companie, all the horse-men follow him, the foote rise, and with furie charge the Lansquenets. All the squadrons ioyne, D danger, glorie, hope and hatred of nation against nation flesh them in the combate. Fabri- cio Colonne is already taken by the Duke of Ferraras companie, Aligre chargeth in flanke with his rereward. The Viceroy of Naples and Carnagial are put to flight, leading with them almost a whole squadron. The light horse are dis-ranked, and the Marquis of Pescara their Captaine, prisoner, beeing couered with wounds and blood. The Marquis of Padillia is likewise defeated with his squadron, and taken prisoner. The Italian foote shrunke and began to turne their backs, if the Spaniards had not speedily come to second them against the Lansquenets. But all the horsemen fled, and the Spanish Battalion retired in order, when as Gaston turning to charge them with a great troupe of horse, not holding the victorie absolute, if those retired whole, he went courageously to assaile them. But alas, as they charge the hindermost, they are inuironed by this battalion, cut in peeces for the most part, and he E (throwne vnder his horse) was slaine, beeing thrust into the flanke with a pike. Doubtlesse a happy death for him, hauing this content in his soule, to die in so young an age, honored with so much glorie, the which he had purchased in few moneths by so many and so notable victories: but a fatall victorie, polluted with the death of so braue a Commander, who but euen now began to make his name and his valour knowne, and by his fall carried with him the happinesse of the French, and the strength of this armie.

The battaile
of Rauenna wonne by the French.

Gaston of Foix
slaine.

The Vicount of Lautrec his cousin, remained almost dead by him, maymed with twenty wounds: but led afterwards to Ferrara, and beeing carefully looked vnto, he escaped, to do the King notable seruice. Gaston beeing dead, the Spaniards retire without trouble or let:
the rest of the armie is broken and dispersed. The baggage taken, ensignes and artillerie: prisoners of marke, Fabrizio Colonne, the Marqueses of Pescara and Padillia, Estelle and Bitonto, the Earle of Monteleon, Iohn of Cardone, Peter of Nauarre, many Barons and Noblemen Spaniards, Neapolitans and Italians, and the Legat of the Councell of Lateran. There were slaine according to the common estimation, tenne thousand, and a third of the French, amongst which were Aligre and Vicarrois his sonne, Raimonet of S. Maur, Molare Ccc and

1512. and some other Gascoine captaines, Jacob Colonell of the Lanquenets, a braue man, and commended to haue assisted much with his troupe for the winning of this victory. Two thirds of the enemies, but almost all their chiefe captaines and the brauest of their army, a great number hurt, and most of them that fled, were stript and beaten downe by the countrymen, which lay in troupes by the way. And (for the last act of this Papal tragedy) Ra- uenna is taken by assault and cruelly sackt, and spoiled. Imola, Furly, Cesena, Rimini and all the forts of Romagnia followed the victors fortune, and the Legate of the Councell of Pisa, receiues them all in the name of the said Councell. The body of Gaston was carried to Milan, with an honorable conuoy, in a litter followed by the aboue-named prisoners, and interred with a wonderfull mournfull poimpe, namely of the soldiars, whose hearts he had so wonne, as they protested that nothing was impossible vnto them, vnder the leading of such a Commander. And the King his vnle receiuing these heavy tidings. I would to God (sayd he) I were drinen out of Italy, for as my Nephew de Foix and the other Noblemen lined. I wish such victories to mine enemies. If wee vanquish once more after this sort, wee shall be vanquished. Without doubt he had reason, for from that time this army (not able to finde a Commander of that credit) on the one side rich with spoile, on the other weake both of force and courage, by this so bloody a victory, seemed rather vanquished then victorious. This battaile had filled the Court of Rome with terror and tumult, and the Cardinals running to the Pope, prest him with instant praiers to accept a peace, with such conditions as the King offered by the Cardinals of Nantes and Strigonia, wherewith the King was yet content, notwithstanding the happy successe of his affaires: That Bologna, Lugo and all other townes, which Alphonso held in Romagnia, should be restored, and the Councell of Pisa disannulled. Julius seeing these conditions very honorable for him, and that vnder colour of these parles he should stay the Kings army, vntill he heard the resolution of those, on whom he grounded the rest of his hopes, subscribed these articles nine daies after the battaile, promising on his faith to the Cardinals, to accept them. But our Lewis must try once more, how dangerous it is to moue a warlike nation. The Suisses wonderfully discontented with the Kings refusall, to increase their pensions, by whose valour (said they) hee had conquered so great Estates without his realme, and for that he had entertained Lanquenets, as if hee had means to make warre without their forces, they haue no sooner receiued a florine of the Rhine for euery man from the Pope (whereas before the King was inforced to giue much gold, and great presents to their colonells, to haue them fight) but descending into Lombardy with seuen or eight thousand men, they force Palisse Lieutenant generall of the Kings army, to retire to defend the Estate of Milan, Robert Vrsin, Pompey Colonne, Anthony Sannelle, Peter Margane and Rance Mancin had (since the battaile) accepted the Kings pay, & now the descent of the Suisses, and the dislodging of Palisse, makes some to lead such men as they had leuiued with the Kings money vnto the Pope, others retaine the money to themselves, onely Margane (more modest then the rest) restores it againe. All this freed the Pope from feare, and confirmed him in his obstinacy. He begins the Councell of Lateran the third of May, pronounceth a monitory vnto the King. That hee deliuer (vpon the peines set downe by the holy Canons) the Cardinal of Medis, taken prisoner in the warre, being at Milan, and after some sessions he surceaseth, to attend the warre.

The treachery of Julius.

A new descent of Suisses.

Disorders in the French army.

John Paul Baillon, general of the Venetian army, attended the Suisses in the territories of Verona with foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and six thousand foot, being ioyned, they surprise a letter which Palisse did write to the general of Normandy, who remained at Milan: That it would be very hard to resist the enemies, if they turned towards the Duchy of Milan: A sufficient instruction to direct them in their course, which makes them to march towards Milan. Palisse had not with him aboue a thousand Lances and six or seuen thousand foot, all his other troupes being diuided into places for defence, and this generall of Normandy, as bad a warrior as a treasurer (I would not forget to name him, if I had learned his name) hauing after the battaile of Rauenna, vnder colour of sparing for the King, contrary to the disposition of present affaires, indiscreetly discharged the Italian foote and some French. And besides the small number of men, the dissention and disobedience of captaines, and the souldiars contempt of their Commander, ioyned with the discomodities of a tired army: a Generall little regarded, ill accompanied, in a country

A farre from succours, enuironed with mighty and many enemies, must needs produce some great and sodaine disorder.

The best meanes our captaines could find, was to abandon the field, and disperse their troupes into the most important places. In Brescia two thousand foote, a hundred and fifty Lances, and a hundred men at armes of the Florentins, in Crema fifty Lances and a thousand foote, in Bergamo, a thousand foote, and a hundred men at armes of the Florentines. The remainder of the army consisting of six hundred Lances, two thousand French foote, and foure thousand Lanquenets retired to Pontique, a strong place of situation, and fit to succor Milan, Cremona, Brescia, Bergamo, and to withstand the enemy: But it is a great inconvenience to rely most vpon forreigne forces, so subiect to change. The Emperour giues the first stroke, hee calls home his Lanquenets, and their departure making Palisse loose all hope of possibility to defend the Duchy of Milan, he retires to Pisqueton. So the Cremonois abandoned, yeelds (except the castle) at the first approach of the confederats, and pay forty thousand ducats to the Suisses. Certaine banished men returning into Bergamo, cause a reuolt, and Palisse being too weake to stop the enemies passage over the riuier of Adde, puts himselfe into Paui. But he sought to preuent the ruine of a great building with a rush. Then John Iaques of Triuulce, the generall of Normandy, Anthony Maria Palmosin, Galeas Visconte, and many other gentlemen and seruants to the King, sauing themselves in Piedmont, leaue Milan in prey, which bound it self at the first summons to pay a great some of money. Paui battered and abandoned by the French, is saued by the same meanes from spoile. All townes except Brescia and Crema, make hast to doe the like.

The estate of Milan lost by the French.

All the country calls vpon the name of the Empire. All is taken and gouerned in the name of the holy League (for so they called it) the Cardinall of Sion gouernes all at his pleasure, and causeth all the taxes of the conquered townes to bee giuen to the Suisses, so as vpon the brute of this money, an infinite number of other tunne and ioyned with the first. Rimini, Cesenne and Rauenna returne to the Popes obedience; Placentia and Parma yeeld willingly vnto him, as members of the gouernment of Rauenna. The Suisses seize vpon Lucarne, the Grifons (who also in this crosse left the French alliance) vpon Voltoline and Chianenne. Genoua rebels, expels the French, and John Frégose, a captaine in the Venetians army, returning, causeth himselfe to be created Duke, as his father had beene. At the same instant the Pope recouers all Romagnia, the Bentinioles abandon Bologna, and the Duke of Vibin seileth thereon in Julius name. So euery one pulls his peece from the whole, and all these estates conquered with so great toyle, so much money, and such losse of blood, are lost at the first attempt, after this great victory of Rauenna, with little labor and lesse bloodshed. Truly, the best wits are confounded in the iudgement of these things, and we must confesse, that the issue of humane affaires depends of a higher Councell then that of Man. Notwithstanding, according vnto man, to whom shall we impute the cause of these accidents, but to the death of the Duke of Nemours? for if he had liued, it is likely, that gouerning well his victory, he had (with his helpe that giues & takes) reaped the fruits worthy thereof. But greatness comes neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the desert, for it is God which gouerns, he pulls downe one, and raiseth another.

The Pope still gaped with his old ambition to haue Ferrara in his power. But by the intercession of the Marquis of Mantoua, the Ambassador of the King of Arragon (for that Alphonso was borne of a daughter of old Ferdinand King of Naples) and the Colones, Alphonso hauing demanded and obtained pardon of the Pope, vpon promise hereafter to doe the deeds and duties of a faithfull feudatary & vassal of the church, Julius turnes his reuenge vpon the companies, wherewith the Florentins had aided the King, whom he caused to bee spoiled by the Venetian soldiars, with the consent of the Cardinall of Sion, who notwithstanding had giuen them a passport to passe safely into Tuscane. And by the practises of the said Julius, who (according to the ancient desire of all Popes) sought to haue authority in this common-weale, the Medicis, with the helpe of the confederats, returned to Florence, & seiled themselves by force in the dignity which their father was wont to enioy. Italy being for this time freed from the feare of the French forces, the King holding nothing but Brescia, Crema, Legnague, the Chastlet & the Lantern at Genoua, the castles of Milan, of Cremona & some other forts, all these confederats gaped after the duchy of Milan: & the Suisses 1512. (on whom the Pope then partly depended) opposing themselves, not to suffer this estate to fall into the hands of any other Prince, but of such a one as could not maintaine himselfe without their aide and succour: Maximilian grand-child to Lodowike Sforze was named Duke of Milan, who made his entry in the end of December, receiuing the keyes from the hands of the Cardinall of Sion, as confirming the said Maximilian. That he held the possession of Milan in the Suisses name. An honorable act and worthy of their generosity, not to yeeld the honor which belonged vnto them to the other confederats, the which notwithstanding they should much esteeme, and (it may be) might haue obtained it for money. Nauarre returnes soone after to the obedience of Sforze.

Then the Genouois recovered the Chastelet of Genoua, for ten thousand ducats giuen to the captaine, and the Venetians besieging Brescia, Anbigni who defended it, resolues to deliuer it to the Spaniards, to breed a ialousie betwixt them, euen as a few daies before Palisse had giuen Legnague, to the Emperour, to nourish a discord bred betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians, who besieged it. Ottavian Sforze bishop of Lode, and gouernor of Milan, sent foure thousand Suisses to conquer Crema, for Maximilian Sforze: but Benedict Crubario, corrupted by gifts, deliuered it to the Venetians, with the consent of the Lord of Duras, who kept the castle. This was of purpose to breed a diuision betwixt the Suisses and the Venetians. A counsell generally concluded by the French, which remayned of this ship-wreck, the which in the end wrought some effects: but the losse fell vpon the French, for with this first disdain of the Venetians against the Emperour by reason of Legnague, behold a new leuaine of discontent is laied by the bishop of Gurce, Maximilians ambassador at Rome. Hee made great instance, that the Venetians should deliuer Vincenza to the Emperour, wherevnto, neither solicitings, intreatings, nor the Popes threats could induce the Venetians. The Pope (desiring to gratifie Maximilian: that in his fauor hee should approue the Councell of Lateran against that of Pisa) protested to the Ambassadors of Venice: That he should be forced to pursue their common-weale both with spirituall and temporall armes. So as nothing inouued with this protestation, the Pope, the Emperour and the Arragonois renue the league of Cambray, declaring the Venetians to be excluded. So the Emperour (by the bishop of Gurce, in the next session of this Councell of Lateran) disauowed all them that had vsed his name in the Councell of Pisa, and allowed that of Lateran.

A new league where the Venetians are excluded.

In the meane time, the six thousand English (promised by Henry King of England) were arriued at Fontaraby, a towne seated vpon the Ocean, and frontier of the realme of Spaine towards France, to assaile ioynly (according to the conuentions of the two Kings of Arragon and England, father in law and sonne) the Duchy of Guienne, vpon this pretext the Arragonois had intreated John, sonne to Alain of Albret King of Nauarre, (but by reason of Catherin of Foix his wife, heire of the said realme) to remaine a newter betwixt the King of France and him, and that for the assurance thereof, he should deliuer certaine places into his hands, promising to re-deliuer them when the warre should be ended. But the Nauarrois knowing well the demanders intent, obtains a promise of succors from King Lewis, who, to deliuer the Arragonois forces, treated with the duke of Alua Lieutenant generall for Ferdinand in this army. But when the one party is vigilant and politike, and the other slothfull, there soone appeeres great effects. The industry and vigilancy of Ferdinand, the slacknesse and too great facility of Lewis, who (abused with the policy and deuises of his nephew) did equally hurt the Nauarrois, who suffred himselfe likewise to be deceived with the fraudulent hopes wherewith the Arragonois entertained him, who (seeing the succors of France farre off, the realme vnfurnished of forces, and the places not yet fortified) enters into Nauarre, takes Pampelune, and the other townes of the realme, abandoned by John (being vnable to defend it) who fled into Bearne.

And hauing no lawful title to possesse it, publisheth, that he is lawfully seized thereon, by the authority of the Apostolike see, whereby the sayd Realme was giuen to the first that should conquer it, by reason of the alliance which John had with the French King, a sworn enemy to the church, and by the Popes bull, both being subiect to the censure, as heretikes and scismatikes. Without doubt the Pope holds not this prerogative of Iesus Christ, to giue Kingdomes, and to expose them in prey: for he exhorted to yeeld, and not to take from Cesar: and the Apostles did not busie themselves, to diuide earthly possessions. Moreover,

A is it lawfull for the Pope to vsurpe another mans right, giue away that which is not his own, and consequently vse the spirituall sword against those hee cannot iudge, hauing declared tege of Bayonne, who without this place made no reckoning of the rest of Guienne. But he held that which he long wished for, as a commodious cuntry and very necessarie for as the English, seeing that Ferdinand did vse them onely to satisfie his priuat couetousnesse tooke shipping and sailed into England.

To recouer this vsurped Realme, the King sent Francis Duke of Longueuille, gouernour of Guienne, Charles Duke of Bourbon, sonne to Gilbert late Vice-roy of Naples, Odet of Foix Vicont of Lautrec, John of Chabannes Lord of Palisse Marshall of France, Peter of Terrail, the Lords of Maugiron, Lude, Barbezieux, Turene, Escars, Ventadour, Pompadour, and other valiant Captaines, with the old bands and Gasccons, which hee assembled as Gouernour of Guienne, pretended the commaund to belong vnto him: and the Duke of Bourbon vnwilling to yeeld vnto him, by reason of his qualitie, prooued fruitlesse for the King of Nauarre. Thus the realme of Nauarre was inuaded by the Spaniard, who remained master thereof. The departure of the English, and the enterprise of Nauarre being made frustrate, the King affects the affaires of Milan, with greater vehemencie, whilest the Castell, and that of Cremona held good: but the opposition of so many enemies bred many letts. There were many hopes to draw some one of these from this common alliance. The Bishop of Gurce had courteously giuen eare to a friend of the Cardinall of Saint Seuerus, Court to make a motion, that the King should bind himselfe to aide the Emperour against the Venetians: that Charles grand-child to Maximilian, should marrie with the Kings youngest daughter, to whome he should giue the Duchie of Milan in dowrie: that the King should yeeld vnto them the rights he pretended to the Realme of Naples, and that the said Duchie being recouered, Cremona and Guiradadde, should be held by the Emperour. Moreouer the Venetians were wonderfully grieued at the Popes new treatie with the Emperour: which put the King in hope to draw the Venetians vnto him. The Arragonois came betwene by a politicke stratageme: to assure his new conquest of Nauarre, hee had sent two Fryars into France (it is the Spaniards custome to manage affaires by the meanes of religious persons, to make their negotiations the more graue, and to colour their policies with more subtiltie) to treat with the Queene, touching a generall peace, or a priuate, betwixt the two Kings. The amitie of the Suisses did import much. But remembering, that by their forces, Charles the 8. had first troubled the peace of Italy, Lewis his successour, by meanes thereof had conquered the estate of Milan, recouered Genoua, and ouerthrowne the Venetians: that at this present the Pope and other Potentates of Italy payed them annuall pensions, to be receiued into their confederacie: They grew obstinate in refusing the Kings alliance, which he sought by the Lords of Tremouille and Triuulce. In the end, the King (being reiectd by the Suisses) seekes to the Venetians, who conclude to make a league with the King, according to the capitulations made formerly betwixt them, by the which Cremona and Guiradadde should remaine to them. Robertet, Secretarie of State, Triuulce and almost all the chiefe of the Councell approued this league. But the perswasions of the Cardinall of S. Seuerin opposite to Triuulce, and the Queenes authoritie, (who desired much the greatnesse of her daughter by the fore-said marriage, so as she might remaine with her, vntill the consummation thereof) made the King and his Councell incline to the Emperours partie. But discouering, that these were but practises of the Emperour, to make the King proceed more coldly in his courses, he soone gaue it ouer.

Whilest that armes ceased on all sides, the Popes passions increased. Hee reuiued his designs against Ferrara, Sienna, Luques, Florence and Genoua, and as if it had beene in his power to beate all the world at one instant: he thrust the King of England into war, in whose fauor he had dispatcht a Bull in the Councell of Lateran, whereby the title of most Christian was giuen vnto him, and the Realme of France againe abandoned to him that should conquer it. But as he deuised of all these things, and without doubt of many other greater def-

Pope Julius dies.

A truce betwixt France and Arragon.

Peace betwixt the King of France and the Venetians.

A royall army in the Duchy of Milan.

Genoa taken.

A prince doubtlesse of great courage, of admirable constancie, and most worthy of glory, if he had directed his intentions to aduance the church by peace, as he sought to grow great in temporall things, by policies in warre. John Cardinal of Medici succeeded him, and was called Leo the tenth. The happy memory of his father, his lawfull election free from bribes and Simony, his faire conditions, his liberality and mildnesse of spirit, gaue great hope of the quiet of Christendome. Yet soone after his instalment, he shewed plainly that hee was rather a successor of his predecessors hatred and couetous passions, then of Saint Peter. According to the treaty of the aboue named Friars, the Kings of France and Arragon concluded a truce, whereby our Lewis hauing more liberty to thinke of the warres of Milan, resolved to send an army, knowing well that the people of that estate, oppressed with excessive taxes, leauied to pay the Suiffes, and with the lodging and payment made to the Spaniards, desired earnestly to returne to his obedience. And to make this enterprife the more easie, the accord propounded before with the Venetians was againe renewed: so as the Venetians considering, that a concord with Maximilian (keeping Verona from them) was not sufficient to protect them from troubles and dangers, and that hardly they should get such an occasion to recouer their estate, they bind themselves by Andrew Gritti: To aide the King with eight hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horse, and ten thousand foot: to recouer Ast, Genoua and the Duchy of Milan. And the King, to assist them, until they had recouered all they had possessed in Lombardy, and in the Marquisate of Treuise before the treaty of Cambray.

The King knew well, it was but labour lost to seeke the Pope, who desired to haue no Frenchman in Italy. Yet the deuotion he had to the Romaine sea, made him sue vnto Leo, not to hinder him in the recouery of the aboue named places, offering not onely not to passe any further, but also at all times to make such peace with him as he pleased. But Leo treading the steps of his Predecessor, perswades the King of England to ioyne with the Arragonois in the inuasion of France, according to the Bull giuen by Iulius, hee protested to continue in the league made with the Emperour, with the Catholike King, and with the Suiffes. The King thus frustrate of a peace with the Pope, sends the Lord of Triulce, with fifteene hundred Lances, eight hundred light horse, and fifteene thousand foot, halfe French and halfe Lansquenets. The whole country was already in a mutiny, the Earl of Mussocque, son to John James of Triulce, was entred into Ast and Alexandria: the French had taken Cremona, Sonzin, Lode and other places neere, and the Milanois had excused themselves to their duke, who was at Nouarre: for that hauing no man to defend them, they made their composition with the French, yet giuing him hope to returne to his subiection, when as the Suiffes and his confederates should ioyne in field. Bartholmew of Aluiane, Generall of the Venetian army, had taken Valege, Pesquiere and Brescia, when as the Kings army at sea approaching to Genoua and finding Othobon and Siniband, the sonnes of Lewis of Fiesque, leading foure thousand foote, and on the other side Antonel and Ierome Adornes, with a great number of the country men: they tooke Genoua from the Fregoses, where the victors entring (transported with the fury of reuenge) the two Fiesques bretheren, caused Zacharie brother to the duke of Genoua to bee slaine, and then to bee tied cruelly to a horse tayle, and dragged through the city, being present a little before, at the death of Ierome their brother, who coming out of the palace, had bene murdered by Lodowike and Fregosin, brothers to the duke.

All this succeeded well, but forty thousand ducats, lately sent by the Pope to the Suiffes, had drawne an infinite number into the estate of Milan, thrusting themselves into Nouarre, at the first brute that the French ment to besiege it. It was the same Nouarre, wherein Lodowike Sforze, father to this present duke, was taken prisoner. In the Kings campe were the same captaines, Tremouille and Triuulce, some of the same Ensignes and Colonels which had sold the father, accompanied the sonne in this warre. And these presumptions caused Tremouille to make this ouer-bold promise to the King: that hee hoped to deliuer him the sonne prisoner in the same place, where before he had giuen him the father. The representation of what had past, comforts this hope: but let vs take heed, least vnder this colour wee grow insolent and carelesse. Now the arogancy of our French, finds a firme resolution in the

A the Suiffes, whereof followes a strange catastrophe, and an ouerthrow of the designe. The armie batters Nouarre furiously, and layes a great part of the wall ceuen with the ground: but whereas the descent was wonderful hard and dangerous, so as Tremouille aduertised, that new Suiffes were entred into it, and that Alafaze, a very famous Colonell, brought a greater number, which coming by the valley of Aoust, approached to Iuree, dispairing to take the Towne, he retired his campe, to go fight with the succours that came, making his accompt to breake the enemies, rather by their owne disorders for want of pay, then by the force of his armes.

But by the perswasion of Matin, one of their Captaines, ten thousand Suiffes issue forth in the night, the sixt of Iune, without horses or artilerie, against a mighty armie, and better provided: they set vpon our French, not allcepe, but in a lodging vnfortified. The men at armes assemble at the first alarme of their Centinels, range themselves in bataille, and the foote vnder their colours. The artilerie layed many Suiffes on the ground, when as the Sun beginning to appeare, the bodie of their armie resolving rather to be cut in peeces then retire, seuen thousand of them fall violently vpon the Lansquenets, who guarded the artilerie: and 3000. of them plant themselves with their pikes charged against the horse. The Suiffes and Lansquenets, thrust on with a mutuall hatred, and a desire of victorie, hew one another with a bloudie furie, one while the one shrinkes, is chased and recoyles, and then the other: filling the field with dead bodies, wounded men, and with blood, in view of the men at armes, lodged so as they could not succour the foot, by reason of brookes and ditches, that were betwixt them. So the Suiffes after two houres combat remained victors, winne the artilerie, turne the mouth of it against our men, and put both foote and horse to flight, of whome there is nothing remarkable obserued, but that Roberts of la Marke Lord of Sedan, vnderstanding that Floranges and Jameis his sonnes, Colonels of the Regiments of Lansquenets, lay among the dead carcaies, moued with furie and a fatherly affection, he runs into the midst of the Suiffes troupes, and in despite of them, layes the eldest vpon his horse, and the youngest vpon one of his men at armes, bringing them aliuie out of the confict, beeing referred to shew future proofes of their valor. There died about fifteene hundred Suiffes, with the author of this glorious Councell: Of ours, the most part of the Lansquenets fighting, and of the French flying, vnto the number (as the Italian Authors say) of ten thousand. All the horse in a manner saued themselves: the Suiffes not able to pursue them for want of horse, all their baggage was lost, and two and twentie peeces of great Artilerie, with all the horse appointed for the same. Doubtlesse it was one of the most glorious batailles that euer the Suiffes wonne: whereby we obserue, that to be surprized and preuented, takes away all iudgement of command from the best commanders, daunts the souldiers courage, and breeds confusion in order. This victorie being gotten, all places which had declared themselves for the French, craue pardon, and purchase their peace for money. Milan for two hundred thousand Ducats, and the rest according to their power, to bee distributed to the Suiffes, to whome was due the glorie and profite of this victorie gotten by their blood and valour. Ottavian Fregose (aided by three thousand Spaniards, commaunded by the Marquis of Pescara) enters Genoua, and causeth himselfe (to the preiudice of John his brother) to be created Duke of Genoua. Aluiane (fearing least this happie successe of the Suiffes and Spaniards should draw them vpon him) retires himselfe, takes Legnague from the Germaines, beseegeth Verona, but in vaine, and then lodgeth his armie within Padua. The two chiefe Authors of the Councell of Pisa, Bernardin Caruagial, and Fredericke of S. Seuerin, amazed with this route, went and craued pardon of the Pope, and were restored to the ranke of Cardinals. In the end of the yeare, the Castels of Milan and Cremona, returned to the Duke of Milans obedience, so as the King held nothing in Italy, but the Lanterne of Genoua, the which we shall see taken and razed by the Genouois. Without doubt, hee that seekes profit farre from his owne home, is oft-times forced to returne poore and naked.

F The King thus dispossessed of his estates in Italy, now turnes his thoughts and armes to crosse the attempts of Henry King of England, who hauing (at the Popes perswasion) resolved to inuade the realme of France, agrees with the Emperour to giue him sixscore thousand Ducats, to enter into Bourgogne at the same instant, with three thousand horse, and eight thousand foot, Germaines and Suiffes, promising the Suiffes a certain sum of mony, to ioyne their 1513. their forces with Maximilian, being content they should retaine a part of Bourgongne, until they were fully satisfied. According to this agreement, the English enters the marches of Ficardy, and camps before Therouenne, with five thousand horse, and above forty thousand foote. But the English forces did not molest France at land onely, the Admirall of England ran along the coasts of Normandy and Britanny. And the King to resist their incursions, caused foure Gallies to passe the straight of Gibraltar, vnder the charge of Capitaine Pregent. At the first encounter the Admirall chased Pregent into Breff. Here Pregent turnes his force, fights with the Admirall, and hurts him, whereof he died within few daies after. After that, foure score English shippes, and twenty Normands and Brittons shippes, fought with equal forces, ours hauing the winde. But in the end Primauguet a Britton, Capitaine of the Ninne, which Queene Anne had caused to be built, beset by ten or twelue English shippes, and resolute to sell his death dearly, grappled with the Regent, the chiefe shippe of the enemies flecte, and fiering it, burnt both the one and the other, with all that was in them.

7 therouenne besieged.

Therouenne was defended by two hundred and fifty Lances, and two thousand foot, whilest the King prepared two thousand five hundred Lances, ten thousand Lanquenets led by the Duke of Gueldres, sixe thousand others, which the Duke of Norfolk brought (being fled long before out of England) and tenne thousand French, to succour the besieged, who in the meane time molested the enemy, day and night, with their artillery, with the which the great Chamberlaine of England was slaine, and Albot Capitaine of Calis lost a legge. The troupes assembled, the King sent them to Aire, vnder the command of Lewis of Longueuille, Marquis of Rotelin, Capitaine of an hundred Gentlemen of his household. Victuals grew scant in Therouenne, when as the Lord of Pienes, gouernour of Picardy, and the French Capitaines, chose out the most resolute of all their troupes, and gaue them charge to carry victuals to the towne. And for that their enterprife had happily succeeded, retrying too confidently, and reproching the enemy of cowardise, hauing no intelligence of their intent, the English hauing sent their horse, and fiftene thousand foote, to cut off our mens passage, who did ride on their nagges disarmed, they charge them vnwares (being ready to wade through a riuer that passeth at Huchin,) they kill about three hundred, and take many prisoners: amongst others, the Marquis of Rotellin, Bayard, la Fayette, Clermont of Aniou, and Bussy of Amboise: all the rest casting away their Lances, and trusting to their heeles, and horses, saued themselues by flight. And therefore they call it the bataille of spurres, which caused the yeelding of Therouenne, the which was dismantled, to take away all cause of discord, betwixt the Arch-duke Charles, (who by ancient right pretended it,) and the English, who challenged it, as conquered from the enemy by the sword.

From Therouenne Henry went to campe before Tornay, following in this resolution, not so much the actions of a good Commander in the warre (seeing the taking of this place, lying within the low countries brought him small profit) as the perswasions of Maximilian, hoping that this towne pulled from the French, might in time returne to the obedience of his grand-child Charles, to whome, they pretended it appertained. Tournay vnfurnished of men of warre, and dispayring of succours, for that the King (not being inaisster of the field, nor of sufficient force to incounter the English) could not succour it, saued her selfe from spoilepaying a hundred thousand crownes. To crosse the English, at home, the King had stirred vp James King of Scotland (an ancient ally to this crowne) but the successe of armes was nothing fortunate for him, neither at land, nor at sea. After these victories, the end of October approaching, Henry left a great garrison in Tournay: dismissed his strangers, and tooke his way towards England, carrying no other recompence for so great, and sumptuous a preparation for warre, but the City of Tournay. But some desseines vpon Scotland (fallen into a pupils hands,) hastned him home. An other storme threatened France. The Suiffes armed according to the former conuentions: the King sends Tremouille vnto them, to disperse them, vnder whome many of the Collonels, had received the Kings pay. But neither by presents, nor promises, preuailed he any thing: onely he had a secret intelligence giuen him from some Captains, to provide for the defence of his gouernment of Bourgongne, whether the Pope, the Emperour, and Sforce did thrust them. And he hold foureteene, or fiftene thousand Suiffes, with the troupes of the French County, a thousand horse

A horse, and the artillery which the Emperour gaue them: vnder the conduct of Vlrike Duke of Wirtemberg, camped before Dijon: Tremouille was returned, with a thousand Lances, and six thousand foote, who by his practises had greatly altered the Colonels, when as the multitude doubting the faith of their Capitaines, takes the artillery, and batters the wall. Tremouille not able to resist the force of this nation, which increased daily, flies to the last remedy, and without expecting any authority from his Maiesty, agrees with them: that the King should renounce the rights he had to the Duchy of Milan, and should pay them 400000. crownes within a time prefixed, which they pretended was due for their seruices in the former warres: and for assurance thereof, he gaue for hostages, his nephew of Mezieres Balife of Dijon, and foure Bourgeses of the said towne, who sauing themselues a while after in Germany, escaped the threats of this people, to cut off their heads, if the King did not ratifie it. Doubtlesse, these were wise men, to saue their heads from the Suiffes choler. A very preiudiciall accord for the King, if he had beene constrained to ratifie it. But was it not better to lull the Suiffes a sleepe, then to loose Dijon? Our Lewis is now freed of two incombrances, the English, and the Suiffes. But the exemption of present dangers freed him not from a relaps, for the English departing, threatened to returne in the spring, and prepared already, being loth to stay any more so long at the warre. The Emperour had the like intent to annoy him. The Catholike King deuised (as it was discouered by a letter, written to his Ambassadour resident with Maximilian) the meanes to draw this Duchy of Milan to Ferdinand their common grandchild, younger brother to Charles the Archduke, shewing that by that meanes, all the other estates of Italy should be forced to take their law from them, that it should be easie for the Emperour, assisted with the armes of Arragon and Naples, to make himselfe Pope (the which he had alwaies desired since the death of his wife,) and being installed in S. Peters chaire, he should renounce the Imperiall Crowne, in fauour of the said Arch-duke. Moreover, the bad affection of the irreconcilable Suiffes was apparent. The flight of the hostages had newly incensed them, who threatned Bourgongne or Dauphine.

The Suiffes
enter into Bourgongne.

The Pope desired greatly the whole extirpation of the councill of Pisa, especially for matters decreed, either by the authority of the said Council, or against the Popes authority, the which (not reuoked) must needs breed great confusions. Yet could he not obtaine this abolition before the King did ratifie it. Three Cardinalls were therefore appointed to redresse these disorders. But the greatest difficulty was about the abolition of Censures, which the King (said they) had incurred, thinking it a thing vnworthy of the Apostolike sea to graunt, if the King did not demand it: the which his Maiesty would not yeeld vnto, whereby both his person and his realme had beene taxed of schisme. In the end, the King ouer-ruled by the earnest sute both of the Queene and his subiects, wearied with so many crossees, resolves to yeeld to the Popes will, hoping hereafter, by this meanes, to find him fauorable. And therefore at the 8. session of the council of Lateran, which was in the end of the yeare, the Kings agents, in his name, and by his command, renounced the petty Councill of Pisa, adhering to the Councill of Lateran, and so obtained full remission of all things committed against the Romaine Church.

Amidst so many forraigne crossees which did infinitely trouble the King, there chanceth a home-bred affliction, the death of the Queene his wife: a Princesse indued with most vertues incident to an honorable Lady, and for this caute greatly lamented of the whole realme. This death was the accomplishment of the marriage betwixt Francis Duke of Valois, and Earle of Angoulesme; and Claude the Kings eldest daughter: the which had bin deferred till then: for that the Queene loued not Louise of Sauoy, mother to the said Francis, and affected more to haue Charles of Austria, afterwards Emperour, for her sonne in law. The realme being reduced to the obedience of the Church of Rome, the Pope (to whom the Kings greatness was commonly fearefull) begins now to feare least his power should be too much suppressed, and that the enemies of France should hereafter ioine their forces to the preiudice of the Romaine Court. To balance things in such sort, as he might subsist in the midst, and that the meanes which aided one of his intentions, should not hurt another: considering that the irreconcilable hatred of the Suiffes, might force the King to resigne his rights of the Duchy of Milan to the Emperour and Catholike King; in regarde of the Marriage which they pretended (a very preiudiciall thing to the common liberty of Italy:) and holding

Queene Anne.

1514. holding it also dangerous to haue the King to recouer it, he perswaded the Suiffes, that their A extreame hatred might not force the King to take a course no lesse hurtfull to the liberty of their common weale (considering the little loue which Maximilian and Ferdinand did beare them) then to the Church and all Italy. Moreouer, to make the Kings descent into Italy more difficult at all euents, he labours an accord betwixt the Emperour and the Senate of Venice: who being resolute, either to haue a firme peace concluded, or open warre, would by no means giue care to any truce, for that had bin to settle the Emperours affaires in those townes which hee inioyed.

The Popes perswasions were fruitlesse with the Suiffes: the Emperour and Venetians made him Iudge of their controuersies, but without decifion for either party: hee onely com- B mands them to surcease from armes, vntill the pronounciation of his sentence. The Catho- like King could not more firmly assure the realme of Nauarre, then by a peace. Our Lewis and he prolong the truce for a yeare, adding to the former articles, one that was secret. That during the truce, the King might not molest the estate of Milan. That which the Pope could not get of the Suiffes, he obtayned of the King of England: Henry discontent that his father in law had againe deceiued him, by the prolongation of a truce, without his consent, grew daily more vnwilling to make warre in France. The Pope desiring by some kindnesse, to win the Kings loue, and fearing daily, that Lewis oppressed with enemies, would ally himselfe, both by a peace, and consanguinity with Maximilian and Ferdinand: he sent the Cardinal of C Yorke, to perswade his King: that remembering what correspondency of faith he had found in the Emperour, the Catholike King, and the Suiffes, and contenting himselfe with his happy passage, and returne, he should forbear any more to afflict France with his forces. The cardinall finding Henry disposed to peace, whome the Duke of Longueuille (a prisoner, taken in the warre) had already moued, and Lewis desiring it, with all his heart, (having sent the Generall of Normandy) but more vnder colour to treat of the deliuey of the Duke of Longueuille, and his companions in prison, they made an agreement betwixt the two Kings, in the beginning of August, for their liues, and a peace after their death, vpon condition, that the King of England should enioy Tournay, and the French King should pay him sixe hundred thousand crownes. That they should be bound to defend the estates one of another, with tenne thousand foote, if the warre were by land: and sixe thousand, if it were by sea: that the French King should furnish the King of England with twelue hundred Lances at neede, and the King of England with tenne thousand foote: but at his charge that should haue neede. This peace was confirmed by the marriage of Lewis with Mary sister to Henry. But the Pope was not perswaded, so great a hatred might so sodainely be conuerted into amity, and alliance.

A peace with the English.

Lewis King of France marries Mary of England.

For as hee had made the first motion, so did hee expect to be made acquainted with the conclusion: wherein hee made account to referue this clause, That the King should not inuade the Duchy of Milan for a time. The Emperour and Catholike King were exceeding iealous: yet the last assured him selfe to receiue two contents. The one, that the Archduke E his grand-child was out of hope, to giue his sister in Marriage to Lewis: the other, that Lewis being in possibility to haue heires males, the succession of Francis Earle of Angoulesme should remaine doubtfull, whome he hated exceedingly, seeing him greatly inclined to restore the Realme of Nauarre, to the ancient estate. The Suiffes reioyced, not for any affection they beare vnto the king, but fore-seeing that Lewis hauing truce with the Arragonois, and peace with the Venetian, and English, would imploy his forces to recouer Milan, and this should be a new whetstone to sharpen their hatred, and make their vertue knowne to the whole world. No man doubted of the Kings resolution herein, and in deed he prepared for it, hauing retayned the Lanquientes, which the Duke of Gueldres had brought against the English.

And the Pope, although it were a very troublesome thing vnto him, to haue the King recouer this estate, yet knowing that his perswasions could not diuert the enterprife, he aduiceth him (but faintly) not to prolong it, giuing him to vnderstand that things were ill prepared to resist. The Emperour had no forces, and as little mony, the Arragonois army was growne weake, and not paid: the people of Milan poore and brought almost to dispaire: no man could furnish mony to make the Suiffes march, and Fregose was not out of hope to

A to agree with his Maiestie for the Seigneurie of Genoua. But let vs obserue his policie. All these prouocations came not from a sincere heart. The Pope sees euery one tyred with troubles past, and ill provided. And now the French had taken breath, and fortified themselves with new alliances: he begins to feare the King, and would assure himselfe of his forces, in case he came into Italy. Moreouer, he knew well the King could not this yeare molest the estate of Milan, by reason of a clause mentioned in the truce with the Arragonois: and if it should so fall out, this good inclination and will, should serue him for an excuse with the King, when as he should require either his consent or helpe. During this truce, the Lantern at Genoua (beeing reduced to all extremitie, for want of victuals, and not able to bee succoured) yeelds to the Geneuois, who made it euen with the Causey. Thus the King was B dispossessed of all his conquests in Italy. We must not wonder if the people make heapes of stones of Castles within their townes, when they fall into their powers: for they are but shackles of their libertie.

In the meane time, the new confederacie which the Pope contracted with the Emperour, (betwixt whom and the Venetians, Leo laboured an agreement, not giuing the King any notice thereof) lending him fortie thousand Ducats, and receiuing from him Modena in pawn, gaue our Lewis new causes of iealousie and distrust. To be resolu'd then of the Popes intent, he sends to intreate him, to declare himselfe in his fauour, adding moreouer, that if he might not be in good termes of friendship with him, hee would accept such conditions of C Maximilian and Ferdinand as he had refused. On the other side, Maximilian and the Arragonois wanted no perswasions full of efficacie, to vniue the Pope vnto them, for the defence of Italy: shewing, that if vnited together, they had beene able to chase the French out of the Duchie of Milan, they were not now more vnable to defend it against him. They did not omit to shew, that if the King preuailed in his desseignes, he would not faile to be reuenged at the same instant of all the iniuries he had receiued, namely, of the money, wherewith Leo had lately thrust the Suiffes into Bourgogne. And the authoritie of the Suiffes (who continuing in their first spleene, offered for sixe thousand Florins of the Rhin, to take and defend the passages of Mount Senis, Mount Geneure, and Final: and for fortie thousand Florines a moneth, to inuade Bourgogne with twenty thousand men) did strangely moue the D Popes mind, who restrained by feare of that he most desired, made some scruple to bewray his conceits, giuing them all good hopes vnder generall termes.

In the end, beeing prest by the King, behold his answer: That he had perswaded him to passe into Italy, when as without danger or effusion of blood, he might haue reaped an assured victory. That now other Princes haue so ordered their affaires, as there is no more hope to vanquish, but with much hazard and blood. And for that the Turke had lately increased his power much by a notable victorie against the Sophi of Persia, Leo therefore forgets not to adde: That it was neither conformable to his nature, nor agreeable to his office, to fauour Christian Princes armes against themselves. That he could not but exhort him to surcease, attending some more easie and better oportunitie, which beeing offered, he should alwaies find in him the same disposition, to his glorie and greatnesse, that he had some few moneths before made shew of.

E This answer was sufficient to quaille the Kings hope of Leo's fauour: yea to let him vnderstand, that he would oppose both his Councell and forces against this enterprife, which the King had resolu'd for the Duchie of Milan, according to the charge he had giuen to the Duke of Bourbon. But death, which commonly cuts off the counsels of man with his life, stayed this resolution, to reuiue it soone after in the mind of his next successor. For as Lewis pleased himselfe exceedingly in the excellent beautie of his new Spouse, beeing but eigh- teen yeares old, behold a feuer, accompanied with a fluxe of blood, frees him from the troubles and cares of this world, to enioy an eternall and happie rest in heauen, noting the first day of Ianuarie, with the exceeding greefe which his memorie graued in the hearts of all his subiects. He was a godly Prince, iust, chaste, mild, temperate, loyall, louing his Princes, his Nobilitie and his people, and likewise beloued of them, a friend to sinceritie, plainnesse, and truth, an enemy to enuie, lying and flatterie. Let vs obserue, for a testimonie thereof, that royall Apothegme, beeing vrged by the flatterers of the Court, to take reuenge of Lewis of Tremouille, who had overcome and taken him at the battaile of S. Aubin. A King of France (saith he) doth not take vpon him the quarrels of a Duke of Orleans: if he hath fast- fully 1515. fully served the King his Master, against me who was but Duke of Orleans, he will do the like for me, who am now King of France. But about all; he was good to his subjects, whom he did alwaies study to ease: for how many leuies hath he made both of horse and foote, without the oppression of his people, by any new imposition? How often haue his subjects, willingly granted him an increase of subsidies, to supply his forreine and domesticall affaires, and yet would he not allow of these impositions? desiring rather to cut off the expenses of his owne person, and his house, to saue his people from oppression and spoile.

The death of Lewis.

France was neuer scene so populous, so fruitfull, so rich, so well tilled, nor so well built, as in this raigne. A happy raigne in the obseruation of Iustice, martiall discipline, liberty of trafficke, increase of goods, cheapnesse of victuals, and which is more, euery man to eate his bread quietly at his owne board, free from the outrages and insolencies of Souldiers.

To conclude, neuer King loued his people so much, neuer subjects loued their King more: neuer subjects gaue with greater ioy to their Roueraigne, then the French did to him, that glorious surname of

Father of his people.

FRANCIS the first of that name, 58. French King.

Appy is that Realme (saith the wife man,) which falls not into a child's hands. This was the first comfort which reuiued the hearts of the French, oppressed with mourning, and heauinesse, for the death of their good King Lewis the twelfth; The second was that they cast their eyes vpon a worthy successor, a Prince well borne, iudicious, and of a generous spirit: liberall, courteous, in the prime of his age, and fit for government, affable to the people, fauorable to the Clergy, pleasing to the Nobility, (who doe naturally loue their Princes good countenance,) and (that which all subjects admire in their Soueraigne) of an excellent beauty. Thus capable was he of the royall dignity. Francis being then two and twenty yeares old, before Duke of Valois, and Earle of Angoulesme,

A Angoulesme, tooke vpon him the government of this Monarchy, as sonne to Charles Earle of Angoulesme, sonne to John Earle of Angoulesme, who was the youngest sonne of Lewis Duke of Orleans (murthered by the Bourguignon at Paris, in the time of Charles the sixth) who was also the youngest sonne of King Charles the fifth. He was anointed at Rheims, the five and twentieth day of January, being attended on by the Dukes of Bourbon and Alanson, the Earles of Montpensier, Vendosme, and Saint Paul, and the Prince of Roche-sur-Yon, all of the house of Bourbon. Then hauing made his entry into Paris, and a sollemne Tournie kept in Saint Anthoines street, he confirmed all the ancient officers of the crown, and to supplie those which were vacant, he created Charles Duke of Bourbon Constable of France (being voided by the death of John the second duke of Bourbon) Anthony Prat, Chancellor (for then Stephen Poncher bishop of Paris was keeper of the seale) Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Vendosme, Gouernour of the Ile of France, making the said county a Duchie, and a Peere of France; the Lord of Lautrec, Gouernour of Guien, Palisse Marshall of France, Boissi, his gouernour in his youth, Lord Steward and Superintendent of his house: with whom hee ioyned Fleuremonde Robertet, Secretarie of State. With this title of French King, hee tooke vpon him that of the duke of Milan, not onely as descending of the house of Orleans, the true heire of that Duchie, but also as comprehended in the inuestiture made by the Emperour, according to the treatie of Cambray. And for that he succeeded equally, both to the crowne, and the desire his predecessor had to recover that goodly estate of Milan, he therefore (to worke it with more facility) renewed the peace, made betwixt the deceased King, and the King of England, sending home Mary, the widow of Lewis, with a dowrie of threescore thousand crownes a yeere: who afterwards married with the Duke of Suffolke. Hee also confirmed the alliance this crown had with the Senat of Venice. The Archduke Charles, sent a very honourable Ambassage to the King, whereof the Earle of Nassau was the cheefe, to doe him homage, for the counties of Flanders, Arthois, and other Lands, which held of this crowne, and (the which gaue hope, of a future peace, betwixt these two Princes, both being young, but marked for great desseignes) to treat a marriage betwixt the said Charles, and Renée the Queenes sister, who was afterwards wife to the duke of Ferrara. And for that the said Earle D was greatly fauoured by Prince Charles, the King desirous to gratifie him, caused him to marry with the daughter of the Prince of Orange, bred vp in his Court.

Charles was yet vnder age, but so carefully instructed by that wise Lord of Chicures, of the house of Croy, whom the deceased King Lewis had made choise of, to gouerne him in his youth (for that Philip the father of Charles had by his testament intreated Lewis to accept the charge of his sonne) that euen in his younger yeeres hee made him capable to vnderstand the affaires of state, presenting vnto him all packets that came, causing him to make report thereof vnto his Councell, and to determine all things in his presence. Hee did fore-see, that after the death of Ferdinand his grand-father by the mother, the French might crosse him in his passage from Flanders into Spaine: holding it dangerous, to stand in the midst, betwixt the Kings of France and England vnited together, and not to fortifie himselfe, with this common alliance. Moreouer his subjects of the low countreys, would haue no warres with the Realme of France. The King likewise desired, to take from him all motiues, to gouerne himselfe hereafter, by the councell of his two grand-fathers.

E They therefore agreed. That the marriage proceeding betwixt the Archduke, and Renée, the King should giue him sixe hundred thousand Crownes, and the Duchie of Berry for euer, to her, and to her heires: vpon condition she should renounce all rightes of inheritance, both from father and mother, namely to the Duchies of Milan, and Britannie. That after the death of the Catholike King, the King should aide the Arch-duke with men and shippes, to goe F and receiue his Realmes of Spaine.

The Arragonois demanded a continuance of the truce: but the King meaning to put out that clause. Not to molest the Duchy of Milan during the truce, their parole was fruitlesse. The Emperour (who ioyned his desseignes to the counsels of Ferdinand) opposed against the amitie of the French. The Spaniards were as forward as before. As for the Pope, Francis desired to bee freed from all bond to him, that hee might resolve for the best, according to

The King led the battaile, followed by the dukes of Vendosme, Lorraine and Albania, the Earle of Saint Paul, Claude of Lorraine Earle of Guise, brother to the duke of Lorraine, the Lords of Lautrec and Lescut, brothers to Arual, a yonger brother of the house of Albret, Tremouille, René bastard of Sauoy (who was afterwards Lord Steward of France, and gouernour of Prouence, whose daughter Anne of Montmorency, the Constable married) and capitaine Bayard, to whom the King did that honour the day of the battaile, to receiue his Knight-hood at his hands, hoping that the happinesse of so gentle & braue a Knight, would accompany his armes. The reere-ward was committed to the Duke of Alanfon, who had married with Marguerite of France, afterwards wife to Henry of Albret, King of Nauarre, grand-father by the mothers side to Henry the fourth, lately murdered. At the first bruce of this armie, the Emperour, the Arragonois, Sforza, and the Suiffes contra a league together, to force the King to renounce his rights to the Duchie of Milan, the Suiffes, receiuing thirtie thousand crownes a moneth of the other confederates, should keepe the passages of the mountaines, and inuade Bourgongne, or Daulphiné, and the Catholike King, France, by Papignan or Fontarabia. The Pope (although the King made some account of his friendship, for that Iulian of Medicis his brother, had lately married with Philiberte, sister to Charles Duke of Sauoy, and Aunt by the mothers side to his Maiesty) in the end ioyned with them.

The duke of Genoua, swome betwixt two streames and (as they say) held the Wolfe by the care. Both the French forces, and the confederates victory were fearefull vnto him, namely the Popes, who vnder colour to keepe this Duchie from any stranger, desired exceedingly to vnite it to the Church. In the midst of these contrarieties, he yeelds Genoua to the King, vpon condition: That hee should lay aside the title of Duke of Genoua, and take that of Gouernour of Genoua, perpetually for the King, with power to giue the Offices of Genoua: (this was to retaine some markes of Soueraignty) That the King should giue him an hundred men at armes, the order of Saint Michel, and a yeerely pension during his life. That the King should not repaire the fort of Todisa, and should restore vnto the Cittie, all the priuileges which King Lewis had disannulled. That hee should giue certaine Ecclesiasticall linings, to Frederike Archbishop of Salerne, brother to Octavian, and to himselfe (if he should be expelled Genoua) some places in Prouence.

The army approached neere the Alpes, which diuide France and Italy, and the Suiffes, according to their capitulation, had stayed vpon the passages of the mountaines and uallees, aswell of Mont-fenis, which is of the iurisdiction of Sauoy, the shortest way, but the most vnease, as of the mount of Geneure, which is of the iurisdiction of Daulphiné, the longer way, but the lesse painfull, being the ordinary passage of the French armies. The King had intelligence, that Prosper Colonne was at the foote of the Mountaines within Piedmont, with fiftene hundred horse, which the Pope had sent to succour Milan, not fearing any enemy, for that the Suiffes (as hee thought) had seized vpon all the approches. But (some guides belonging to Charles of Soliers, Lord of Morete, hauing shewed them a passage nere to Rocque Espierre) the King sent Palisse (whom hereafter we will call the Marshall of Chabannes) Imbertcourt, Aubigni, Bayard, Bussi of Amboise, and Montmorency, at that time highly fauoured by the King, leading foure cornets of light horse, vnder the charge of the said

Morete

A Morete and his guides, who hauing waded through the Po, beneath Villefranche, whereas Colonne lodged; they came to the gates not discouered, but by some inhabitants, who run speedily to preuent their entrie, but two hardie men at armes of Imbertcourt company, which led the Scouts, whose names were Beauuais the braue, a Normand, and Hallencourt a Picard, set spurs to their horses (so as Hallencourt was carried into the ditch) and amazed the inhabitants: Beauuais thrusting forward his lance, kept the gate open, vntill the troups arriving, surprised both Villefranche and Colonne as hee dined, they made bootie of the baggage, and about twelue hundred Neapolitan horse, and carried away the Commander and his troupe, prisoners to Toffan.

In the meane time the forces passe, some with the Artillery betwixt the Alpes towards the sea, and the Coctiennes, descending towards the Marquisate of Saluce: the toile of men exceeding all difficulties, which the steepe and craggy mountaines, and the rough downfalls, in the deepe ualleis of the riuier of Argentiere, did present vnto them, where the artillery, not able to passe in those straights, the horses being vnprofitable, in fure daies it was forced vp with roapes by maine strength, in those places where as neuer canon nor horseman was fene to passe. Others, with infinite paines and difficulties, recovered the pace of Dagonniere: some, the high tops of the rocke of Perrot of Cuni (passages lying towards Prouence) where the Marshall of Chabannes had passed. Thus the Suiffes deceiued of their hope, abandoned the Straight of Suze, where they defended the passages of Mont Senis and Geneure, and that of Coni, returning with shame toward Milan, spoyling and sacking Chinas, Verceil and other places, where they entred, whilst that Ainard of Prie, hauing passed with the first, had with the helpe of Octavian Fregose, reduced Alexandria, Tortone (and all that lies beyond the Po) to the Kings obedience, who hauing passed the Po at Montcallier, and presenting himselfe before Nouarre, receiued the towne at his deuotion, and then Pavia. The Milanois sent Ambassadors to the Kings lodging at Bufalore, to beseech him to rest satisfied with victualles, and a promise from the people to remaine affected to his crowne, and so to march on against his enemies, assuring him, that Milan should most willingly giue him entrie, when hee should bee maister of the field. It is an ordinarie stratageme of inconstant Townes, to set vp the Enseignes of the stronger partie. The King hauing a mightie armie in front, granted their demands for that time.

Then the duke of Sauoy did mediate an accord betwixt the Suiffes and the King his Nephew, wherein hee preuailed so much, as they concluded: That the King paying vnto them foure hundred thousand crownes, promised by the treaty of Dijon, and all which they pretended to bee due for their ancient seruices, they should yeeld vnto the King his Duchy of Milan, and the ualleis which the Grisons enioyed, and the King should giue vnto Maximilian Sforza three score thousand ducats of yeerely pension. But some hope to gaine, who loose all, especially in these cases. A new supply of Suiffes, by reason of their forepassed victories (being dissuaded by the Cardinall of Sion) breake this treaty, and bring matters to the same estate they were before. Thirty fivie thousand take the way of Monfe, to lodge in the suburbs of Milan, vntill the Popes army led by Laurence of Medicis, and the Spanish by Raymond of Cardone, should ioine with them. Maximilian Sforza and the Cardinal pressed them, but distrust one of another staied them. Raymond had surprised letters of credit, sent from the Pope to the King, and was well aduertised that Laurence had secretly sent (whether vpon his owne motion, or by the Popes command hee knew not) a gentleman to the King, to excuse himselfe for the army which he led against him, being forced by the duty hee did owe vnto his vnkle, promising that without offence to his vnkle, or blemish to his owne honor, he would endeavour to content his maiesty, according to the desire hee had alwaies had, and now especially more then euer. Moreover the Arragonois descigne was to remaine quiet, so as this army did not threaten his new conquest of Nauarre.

F And Laurence on the other side, seeing the delaies of Raymond, conceiued, that hee had some secret charge from the King his master, to forbear to fight, and giue others leaue to decide the quarrell, and both ioynly feared to ingage themselves betweene the Kings army, and the Venerians, led by Bartolmew of Aluiane, the which was very available for the King. Without doubt all their priuate intents were to act this tragedy with the bloud and

A miserable estate of Italy, the which at one instant was oppressed with five fundry armies, French, Venerian, Suiffes, Spaniards and Italians. Vpon hope of this treaty of peace, the King had countermanded Aluiane, who was at Laude, and Lantrec to carry vnto the Suiffes all the money they could get out of the Kings coffers, or borrow of the Princes and Nobility, but through the perswasions of this mutinous Cardinal, they resolute, both to take the money from Lantrec and sodenly to giue the King battaile, when hee least doubted any enemy. This counsell had preuailed with some droulie commander. But Lantrec (aduertised by his spies of the treacherous resolution of these Suiffes) left the way, and retired into Galere. And the Suiffes sayling of their purpose, passed on, to wreake their choller vpon the King. The King was come from Marignan, to lodge at Saint Donat, the thirteenth of September: when as behold they come with a resolution, and charge the artillery of the vanguard which the Lansquenets garded, they ouerthrew the first they encountered, recover some peeces of Cannon, and amaze a battaillion of Lansquenets, who (supposing that the treaty of peace with the Suiffes had continued firme) feared least they should deliuer them into the hands of their ancient enemies. But seeing the horse, and the king himself in person come to second them, they resume their courage, enter the combate, stay this violence of the Suiffes, and with a fore fight maintaine the shooke with variable and doubtfull euents, vntill the dust and approaching night made them retire. At this first charge were slaine Francis of Bourbon duke of Chastelleraud, the Earle of Sancerre, Imbercourt and many other gallant gentlemen.

of Marignan.

The King seeing the greatnesse of the danger, planted his artillery in conuenient places, ordred his battaillions, gathered his horse together, sent for Aluiane, and lay all night armed with all peeces but his helmet, vpon the carriage of a Cannon. The sunne was scarce risen, when as the Suiffes (growne proud with the conceite of some aduantage) charge the Lansquenets, and force them to recoyle aboute a hundred paces, and but for some horsemen (who repelled the violent force of the Suiffes) the issue had bene very dangerous. The Cannon thunders through their squadrons; the French and Gascon shot make a horrible slaughter; the horse charge them in flanke, Aluiane comes vpon their backe in the fury of the fight: They had all continued many houres very hot in skirmish, when as the Suiffes (having lost most of their capitaines, being charged in front, in flanke and behinde) grow amazed, despaire of victory, turne their squadrons, and make a goodly retreat, some to Milan, others home to their houses. A great number shut themselves into the Constables lodging, where (refusing to yeeld to the Kings mercy) they were all burnt, and many of our men, that were entred pel-mel with them, amongst others John of Mouy Lord of Maileray, who carried the white corner. In this second battaile were slaine the Prince of Talmont, Bussy of Amboise, the Lord of Roze and many other valiant Knights: Gilbert of Leui Lord of Ventadour was hurt, Claude Earle of Guise ouerthrowne and troden vnder the horse feete, but hee was releued by captaine James a Scottishman, a Gentleman of the Kings chamber. The King was often in danger of his person, receiuing many a push of the pike vpon his armour.

of the dead.

Without doubt this was the most furious battaile that euer the Suiffes gaue, the which by the testimony of Triuncke, seemed rather to haue bene fought by Giants then by men. For that the eightene battailes wherein hee had bene, were like the encounters of smal children in regard of this. That which happened to Gaston of Foix at the battaile of Rauenna, made the King to giue them that fled, free passage: leauing foureteene or fifteene thousand slaine vpon the place. The King lost of French and Lansquenets, about three thousand. The Cardinal of Sion (the chiefe author of this battaile) fled at the first charge, to Milan, and from thence (seeing the Suiffes in a mutiny, as well for their losse as for three moneths pay, that were due vnto them) into Germany, to Maximilian. We may iustly say, that the Suiffes had need of this correction, for the remembrance of their forepassed prosperities had made them insolent beyond the bounds of modesty, but they reaped a benefit by their shame, growing more tractable, and friendly to them that corrected them. Moreover this should be a good aduertisement to the King, to consider rightly of the wars of Italy, in

A in the which (for want of iudgement) both he and his Realme were afterwards in a manner ruined. After this happy victory, Milan and al other places of the Duchy, followed the conquerors fortune. Peter of Nauarre, had by a mine blowne vp a Casemate at the castle gate. Maximilian Sforza and the Suiffes (besieged therein by the duke of Bourbon) yeeld it, vpon condition: That the Suiffes should depart with bagge and baggage, and Maximilian should deliuer the castle with that of Cremona, vnto the King, and al other places held by him, and should goe into France, where the King during his life should giue him three (core thousand) crownes a yeere pension. According to this capitulation, Maulon brother to Tremouille, Francis Earle of Pontremie (with many other Gentlemen) conducted him into France. The King entered into Milan armed, accompanied with the aboue named Princes, and the Nobility of his army, whether the Potentates of Italy sent vnto him, some to reconcile themselves, others to congratulate this victory.

The Pope did not forget his ordinary praetises, to stay the course of the Kings victory, and finding the King very obedient to the sea of Rome, they concluded a mutuall league for the defence of the Estates of Italy, of the Pope, the church, of Julian and Laurence de Medicis, and the Estate of Florence. By this accord the King gaue the Duchy of Nemours to Julian, who had married a sister to the Kings mother, which Duchy (after the death of Julian) the King did giue to Philis of Sauoy, who tooke to wife one of the daughters of René, Duke of Alancou: to whom the duke of Nemours, now lyuing is Grand-child. And the Pope deliuered Parma and Placentia to the King. These Articles were confirmed by an interview, betwixt the Pope, and the King at Bologna, in the beginning of December, where they treated of many things touching the Realme of Naples, which the King resolved to inuade, for the recovery whereof the Pope promised him his fauour, after the death of Ferdinand (which euery man thought to be nere) or at the least when as the truce were ended. Hee promised also to giue him power to leaue the tenth part of the reuenues of Clergy, within his Realme, and the collation of benefices, the which before belonged vnto the Colleges and Chapters of Churches; and for the Kings sake, he made Adrian of Gonfieres, brother to the Lord Steward, Cardinall. And the King, to gratifie the Pope, granted an abolition of the pragmaticall Sanction, making new conuentions in steed thereof, whereunto the D French church and the Vniuersities opposed.

The Venerians sent foure Ambassadors to the King, the chiefe, and most honourable persons of their Senate: Anthony Grimani, Dominic Treuisan, George Cornare, and Andrew Gritti, to congratulate his victory, and to beseech him to make them partakers of the fruits thereof, that by his aide they might recouer their townes, according to their agreement. At their request, the King gaue commission to the bastard of Sauoy, and to Theodore Triualce, to ioyne with Aluiane, with six hundred lances, and six thousand foote led by Peter of Nauarre. Then leauing the duke of Bourbon his Lieutenant Generall in the Duchy of Milan, hee returned into France, about Candlemas, whether the designs of Henry King of England did call him.

E Henry discontent, that the King had taken the yong King of Scotland into his protection, and to that end had sent John Steward Duke of Albania, both to gouerne his person and his Realme (which John had punished either with death or banishment, all such as hee found to fauour the English, and euer the mother of the yong King, sister to the sayd Henry) for reuenge whereof hee thrust the Suiffes to new attempts against the King. But returning to their first sincerity, they ioyne in league with this crowne, binding themselves: To giue vnto the King for euer, in Italy or out of Italy, and against all men (except the Pope and the Emperor) such numbers of men, as he should require vnder his pay. The King did also confirme their ancient pensions, promising to pay, within a certaine time the summe due by the treaty of Dijon, and three hundred thousand crownes more, yeelding vnto him the townes and walls which they held belonging to the Duchy of Milan. But the five Cantons which did enioy them, having refused to ratifie this accord, the King began to pay vnto the other eight, that part and portion of money which was due vnto them, who accepted thereof, but with an expresse condition: That they should not bee bound to march vnder his pay, against the other five Cantons. cross him. The Emperour (alwaies desirous of innouations) could not with his owne forces hold the townes hee had taken from the Venetians: and the English remembring the fruitlesse promises which Ferdinand his father in law had made him (the which he respected not where he might gaine) stood waivering betwixt the distrust hee had of his father-in-law, and the hatred he bare to our Francis, but this treaty is sodainely broken by the death of Fer- dinand, who died in the moneth of Ianuary. A prince excelling in counsell and many ver-tues, so as if his promises had bene accompanied with their effects, he might well haue bin numbred amongst the most perfect.

The Emperours voyage into Lombardy.

This death seemed to make the Kings enterprife vpon Naples more easie, purposing to B send the duke of Bourbon for the execution thereof: Many reasons moued him therevnto.
There was some reuolt in the Realme, after the decease of Ferdinand. The Archduke Charles was young, and could not come in time to succour it: the Popes fauour might aide him much (yet the King trusted to him who deceived him in the view of all the world) but aboue all, the priuate interest of this crowne, to whom the greatnesse of Charles (heire to so many Realmes by the death of the Catholike King and future successor of the Empire) should be wonderfully suspect. But the designs of our Francis are crossed by the Emperours com-ming with ten thousand Germaines and Spaniards, foureteene thousand Suisses, and five thousand horse, to succour Brescia, ioynly besegged by the French and Venetians, which made them retire to Milan to the duke of Bourbon. So Maximilian passing the riuers of C Mincie, Ogly and Adde, without any let, had all the country betwixt Ogly, Po and Adde, at his command, except Cremona and Crema, the one kept by the French, the other by the Venetians. Then hauing taken Laude by composition, hee sends to summon the Milanois with threats: that if within three daies, they did not expell the French army, hee would intreate them more rigorously, then Frederske Barbarossa, one of his predecessors had done: who not content to haue burnt Milan vnto ashes, did sow salt there, in memory of his wrath, and of their rebellion. The inhabitants beganne to rise, and our men grew amazed, when as Albert Peter, leading thirteene thousand Suisses and Grisons, arriuing, confirmes them, he made them to change their resolution, to burne their suburbs, and to re-solue vpon defence.

The Cardinall of Sion, and many others banished from Milan, followed the Emperour, feeding him with hope, that at the first brute of his approach, the citizens would set vp his en-signes. Marke Anthony Colonne likewise followed his army, with two hundred men at armes, at the Popes charge (a manifest signe of his Counceils and dissemblings.) But Maximilian seeing no shew from the towne (the chiefe of the Gibelin faction, being expelled by the Constable of Bourbon, as adherent to the Emperour) remembring the treachery of the Suisses, to Lodowike Sforze, and fearing least through the ancient hatred of that nation to the house of Austria, the Suisses in the French army, and those in his (which refused plainly to fight one against another) vniting their forces, should deliuer him to the enemy, for that James Stafflet Colonell of his Suisses, had with much arrogancie demanded their pay, he secretly departs from his army in the night, with two hundred horse, so as hee was twenty miles off before they were priuy to his departure. His army (wanting both a commander & money) tooke the same course. The Earle of Saint Paul, with the Lords of Montmorencie and Lescu, pursuing them, defeated a great number, whereof three thousand, part Germaines and part Spaniards, yeelded to the French and Venetians, being in campe, and our Suisses (notwithstanding they had bene paid for three moneths) went home to their houses, except some three hundred which remained with Peter.

retires.

During these garboiles, the Pope smothering his conceits, laboured to bee as pleasing as he could to either party, yet was hee grieved, the Emperour had brought so great forces, for hee could not remaine a victor, but hee must afterwards seeke to oppress all Italy, or put Leo from the Papall seate, to hold it himselfe, according to the common report. On the other side (as wee iudge of causes by the effects) the King had many reasons to suspect the Pope. Hee had consented to the Emperours descent. Colonne the Popes pensioner, did accompany Maximilian. He refused to send five hundred men at armes for the defence of Milan, and to pay three thousand Suisses, as hee was bound by the treaty of Boloha.
So

A So as the King, to let Leo know, that the brightnesse of his Myter, did not so dazle his eyes, but he discouered his practises, he made him Brewisse of the same bread: declaring, that seeing the league they had made, was fruitlesse in time of warre, he would contract a new one, which should not tye him but in time of peace. The Emperours armie being dissolued, the Duke of Bourbon returns into France, and of his owne motion resignes his gouernement into the Kings hands, by whose command the Lord of Lautrec taking the charge of the armie, to free the King from that bond, ioyning with the Venetians, returned to Brescia, which pressed with two batteries, one by the French, the other by the Venetians; yeelded to the King, their liues and goods saued, and Lautrec deliuered it to the Venetians. Verona had a harder issue, for being battered by the French towards Mantoua, and by the Venetians towards Vincenza, giuing two assaults: afflicted with want of victuals and munition, and tro-bled by the hurting of Mark Anthony Colonne, Gouernour of the cittie, yet being assured of eight thousand men, led by Count Roquendolfe, that came to their succour, they held out vntill Christmas, at what time famine forced the Spaniards to yeeld the towne, the which was in like sort deliuered to the Venetians. The Pope, to make profit of the Kings victorie and forces, solicits Lautrec to aide him, to dispossesse Francis Maria of Rouere of the duchy of Vrbini. The motives of this warre which Leo pretended against him, were, for that Francis had denied the Pope those men, for the which he had receiued pay of the Church, and had treated secretly with the enemy: That he had slaine the Cardinall of Pavia, and committed many other inurthers.

Brescia yeelded.

Verona yeel-
ded.

That in the hottest of the warre against Pope Iulius his Vncle, hee had sent Balthasar of Chastillon to the King, to receiue his pay; and at the same instant he denied passage to some companies that went to ioyne with the armie of the Church: and pursued (in the estate which he held as feudatarie of the Church) the souldiers which saued themselves at the defeat of Rauenna. Lautrec desiring to please Leo, sent Lescun his brother, the Lord of Chiste, the Knight of Ambrun, the Lords of Auffun and S. Blimond, and many other Captaines with good numbers of horse and French foote: who in few dayes reduced the said Duchie to the Popes obedience, who did inuest Laurence of Medicis his Nephew in the said Duchie. Moreouer, the Kings friendship was very necessarie for the Catholike King. Charles the Arch-duke tooke vpon him that title (after the death of Ferdinand his Grand-father by the mothers side) to make his passage more easie from Flanders into Spaine, and to assure himselfe of the obedience of those realmes.

Francis Maria
chased from Vrbini,
and Laurence of Medicis inuested in the Duchie.

Fitting therefore his resolutions according to the time and necessitie, by the aduice of the Lord of Chieures his Gouernour, hee sent Philip of Cleues, Lord of Raustein to the King, to make choise of a place where their deputies might meete, to decide all controuer-sies betwixt them. Noyon was named: and for the King there came Arthur of Gouffiers, Lord of Boissy, Lord high Steward of France: for the King of Spaine, Anthony of Croye Lord of Chieures, both gouernours of their masters manage, and both assisted with notable personages. Who concluded: "That vrbini fixe moneths the Catholike King should yeeld the realme of Nauarre to Henry of Albret, sonne to John of Albret, and Catherine of Foix, deca-fed the same yeare: or else should recompence the said Henry within the said yeare, to his content: else it should be lawfull for the King to aide him to recouer it. That the King should giue his daughter Louise (who was but a yeare old) in marriage to the Catholike King, and for her dowrie, the rights he pretended to the realme of Naples, according to the diuision made by their predecessors: vpon condition, that vntill shee came to yeares of marriage, Charles should pay vnto the King a hundred and fiftie thousand Ducats yearely, towards the maintenance of his daughter. That shee dying, if the King had any other daughter, hee should giue her to the Catholike King, vpon the same conditions. If hee had none, then Charles should marrie with Renée, daughter to the deceased King. To propound and conclude marriages so disproportionable of age, is it not properly to mocke one another? Seeing that only two yeares time bring forth occasions which makes Princes to alter their desseins, whose willes are often inconstant. This treatie was respectiuely sworne by both Kings, who appointed an interview at Cambray, attending the which they sent their orders of Knighthood one to another: and since the Emperour ratified these conuentions, but wee shall see small fruites thereof.

France reaped another benefit of this peace. The Suisses (seeing a surcease of armes between the Emperour and the King) compounded, as the former had done: That the king should pay unto their Cantons, within three moneths, three hundred and fiftie thousand ducats, and after that a perpetuall and annuall pension: That the Suisses should furnish him, whensoever he demanded, a certaine number of men at his charge. But diuersly, for the eight Cantons bound themselves to furnish against all men indifferently, and the fise, no otherwise, but for the defence of his owne estates. As for the Castles of Lugan and Lugarne, strong passages and of great importance for the suretie of the Duchie of Milan, they desired rather to raze them, then to take three hundred thousand Ducats for the restitution thereof.

Let vs now lay all armes aside for a certaine space, and giue our warriours time to take breath, and returne againe shortly to warre, by the ambitious factions of two most great and mightie Princes. This yeare in Februarie, was borne Francis, Daulphin and successeur to this Crowne, if his end had not bene violently forced: Laurence of Medicis did present him at the Font, for the Pope his Vncle. A Christening celebrated with iousts, skirmishes, incounters, beseeing and taking of places, and other such statelie shewes, as the memorie of man hath not observed greater. And the King, to make a more strict league with the Pope, he caused the said Laurence to marrie with Magdaleine, daughter to John Earle of Auergne and Auraguez, and of Joane sister to Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Vendosme, who died at Vercell, when as King Charles the eight returned from Naples. Of this mariage came Katherine of Medicis, whom we shall see Queene of France, and Mother to the three last Kings of the name of Valois.

At the same time, the King sent Gaston of Breze, Prince of Fonquarmont, brother to the great Seneschall of Normandie, with two thousand French foote, to succour Christiurne King of Denmarke, against the rebels of Sueden, who (after they had wonne a battaile for the King) being abandoned in the end by the Danes, in a combate vpon the Ice, (where those Northerne Nations are more expert then ours) were ouerthrowne, and the most part slaine: such as could escape the sword, returned without pay, without armes, and without clothes.

The yeare following, the last of March, Henry the Kings second sonne was borne, who by the death of the Daulphin his brother, shall succeed his father. Henry King of England D was his God-father, and gaue him his name: During this surcease of armes among Christian Princes, the Pope motioned (but faith the Originall) rather in shew, then with any good intent, a generall warre of all Christendome, against Selim Prince of the Turkes. Bruzzet (as we haue said) in his latter age, studied to install Acomath his eldest sonne, in the throne of the Turkish Empire: Selim the younger brother, through fauour of the Ianisaries and souldiers of his fathers guard, forced him to yeeld the gouernement vnto him. Selim was no sooner in possession, but (as they say) he poisoned his father, and murdered his brethren, Acomath and Corcut, and in the end, all that descended from the line of the Ottomans. Then passing from one warre to another, he vanquished the Aduliens, ouerthrew the Sophi of Persia in battaile, tooke from him Tauris, the chiefe seate of his Empire, and the greatest part of Persia, rooted out the Sultans of Egypt, and the Mammelukes: tooke Caire, and seized vpon all Egypt and Syria. So as hauing in few yeares almost doubled his Empire, and taken away the hinderance of so mightie Princes, who were ialous of his Monarchie: Christian Princes did not without cause, feare the happie course of his victories. Hongarie was weake of men, and in the hands of a pupill King, gouerned by Prelates and Barons of the Realme, diuided amongst themselves: Italy dismembered by former warres, feared least the partialities of these Princes should cause Selim to turne his eyes towards it. The Pope and all the Court of Rome (making shew to prevent this imminent danger) thought it expedient to make a great prouision of money, by a voluntarie contribution of Princes, and a generall taxe ouer all Christendome: That the Emperour, accompanied with the horse of Polonia and Hongarie, and an armie of Reitres and Lanquenets, fit for so great an enterprise, should assaile Constantinople: and the French King with the forces of his Realme, the Venetians, Suisses, and Potentates of Italy, should invade Greece, being full of Christians, and ready to rebell vpon the first approach of forraime forces. The Kings of Spaine, Portugall, and England, should passe the streight of Gallipoli with two hundred sayle: and

A hauing taken the Castell at the entrie thereof, they should approach neere to Constantinople: That the Pope should follow the same course, with an hundred great Gallies. These were goodly plottes in conceit. This counterfeit shew to send an armie into Turkie, was but a device to fill the Popes coffers, which were made emptie by the former warres, especially by that of Vrbain.

To treat of these propositions, Leo published in the Consistorie a generall Truce for five yeares amongst all Christian Princes, and vpon rigorous censures to them that should breake it. Appointing for Legats, the Cardinal of Saint Sixte to the Emperour; the Cardinal of Saint Marie in Portico, to the King; the Cardinal Giles, to the King of Spaine: and the Cardinal Lawrence Campege, to the King of England: he proclaimed his Bulls of pardon, B to all such as should contribute a certaine summe for so worthie an expedition. All Princes accept this truce, and shew themselves very willing to so honourable an action. But the meanes wanted, how in so short a time to make a firme Vnion among so many Potentates, who had bene long at deadly warre? Euery one studies of his priuat interest, and finding the danger to concerne one more then another, they care for themselves, and manage these affaires carelessly, more with shew then deuotion.

This negligence of the publike state, and greedinesse of priuate men, was the more confirmed by the death of Selim, who leauing his Empire to his sonne Soliman, young of age, but of a milder spirit, and not so inclined to war: then all things seemed to incline to peace and loue betwixt so many great warriours. The Kings of France and England renewed their friendship by a defensiu League betwixt them, vpon promise of a marriage betwixt the Daulphin, King Francis eldest sonne, and the onely daughter of Henry King of England, both very young: which contract, many accidents might hinder before they came to sufficiency. And Henry yeelded Tournay for foure hundred thousand crownes, the one halfe for the charge in building the Cittadell, and for the artillerie, powder, and munition which the King of England should leaue in the place: the other halfe, for the expences in conquering thereof, and for other pensions that were due vnto him. Thus oftentimes the looser payes the shot. On the other side, the kings eldest daughter: being dead: whom they had appointed to be wife to the King of Spaine: a peace betwixt these two Kings was reconfirmed, according to the first Capitulation, with promise of the younger. An alliance which either Prince did confirme, with great outward shewes of friendship, King Francis wearing the order of the Golden fleece on Saint Andrewes day: and the King of Spaine that of S. Michell, on the said Saints day. The Venetians also, by the Kings meanes had prolonged their truce for five yeares with the Emperour.

A peace concluded with the English.

And with the Spaniards.

But the Soueraigne Iudge of the world (hauing decreed to punish the disorders of Christendome with sundrie afflictions) tooke Maximilian out of this world: in whose life we may observe a strange alteration of affaires: for if prosperitie did often present vnto him goodly occasions, aduersitie did as often crosse him in the execution. A good Prince, mercifull, courteous, very liberall, a great spender (the which did many times hinder his good success) painefull, secret, well scene in the Art of warre: but his happie beginnings did commonly prouoe fruitlesse, through his owne delays and inconstancie. This death bred an equall desire in the minds of two great Princes, Francis King of France, and Charles King of Spaine. Francis sent the Lord of Boissy Lord Steward of France, to purchase the fauour of the Germane Electors for the Empire. Some promised all fauour for the King his matter: yet the cause was not so fauourable for the French, hauing no correspondencie with the Germanes, neither in tongue, manners, nor life. Moreouer, the Commons of Germany, were sutors that the Imperiall dignitie might not go out of the nation. The Pope fauoured the King, but in shew onely, hoping that by these demonstrations of loue, hee would hereafter giue more credit to his Councils: whereby discovering, that in his inward thoughts the election both of Francis and Charles were alike suspect vnto him, hee laboured to persuade the King (that seeing there was small hope for him to carrie it by voyces) hee should seeke by his authoritie to aduance some other Germane Prince to this crowne, rather then Charles. But whilest that Francis feedes himselfe, with vaine hopes giuen him by the Elector of Brandebourg, and the Archbishop of Treues, who (to draw money from the King) gaue him great assurances. Charles in stead of gold, brings armes to the field. An army approachi 1519. cheth neere to Francford, for the King of Spaine, vnder collour there should be no force in the election : the which increased their courage that fauoured his cause, made them yeeld that waivered, and troubled the French faction. So Charles of Austria King of Spaine, the fift of that name, was chosen Emperour of Germany the twenty eight of Iune. The election of a new Emperour consists in the voyce of fixe Germane Princes. Three are of the clergy, the Archbishopbes of Maience, Cologne, and Treues: Three seculars, the Count Palatine, the Duke of Saxony and the Marquis of Brandebourge. The King of Bohemia is Vmpier, when as the voyces are equall. The Emperour is chosen at Francford, and crowned at Aix la Chapelle.

of Charles.

Who could doubt, but these two young Princes, hauing so many occasions of Ielousie and quarrell, would soone breake forth into fierce and cruell warres, the which had taken deepe roote in both their hearts. The King desired infinitely to recouer the Realme of Naples, and did greatly affect the restitution of Henry of Albret, to his kingdome of Nauarre, whereof he sees him-selfe now frustrate by the sodaine aduancement of Charles to so high a dignity, and all that which the French held in Italy was in great danger. The Emperour on the other side was discontented, that the King contemning the accord first made at Paris, and knowing the necessity of his passage into Castille, for the which his fauour did much import, had in a manner forced him to agree to new Articles. Moreouer the King had taken the Duke of Gueldres into his protection, (an enemy to the Flemings, who were subiects to Charles), a sufficient cause to draw both Francis and Charles into armes. But about all, the recovery of the Duchy of Bourgongne, caused strange alterations in the minde of this new Emperour. The Duchy of Milan was a sufficient motiue of quarrell: the King since the death of Lewis the twelfth had neither demanded nor obtained inuestiture, and therefore they pretended the possession to bee of no validity, and his interest to be void: yet all these were not sufficient motiues to stirre vp those horrible confusions, which so afflicted the Estates of these two Princes for the space of thirty yeares. Ambitious hatred is alwaies grounded vpon light beginnings. In the meane time the Preachers of this voyage against the Turke, dispersed throughout all Christendome, grew vehement, promising (according to the Popes Bulls) pardon for all finnes, and the Kingdome of Heauen, to such as payd a certaine summe of money. Without doubt Leo vsed the authority of the Apostolike seat boldly, dispersing throughout the world, without distinction of time or place, most large pardons: not onely for the liuing, but also to redeeme the soules of the dead from purgatory for money. And for that euery one did plainly see, that these pardons were onely granted to get money, which the commissioners (appointed for such exactions) demaunded after an impudent and shamelesse manner; beeing also well knowne that the greatest part of them had purchased their authority from the Popes officers. Leo incurred great dislike: many were discontented with this insolent proceeding, especially in Germany, where the ministers of this collection, appointed (according to the common opinion) for the deliery of poore Christians, fighting vnder the burthen of the Turkish yoke, sold for a small price, yea played away in their Ale-houses their authority to redeeme dead mens soules from Purgatory.

And that which did more increase the peoples spleene, it was generally reported: that Laurence of Medicis, had carried a breefe, from his Vncle to King Francis, whereby he allowed him to imploy the money gathered throughout his Realme for this warre, to what vses he pleased: vpon condition, to yeeld it, when it should be demaunded for the voyage beyond the seas, and to imploy fifty thousand crownes, to the benefit of the said Laurence his Nephew. A worthy cause to make the French repine, seeing the money they gaue to a good intent, was conuerted to contrary vses. But that which made the Germanes wonderfully impatient, Leo had giuen to his sister Magdalen the profit of the exaction of Indulgences in many parts of Germany, who appointed the Bishoppe Arembauld a Commissioner in that part: worthy (saith the history) of such a charge, the which he executed with great couetousnesse and extortion. Being the more odious for that this holy money went to satifie the greedinesse of a woman. So as not onely this exaction, and the Agents thereof, but also his name and authority that granted it, became odious in many prouinces.

ning of Lu-thers doctrine

Martin Luther, a religious man of the order of S. Austin, learned and vehement, began to preach against these indulgences in his publike sermons; hee taxeth the Popes authority, complains

A complains of Albert of Brandebourge, Arch-bishop of Mayence: and of the doctrine which these gatherers did teach, inducing the people to belecue confidently, that by the purchase of these pardons they must needs be saued: as if the vertue of these money-pardons could wipe away any sinne, and the money put into the coffers of the Church or of the Commissioners, could draw mens soules out of Purgatorie, and send them into Paradise. And therupon he exhorts euery man to belecue soberly, and to gouerne himselfe wisely in this businesse, and rather to employ their money otherwise then in this fruitiuous merchandise. The people giue eare vnto him, find his doctrine plausible: and Frederick Duke of Saxonie his Prince doth embrace it, Luther, supported by the fauour of his Prince and the people, proceeded: he publisheth propositions, wherein he doth dispute at large, Of Purgatorie, of true repentance, of the office and dutie of Charitie, of Indulgences and Pardons, to seeke out (saith he) the truth, calling all such to dispute as would propound any argument to the contrarie. He intreated all such as could not assist, to answer by writing: protesting, that hee would not maintaine any thing, but submit himselfe to the censure of the holy Church: yet reiecting all things that should not be conformable to the holy Scripture and the decrees of the Fathers. In the end he encounters the Popes authoritie, the Images of the Church, the celibate of religious persons, restraining the Popes authoritie within the limits of the Bishopricke of Rome, and publishing the doctrine, which hath caused a generall Schisme vnto this day. The Pope to quench this fire, cites Luther to Rome, forbids him to preach, declares him Cismatick, if he did not obey, and submit himselfe to the Ecclesiasticall censure. Notwithstanding the Original faith, he did not reforme many things that were of bad example, which Luther did blame with reason, beeing very odious to all men, vsing his pontificall office with small reuerence. But this was to cast oyle into the fire. These Ecclesiasticall armes did but increase Luthers reputation with the people. Neither the religious men, which Leo sent to preach against him, nor the letters which he did write to the Princes and Prelates, nor all the other meanes he employed to suppress him, could any thing withdraw the peoples inclination, nor the fauour of Fredericke from him.

This action seeming still of greater importance to the Court of Rome, made them to feare some great disgrace to the Popes greatnesse, to the preiudice of the Court of Rome, and the vnion of Christian Religion. Many assemblies were made at Rome, many consultations in the Popes chamber betwixt the Cardinals and Diuines, appointed to prevent these inconueniences. Some did shew, that for asmuch as they did not correct in themselves so many vices and damnable things which did scandalize all Christendome, the persecution of Luther, would but augment the hatred of nations against him: giuing counsell like vnto that of Gamaliel in the fift of the Acts of the Apostles, that it had bene better, to haue winked at such a folly, which happily would haue vanished of it selfe.

Notwithstanding the heate and violence of others preuailed, so as not onely the persecutions were doubled against him, and his followers (who by his name were called Lutherans) but an excommunication was decreed against Fredericke Duke of Saxony: the which did so incense him, as of a fauourer he became a vehement protector of the cause: the which since hath bene dispersed ouer all Christendome, so as neither prisons, nor banishment, fire, nor water, sword nor tortures, nor any other punishments, could preuaile against it. Without doubt, we haue learned by experience, that religion is not planted, nor rooted out by violent meanes. The altars of pietie are enemies to armes, drums, and trumpets. Mens consciences must be gently intreated, not violently forced. Let vs attend this so desired reunion from heauen. The mediation of the most Christian King is necessarie: let vs hope, that the continuance of a holy peace will giue him the meanes, as he hath a desire to choose men capable thereof, who not regarding their priuate interest, will seeke the aduancement of Gods glorie. But let vs returne to our historie. Whilest that Charles, the fift was crowned at Aix, the people of Spaine fore-seeing, that by the means of his aduancement to the Empire, he should remaine for the most part out of Spaine, beeing also incensed against the Lord of Chieures, and some Flemings which had gouerned Charles in his youth, through whose couetousnesse, Offices, Graces, Priuiledges, and Expeditions (which had bene usually giuen to Spaniards) were now dearly sold vnto them, they rebelled, refusing to obey the Kings officers. They created a forme of popular gouernment, with the aduice almost 1520. of all Spaine, whilest the Nobilitie sought by force to suppress this popular libertie. The A King, by the Popes counsell (who makes his profit of Christian Princes quarrels, that hee might haue peace, whilest they are at warre) seeing that the Emperour, being often vrged, did in no sort performe the Articles of the treatie of Noyon, sent an armie into Nauarre, vnder the commaund of Esparre, brother to Lautrec, who in lesse then fiftene dayes reduced Nauarre to the obedience of Henry of Albret their lawfull King. This was enough for Esparre. It had bene better to returne a victor triumphing with glory and honour, then to follow the aduice of too violent a Councillor, Saint-Colombe Lieutenant of Lautrecs companie, (promising to himselfe, it may be, the conquest of Spaine, as easily as that of Nauarre: or fed with a hope to make some good bootie:) carried Esparre euen to the frontiers B of Catalonia: who hauing taken Fontarabie, did runne as farre as the Grongne. The Spaniards being incensed, (the Nobilitie against the people) had endured the losse of the kingdom of Nauarre, but seeing them to inuade their owne marches, they put in practise the by-word of the dogges, who fighting together, layed aside their quarrell, to fall vpon the wolfe, their common enemy. So these, being at great discord amongst themselves gaue ouer their intestine quarrells, to pursue their professed enemies.

The Nobles and Commons ioyned their forces, they incounter Esparre, who to saue the souldiers pay, had dismissed some part of his armie, giuing leaue to all that would, in yeelding halfe a pay: they charge him, defeat him, and take him prisoner, being hurt in the eye with a Lance, whereof he grew blind. The Lord of Tournon was likewise taken, with C many other good men. So the Spaniards finding Nauarre vnfurnished of souldiers, recovered Pampelune, with as great facilitie as the French had conquered it. The first breeder of the horrible confusions which shall follow. But let vs see another motiue of warre, betwixt these two Monarchs, which rising from a small fire, shall flame ouer all this Realme, and many other estates.

The Prince of Chimay, of the house of Croy, had beforetime obtained a sentence against the Lord of Aimeries, giuen by the Peeres of the Duchie of Bouillon; (which iudge souverainly) for the towne of Hierges in Ardenne: yet through the fauour and credit which Aimeries had with Charles of Austria, and the greatest in his Court, hee was releued, although he had not appealed from the said sentence in time, grounding the causes of his releefe vpon the letts and hinderances he had had during the former warres, at the which hee had alwaies assisted in person. So as a Commission being granted before the great Chancellor of Brabant, and a day assigned to the heires of Chimay, to come to heare the reasons of Aimeries releefe: and if need were, to see the former sentence (giuen to their behoofe) reuoked. They found this commission so vniust, and vnreasonable (seeing that both their father and they had bene in long and quiet possession of the said Towne) and that this decree was not subiect to appeal: as they repaired to Robert de la Mark Duke of Bouillon, as to their Lord and Protector, that with their right he might defend the liberties and priuileges of his Duchie. Robert discontented, that his companie of men at armes had bene cashiered for the extorsions and robberies they had committed in Italy, and else-where, had E left the King, and was retired to the Emperour. But seeing that iustice was denied him, as well for the priuate interest of pupils (whose Vncle and Tutor he was, hauing married their Ant, sister to the Prince of Chimay) he made his peace with the King, by the mediation of his wife, and his sonne Fleuranges (thee being daughter to the Earle of Brenne) with the Kings mother.

Robert hauing assured his affaires with the King, sent to defie the Emperour at Wormes, where he had called a Diet of the Princes, and free Townes of Germanie, against the new-bred troubles, by reason of Luther. A bold attempt of a pettie Prince against an Emperour, mightie in meanes, men, and courage. A great riuer runs quietly betwixt the bankes that bound it, but at the first breach it ouerflows a whole countie: so there is nothing more easie then to incense Princes; but being once moued, they are hardly appeased. This defie giuen, Fleuranges the eldest sonne of Robert, notwithstanding the Kings expresse prohibition, made a leaue as well in France as in other places, of three thousand foote, and foure or five hundred horse, with the which he besieged Vireton, a small towne in Luxembourg belonging to the Emperour. But soone after he retired his armie by the Kings commandement, and

A and dismissed it. But their spleenes were wonderfully incensed vpon new occasions. The king, for that the Emperour failed in the payment of the pension, for the Realme of Naples, and in the restitution of Nauarre: and withal, his preferment to the Empire had greatly discontented him. The Emperour was grieved, for the enterprise of Nauarre, and the attempt of the Duke of Bouillon, being also well informed, that the King sought the meanes to recover the Realme of Naples. Francis had sent a Gentleman to the Pope, to know when it should please him to performe his part for the execution of that which they had concluded together (the which his Maiestie knew according to the disposition of Leo to be more counterfeited then currant.) And Leo giuing to the Gentleman a note of the horse, foote and artillerie, that was necessarie for this enterprise, assigned the King two and twentie dayes to arm, B whilest the Venetians might enter into this League.

The Pope had no meaning, that Naples should be subiect to the French. If the King had not in the meane time neglected his affaires, Leo had bene forced to runne another course. And the Pope glad to haue some colourable shew of discontent, accuseth the King either to be carelesse, or ill-affected, hauing not drawne the Venetians into the said League, for the defence of Italy. He complains, that his Maiestie had not payed but the first month for the leaue of Suisses, which they had bene forced to make against the Spaniard, who a little before had inuaded the territories of the Church, whereof the King should pay a moitie, and makes a shew as if the King had treated something with the Emperour, without his priuie, and to his prejudice.

C Thus Leo seeming iustly displeased, receiued into Rhegium (contrarie to his agreement with the King) all the banished men of Milan: he inuested Charles of Austria, in the Realme of Naples, made a defensue league with him, including the house of Medicis and the Florentines: and deuising how to conquer Milan; they agreed: That Parma and Placentia should remaine to the Church, to hold them with the same rights it did before: That Francis Sforza brother to Maximilian should be put in possession of the Duchie of Milan, as hauing right from his father, and his brothers renunciation: and that the Emperour should ayde the Pope against his subiects, and feudatories, namely, to conquer Ferrara. This mutuall resolution of aliance was a meane, by Gods prouidence, to shew his wonderfull iudgements, and a scourge to punish both French, Italians, and Spaniards for many yeares: whereby followed so many euerfusions of townes, oppressions of people, desolations of Prouinces; and the death of so many men of valour.

The Emperour in the meane time, leauies a great armie of horse and foote, vnder the command of Henry Earle of Nassau, who tooke Longnes from Robert de la Marke; raised the Towne, and hanged the Captaine, with twelue of the chiefe of his troupe. The Captaine of Musancourt, (deliuered by some of his souldiers, with the place to the said Earle) escaped the gallows at the intreatie of the chiefe of his armie, but twentie of his souldiers were hanged, and the place likewise razed and spoiled to the ground. About this time, there was much controuersie touching the Duchie of Milan, the Emperour pretending it to belong absolutely to him, not onely by conquest, but much rather by inheritance: concerning which, the most learned in the lawes of the Empire produced many and very probable reasons and arguments. These two prizes caused Fleuranges and Sansey his brother (the sonnes of Robert) to put themselves into Sametz, with a resolution to die or to keepe it. The Earle after foure dayes seige, hauing seen the garrisons firme resolution, raised his campe, to take the way to Fleuranges. The Germanes which kept it, yeilded vp both the towne and their Captaine the Lord of Sametz, the sonne of Robert, into the Earles hands, who hauing ruined it, did the like vnto Sansey. Bouillon was afterwards yeilded vnto him by intelligence. After this, Robert obtained a truce of the Emperour for sixe weekes. But the Emperour Charles dreamed of a more important warre: If his spleene had bene onely against the house of La Mark, why should he grant them a truce, being almost ruined; and being a Conquerour, and strong enough to subdue the said Robert, why did he still increase his armie?

The King hauing intelligence, that warre was proclaimed against him, prepared his forces to withstand the Emperour: and to this end he gaue a commission to Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Pol, to leaue sixe thousand foote: to the Constable of Bourbon 8 hundred horse, and sixe thousand foote: and to the Duke of Vendosme the like charge. And to 1521. reuenge the disgrace receiued by Esparte, he sent fixe thousand Lansquenets, of whom Cland of Lorraine Earle of Guise was Generall, vnder William of Gouffiers, Lord of Bonniuet, Admirall of France, to whom he gaue fise companies of horse, and commission to leaue what number of Galscons and Basques he should thinke necessarie. The Lord of Lescut was in like fort releued with French and Suisses, for the warre of Italy.

The armies on either side were in field: there remains nothing but for the one to make a breach: the Imperials beginne. There had beene a long and a great quarrell betwixt Lewis Cardinall of Bourbon, and the Lord of Liques, a Gentleman of Hainault, for the Abbey of S. Amand which the Cardinall enioyed. Liques takes this occasion to assault the Abbey, which beeing of no strength, was deliuered vnto him by Champeroux, Lieutenant for the King in Tournaisis, in the which de Loges Gouverneur of Tournay was surprized. We might pretend that these were but priuate quarrels: but Liques aduanced with his forces to Mortaigne, a place subiect to the King, the which he said he had sometimes enioyed.

In the end Prancy, Captaine of the said place (hauing no hope of succours) yelded it, not to Liques, but to the Lord of Portien, vpon condition to depart with their liues and baggage. But contrarie to the Law of armes and honestie, they were pursued, stript, and hardly escaped with their liues. On the other side, Piennes, of the house of Luxembourg, Gouverneur of Flanders, beseege Tournay with a thousand horse, eight thousand foote, and fixe Cannons, continuing there fise moneths, whilest that the Bourguignons did take, spoile, and raze Ardres, the Lord of Teligni in exchange, did charge, defeat, and cut in peeces fixe hundred Bourguignons, that were entred the Realme to spoile it. In the beginning of these garboyles, Henry King of England did offer himselfe an Arbitrator betwixt these two Princes, Charles and Francis, and Calis was named for the treatie of a good peace. But what meanes was there to yeld to the Emperours vnreasonable demaunds, to restore vnto him the Duchie of Bourgogn, with an abolition of the homage which he ought vnto this crown, for Flanders? beeing vnreasonable (as he pretended) that an Emperour should doe homage to a King of France: as if we did not commonly see Princes hold their hands by the homage of simple Gentlemen. So this parle tooke no effect.

Hitherto the Imperials dealt vnder-hand, protesting not to make warre against the King: but now they discouer themselves, and come with enignes displayed to beseege Mouzon: they batter it in two places, the one by the meddow towards the port of Rheims: the other from the mountaine going to Iuoy. The footmen newly leauied, and not yet trained, grew amazed, and force Montmort the Captaine of that place, to demaund a composition: for the obtaining whereof, he went with Lafsigny, his companion, to the Earle; and obtained, That every man at armes should depart, with a curtall vnarmed, and the foot-men and archers, without armes, and a white wand in their hands: what policie was this, to see two Lieutenants to a King, goe forth off a place to capitulate with the enemye without doubt they deserued the shame which many haue suffered for the like rashnesse, to be detained prisoners, put to ransom, and forced to yeld the Towne at discretion.

The taking of all these Townes without opposition, drew the Earle to Mezieres (commanded by the Cheualier Bayard) but he found a more generous resolution then at Moizon. The experience and valour of the Capitaines, and the desire which Anne Lord of Montmorency had to do the King some notable seruice in his youth, had drawne him into the Towne, with many well-minded Gentlemen of the Court: amongst the rest, the Lords of Loges, Annebault, Lucé, Villeclair, John de la Tour Lord of Bremont, John Duresl, Lord of Betbee, Nicholas of Thouars Lord of Suilly, Mathurin, and Charles de Cleres, (whose valours and fidelitie deserue a place in our Historie.) Anthony Duke of Lorraine (whole Lieutenant Bayard was) and the Lord of Oruall, Gouverneur of Champagne, commaunded either of them; a hundred men at armes. Boucart and the Baron of Montmoreau, had either of them a thousand foot. This might seeme too much for a small place, but it was strong and of importance. The Canon did no sooner begin to batter, but most of the foot grew amazed, and in despite of their Capitaines fled, some by the gate, others ouer the wals: Bayard by the basenesse of them that fled, tooke occasion to assure the resolutions of such as remained, For (said he) prefering the towne with the helpe of few men, we shall haue the more merit and reputation: our troups are of the more force, beeing discharged of this unprofitable burthen.

The

A The Earle comming neere to Mezieres, sent to summon the commanders to yeld the towne vnto the Emperour. Report vnto the Earle of Nassau (said Bayard to the trompet) That before he shall heare me speake of yielding up the towne, which the King hath giuen mee in charge, I hope to make a bridge of my enemies carcases, ouer the which I may march. Henry makes two bateries, and shakes the wals, for the space of a moneth. But finding by sundry sallies (in the which the beseege did most commonly carry the honour and aduantage) the resolution of the commanders, men at armes, and fouldiers: hauing also intelligence of the defeat of a hundred choise horse of the Emperours campe, and two hundred foote, led by the Earle Reinfourket, to spoile Arrigni, vpon Aisne: all which Francis of Silli, Baylife of Caen, Lieutenant to the Duke of Alançon; had put to the sword, except 5. or 6. which were carried prisoners to the said Earle at Rheims; the towne hauing beene also releued, the first of October with a thousand foote led by Loges, foure hundred horse by Teligni, and some munition, he abated the first fury of his artillery, and despayring to take the towne by force or famine, he raised his campe, and made his retreat by Mont-Cornet in Ardennes, Maubert Fontaine, and Aubenron, to Veruin and Guise, spoyling, burning and killing, men, women and children without distinction: a mournfull beginning of the cruellies which haue beene committed in the succeeding warres. Bayard for a worthy reward of his vertue, was honored by the King with accompany of a hundred men at armes, and the order of Saint Michael. In the meane time the King assembles his forces at Feruaques, to cut off the enemies way about Guise, and to fight with him: during whose retreat, the Cont Saint Paul recouered Mouzon, for the King.

The Earle of Nassau leaves Mezieres.

Such was the estate of Picardy, and Champagne, whilest the Admirall of Bonniuet arrived at Saint John de Luz, for the enterprise of Nauarre. His purpose was to surprize Fontaraby. To hold the enemy in suspence, he first tooke the Castell of Poignan vpon the mountaine of Roncevaux, then making shew to take the way of Pampelune, hee turned head through the mountaines towards the towne of Maye, and whilest he lodged his artillery, he caused the Earle of Guise (who commanded the Lansquenets) to take the way by the riuier of Behaubie, running at the foote of the mountaines which come from Nauarre and so passeth into the sea before Fontaraby: and in the morning hee followed with his army. Hauiug some Spaniards in front, which camped on the other side of the water; he passed the riuier at a ford, the said Earle marching before them with a pike in his hand. Don Diego de Vere chiefe of the enemies army, being equall in number, and hauing an aduantage ouer those that came wet from the passage of a riuier, amazed at the resolution of our men, left the field, and fled with his men through the mountaines.

The Castell of Behaubie kept all victualls from our campe, and held it in great destresse. But the first Volee of the cannon, hauing split one of their best peeces, and slaine the gouernor with some others that did assist him, the soldiars beeing amazed, force their Capitaine to yeld at discretion: whereof the Admirall sent the best prisoners to Bayonne, the rest hee turned away being disarmed. The way beeing thus layd open to Fontaraby, (a place which they held impregnable, and one of the keyes of Spaine) fortified on three parts, with the sea, riuier and mountaine, in few daies he made a breach, but not assailable. Norwithstanding the Galscons, Basques and Nauarrois, demanded the assault, the which was defended with as great resolution as it was assayed: but the beseege hauing discovered some peeces, which the Admirall had planted on the mountaine, to beate them the next day in flanke at the second attempt, and knowing the resolution of the assaylants, by the proofe they had formerly made, caused them to yeld, vpon condition to depart, with their baggage and baggage. James of Aillon Lord of Lude, was made Gouverneur thereof.

Fontaraby taken.

Let vs returne to Feruaques, where we haue left the King preparing to fight with the enemy. To this end he giues the forward to the Duke of Alançon (who had married Marguerite of Valois the Kings sister) accompanied with the Marshall of Chastillon, (this was the first motiue of the Constable of Bourbons discontent; the which place was due vnto him as Constable of France.) He tooke the battaile himselfe, taking the said Duke of Bourbon vnto him, and committed the rereward to the Duke of Vendosme. Bapaume did much annoy the frontier towards Peronne, Corbie and Dourlans. The Earle of Saint Paul, the Marshall of Chabannes and the Lord of Fleuranges tooke it, beat downe the defences, and burnt 1521. it to ashes. The Duke of Vendosme had Commission to do the like vnto Landrecy: who arriving late, foure or fiue ensignes of the bands of Picardie march, without commandement and without ladders, and sie furiously to the port, where they plant their Ensignes vpon the draw-bridge, but they were repulsed by seauen or eight hundred Lansquenets and some of their Ensigne-bearers slaine. This furie of the Picards did so amaze the Germanes, as without attending batterie, breach, or assault, they retired into the next Forrest, where they could not pursue them, by reason of the riuer running thorough the towne. Thus Landrecy vnfurnished of men, was the next day taken, razed and burnt.

The Emperor was retired with his armie towards Valenciennes: the King makes a bridge ouer the riuer of Escan beneath Bouchain, either to fight with him, or to make him abandon the cuntry with dishonour. Charles hauing intelligence of this bridge, sent twelue thousand Lansquenets, and foure thousand horse to stop the passage, but the Earle of S. Pol with those fixe thousand men which he commanded, was already in battaile on the other side of the water, in a marsh towards Valenciennes, and the King followed him speedily with all his army, which were about sixteene hundred men at armes, and fixe and twenty thousand foote with the light horse. The which the enemy perceiuing, he left seuen or eight hundred horse to couer the retreat of his footmen, taking the way to Valenciennes. Tremouille and the Marshall of Chabannes offer to charge them in the reere: the Swisses cried out for battaile, to giue a testimonie vnto the King, that they desired to seale the confirmation of their new alliance with some notable seruice: and if their aduice had bene followed, the Emperor had that day by all likelihood lost his honour, and the flower of his armie. So the enemy retired without any losse, except the bastard of Aimeries and some prisoners. GOD doth often minister occasions, the which beeing once neglected, are neuer recovered with so great aduantage. But howsoeuer, the Emperor retired by night into Flanders with an hundred horse, leauing all the rest of his armie behind him.

The next day, Bouchain yeelded at the first summons to the Duke of Bourbon. This shamefull retreat of the Imperials draws our armie to Hedin, beeing vnfurnished of souldiers, when as the inhabitants feared no enemy, beeing busied at the marriage of a daughter of the Receiuer generall of Arthois. The Dukes of Bourbon and Vendosme and the Earle of Saint Paul, with the troupes (commonly called the Blacke bands) notwithstanding the continuall raine, were at the Towne-gates, before the cittizens had any intelligence of their departure from the armie. The towne being resolutely attempted, was taken by assault, and was spoiled by the footmen, the which abounded in wealth: for that in old time the Dukes of Bourgongne had made their chiefe residence there. But in the midst of the spoile, one quarter of the towne was fired, contrary to the Constables expresse commandement, the which depriued the souldiers of part of their bootie. The Ladie of Rieux and the garrison of the castle departed with their baggage: but all the Inhabitants that were retired and come into it, were put to ransom. The Lord of Biez had the gouernement of the Castle, and Lorges of the towne, with a thousand foote. This happened on all-Saints day.

Winter was come, and the enemy appeared no more: the King dispersed his army, and giuing the most of the Gentlemen that had followed the Dukes of Bourbon and Vendosme the command of twentie fiue horse a peece, putting his companies into garrison, and disposing of the rest of the armie, he retired to Compiene, about Christmas, not able for the distemperature of the weather to releue Tournay, necessitie forcing the Lord of Champroux to depart with an honourable composition, armed, their Ensignes displayed, Drums sounding, and their baggage saved.

Now may we see, what effects the Popes league with the Emperor shall bring forth. Being both equally desirous to expell the French out of Italy, they thought it best, before they came to open force, to shadow their practises with a Foxes skin, and by meanes of the banished men, to assaile the Duchies of Milan and Genoua at one instant, with the citties of Parma, Placentia, Cremona, and Crema. But he that attempts too much, performs little: so many sundry enterprises do most commonly terrifie more then hurt. According to this plot the Emperors gallies, remaining at Genoua, the Popes come sodenly into the port of Genoua, with two thousand Spaniards, led by Ierome Adorne, hoping that the partisans of that family, would not faile to mutine: but the good order which Fregose had set, made their desaigne

The Emperors dishonorable retreat.

Hedin taken.

A desaigne fruitlesse. On the other side, Lautrec; before his comming into France, to marry the daughter of the Lord of Orual, had expelled many out of Milan, that were ill affected to the King, whereof they said the most part had bene banished for sleight occasions, or to seize vpon their goods.

Without doubt, severity looseth those hearts, which clemency and moderation in a temperate commander would make vse of at need. Francis Sforza, Ierosme Moren, Manfroy Paluiofin and Soto of Brindisi, were the chiefe, who hauing assembled a great number of their Partisans, for the execution of their desaignes, retired to Regium, belonging to the Church, although neither the Pope, nor the King (according to their treatie) ought to haue supported them in their territorics. Lescur Marshall of Foix, Licutenant to his brother, aduertised of these stirres, by Frederike of Bossole, parted from Milan on Midfomer eue, accompanied with foure hundred Lances, and followed by Bossole, leading a thousand foote, to require Count Guy of Rangon, gouernour of the towne for the Pope, that according to the treaty, hee should deliuer these banished men into his hands. Whilest that Lescur and Rangon, conferred together vpon their faith, at a posterne entring into the Ruelin, at the gate which goes to Parma, the one complaining, that contrary to the articles of the league, they did support (in townies belonging to the church) the banished men being assembled to trouble the Kings estate; and the other, that hee had sodenly entred with armes into the territorics of the Church: behold a gate being opened for the letting in of a cart laden with meale, the Lord of Bonneual aduanceth with some men at armes, to seize vpon the port, but they were repulsed, and the gate shut. Some banished men being vpon the walles, discharge their Harquebuses, and hurt Alexander Truulce, whereof he died two daies after. Nothing saued Lescur, but the feare which the Harquebusier had that aimed at him, to kill the Gouernour. The indiscretion of one man, is pernicious to such as accompany him. During this garboile, the Earle, to assure *Lescur*s person, led him vpon his faith into the Ruelin. The men at armes taking this for an imprisonment; fled to carry news to the troupes, which stayed two miles from Regium, who standing doubtfull, whether they should march against the towne to recover their leader, or returne to Parma, thinking it a practise to surpris the towne in their absence: the Marshall arrived, being released by the Earle, forbearing to stay him, hauing giuen him his faith, and receiued commission, not to proceed against the King by open warre. This enterprise, as badly effected as rashly attempted, was of consequence. It was a good colour for the Pope to accuse the King, and to iustifie his confederacy with the Emperor. To preuen this, Lescur sent La Motte to Leo, to disauow the attempt at Rhegium, and to let him vnderstand, that what hee had done, was neither to attempt against him, nor against the estate of the Church. For answer: The Marshall of Foix (said the Pope in great choller) hath lodged (in armes like an enemy) vpon my territorie, I will make him know the wrong hee hath done vnto the King. Presently after this threat, hee did excommunicate the Marshall out of the Church. The desaigne vpon Como, succeeded no better then that of Genoua, for Manfroy of Paluiofin, and Soto of Brindisi, hauing in the night approached to the walles, with eight hundred Italian foot, and Lansquenets, hoping that Anthony Rusque a citizen of Como, would make a breach for them in the wall behind his house, as he had promised to Benedict Torne, an other of that city, that was banished, capitaine Garron a Basque by nation, a man well practised in armes, did mingle the townes-men with the souldiers, at the gard of the wall, to preuent the execution of their intelligence, if happily they had any. So as the conspirators not daring to discouer themselves Paluiofin deceived of his foolish enterprise, hauing planted his gards about the towne, where hee thought most fit, went to sleepe. Garron, issues forth to giue them a skirmish, hee kills the greatest part; some seeke their safety vpon the lake, others vpon the mountaine. Three barks were sunke in the Lake, and seuen taken by Garron. Many were taken prisoners, amongst others Manfroy and Soto, who after they had confessed the reuolts and practises in the estate of Milan, were publickly quartered at Milan: and Bartimew Ferrer their complice, a man of authority in the towne, was beheaded, vpon the returne of the Lord of Lautrec; whom the King (beeing aduertised of these disorders) sent presently to Milan. The Lansquenets had leaue to depart into their country.

Seeing the Popes secret practises could not succeed, he now discouers himselfe, hee complains

An enterprise vpon Como, faileth.

1521. plaines in the Consistorie of Cardinals, of the attempt of Rhegium: and concludes, that the King is ill affected to the Apostolike sea, and (concealing the capitulations hee had secretly made with the Emperour) he protests, that he is forced to allie himselfe vnto him, who (said Leo) had neuer committed any thing vnworthie of a Christian Prince, and very zealous to Religion.

So, the Wolfe in the Fable accused the sheepe for troubling the water. Thereupon he presently makes shew to contract with Dom Iohn Emanuel, Ambassadour to Charles, the league which he had formerly concluded, and resolues, by the aduice of Prosper Colonne, to inuade the Estate of Milan with fixe hundred men at armes, and the companies of horse which the Emperour had in the Realme of Naples, fixe thousand Italian foote, two thousand Spaniards (which Adorne had in the riuier of Genoua) two thousand Neapolitanes, (which the Marquis of Pescara should bring) foure thousand Lansquenets, and two thousand Grisons, (which should be leauied at their common charge) and two thousand Suisses, which had remained voluntarily, of a greater number vnder the Popes pay.

An ominous
signe to the French.

Whilest this was working, behold a fatall signe to our French-men of their instant calamities: for on Saint Peters day, the Sunne beeing set, and the skie cleare, lightning fell vpon the great Tower of the Castle of Milan, and ouerthrew fixe fadomes of the Curtaine on either side, consumed two hundred and fiftie thousand weight of powder, twelue hundred fire-pots, the prouision of salt for five yeares: and vnder the ruines were slaine Richbourg Capitaine of the Castle, and about three hundred Gentlemen and souldiers that were walking there. Leo did not forget to triumph at this accident, and to impute it to the wrath of God laid vpon the French.

Seege of Parma.

This heauie accident was a spur to hasten his resolutions, for the ruine of our men. And knowing that the estate of Mantoua did import him much for the warres of Lombardie, hee entertained Fredericke Marquis of Mantoua with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horse, giuing him the title of Generall for the Church: for the accepting wherof the Marquis renouncing the order of Saint Michel, sent backe the collar to the King, wherewith his Maiestie had honoured him. The Marquis of Mantoua and Prosper Colonne, hauing armed for the Pope, and the Marquis of Pescara for the Emperour, they besieged Parma, seated vpon a riuier of the same name, and easie to be passed: but after great raine, and the day after the beheading of S. Iohn, hauing battered the port of S. Croix towards Milan (which at that time was but the suburbe) and made a breach of fiftie paces, giuen three sharpe assaults and were repulsed, about foure thousand Italians (of fixe thousand that were within the towne) went out at the breach, and yeelded to the enemy. The Marshal of Foix, who had vndertaken the defence thereof, the Lord of Pont-Dormy, Gouvernour of the town and the other Captaines, hauing kept the bafe Towne about fiftene dayes, retired into the Towne beyond the Riuier, leauing an Italian Captain at the breach, to fauor the retreat of their men at arms, who, to work his own safetie, decieued the enemy by a gentle stratagem, he caused euery one of the harguebuziers, to lay an end of a match, light vpon the rampar, where they did vsually make their guard, so as it was an houre after the breake of day, before the enemies had knowledge that the breach was abandoned: which hauing discouered, they passe their artillerie, spoile the suburbes, make their approaches to the Towne at Noone-day, and begin to batter the wall, which defends the other banke of the riuier.

But small accidents doe often disappoint attempts of great consequence. The same night that the enemy entred into Codipont (which is the suburbe they had abandoned) newes comes, that Alphonso of Este, Duke of Ferrara, with an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse, two thousand foote, (whereof Lautrec had sent him a thousand Italians and Corsegues, and twelue peeces of artillerie) had surprized Final and Saint Felix, and threatened Modena. Prosper Colonne would not diminish his army, when as he feared the enemies approach. But to assure Modena, they must draw out of the Popes armie two hundred light horse and eight hundred foote, led by Count Guy of Rangon, to ioine with fixe hundred others that were left within the place.

On the other side, Lautrec approached with his army, which consisted of seauen or eight hundred Lances, thirteene or fourteene thousand Suisses, foure thousand French, which S. Vallier had newly brought: five hundred men at armes Venetians, and foure thousand foote

A foote vnder Theodore Triumice generall of the Venetians, and Andrew Gritti Commillary, accompanied with the duke of Vrbin and Marke Anthony Colonne. These two considerations, with the obstinate resolution of the besieged, forced the enemy to raise the seege, and to take the way of Po, to enter the estate of Milan. Lautrec follows them: but hauing lost two or three daies in taking the Castell of Roque-bianque, he gaue them leasure to passe the riuier. It is good to obserue the errors of a Commander, that others may iudge and make their profit thereby. The Popes army lay open to the spoile: the Lansquenets mutined for want of pay, refusing to follow, and resolved to ioine with the French. The retreat was made in confusion: the army was full of feare, for this sodaine dislodging: they had in front a great difficulty, being to passe the riuier of Po: when a great army passeth any riuier, it is easie to disturbe them, if the enemy bee dilligent and valliant: were they not then likely to be put to rout, if Lautrec had pursued them hotly? Thus they passed the Po, the first of October, spending a whole day and a great part of the night at the passage, but the sparing of spies makes commanders oft times to let slip goodly occasions, being ignorant of the disorders and difficulties that troubled the enemy.

French army.

This is not all, other accidents happen, which being neglected, the French shall receiue a shamefull disgrace. The enemies army was so weake, as the Spaniards and Lansquenets were now reduced to about seauen thousand, the Italians (for the most part new soldiars,) serued rather to make a number, then for any strength, and lodged at Rebec, attending a supply of Suisses, so prest for victuals, as the prouision of meale, which was brought vnto them in small quantity, was distributed to the companies by measure. The soldiars, for want of O-uens, baked their portions vpon the embers: their Suisses came not, many Italians fled away secretly, & al men confessed, that if the French army which lodged at Bourdellane, two miles neere to the enemies campe, & had charged them at their rising from Rebec, halfe vanquished with so many difficulties, ther had remained little or no hope of safety. For these necessities had forced them to retire: where the retreat being long and the enemy neere, the danger had bene euident, considering that from the Castell of Pont-Iuy, belonging to the Venetians, they might disorder their battaillions with the Cannon. But the fruitlesse and long stay of our commanders at Rebec, after the enemies departure, gaue them leysure to passe the riuier of Oglic, and to lodge in the village of Ostiana, with an intent not to rise, before the arriual of their Suisses.

The feast of all Saints drew neere, the nights grew long, the continuall rayne and cold annoyed our Suisses, who demanded that pay which the law of armes giues vnto soldiars that haue wonne a battaile, saying, that it was not their fault they had not obtayned a victory. But in this case, not the will, but the effect merits such a pay: so as of all their company there remained about foure thousand. Thus beeing full of disdain and discontent, suborned likewise by the practises of the Cardinalls of Medicis and Sion, who as Legats to Leo marched in the midst of the army with their crosses of siluer, enuionned (said the Originall) with numbers of armed men, artillery, blasphemers, murderers and theues, they did greatly weaken the Kings army, to fortifie the enemy, ioyning with Prosper Colonne, and imputing the chiefe cause thereof to the want of pay. Without doubt, it is a great error, in a Kings officers, especially in an army, to conuert the mony appointed for the paiement of an armie, to other vses. It was at the passage of the riuier of Adde, that the last act of this tragedy must be played: for the defence whereof Lautrec sent the Lord of Pont-dormy, with his company: that of Ottavian Fregosc (led by Count Hugues of Pepoli a Bolonois) a thousand or twelue hundred foote, and two faulcons. But it pleased God, at this time to satisfie the Popes couetousnesse with the spoile of our men, that he might execute the iust iudgement of his vengeance soone after vpon his person. The enemy beates backe our gards, and put them to flight, kills some and amongst others, Gratian of Luce and Chardon, neighbours to the forrest of Orleans: who commanded either of them a regiment of five hundred men. They passe Adde at Vauci, and force Lautrec to retire to Cassan, and so towards Milan with his whole army.

The passage of Adde recovered *Prosper Colonne*s reputation, who for the retreat before Parma, and his ordinary tediousnesse, was ill reputed of, as well at Rome, as in his army. Contrariwise, Lautrec wanting neither valour nor braue resolution, but Vigilance and happinesse, purchaseth purchased contempt of his men and hatred of the Milanois, whome hee did the more exasperate, in causing Christopher Palmoisin to be publicly beheaded, a man of great Nobility, great authoritie, great age, and a long time detained a prisoner. Colonne advertised of the retreat of the French to Milan, lodged at Marignan, and his Suisses in the Abbey of Cleruaut, doubtfull whether he should passe on to Milan, being fortified with so many men: or turne to Pavia, being destitute of souldiars. Beeing thus irresolute, there appears vnto the Marquis of Mantoua; an aged man, meane in shew and apparell, who beeing brought before Colonne and the other Capitaines, assures them, that he is sent from the parishioners of S. Cir of Milan, to let them vnderstand, that at the first approach of their armie, all the people of Milan are resolu'd to take armes against the French, by the sound of the belles of every parish: wishing them to set forward with speed, without giuing the French leysure to be thinke themselves. And so he vanished away, not knowne to any man.

The Commanders gaue credit to this intelligence. The 23. of Nouember the Marquis of Pescara with his Spanish bands, presents himselfe at the port of Rome at Sunne-setting, and presently chargeth the Venetians, appointed to guard the suburbs with a bastion which they had newly begunne: he puts them to flight, making no resistance; and the Suisses likewise that were lodged by them: killes some and hurts others, before our men had any knowledge of their arriual. Theodore Trimmle, who (beeing sicke and disarmed) came to this alarme vpon a little moyle, was taken, The Gibelins seizing on the port, brought in the Marquis of Pescara and Mantoua, the Cardinall of Medicis, Colonne, and a part of the army: the victors not able to conceiue by what happinesse and meanes they had so easily obtained so notable a victorie; the which was confirmed by the sack of the Citie, which continued fifteene dayes.

We cannot but blame our Commanders herein of negligence, and too great confidence in not discouering the enemies remooue that day: who thought, that they would not assault the Ramparts without their artillerie, the which could not march, the wayes beeing broken with continuall raine.

Lautrec, troubled with the feare and the darknesse of the night, not able to discouer in so short a time, the estate of the enemy confusedly lodged, some in the citie, others in the suburbs: left Masfaron (a Gentleman of Gasconie) within the castle, with fiftie men at armes, and six hundred French foote, and retired his armie to Como, where leaving John of Chabannes Lord of Vandenesse, brother to the Marshall of Chabannes, with fiftie men at armes, and five hundred foote, he re-passed the riuer of Adde at Lecque, and tooke the way of Bergamo, to put his men at armes into Garrison in the Venetians cuntry, and other places which held yet for the French.

It is an vniuersall thing to yeeld vnto the Conqueror. Lauda, Pavia, Placentia, Alexandria, Cremona, hold for the Empire and the Duke of Milan. Janot of Herbouille, Lord of Bunnon, held yet the castle of Cremona. Laurie sent his brother Lescut thither, (who since the retreat of Parma, had ioyned with the armie) with part of his forces to recouer it. Who beeing repulsed, Lautrec brought all his troupes, which were but five hundred men at armes, foure thousand Suisses, and a few other footmen, foure hundred men at armes Venetians, and six thousand foote. As all things were readie for the assault, the enemy beeing amazed, demanded a composition, the which they obtained with their liues and baggage. A smal comfort for men halfe discouraged.

Cremona recovered.

Frederike of Bossole came from Parma with his forces by Lautrecs commandement. He had no sooner passed the Po, but Vitelli seizeth thereon with a most pleasing consent of all the people. All these victories were glorious to the enemy: but the trecherie of one blemished their former reputation. Como besieged and battered tenne or twelue dayes, despairing of succour and defence, had yeelded vpon condition, that as well the French companies, as those of the towne, should haue their liues and goods saued, depart with their Lances vpon their thighes, and be safely conducted into the Venetians cuntry: and yet when the French would depart, the Spaniards entred and spoiled both the souldiers and the Citizens. Vandenesse accusing the Marquesse of Pescara to haue broken his faith, challenged him to the combat: If you will maintaine (answered hee) that this sacke is happened by my commandement or permission: I say that you haue lyed. But before the quarrell could be ended, Vandenesse was slaine at Romagnen, at the retreat of the Admirall 1522.

Death of Pope Leo.

Alterations after this death.

Parma besieged.

A new Pope called Adrian the sixth.

The warre renewed.

A Admirall of Bonniuer, whom the end of the wars of Nauarre had drawn beyond the Alpes. At the same instant, those of the league sent the bishop of Verule to the Suisses, to withdraw their affections from this crowne. But displeased that their men had marched against the King, and complaining of the Cardinal of Sion, the Pope and all his officers, who had perswaded them to breake the conditions of their alliance, they put this bishop in hold at Bellinzone, and called home the troupes they had in Italy. Oftentimes the victor is parraker of the commodities of warre, they made preparation to assaile Cremona and Genoua. But their desseignes are broken by the death of Pope Leo, who hauing newes of the taking of Milan, but especially of Parma and Placentia (for the recouery whereof to the church, hee had chiefly moued this warre) he was so wonderfully transported with ioy, as he falls into a quotidian, with a Catarre, amidst all his iollity, the which carried him within three daies after to the graue, being the first of December.

This death did greatly impair the Emperours affaires in Italy, and bred new gouernments, new Councils, and a new estate of affaires in the Duchy of Milan. The Cardinals of Medicis and Sion, went to assist at the election of a new Pope. The Imperials retained fifteene hundred Suisses, and dismissed the rest. The Lansequets likewise departed. The Florentine companies returned into Tuscany. Guy of Rangon lead part of those of the church to Modena, the rest remained with the Marquis of Mantoua, in the Duchie of Milan. And the duke of Ferrara (making his profit of this occasion) recouered with the liking of the inhabitants, Bondene, Final, the mountaine of Modena and Carfagnane, hee tooke Lugo, Bagnacaul and other townes of Romagna. Likewise Francis Maria, beeing expelled his Duchy of Urbino, by Leo, and called home by the people, recouered it in few daies. Our Commanders slept not, but the chance was turned. The Admirall of Bonniuer, with three hundred Lances, Frederike of Bossole, and Marke Anthony Colonne, leading five thousand French, and Italians, went to beseege Parma, the which after many distresses incident to townes besieged, was preferred by the wife resolution, and singular direction of Francis Guindardin gouernour thereof.

In the meane time, the Cardinals at Rome did strue for Saint Peters chaire. The Cardinall of Medicis, for the reputation of his greatnesse, for his reuenues, and glory gotten in the conquest of Milan, had already gotten the suffrages of fifteene Cardinals. But the rest could not endure two Popes together of one familie, which might haue bene a president to vsterpe a right of succession in the Popedom: The most ancient Cardinals opposed themselves against his nomination, every man pretending that dignity for himselfe, which an other sought so greedily. During their controuersies, Cardinal Adrian bishop of Derthuse, borne at Vtrecht, and sometimes scholemaster to the Emperour Charles, was put in the election, not with any intent to install him in the place of the deceased, but onely to spend that morning, and by delaies coole the heat of the most violent furors. But the Cardinall of Saint Sixte, hauing by a long oration amplified his vertues, and knowledge, some yeelded vnto him (it may be the Emperour would haue bene displeased, if they had reiected his election) others followed them, so as all the Cardinals agreeing, by a common consent hee was created Pope, when as hee least dreamt of it, being absent, a stranger, vknowne, hauing neuer seene Italy, and without thought, or hope, euer to see it. Being loth to change his name, he was called Adrian the sixth.

But what shall this poore Fleming get, to runne so farre to sit in a chaire, so much enuied: Hee came from Spaine (where the Emperour had made him gouernour in his absence) to seeke his death at Rome. Hee shall be little esteemed, during his Popedom, and they will bee glad, to send him speedily after his predecessor. The winter passed, and our souldiers laied aside armes, to resume them againe, the one to preserue their conquests, and the other to recouer their losses. To this end the King sent René, bastard of Sauoie, Earle of Villars, Lord Steward of France, the Marshall of Chabannes, Galeas of Saint Seuerin, master of his horse, and the Lord of Montmorency, newly created Marshall of France, to make a leaue of sixteene thousand Suisses, to succour Lautrec. And to crosse him, the Emperour, by meanes of the King of Englands money (estranged from the loue of France) sent Ierome Adorne to make a leaue of fixe thousand Lansequets, to put into Milan, with Francis Sforza. Adorne comming to Trent, vnderstood that the Milanois had 1522. had already entertained foure thousand foote, with the which hee retired to Milan, whilest A the other six thousand did arme.

In the meane time there wanted no practises at Milan, by Ierosme Moron, and his partisans, to kindle the peoples hatred against the French. It is not alone in our late troubles, that we haue tried, with what efficacy seditious sermons touch the peoples hearts. Andrew Barbato, an Augustin, by profession, preaching with a great concourse of people, did wonderfully encourage them, to defend their religion, goods, families, liues and country. A vehement preacher, and gracious to the people, leads them as he pleaseth, and it is the ordinarie maske of the wise men of this world, to settle their affaires.

It is no lesse honour to preserve, then to get. Ten thousand Suisses were already come: B and Posper Colonne (to keepe the French from entring into Milan, by the castle, and to furnish it with victuall, and munition) caused to bee made, after the manner of the ancient Romaines, without the said castle, betwixt the gates that goe to Verceil and Como, two trenches, distant twentie paces one from another, about a mile long: and at the end of either of the said trenches, a Cavalier, or Mount, very high, and well furnished (to annoy the enemy) with his cannon, if he approached on that side, so as the succours could not enter, nor the besieged goe forth.

Lautrec hauing by chance surprised, and defeated the troupe of Lewis of Gonzagua, repaired his companies, and the Venetians assembled theirs, about Cremona; who being ioyned with the Suisses, passed the riuer of Adde, the first of March, and John de Medicis C with them, who perswaded by the Kings great and certaine entertainment, was newly drawne to his seruice. They march like men resolved to assaile the rampar, but the trenches stay them, the third day Marke Anthony Colonne and Camillo bastard sonne to John Iaquet of Triuulce, walking together in a house, and deuising to make a mount to shoot from thence with their artillery, betwixt the enemies two trenches, a vollee of cannon shot from the towne, did beate downe the sayd house, and buried them in the ruines thereof. Thus Lautrec despairing to take Milan by assault, conuerteth all his thoughts to vanquish it in time by famine, hee waits the countrie, stops the victuals, breaks the mills, and cuts off their water. But not to fall into their hands whom they feare, they dread not death. The peoples hatred against the French, and the desire of their new duke whom they expected, makes D them to endure all distresses patiently. Francis Sforza comes to Trent with fixe thousand Lansquenets, who by the taking of the castle of Croare, hauing opened the passage of Po, arriued without any let at Pauia. The way was difficult from Pauia to Milan: for at the first brute of their approach, Lautrec went to lodge at Cassin, and the Venetians at Binasque, upon the way to Pauia. There fell out an accident, which helpt Sforza; the Marshall of Foix came out of France with money, and some troupes of footmen. Lautrec sent Frederick of Bossole, to receiue him into the estate of Milan, with foure hundred Lances, and seuen thousand Suisses, and Italians: being ioyned together, they went to Nouarre, and through the fauor of the castle, tooke it at the third assault, with the slaughter of most that defended it. A final gaine which shall cause a great losse.

For Lautrec wanting a great part of his forces, he gaue Sforza meanes to enter into Milan, with his Lansquenets, and three hundred horse, with an incredible ioy to the Milanois. The coming of a new Prince is very pleasing to an estate, whereby the people hope for ease. Lautrec seeing Sforza dislodged from Pauia, and receiued into Milan, resolves to besiege Pauia, where the Marquis of Mantoua commanded, with two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. Lautrec batters the towne, and makes a breach of thirty fadome, hee giues two assaults, and is repulsed. There was a posterne in the towne, ioyning to the riuer of Tesin, where they watred their horses, which by reason of the riuer was ill garded, whilest they did busie the Imperials at the breach, Saint Colombe had charge to passe the riuer, at a foard, E with two thousand foote, and Riberac and Rocheboscay, with foure hundred horse, of the companies of Lautrec, and the bastard of Sauoie, who marching along the wall, where there was no flankers, should by the swiftnesse of their horses seize vpon the posterne, and hold it vntill their foote came. Riberac and Rocheboscay execute their desaigne, they enter the towne, plant a Guidon vpon the posterne: but Saint Colombe was content to bring his men to the riuers side, without wetting of his foote. So as the citizens had leisure to come to succour it,

Nouarre taken

Pauia besieged in vaine.

A it, and to repulse our men: who if they had beene followed, had taken the towne. Riberac was slaine fighting, and Rocheboscay had a legge broken with a musket shot. This attempt did wonderfully amaze the Inhabitants, considering their want of men, and munition, and the Marquis made it knowne, that without succours hee should in the end bee forced to yeeld the Towne. Prosper knowing the danger, sent twelue hundred Corles and Spaniards, who marching by night, speaking Gascon, were taken for Gascons, by the Venetians, and passed their first gards, and meeting with some French scouts, speaking Italian, were taken for Italians. So as deceiuing the companies by this stratageme, they passed without discouery, but very late, by the horsemen, who charging them behinde, slew some small number. The death of Riberac, kinsman to Lautrec, made him to double the furie of the cannon, and all B prepared for an assault: when as Colonne fortified with Sforzas troupes, goes to field, and comes to campe at Chartruse, three miles from the French. What meanes then was there to giue an assault, hauing a mighty army behinde them, and all things else succeeding crossly? The money which Lesclapart had brought, was spent, and that which came from France, was staied in Arone, by the Vicount Anchiefe, who was sent to that end from Milan to Buste. The continuall raine had ouer-flowed the riuer of Tesin, and small brookes grew to be great riuers: so as the victuals which came from Omeline, to the campe, could no more passe, whereby they were forced to raise the siege, and draw towards Monce, to enioy the commodities of Laudefan and Cremonois.

C The enemy seeing the French army take the way to Monce, fearing they would recouer Milan, went to lodge at Bicocque, a Gentlemans house, but of so great a circuit as twentie thousand men might easily be put in battaile, vpon the way from Laude to Milan. Without doubt the valour and wisdom of Prosper, gaue the first wound to the French affaires, but the impatience of the Suisses did vtterly ruine them. Their Colonells gaue Lautrec to vnderstand, that their companions were weary of camping so long without any profit, that they demand of three things the one, either money, leaue to depart, or a battaile. Our Commanders hoped by famine to driue Colonne out of his borrow. And what reason was there to assaile a mightie enemy in a fort intrenched, flanked with great platformes and wel furnished with artillery? But neither perswasions, praiers, promises, nor authority could D diuert them from their first resolution. Seeing then there was no other meanes to reteine them, Lautrec resolved, rather to hazard his armie by a battaile, then to giue any occasion to be suspected of cowardise. An vnfortunate condition of a commander, who sees himselfe a slave to those whom hee should command: and what a greefe is it to bee forced to doe that which must needs bring shame and confusion? but where force reigneth, right hath no place.

Lautrec forced to fight by the Suisses.

The day of Quasimodo, the armie marcheth towards Bicocque. The Marshall of Foix led the forward: Lautrec, the Marshall of Chabannes, the bastard of Sauoy, and Galeas of Saint Seuerin the battaile. Francis Maria Duke of Vrbin, with the Venetian army, the rearward. Peter of Nauarre marched before, to make the way. The Lord of Montmorency should assaile them on the one side with eight thousand Suisses. Lesclapart, with three hundred E Lances, and a squadron of French and Italian foote, should charge at the bridge, entring into the enemies lodging; and Pontdormy should march before the Marshall of Foix, with a troupe of horse, to watch, least the Imperials should come behind and disorder the armie, and likewise to succor where need should require.

Besides force, Lautrec vsed this policy, to cause the men at armes, to set red crosses vpon their Cassocks, the marke of the Imperial army, in steed of a white, the liury of France. But the providence of Colonne made this deuice fruitlesse, as we shall see. On the other side, Colonne had sent for Sforza, who hauing sodenly assembled foure hundred horse, and six thousand of the commons, was set to gard the bridge, and all the troupes were put in battaile vpon the trench. Montmorency accompanied with a great number of the Nobility, was come close to the enemies rampar, intreating the Suisses to attend the Artillery; and that the Marshall of Foix should be ready to assaile them on the other side: that Colonne being charged on all sides, might bee constrained to diuide his forces. But a rash fury transporting the Suisses, to their owne ruine, all ranne furiously to the enemies fort. The canon entertaines them before they approach, and kills about a thousand of them. A vollee of small shot kills most

The battaile of Bicocque.

1522. most of their capitaines, and chiefe souldiers, and the Rampar beeing about a pike in height, stayes them sodenly. The Earle of Montfort, eldest sonne to the Earle of Laual, Miolans of Sauoy, Granville brother to the Vidame of Chartres, Roquelaure, la Guiche, the Lords of Tournon and Longa, Launay a Gentleman of the Kings Chamber, and many others died there. Colonel Albert Peter (who about all others, thrust them into this furie) suffered the paines of his rashnesse. Montmorency was ouerthrowne, but sodenly releued by the gentlemen that were about him.

In the meane time, the Marshall of Foix forced the gards vpon the bridge, and charging the enemy within his fort, gaue hope of victory. But this violent heat of the Suisses was soone quenched. All retire, yet keeping a kinde of order. The Imperials freed from the Suisses, turne all their forces vpon the Marshall and Vandenesse, who had not about foure hundred horse, and force them to repasse the bridge with the losse of some men. Ont he other side the Spaniards issuing forth, charge the Suisses in the reere-ward, and had put them to route, if Pontdormy had not by a furious charge kept them within their fort. The Venetians kept themselves safe from danger, but if they had charged with the Suisses and men at armes, and the Marshall of Foix had bene well followed, the French in shew had wonne the victory. But when things are done, there neuer wants an if. The Suisses lost about three thousand men, and two and twenty capitaines. The enemy lost few, no men of quality, but John of Cardone Earle of Culsane. So Lautrec returned with the rest of his army, the Suisses and the artillery, to Monce, from whence the Tew/day after, the Suisses returned to their houses, and the bastard of Sauoy, the Marshall of Chabannes, and Galeas of Saint Seuerin retired with them. Now shall we see this nation so daunted, as of many yeeres they shall not shew their accustomed vigour.

from the French.

The remainder of the French hopes was chiefly grounded vpon the towne of Laude, for the passage of the riuer of Adde, and preseruatiō of the country of Cremona. Lautrec sent John of Medicis and Frederike of Boffole therewith their troupes, which were about foure hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote, comprehending those which Bonneuil, capitaine of the place had. These companies tired with their march in the night, arrived in the morning, and leauing the gard of the towne to Bonneuil, they tooke their lodgings, to refresh themselves & their horse. The Marquis of Pescara had followed them, & his foreward marching nere vnto the towne, gaue occasion to the garrison to come forth to skirmish: in the which our men were so roughly repulsed, as the enemy entred with them pell-mell, into Laude, and surprised most of the soldiars in their beds at noone-day. Thus, foure hundred men at armes, and three thousand foote were shamefully taken in a towne without batterie, without breach and without ladder. John de Medicis and Boffole saved themselves in Cremona.

The losse of Laude for the French, was the cause the enemy recovered Pifqueton, one of the strongest places vpon Adde. Herevpon Pontdormy offers to put himselfe in to Cremona, with such as would follow him, and beeing strong or weake, hee would fight with all that should come, desyring rather to die by the enemies sword, then to fall into the mercie of villaines, or returne into France without armes, and without honor. Lautrec yeelds, and hee gathers together a troupe out of many companies. The Marshall of Foix would haue his part of this glory, siue or sixe daies after the Imperials campe before it. At their arriual, John of Medicis mutines, hee demands pay for fiftene or sixtene hundred men, which hee had gathered together presently after his retreat, hee seizeth vpon one of the gates, towards the enemies campe, and threatnes to deliuer it for want of payment. They search their purses and pay him the summe demanded.

Cremona
yeelded.

But he was corrupted, and our men seeing his treacherous intent, hauing no hope of succors, did capitulate: That, if within three monethes the King did not send a strong army, able to passe the riuer, they should depart with their baggage, armes and all their artillery, marked with the armes of France, and should bee conducted in safety vnto Suze: and the said Marshall should deliuer into Prosper's hands all whatsoeuer was held in the kings name, in the estate of Milan, except the Castles of Milan, Cremona and Nouare. This capitulation was found of hard digestion: for Montmorency was in possibilitie to renew the league with the Venetians, but aduertised of this composition, they changed both affections, and partie. The reason which made

A made Prosper yeeld to so honorable a composition, was the desire he had to restore the Adornes into Genoua before the leauy of foure hundred Lances, and foureteene thousand Gascōns should be ready to enter into Italy. Prosper Colonne plants himselfe before Genoua, which was then governed by Ossianus Fregese, a man of excellent vertue, who for his Iustice, and other commendable parts, was as much beloued, as any Prince might bee, in a city diuided into factions, hauing not yet lost the remembrance of the ancient liberty. Fregese seeing Jerome and Anthony Adorne, to take armes, in fauour of the Imperials, and the people inclined to sedition, treated of an accord, when as Peter of Nauarre enters into the port with two gallies, and some two hundred to assure the towne, attending the succors of France. But a Tower which the Marquis of Pescara had battered nere vnto the gate, made them returne vnto their parle. Being readie to conclude, the Spaniards discovering the smal gard they made within, vnder colour of this hope, seised on the Tower, entring the towne thereby, and by the wall which was ruined, killing all they met, and getting a great spoyle, Fregese beeing sicke, yeelded to the Marquis of Pescara, and within fewe daies after died.

and spoiled.

Peter of Nauarre was taken fighting in the market-place. The Archbishop of Salerne, brother to Ossianus, and many capitaines saued themselves by sea. Anthony Adorne, was chosen duke of Genoua, and within fewe daies received the Citadell, the Chastelet, and the Church of Saint Francis, by composition. Sixe thousand men newly sent by the King, vnder the command of the Lord of Lorges, for the succour of Genoua, and the armie of Claude of Orleans, duke of Longueuille, to repaire the affaires of Lombardie, returned without any effect, being already entred into the territorie of Ast: and Lescot, prest by the terme limited by the composition, deliuered Cremona to Colonne, leauing Bonneuil capitaine of the castle. Thus the French were againe expelled out of Italie. Lautrec seeing the enterprise of Laude made fruitlesse, his armie ruined, the Suisses, and Venetians retired, hee returns into France, bringing to the King, rather iustifications of his actions, then any signes of his victories, imputing the cause of these disorders to want of money, without the which, hee could no longer keepe the men at armes together, who had serued eightene moneths, without any pay, the Kings mother hauing staid foure hundred thousand crownes, appointed for the payment of the army, which summe (hee said) hee had spared out of other reuenues, and had long before put it into Semblaçais hands, being overseer of the Treasor of France. Hereupon the King appointed certaine Iudges, and Commissioners to determine of this controuersie, and to araigne the said Semblaçais, for the which hee lost his life.

Let vs now passe ouer the Pirenee mountaines, and then we will returne to the frontiers of Picardie, an other Theater, where there was likewise acted a mournfull and bloudy Tragedie. The Admirall Bonnivet was no sooner returned into France with his troupes, but the Spaniards went and incamped before Fontarabie, and had so prest it with siege, for the space of a yeere, as many were dead of hunger. The Marshall of Chastillon marched with an armie, to releue the towne, and Lude, beeing then gouernour, comming to Dax (sixe leagues on this side Bayonne) hee died of a violent sicknesse. A Nobleman of great experience, and credit. Montmorency (who was then at Venice) succeeded him in the Office of Marshall, and the Marshall Chabannes in that of Lieutenant Generall for the King in his armie, who hauing gathered together his troupes, lodged in Endaye, hauing a riuer betwixt the Spanish army, and him, attending Lartigue Viceadmirall of Britan, with an army at sea, for the victualling of the towne. But hee not appearing, either through sloth or misfortune, resolues of an other course, hee passeth the riuer, dislodgeth the enemy with his Canon, and by continuall skirmishes, makes them flie through the mountaines. So Chabannes hauing victuall'd the towne, returnes, leauing Françet to gouerne there in the Kings name: hee was Lieutenant to the Marshall Chabannes, leading away Lude to refresh himselfe in France. Without doubt, Lude deserues to be registred in this History Hauing (saith the Original) wonne such honour in the defence of this place, as he may well be compared to any that haue maintained sieges in our daies, or our forefathers. Contrarywise, Françet shall purchase as much infamy, as his predecessor did honour. During these confusions beyond the Alpes and Pirenee mountaines, the warre continued throughout all the garrisons.

Picardy.

1522. of Picardy, sometimes with gaine, sometimes with losse. The day of the Annuntiation, twelve hundred Lansquenets going out of Arras, hauing spoiled Bernaillie and other villages thereabout, led away their booty, when as Estreé commanding the company of the duke of Vendosme, which was in garrison at Dourlans, aduertised hereof, goes to horse-backe about midnight, with thirty men at armes onely, fittie archers and three hundred of the country-men, without pay: hee attends them at a passage of the riuer of Othie: vpon their retreat, hee chargeth them, defeats them, and killeth a hundred and fittie, making the rest to leaue their prey. And if this handfull of men could giue them so great a check, what had beene the issue, if their footmen had come to fight? In this encounter were slaine the Lord of Ricame, and the bastard of Dampont.

Dourlans besieged.

The enemy greued at this disgrace, sought to be reuenged by the surprize of Dourlans, where there were no foote-men. With this designe, the Earle of Bures, Lieutenant general for the Emperour in the low-countries, incampes before the towne, with all his garrisons, batters it with six peeces of artillery: makes a breach nere to the Tower of Corniers, giues an assault, and plants many ladders. Here the Inhabitants shew themselves better Frenchmen, then in our late troubles: who backt by this small troupe of men at armes, repulse the enemy, and ouerthrow a good number dead in the ditch.

To raise this siege, the Earle of Saint Paul (vnder the authority of the duke of Vendosme his brother) gathers together such forces as the garrisons could furnish, whereof the Bourguignons aduertised, they shamefully returned to Arras, leauing their ladders within the trenches. Diental, Diuion, Breuil and other places about Betune (wonderfully annoying the frontier) were ruined by the duke of Vendosme. But oftentimes a small gaine is crost with a notable losse. Telligny came from Monstreuil, to ioyne with the dukes troupes at Mouchy le Cayen, when as passing by Hedin, he encountered three hundred Bourguignons foote, driuing the booty before them: hee chargeth these armed clownes, slue some and tooke others. A very preiudiciall victory, in regard of that valiant Knight, so well experienced in martiall affaires, who beeing shot into the shoulder, died within few daies after. In the meane time the Emperour passed into Spaine, to punish the authors of the sedition before mentioned, imparting his designes to the King of England. His voiage was not fruitlesse, they remayned well satisfied one of another, to the preiudice of this crowne, both equally desirous to ruine it. But it shall seele (as in former times) the fauour of heauen against their common attempts.

Telligny slaine.

A league betweene the Em-perour and
the King of England.

The first effect of their treaty, was to send their Ambassadors ioyndly together to Venice, to require the Senat to ioyne with the Emperour, for the defence of Italy. For the second, The King of England complayning that the King did not continue the paiement of fiftie thousand crownes yeerely, which hee ought him (as we haue said) hee proclaimed warre against the King by his Herald, in case hee would not make a generall truce with the Emperour, comprehending the Church, the duke of Milan, and the Florentins. The King refused this truce, and as for the pension, It is not reasonable (sayd hee) to giue money to him, that aides mine enemies with money. Henry King of England had before lent a notable summe of money to the Emperour: but not discouering himselfe openly, he sent the duke of Suffolk, husband to Queene Mary, widow to Lewis the twelfth, to Calais, and the Emperour ioynded his forces with him, being led by the Earle of Bures.

The King opposed the duke of Vendosme, commanding about a thousand men at armes, with their archers, and eightene thousand foote, assisted by that reuerend old man Lewis of Threshouille. The enemies army was not ready in fiftene daies. The duke therefore diuided his forces into Bologne, Therouenne, Hedin, Monstreuil, Abbeuille and other places subiect to the enemies inuasion. He must not suffer their courage to quaille through idleness: Bapaume serued them for an exercise. The Earle of S. Paul led the Earles of Guise and Lorraine thither, equall in charge, with foure hundred men at armes, six thousand foot and foure Canons: who hauing taken, burnt and razed the towne and castle, they tooke their way, to the passage of Sluce, and finding it garded by the Bourguignons, they charge them, and chase them to the gates of Douay. Here Francis brother to the duke of Lorraine and Earle of Guise, of the age of sixteene or seuentene yeeres, carried his first armes, who seeing in this chase, seuen or eight Bourguignons on foote, seeking their safety within the woods: being alone

A alone, not scene by his followers, hee lights and chargeth them, but Martin du Bellay arriues happily, accompanied with ten or twelue horse, by whose meanes these run-awaies were cut in peeces.

The English
land in France

Hereupon the English arriue at Calais, and at their first entry, they become maisters of the castle of Comtes, betwixt Monstreuil and Hedin. To preuent these incursions, the duke sent the foresaid Earles into the trench of Bologne (Ardes was then ruined and desert) who by the recovery of the said castle, put all to the sword they found within it, except the captaine: and afterwards ouerthrew many other troupes, that were disperfed in the land of Oye, while the two armies, English and Bourguignons assembled betwixt Ardes and Saint Omer, consulting vpon the first obiekt of their forces. Hedin seemed the easiest to be attempted, yet it must needs cost blowes. The Lord of Biez commanded there with thirty men at armes, and two hundred dead-paies: Sereu with a thousand foote, and La Lande with fife hundred. The battery continued fiftene daies, and a breach was made of the Earles of Guise and Pont-dormy, vnderstanding one day amongst others, that foure hundred English were gone towards Biez, and the Commander of Oison: they part from Monstreuil with their companies, and some of the duke of Vendosmes, they ouertake them, charge them, and kill or take them all. Some few daies after, Pont-dormy incountring some other troupes, which had burnt Fressin, a house of his elder brothers, hee put them all to the sword.

Hedin besieged by the Imperials and English.

C Thus kept within their lodgings, by continuall enterprises, and afflicted with a generall flux, which went through their army, proceeding in part by the continuall raine, after sixe weekes siege, they raised their campe with shame, to march towards Dourlans, which was not defensible. At that time there was castle, and from the mountaine where it is now built, they discouered the towne on all sides. The Earle of Saint Paul preuented the enemy, and (least they should make vse thereof) hee spoyleth the victuals, and tooke off the gates: then heretired to Corby, to withstand the attempts of the English. Then arriued the Marshall of Montmorency, bringing with him the two hundred Gentlemen of the Kings Chamber, with authority from his Maiestie to rule and command at Corby, if the enemy did beseege it.

But there was too great a resolution in Corby, the waies were too foule, the infirmities were many in the English and Bourguignons armies, and winter approaching (it was about all Saints) inuited them to set saile. Being able to doe no worse, they burnt Dourlans, and the villages about, and retired into Arthois, putting the Bourguignons into Garrison, and the English tooke their way for England. Let vs conclude this yeere with an ignominious and fatall losse for the Christians. Soliman did not forget to make his profit of these horrible confusions, who by a painefull and constant sege, for the space of eight moneths, brought the Isle of Rhodes vnder his obedience: where (to the great contempt of our Religion) hee made his entrie the day of the birth of our Lord and Sauour. In the beginning of the following yeere, the castle of Milan (preft with diseases and want of all things) compounded, to depart with bag and baggage, if they were not releued by the fourth of April. But death preuenting most part of the garrison, hindred them from enioying any benefit of the Capitulation.

Rhodes taken by the Turke.

E At the same time Linet, a soldiar of the garrison of Guise, treated with the duke of Afcot, to deliuer him the towne (but not according to the buyers intreat) by the consent of Nicholas of Buffu Lord of Longueuall, captaine of the castle. The party was well made and the plot cunningly laied, to take the marchants when they should come for their possession. The Lord of Fleuranges, with three hundred men at armes, and foure or fife thousand foote, should lie betwixt Auenues and Guise, to stop the enemies retreat. The duke of Vendosme, with fife hundred men at armes, foure thousand Germans, and foure thousand French, should cut off their way betwixt the Abbay of Bonhoury and Guise, so as the enemy seeking to retire, had the one before him, and the other behind. The chiefe of all their troupes would bee partakers of this enterprife: When as newes comes vnto them, that the King (who would countenance this exploite with his presence) was come in post to Genlis, nere vnto Chaunis. This made them turne head without any effect, giuing him the strap-padoe

Milan yielded.

1523.

The sute depended in the Court of Parliament at Paris, and Charles either distrustful the equity of his cause, or fearing least the Regents authority should preuaile against his right, and so by consequence dispossesse him; choosing rather to abandon his country; then to liue in want, he practiseth with the Emperour, by the meanes of Adrian of Croy Earle of Rieux: and to make the articles of his transaction the more strong, hee obtains a promise from the Emperour to marry Eleanor his sister, widow to Emanuel King of Portugal.

The King being past the Alpes, the Constable should invade Bourgogne with twelve thousand Germans, which should bee secretly leauied by the Emperour and King of England, who at the same instant should invade Picardy, whilest the Spaniards recouered Fontenoy, as they did. Of their Conquests hee onely reserued Prouence, pretending to call himselfe King of Prouence, as belonging vnto him (said he) by the house of Anjou, yielding all the rest to the English. A practise sufficient to shake France, before the King (being absent with his forces) should returne in any time to succor it. But they reckoned without their host, and the gardian of this crowne did prevent them: for Argout and Maignan, Gentlemen of Normandy, and household seruants to the duke, had aduertised the King, of his pretended retreat to the Emperour, but they were ignorant of the agreement made betwixt them. To diuert him from this resolution, the King passing by Molins, did visite the Duke in his chamber: who made a shew to be sicke, & that cunningly. I vnderstand (said the King) of some practises which the Emperour makes to withdraw the loue you vndoubtedly beare vnto the crowne, as issued and nere allied to the house of France. I doe not beleue, that you haue giuen eare to any such perswasions, moued with any dislike of mee, or of my realme: Some feare of distrust to loose your offices, hath perchance made a breach in the loue you haue alwaies made shew of. Let not this conceit trouble you. I promise you, in case you should loose your sute against my selfe and my mother; to restore you to the possession of all your goods. Prepare therefore to follow me, after your recovery, in the voyage of Italy. The duke (being very wise) dissembled his intent cunningly, confessing vnto the King, that in truth the Earle of Reux had fought him for the Emperour, but hee would giue no eare vnto him, that his intention was to haue aduertised his Maiesty at the first view, being loth to commit it to any mans report: that the Physicians gaue him hope to be soone able to goe in a litter, and that hee would not faile to come to Lions; to receiue his Maiesties commandements. But considering that hee had to deale with too strong a party, and that hardly hee should enioy his goods, which were already sequestred by a decree of the Court, he retired to Chantelles, in the beginning of September, a house of his owne, where he had the most sumptuous mouebles that any Prince could haue. From thence hee sent the bishop of Autun, of the house of Hurauts, to the King, with instructions signed with his hand, promising, To serue his Maiesty well and loyally, in all places; whensoever it should please him, during his life, and without any breach, vpon restitution of the possessions of Peter of Bourbon.

The Duke of Bourbon flies
disguised.

The King finding this maner of proceeding hard and insolent, sent the bastard of Sauoy, Lord Steward of France, & the Marshall of Chabannes, with foure hundred men at armes, the captaines of his gardes, and the Prouost of his house, to besiege the duke in Chantelles. And vnderstanding that many Lansquenets did troupe together vpon the frontier of Bourgogne, he caused the bishop of Autun, the Chancellor of Bourbonnois, the Lord of Cars, Saint Vallier, Bussey brother to Palisse, Ennard de Prie, la Vauguion, and many others, to be taken prisoners, who for the loue of him were content to abandon their country, families and goods, notwithstanding they found grace with the King. But the duke (despairing of his estate) resolved to hazard all, and to begin a furious Tragedy, in the which wee shall see our Francis act the part of an vnforgotten prisoner of the warres, and Charles reserued for a bloody and tragicke end. He disguiseth himselfe, and taking the Lord of Pomperant for his onely companion, whose seruant he seemed to be. After many turnings, being often feared, as appeares in the Originals, the waies being laied, and the passages stopt, or full of troupes, marching into Italy, he recouers the Franche countie, and so by Ferrete, crossing through Germany, he came into Italy, and according to the choise which the Emperour gaue him, either to passe into Spaine, or to remaine in Italy with his army, in the end hee continued at Genoua, to see the end of these two great armies.

1523.

The Marshall and Lord Steward came vpon Chantelles, with the mouebles of Charles, and generally of all the lands of the house of Bourbon for the King. In the meane time, the Marshall of Milan, Morenci, and his brother Morenci, as his twelve thousand Swisses were ioyned with the Admirall, awaiting the Kings comming at Turin. But his presence was necessarie in France, where were stronger grounds against him. He therefore sends part of his forces to the Admirall, and commands him to execute the enterprise of Milan; as they two had concluded. He had eighteene hundred Lances, twelve thousand French, ten thousand Swisses, sixe thousand Lansquenets, and three thousand Italians, a sufficient armie for a great attempt: but want of judgement, misbracket occasions, and negligence of his businesse, made the Admirall lose the opportunity to gett into Milan at the first, and to be vnforgotten in this voyage.

Prosper Colonne, considering the Venetians league with the Emperour, and the treachery of the Duke of Bourbon, could not beleue that the King should continue constant in his resolution, to invade the Duchie of Milan that yeare. This perswasion had made him carelesse to make necessarie provision for this warre. But now (notwithstanding his infirmities) he employes all his meanes and forces to keepe the French from passing the riuer of Tesin, neglecting to repaire the Bastions and Rampars of the suburbs of Milan, being for the most part ruined and spoiled. But the French finding the waters lowe, some passed at a Foord, others in Boates, about some foure miles from the Imperiall campe, making a Bridge for the Artillerie. Colonne knowing that in the counter of this French is very dangerous, in their first heate retired into Milan, and finding the Cittizens and souldiars wonderfully amazed, seeing no meanes to keepe the citie in the siege, it was hee abandons it, to provide for the defence of Laude. Without doubte the capitious propositions of an enemy must be duly examined, and moreover, an assaillant that hath preuened his enemy, should not loose any houre, neither by his too great lenitie, nor his rash negligence.

Hereupon Galeas Visconti gaues the Admirall to vnderstand, that if hee enters forceably into Milan, there will be no meapes to save it from spoile, and so by consequence, the King shall make no vse thereof against his enemies: but if he would suffer him to goe and compound with some Cittizens, which did sollicite him, he would giue order the Imperials should depart, and furnish the King with a good summe of money, which might greatly auale him in his affaires. The Admirall is carried away with these perswasions. But whilst that Galeas Boyer, Generall of Normandie, and some others doe treatre, they spend some time in vaine by the riuer of Tesin, during the which, Prosper deluded our men with parles, reuiued the hearts of his men (who had already packt vp their baggage for their retreat) and with exceeding diligence, puts the Rampars in defence. And then knowing his forces vnable to defend the whole Duchie, he restrained them to keepe Milan, Cremona, and Pavia, whilst the furie of the French should grow cold by an idle aboad, and the winter approaching neare, ruine them.

The Admirall finding the error hee had committed by his too great credulitie, employed all his forces against Milan, but too late. The Cittizens had gotten heart, and Prosper had now gathered together eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, foure thousand Spaniards, sixe thousand sixe hundred Lansquenets, and three thousand Italians, besides the Inhabitants who were all armed. He doth notwithstanding beseege it, betwixt the wayes to Laude and Pavia, and seeing other places abandoned, hee takes Monce for the King, to cut off the victualles from Milan: he sends Bussey d'Amboise, with two thousand Frank-archers, to seaze vpon Alexandria, and the Cheualier Bayard, with foure hundred men at armes, eight thousand foote, and ten peeces of artillerie to Laude, where leauing a strong garrison, he went suddenly to attempt Cremona. The Castle held yet for the King, but the enemies had made two great trenches betwixt the towne and the Castell. There Rene de Cere, a Baron of Rome, ioyned with him, leading foure thousand Italians. This supply encouraged Bayard to attempt the towne in another place. They make their approaches, and within three dayes make a reasonable breach. But all fall out crossely for the French. Being ready to goe to the assault, a continuall raime of foure dayes, made the ascent so slipperie, as they went as much backward as forward, and did to breake the wayes, as no victuals could come to the Campe from any part. Euen so it chanced at Laude before Pavia.

ged.

1523. Paulia. Morteouer, the Venetians armie on the one side, and the Spanishe on the other, cutte A off their victuals. So Bayard prest with famine, refreshed the Castell with men and victualles, and returned to Milan. Without doubt Bayard with the whole garrison that kept this fort, deserved great commendations: where hauing continued two yeares in extreme necessitie, desiring all rather to die, after the example of their Capitaine, then to yeeld the place by treacherie, there remained onely eight souldiers, whom Bayard found languishing, but resolute in their constancie.

We haue vnderstood, that by the intelligences of the Duke of Bourbon, the Emperour at the same instant should assaile Bourgongne and Champagne, the English Picardie, and the Spaniards Fontarabie. According to this desseigne, and to make the sege of Fontarabie ca- B sie, the Spaniards campe before Bayonne the 17. of September. Lantrec Governor of Guienne, although he were vnprovided of men, (the Kings forces being dispersed in Italy, Champagne and Picardie) furnished the Towne with victuals, munition, and such men as the time and necessitie could afford, and he himselfe went into it: where the valour of this Noble man, who continued three dayes and three nights continually vpon the walles, prouiding for all things necessarie, especially for the entrie of two riuers which passe at Bayonne, giuing such courage to men, women, and children, as euery one falling to worke, the most coward made shewes of great willingnesse.

So as the fourth day of the sege, the enemy finding that he did but loose his time, left C Bayonne to beseege Fontarabie, which shewed no proofes of like valour. It was furnished with good store of men, and other things necessarie. Francis commaunded there, as wee haue formerly declared. He was an ancient Gentleman, and all his life had had the reputation of a good souldiar. But now to saue his goods, not attending any force, he yeelds the town which was not to be forced. A cowardise which brought him to a scaffold at Lions, to bee there degraded of his Nobilitie, and himselfe with his posteritie, declared base, for that hee had bene so faint-hearted, and carelesse, to preuent the conspiracie, which he said Don Pedro of Nauarre, (the sonne of Peter Marshall of Nauarre, whom the Spaniards had lately caused to die in prison) had with the Spaniards. On the other side, the Lansquenets which had bene leauied for the Duke of Bourbon, were come vnto Champagne, vnder the command of William Earle of Furstemberg, and spoiled the Prouince, after they had taken Coiffie, D place vpon the confines of the French Comté, and Montclair a castle seated vpon a mountaine, neare to Chaumont in Bassigni. The Duke of Guise, whome the King had made his Lieutenant generall in Bourgongne, in the place of the Lord of Tremouille, lately aduanced to the gouernement of Picardie: hauing with his companie of an hundred men at armes those of the Dukes of Alanson and Vendosme, ioyned with the forces of Orual, Gouverneur of Champagne, and some other troupes, making about fixe hundred men at armes, so restrained the enemy, as hauing no meanes, for want of horse, to guard their forragers, they were in few dayes famished, and forced to seeke their retreat at Neuf-chastell in Lorraine. The Duke of Guise aduertised of their course, sent some three hundred men at armes before to charge them in front, at the passage of the riuier of Meuse, whilst that hee should set on E them behind, being laden with a great bootie. The Duke came, and finding them half past, he cut the remainder in peeces, and recovered the bootie. But a quarrell chaunced betwixt Courville and Chasteler a Lorraine, Ensigne-bearer to the said Duke, the which (Courville being thrust through the mouth with a sword) ouerthrew the better part of this goodly enterprise. The Duke of Suffolke was lately landed againe at Calais, with fourtene or fifteene thousand English, which ioyned with the forces of the Earle of Bure, made fife or sixe thousand horse, and about fife and twentie thousand foote. But if in their former voyage, they made a great stirre and reaped small benefit, so likewise, they will make but a bare conquest by this last descent.

Tremouille (although he had so few men, as he was forced, when he had left the place, to F retire his men, to put them into that, whether the enemy seemed to bend) had so furnished the Townes with valiant Commanders, and all things necessarie, as the Duke and Earle, hauing made a shew to beseege Terouenne, Hedin, Dourlans, and Corbie, in the end they campe before Bray vpon Somme: the wall was weake, and three mountaines commanding the town, were the cause they could not fortifie it: yet that braue Pontdormy had thrust him- selfe

Champagne.

A Iesse into it, with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, and some fifteene hundred foote, to defend this passage against the enemy. Let vs not blame a valiant Capitaine, if he receiue a disgrace in a weake place. He made his accompt (in case he were forced) to retire by the causey, and to breake the bridges after him. But he was so prest, as he had no meanes to retire, but in disorder, with the losse of fourescore, or an hundred men: and if he had not maintained the fight with his men at armes, whilst his footmen recovered Corbie, there had bene no hope of safetie for the rest.

But see how he reuenged this disgrace. The enemy threatned Montdidier: and the small forces Tremouille had, made all men vnwilling to leade any succours thither. Pontdormy was neuer daunted with the difficultie of any enterprise. Night being come, he goes to field, and B without any encounter, puts Rochebaron an Auernac, into Montdidier, and Fleury Lieute- Pontdormy. nant of the Earle of Dammartins companie, either of them commaunding fiftie men at armes, and René of Palletiere, with a thousand French. And fearing lest Tremouille should haue need of him, he had not the patience to attend for night to make his retreat, he doth it at noone day, resolute to charge all he should encounter, hauing but his owne companie, with that of the Vicount of Lauedan. With this resolution hee meetes with fife hundred horse, chargeth them with such furie, as he puts them to route. But two thousand men coming to succour the rest, he was forced to leaue the chace, to fauour the retreat of his troupe. In the which, his horse being slaine, hee left Barnieulles and Canaples his brother and nephew, to beare the shooke with twenty men at armes, whilst that he faued the rest in Amiens, the enemy cutting off the way to Corbie. Barnieulles and Canaples (ouerthrowne from their horses) were taken prisoners with feuen men at armes of their companie. So Roye remained at the enemies mercie, who hauing taken and burnt it, marched to Montdidier, where a breach being made, they within distrusting of their forces, departed with their baggage, and came to Tremouille.

The enemy had opened the passage of Oise, and approched within eleuen leagues of Paris. But their courses are stayed, and Paris is assured by the arriual of the Duke of Vendosme with foure hundred men at armes, so as the English and Bourguignons fearing to bee compassed in by the Duke and Tremouille, and so famished, tooke their way to Artois, and a little D after Al-Saints day, (a notable season for the losse of corne, which was frozen generally throughout the Realme) they dismissed their armie, carrying no other spoiles of their victorie, but the taking of the Castle of Bohain, which was yeilded vnto them without somons. But the enemy was no sooner retired, but Tremouille, before the Duke of Vendosmes arriual, made so furious a batterie with fixe Cannons, as the Garrison seeing their armie broken, yeilded by composition. Thus Picardie is freed from a mightie armie, which at their departure held not one foot of land of their conquest.

In like sort, the Duke of Bourbons attempt against Bourgongne turned to snoake, for wanting money to pay his Lansquenets, the King did practise some of their Capitaines, who came to him with their troupes. So despairing to get any thing in France, hee retired to Milan. Augustus the Emperour loued treason, but not the traitor. So the Emperour Charles loued his actions, but not the Duke of Bourbons person. To keepe him from passing into Spain vnder hope of marrying with Eleonor, sister to the Emperour Charles, he made him his Lieutenant generall in Italy, whilst that he prepared to passe into France in person, as we shall see.

Let vs now returne into Italy, where we shall see a Pope of a more turbulent spirit then Adrian, who died the fourteenth of September, little lamented, and of small esteeme. Hee was a stranger, and little acquainted with the affaires of the Court of Rome, he was learned, and not greatly vicious. The Colledge of Cardinals repined to see any other set in Saint Peters chaire but an Italian, or at the least one bred vp in Italy: Iulio Cardinal of Medicis after many and sundrie strifes and contentions, euery one of the Cardinals seeking the choice and election by the support of such as fauoured him, in the end carried it, the nineteenth of November, through the fauour (saith the Originall) of the great reuenues of his Ecclesiasticall F lumbe. In all his actions we shall see him discover a spirit wonderfully ambitious, of a great courage, active, desirous of innovations, giuen to affaires, especially of the world, not much subiect to his pleasures, and giuing hope of great and extraordinarie matters: and for that presently Clement the 7.

1524. presently after his insalment, he vfed clemencie to the Cardinall of Volterre, declared vnsufficient to come into the Conclaue by Adrian, for the subiect we haue formerly noted: hee therefore tooke vpon him the name of Clement the seuenth. In the meane time our Admirall tooke cold before Milan, which he thought to famish, cutting off the conduits that went into the towne, and beating downe the milles: but the great number of hand-milles (which Colonne had caused to be made) preferred the Cittizens from famine. And to cut off the victuals that came from Laudefan to the French campe, Colonne had put the Marquis of Manroua, with five hundred horse into Pauia. The Admirall fearing least he should seaze vpon the bridge he had made at Vigee, by the which victuals came vnto his armie, he commanded Bayard and Rence, to come and lodge at Vigee: but by their dislodging from Monce, the passage was open to the enemy, and then victuals entred abundantly into Milan, which caused the ruine of the French army.

John de Medicis his stratagame.

Nothing succedes happily with them, whom the providence of God doth not fauour.
 The hope to famish Milan is frustrate, and the intelligence which the Admirall had within the towne with one Morgand, a Corporall of the Squadron of John de Medicis, is discouered with the losse of all their liues, that had consented (he should haue receiued the French into a bastion, when the guard thereof fell vnto him.) Moreouer, the enemy growes proud of small aduantages and light victories, who beeing accustomed to ouercome by degrees, resolues to vanquish all at once. John de Medicis beeing to guard the victuals that came from Trefse to Milan, with five hundred horse and a thousand foote, met with foure-score French Lances: and by a fained retreat drew them into an ambush of five hundred Margeuoliers, which he had layd: he easily defeats them, slew some, and takes the rest. In another encounter Suere a Bourguignon put to route threescore men at armes, of the companie of the Master of the horse. Our men beeing in guard at the trenches, which were made to go vnto the rampars, assailed by many skirmishes, had most commonly the worst. So decreasing in number, prest with abundance of snow and the sharpnesse of the winter, which they had endured sixe moneths together, the Admirall retired his armie to lodge it in Biagras, and other places thereabouts. He sent the Earle of S. Paul from Biagras with Rance de Cere, and Lorges Generall of the French foote, to beseege Arone, a towne vpon Lago-Maiore. They make their approches, plant their ordinance, batter it about five and twentie dayes, and giue two or three assaults. But Colonne foreseeing this desseigne, at the retreat of our men, had manned the Towne with twelve hundred souldiers, who made our attempts fruitlesse. That which they could not do by assault, they seeke to effect by mine, blowing vp a great part of the wall. But they kickt against the pricke. The wall fals vpon the same foundation, and stands firme. So frustrate of their intention, hauing lost many good men, they return to the camp.

At that time Prosper Colonne, the chiefe pillar of the Emperours affaires in Italy, died the last day but one of the yeare. A famous Captaine throughout all the courts of his life, well practised in matters of warre, slow to imbrace the occasions which the weaknesse or disorders of his enemies might present him: but commended to haue managed the warre more by counsell, then with the sword. Don Charles of Launoy, Viceroy of Naples, was substituted by the Emperour: Don Charles, hauing taken vpon him the gouernment, employed all his wit to expel the French out of the Duchie of Milan, either by force or famine: and to ap-proch neere vnto them, attending a supply of sixe thousand Lansquenets out of Germany: an occasion was offered to make the first fruites of his armes famous.

They giue him intelligence, that Bayard, Mezieres, and Saint Mesme with two hundred men at armes, and Lorges with the French foote, whereof he was Colonell, lodged at Rebee, two miles from Biagras. To giue them a Camissado on the sodaine, hee sends the Marquis of Pescara, and John de Medicis, who came from the taking of Marignan by composition.
 Sometimes renowned Captaines are lulled asleepe with conceit of their owne reputations: and although the enemy feares them, yet he most obserues them, and desires most to circumuent them. But Bayard was sicke, and that day had taken Phisicke. The Spaniard fall-es vpon the French guards two houres before day, and presently beates them backe vpon their men at armes, Bayard (beeing sicke) and Lorges, gather together what men they could, and maintaine the hocke, whilst the rest retired to the Campe: few men, but all the baggage was lost. Hereuppon the Lansquenets arriue, and the Imperiall armie ioyned with

1524. A the Venetians: and the Popes (a right Florentine, and no lesse counterfeite then Leo the tenth his kinsman, for he assured Saint Maxent the Kings Ambassador, that he would assist neither partie, and yet he did ayde the Emperour both with men and money) beeing come to lodge at Casere, five miles from Biagras. There were in the Imperiall troupes, sixteene hundred men at armes, sixteene hundred light horse, seuen thousand Spaniards, twelue thousand Lansquenets, and fifteen hundred Italians. The chiefe Commanders were the Dukes of Milan and Bourbon, the Viceroy of Naples, the Marquis of Pescara. The Duke of Vrbin commanded for the Venetians, sixe hundred men at armes, sixe hundred light horse, and seuen thousand foote. John de Medicis led the Popes forces. The Admirall besides his companies diuided into Garrisons, and the French troupes camped at Biagras, (attending sixe thousand Swisses to refresh his army) had with him eight hundred Lances; eight thousand Swisses (and within few dayes after, three thousand more ioyned with him) foure thousand Italians, and two thousand Lansquenets. The lodging was safe, and no meanes to force them: onely feare of famine must dislodge them. With this desseigne, the Imperials passe the riu-er of Tefin, and lodge at Gambale to cut off the victuals that came fro Omeline to the French: they take Garleas from them, and Saint George, seated about Monce. Garleas furnished their armie with victuals which came freely to them from Pauia: and Saint George cut off the provision that came to our men from Biagras.

So the Admirall fearing to be distressed for victuals, and to loose the other places of Omeline, the which beeing taken, he had beene in a manner beseegeed of all sides: he leaues an hundred light horse, and a thousand foote in Biagras vnder Ierome Caraccioli a Neapolitan, and went to lodge at Vigee. He was farre inferiour in number, yet he presents his armie in battaile three dayes together, but the enemy refuseth the combate: he would not hazard a victorie which he held assured, without losse of men. It was better to dislodge the French from Vigee: for the effecting whereof, the Imperials march to Sartirane vpon Po, fit to cut off the victuals from our men: Hugh Earle of Pepoli, and John of Birague kept it for the King. The Admirall followes them to saue both the men and the place. But vpon the way he had newes that it was forced, most part of them slaine, and the Commanders prisoners. Ver-cel supplied our men with most part of their necessarie victuals. The enemy by the meanes of Petit Perceclois, stirrs vp the Gibelins beeing stronger then the Guelphes in the said cittie, who by their mutinie bring in the Imperials, which gaue them great hope to haue the French armie at their mercie for want of victuals: and if neede were to stop their retreat into France, and to this end they seaze vpon the passage of Camarlian. Mischiefe vpon mischiefe is no laste. Monteian, and Boutieres Lieutenant of Bayard his companie, had chosen an hundred or sixe-score of their best men at armes, for the execution of an enterprize they had plotted.
 But beeing ill guided, they incountred a stronger partie, were defeated, and all taken prisoners: a great weakening to an armie in an after-season. The Admirall did still temporize, grounding his hopes vpon foure hundred Launces, which the Marquis of Rotelin did bring:
 who passing by the mount of Geneure, should ioyne with ten thousand Swisses, and Rance de Cere brought sixe thousand Grisons, by the countrie of Bergamo, to passe at Laude to Fre- dericke of Bossole, who led a great number of Italian foote, to assaile the Duchie of Milan on that side, and force the enemy to repasse the riuier of Tefin. With this desseigne the Ad-mirall comes to lodge at Nouarre.

But the ruine of our men approached. Sforza sent John de Medicis against the Grisons, with fiftie men at armes, three hundred light horse, and three thousand foote, who ioyned with three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, and foure thousand foot of the Venetians, and stops their passage, so as beeing discontented hauing no ayde of horse nor foote as Rance had promised them, they returned to their countrie. This thorne pulled out of the Imperials foote, John de Medicis takes Carauage, batters downe the bridge which the French had vpon Tefin at Bufalore: and nothing remaining of all the Townes betwixt Milan and the Tefin but onely Biagras, which lying vpon the great channell that runnes to Milan, did cut off the victuals which were wont to come to the Towne in great abundance: Sforza followed by all the youth of Milan, beseegeed it, accompanied with John de Medicis: he battered it foure or five dayes, and was repulsed from the first assault; he forced it at the second, and spoiled it. A spoile dearely sold to the Milanois. Biagras was infected with the plague, so all

1524. all the houses of Milan, whither any of the bootie came, were infected with the same contagion, which was the death of about fiftie thousand persons. Biagras taken, (to stoppe all passages from the French) the Viceroy went to lodge at Marignon, and the Admirall, considering that it was better to hazard the rest of his armie, then to perish by famine, and pestilence, which had greatly diminished his troupes; he tooke the way of Romagnan, to ioyne with eight thousand Suisses which were come to Yurec. But they stroke the last stroke. They send him word, That it should suffice them, to retire their companions, and conduct them into Suisse, seeing the King had broken his promise with them, by the which they should meete at Yurec with Claude of Longueville, and foure hundred Lances to conuoy them. Their Countrymen which remained in the campe, vnderstanding that their companions were vpon the banks of the riuer of Stefie, disbanded for the most part, to ioyne with them that were newly come.

A worthy speech of Bayard, beeing hurt, and dying

In the meane time the Imperials, by the perswasion of the Duke of Bourbon, followed the Admirall at the heeles, who to take from the enemy the knowledge of the Suisses disorder, endured the shocke, with such men at armes as he could gather together: but beeing hurt at the first charge with a shot in the arme, and forced through the griefe of his wound to leaue the retreat of the armie to the Earle of Saint Paul, and to Captaine Bayard. Bayard and Vandenesse (performing wondrous deedes of armes) died there: Vandenesse presently, Bayard thrust through the bodie, caused himselfe to be layed at the foote of a tree, by his Steward, his face turned to the enemy, as he that neuer turned his backe. The Duke of Bourbon pursuing the chafe, seeing him in this pittifull estate. I am sorry for you; said hee, hauing knowne you so valiant a Knight. Sir (said Bayard, drawing towards his end) there is no pittie of me, I die an honest man: you are to be lamented, who serue against your Prince, your Country, and your aash, and soone after hee gaue vp the Ghost. Lorges arriuing with those few French which remained, repulsed such as pursued vnto the bodie of their armie, and the Earle of Saint Paul hauing passed the riuer with the losse of few, but the brauest of his men, deliuered the artillerie to the Suisses, who made their retreat by the valley of Aouste, and himselfe by Turin. Laude, Alexandria, Nouarre, and generally all which the King possessed in Italy, remained at the Victors deuotion.

The estate of Milan was thus freed from the French, and Italy from their present calamities, but the roors were not yet cut vp: it was but deferred for a time. Then the Duke of Bourbon gaue the Emperor counsell to transport the warre into France. The King of England did willingly giue care vnto it. The fauor, the authoritie, the many followers, and the great intelligence which the Duke of Bourbon presumed to haue in France, inuited him thereunto. To this end, the Emperour treated with the English, and the Duke of Bourbon: "That the Duke should enter into France with a part of his armie which was in Italy: That hauing passed the Alpes, the King of England should pay him an hundred thousand Crownes for the charge of the first moneth, and should continue the same monethly, vnlesse hee would invade the Realme with a mightie armie: That France should be conquered for the English, and Prouence for the Duke of Bourbon, according to the treatie wee haue before made" mention of. That the Emperour at the same instant should make warre vpon them from the confines of Spaine, and should procure the Potentates of Italy, to concur in this enterprise, for the freeing of themselves for euer from the inuasion of the French. Marfeilles is a commodious port to annoy France, and to passe from Spaine into Italy. According to the Emperours desire, and the former treatie, the Duke of Bourbon, and the Marquis of Pescara, march to the conquest of Marfeilles. The King aduertised of their desseigne, sends Rance de Cere, a man well experienced in warre, and the Lord of Brion, with two hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, for the guard of Marfeilles: repayred his armie, and sent to make a leaue of foureteen thousand Suisses, and fixe thousand Lansquenets. The Duke and Marquis had now lien fixe weekes before Marfeilles: the King hauing vntied his forces, marcheth with an intent to fight with his enemies, who seeing so great a power to approach, imbarcked their great Ordinance for Genoua: the lesser they laid vpon Moyles, and so made a speedie retreat. The Marshall of Chabannes, who had the leading of the foreward, sent foure or fife hundred horses after them: who ouerthrew many, & returned with great spoile: euery one leauing his baggage behind him, and the souldiers casting away their armes, to be more

A more light to run away. The King seeing himselfe to haue a goodly army ready, & his enemies retired, resolues to cut off their way, or to come before them into Italy: many dissuaded him, the season might well diuert him (for it was in the middest of October) the Regent his mother aduised him to make warre by his Captaines, and not in person: and the Bishop of Capoua, came from the Pope to treat of a generall peace. But the heate which transported this good Prince to his owne ruine and dishonour, made him to say vnto the Bishop: That he should treat with him by letters, and attend him at Augnon with his mother. If the King makes hast to pursue, the Duke and Marquis made as great hast to arriue in time for the defence of Milan: so as in one day the King arriued at Verceil, and the Marquis at Albe: the Duke followed a day after him with the Lansquenets.

B At that time Claude Queene of France died at Blois, leauing three sonnes by the King and her, Francis the Dauphin, Henry Duke of Orleance, and Charles Duke of Angouleme: and two daughters, Magdalene married afterwards to the King of Scots, and Marguerite, which shall be Duchesse of Sauoy. The Vice-roy seeing the King to march directly towards Milan without stay, he put Anthony de Luna into Pauia, with twelue hundred Spaniards, and fixe thousand Lansquenets: posting himselfe with exceeding speed to Milan with the rest of the armie. Milan had changed hir mind, the plague had wonderfully wasted the Citizens: many (to auoide this daunger) had absented themselves: there was no such store of victuals within it as was vsuall: the trafficke had ceased, there was no meanes to recouer money: they had made no accompt to repaire the fortifications, and the King had from Vigee sent Michel Anthony Marquis of Salusses, with two hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foot: who at the first ouerthrew the Spaniards that were set to guard the suburbs of Milan: beate them into the towne, and kept the suburbs: notwithstanding their continuall sallies, by meanes of the Lord of Tremouille, who came to second him.

The Vice-roy finding the Citizens minds to be litle at his deuotion, went out by the port Romaine, leading with him the Duke of Bourbon, the Marquis of Pescara, and the rest of the army to Laude. The Milanais freed from the danger of the Imperials, receiued in the Marquis of Salusse and Tremouille. The Imperiall armie retired in great confusion and disorder, tyred with the tediousnesse of the way, hauing lost many horse and armes: If they had bene hotely pursued, without doubt they had bene easily ouerthrowne. Moreouer, if our men had presently gone to Laude, the Imperials had not dared to stay there: and it may be passing the riuer of Adde with speede, they had disordered the rest of the armie with the like facilitie. But when as the prouidence of God means to chastise a people, he blinds the eyes of their vnderstandings, in such sort as they cannot iudge of occurrents, but oftentimes they embrace those courses which be most dangerous.

Thus it fell out with our Francis: for according to the aduice of such (as held it not fit for his Maiesties affaires, to leaue a strong towne behind him, manned with many souldiers) he turned head to Pauia, in the end of October. He had with him Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, the Duke of Alanson, Lorraine, Albanie, and Longueville, the Earles of Saint Paul, Vaudemont, Lual and Tonerre: the Marshals of Foix, Chabannes and Montmorency, the Bastard of Sauoy Lord Steward, the Admirall of Bonniuet, the chiefe authour of this counsell: Lewis of Tremouille, the Marquis of Salusses, Anthony of Rochfaucault, the Lords of Brion, Escars, Boineuall, Fleuranges, Paulmy, Roche-du-maine: the Vidame of Chartres, Aubigny, Clermont, Bussy d'Amboise, de Conty, Fontenay, a younger brother to Rohan, d'Aumont, and a great number of others: two thousand Lances, eight thousand aduenturers, eight thousand Lansquenets, fixe thousand Suisses, and foure thousand Italians, which number did afterwards greatly increase.

The Imperials gathered together the remainder of their shipwracke, and made a new leaue of twelue thousand men in Germanie: but want of money did greatly trouble their affaires. The Emperour could not helpe them: to draw any out of the Duchie of Milan, there was no meanes. From their auncient confederates, they hoped for small or no succors at all. The Pope and the Florentines contented them, but with generall words. Clement sought to maintaine himselfe in the middest of these stormes, and would make no League with any other Prince. The Venetians, vrged by the Vice-roy, to furnish the men whereunto they were bound by the Capitulation, made cold answers. They grew now more iealous of the Imperials

1524. the Emperours ambition. All Italy complained, that he would not inuest sforza in the Duchie of Milan, vnto which the Popes authoritie did moue him: to whose example and counsels they had then great regard, beeing willing in like sort to frame themselves to preuent occurrences. And the King of England, in stead of furnishing them with the money he had promised, demanded all that which he had lent. All these considerations, made our Francis resolute to the sege of Pauia. He batters it in two places, makes a breach, and giues an assault, they winne the breach, but had not meanes to enter: they find large and deepe trenches to stay them, and the neereest houses furnished with shot, forced them to abandon the breach after the losse of many good men. As they despaird to take Pauia by force, James of Silly Bayliffe of Caen, propounds a more easie meanes to force it. The riuer of Tessin diuides it selfe into two branches, two miles aboute Pauia, and ioynes againe a mile beneath the towne before it runnes into Po. By reason of the depth of the water, the wall was nothing fortified vpon the greatest streame: he vndertakes to cut this arme, and to driue all the streame into the lesse, hoping that the course of the water beeing dried, and making a fodaine and furious batterie on that side, the towne should be forced, before the enemy had any meanes to preuent it.

They spend many dayes, employ an infinit number of men, and make a great expence in this worke. But the water is of more force then the labour of men, or the Industrie of Ingeniours. A continuall raine did so swell the riuer, as breaking the sluices and banks which were made within the Channell, in one houre it made all this great labour fruitlesse. So all the attempts of our men were reduced to a hope, to force them to yeeld at length by necessity. The Pope in the meane time, (moued with the sudden spoile and conquest of the Duchie of Milan by the King) desirous to settle his affaires and businesse, and to pacifie Italy the better, sent John Mathieu Gilbert, Bishop of Verona his Datarie, to exhort our warriors to peace and concord. The Vice-roy trusting in the strength of Pauia, refused to giue eare to any agreement or composition, whereby the King should hold any foote of land in the Duchie of Milan: the King on the other side, putt vp with his good successfe, the greatnesse of his armie, the hope not onely to maintaine it, but also to increase it, to preserue vnto himselfe the estate of Milan, to recouer Genoua, and afterwards to assaile the Realme of Naples, made him as vnwilling to yeeld to any peace.

Thus the Pope hauing failed to reconcile these two Princes, the chiefe cause why hee sent his Datarie, tooke effect. Clement bound himselfe, Not to giue any succours, either open or secret against the King. And the King receiued the Pope and the Florentines into his protection, especially to maintaine the family of Medicis in their greatnesse. The Pope supposed the Emperour should go to the wall, but he will soone repent him. This agreement drew the King to the enterprife of Naples: for the execution whereof, he made John Steward Duke of Albanie his Lieutenant generall, accompanied with Raince de Cere, sixe hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, ten thousand foote, and ten or twelue peeces of Artillerie. His intent was to force the Vice-roy to abandon the estate of Milan, to flie to the defence of Naples, where as there remained no Garrisons. But he should haue consulted hereof after the absolute conquest of the Duchie. The enemy will make his profite of this indiscreete diuision of his armie in so vnseasonable a time. He did foresee, that in succouring Naples, the Duchie of Milan would be wholly lost. The Vice-roy hauing resolved to make head against the King within Lombardie, sent the Duke of Traietto, to giue order for the defence of the realme, in case the French did assaile it. Let vs leaue the King a little at his sege, and see some exploits of armes.

The Marquis of Salusses, Lieutenant for the King at Sauonne, had in the beginning of March, sent two thousand men in garrison to Varas, a small towne, all walled vpon the sea-shore, mid-way betwixt Sauonne and Genoua. Don Hugues of Moncade, Vice-roy of Sicily, then Gouvernor of Genoua for the Emperour, brought the Emperours gallies to beardowne the gate of Varas with their Cannon, hoping that the weaknesse of the place would force the Souldiars to make their retreat to Sauonne: and with this desseigne he put himselfe in Ambush with foure thousand men, betwixt Varas and Sauonne. The Marquis aduertised of this batterie, flies thither with those few men which the present necessitie would suffer him to gather together. At his approach, the besieged take courage, and rampar vp their gate

The Pope makes a league with the King.

A gate quite ruined. The Gallies of Genoua grow amazed, and turne their prowes. The Marquis pursues them. Don Hugues seeing himselfe abandoned by his forces at Sea, begins likewise to make his retreat to Genoua along the shore. La Mailleray, by the commaundement of the Marquis, goes to shoare, drawes forth the garrison of Varas, and leades them in the pursuite, whilst that he coasted along, seeking to disorder them with his Canon, beeing forced to march by the sea side, by reason of the mountaines. Moncade falls into the reere-ward with some of the chiefe Captaines to endure the shoocke. They charge him, and put his troupes in route, and he, with all them that did accompany him, are taken prisoners. The Marquis takes two Gallies, and pursuing his victorie, finds the Admirall of Genoua in the roade: he forceth her to yeeld, and makes a great bootie of Artillerie, munition, and other riches. And if his forces had beene sufficient to assaile Genoua sodenly by land, as well as by sea, considering the feare which had seized vpon the Cittie, it had beene in daunger to haue beene lost for the Emperour.

On the other side, Anthony of Crecquy Lord of Pontdormy, parting from Monstrueil, at such time as the King lay incamped before Pauia, to put victuals into Terouenne, and to try if he could force Neuffosse (which was a great trench full of water, that shut vp the valley of Cassell, from Saint Omer vnto Aire, furnished with Bulwarkes at euery entrie with artillerie, and well manned, to guard the entries and passages of the said valley whither they retired all their goods and cattle) he came to Fauquemberg with three hundred men at armes, some twelue hundred foote, and two Culuerins. And after the men at armes had fed their horses, hauing put the victuals they had brought into Terouenne, he parted for the execution of his enterprife, and comming to Neuffosse before day, he forced the passage, carrying away an inestimable prey, and passing in his retreat neere to Arques, halfe a league from Saint Omer, he ouerthrew the garrison of the said S. Omer, which issued forth to succour the valley. In this charge Eftree tooke Licques, Lieutenant to the Duke of Ascor, who the same day had married his mistresse, to whom Eftree was likewise a seruant: but with a courtesie neuer enough to be praised, at the request of the new Bride, he sent backe his prisoner. Those of Aire and Betune, likewise came posting, to the number of eight or nine hundred naturall Spaniards, siue or sixe hundred Wallons, and 300. horse of their Ordonances, and ioyned with the troupes of Saint Omer, to stop or hinder the retreat of the French. Pontdormy chargeth them, beates backe the horse vpon their Spanish foote, and entering pell-mell, breakes them, siue two hundred and fortie, and carried away eight or nine hundred prisoners to Terouenne, all which he sent backe for a moneths pay, and for hostages retained their Captaines.

Moreouer, Fiennes Gouverneur of Flanders, hauing suborned a Souldiar of the Garrison of Hedin (which had beene taken in the warres) to deliuer him the Castle of Hedin: the souldiar aduertised Pontdormy of the meanes he had to deliuer into his hands the said Gouvernor, the Duke of Ascor, and most of the Noblemen of the countrey. The Souldier brings this troupe at the day appointed. Pontdormy is there with two hundred men at armes: and couers balles of wild-fire with straw, in a raelin of stone, where the enemy must passe, into the which those that were aboute the gate should cast fire, when as they should see a sufficient number of the enemies entred. Men incounter their enemies both by fraude and vertue: but fraude is oft-times fatal to the author.

Pontdormy hauing his mouth open to speake, the fire was so suddenly cast, by him that had it in charge, as entering in at Pontdormys mouth, it burnt his bowels, wherof he dyed two dayes after. Canaples his Nephew, had his face likewise so burnt, as there remained no forme thereof: so as their enterprife to charge the enemy behind in this disorder, came to nothing. Foure-score or an hundred Bourguignons beeing entred within the Raelin, were burnt: the rest saued themselves in this amazement, and many were lost in the wood vpon their retreat. But all were not sufficient to repaire the losse of that worthy and valiant man of warre.

The sege of Pauia was continued, when as the Duke of Bourbon bringing siue hundred men at armes Bourguignons, and sixe thousand Lansquenets, the Imperials resolute to succour Pauia, and to that end part from Laude the 25. of Ianuarie. The Imperials approach, assured the King hee should haue bataille, and to prouide for it, hee had caused Tremouille,

A notable victorie gotten by the Marquis of Salusses.

The worthy exploits of Pontdormy.

Pontdormy slain.

1525. Tremouille, whom he had appointed Gouvernor of Milan to come vnto him, leauing Theodore Triumue, with Chandou within Milan. Iohn de Medicis with three hundred light horse, and three thousand foote, was newly come into the Kings pay, and had wonne him many Italian Captaines: amongst which, Guy and Francis Earles of Rangon, and Iohn Lewis Paluioisin, brother to him whom Lautrec had beheaded at Milan. Tremouille, the Marshals of Foix and Chabannes, with other Captaines of great experience, aduised the King to retire his armie from before Pauia, and to incampe in some strong place, whereof there are many in that Countrey, by reason of the Channels which ouer-flow the Medowes. They gaue him to vnderstand, that the enemies armie beeing vnfurnished of money, they should be forced within few dayes to breake, and to put their companies into Garrison. That the strangers for want of payment of their money, would make some dangerous mutinie. That the enemies did not maintaine themselves together, but with hope to giue battaile: and if they did see the warre prolonged, they would be ingaged in many difficulties and confusions. To conclude, it was (say they) exceeding dangerous, to thrust betwixt a Towne defended, by five thousand men, and an armie that came to succour it, beeing mightie in numbers of men, in valour and experience.

But all this was to cast oyle into a fire which already flamed. The King will not leaue the sege, and yet will he keepe the enemy from entring into Pauia. He referred (saith the Originall) the gouernement of the armie to the Admirall: hee beleueed his counsell onely, and gaue eare to Anne of Montmorency, and Philip Chabot Lord of Brion, men pleasing vnto him, but not yet of any great experience in matters of warre. Moreouer, he had not that number of men in his armie, as they gaue him to vnderstand. The Duke of Albanie had led away part of his horse: some remained for the guard of Milan, many were disperfed into townes and villages about. There were but 8. hundred Lances in the Campe: and the negligence of his Officers, with the deceit of his Captaines, especially the Italians, abused him, not furnishing the number of footmen, for the which they receiued pay. But howsoeuer, he must needs fight. Behold pittifull first fruites, fore-runners of a generall ouerthrow.

Sad fore-runners of an ouerthrow.

Two thousand Valaisans lodged at Saint Sauueur, betwixt S. Lansfranc and Pauia. They within charge them suddenly, and disperse them. Pyrrhus brother to Frederick of Bossole, held the Castell of Saint Angelo with two hundred horse, and eight hundred foote. This place lying betwixt Laude and Pauia, stopt the victuals which might be brought from Laude. Ferdinand of Aualo approacheth with his Spaniards, takes away the defences, and forceth the Garrison to yeeld, that Pyrrhus, Emilius Cauriane, and the three sonnes of Phabus Gonzaga, remaining prisoners, all the rest should depart without armes or horses, and for a moneth should beare no armes against the Emperour. Belioyeuse, and then all the other places which lay behind them, except S. Colombain, which they had so besieged as no man could issue forth, came into the power of the Imperials.

Moreouer, the King caused two thousand Italians to come of those which had maintained the sege of Marfeilles. Passing the confines of Alexandria, neere to the riuer of Vrbé, wearied and toyled with the tediousnesse of the way, Gaspar Maine Captain of Alexandria, charged them suddenly, breakes them, and chaseth them into Chaitellat, and there forceth them to yeeld with seateene Ensignes. The like successe had Iohn Lewis Paluioisin. The King had sent him to surprize Cremona, which was guarded onely by five or six hundred foote. Sforza aduertised that he lodged at Cassall the great, with foure hundred horse, and two thousand foote, sent Alexander Bentiuole with some number of horse, and two thousand foote, suddenly leuiet, to Cremona. Too great confidence doth no lesse preiudice men, then feare. Paluioisin (holding himselfe strong enough, without attending of Francis of Rangon, who came to ioyne with him, with three or foure thousand men) abandons his Fort to fight with them, marcheth directly to the enemy, and at the first, puts Sforza's horsemen to flight: but Bentiuole comming with his footmen, Iohn Lewis was ouerthrowne in the midst of the combat, taken prisoner, and all his men put to route, which was a great preiudice to the Kings affaires. Behold another disgrace of no lesse importance.

Iohn Iagues of Medicis, a Milanois, Captaine of the Castell of Mus, had intelligence, that the Captaine of Chiauenné, a Castell vpon the Lake of Como, belonging to the Grisons, hauing no enemy neere to annoy him, went daily to walke without his Fort, (the taking of this

A this places, was a fit meanes to diuert fixe thousand Grisons, newly come vnto the Kings Campe) Iohn Iagues lying one night in ambush close to the Castle, failed not of his prey, but holding this insufficient Captaine, he brought him before the gate, with a dagger at his throate readie to stab him, if his wife had not let downe the bridge. The gate beeing open, three hundred men issue forth of another ambush, seaze vpon the castle, and so on the Towne. The Grisons supposing that Medicis had other enterprises vpon their places, call home their men, who notwithstanding the shame they should purchase in forsaking (vpon the point of a battell) a Prince, whose pay they had receiued, and to whom they had giuen an oath, returned five dayes before the fight. All these difficulties chancing one vpon another, were infallible fore-runners of some great disaster: which when he sees come, he ought carefully to prouide for the preservation of his estate, or with a firme and constant resolution, trie the hazard of a battaile. A commaunder may lawfully trie this last remedie: but a King must vse the other. The two armies approached within halfe a mile: the foreward led by the Marshall of Chabannes, lodged with the Suisses at Ronces, in the suburbs neere to Saint Justins gate: the King at the Monasteries of Saint Paul and Saint James, places of aduantage neere vnto Pauia: the Duke of Alançon at Mirabell with the reeward, so as holding Pauia girt in of all sides, the Imperials could not enter, vnlesse they did passe the riuer of Tessen or the Parke of Pauia. The Imperials lodged at Prati towards Saint Justins gate, and extended vnto Treleuere and la Motte, and in a wood by Saint Lazare, and as they did greatly indamage one another with their Cannon, beeing diuided onely by a little brooke, which they call Vernicule. The lodging of both armies had in front on their wings, and on the left flank, great rampars enuironed with trenches, and fortified with bastions. But the Imperials had this aduantage, beeing approached so neere vnto Pauia, as in a day of battaile they might be assisted by them within the town. In the meane time Anthony de Léna did greatly annoy our men by continuall sallies, and in many skirmishes had most commonly the better. The 17. of February, Iohn de Medicis, to be reuenged of a disgrace which his troups had receiued by a former sally, laid a bait for them of the town, seconded with a double ambush, the one in the trenches neere vnto the town, the other farther off. The Spaniards drawn on by their former victories, pursuing them which had charged, they discouer the farthest Ambush, and began to retire, when as the neerer cutting off their way, puts them all to the sword. But this smal victorie did greatly preiudice the General Iohn de Medicis had the bone of his heele broken with a shot, and was carried vnto Placentia. His troups were so disperfed after his hurt, as the armie was diminished about two thousand, and his absence did coole his souldiers courage and heate in skirmishes and assaults: for he was a great souldier, and the good successe of a battaile, doth partly depend vpon the presence of such personages.

The Imperials had no more meanes to maintaine themselves within their fort, want of money had soone driuen them forth: yet they considered that by their retreat, Pauia would be lost, and they were out of hope to preserve the rest, which remained in the Duchie of Milan. To assaile the French within their lodging, were a dangerous and vaine attempt. Also the enemies resolution was not to giue battaile, vnlesse some aduantage were offered them, but onely to retire their men that were within Pauia, and to man it with fresh troups, the which they could not do, without passing in view of the French Campe. They therefore prepare themselves to two effects, either to execute their designe, or to fight, if the King issuing out of his fort would stoppe their passage.

The night before Saint Matthias day, the 25. of Februarie, the day of the Emperour Charles his natiuitie, they disquiet and tire our men with many false alarmes, and make two squadrons of horse, and foure of foote. The first, vnder the command of the Marquis of Guast, consisting of fixe thousand Lanquenets, Spaniards, and Italians. The second vnder the Marquis of Pescara. The third & fourth of Lanquenets, led by the Vice-roy and Duke of Bourbon. They come to the Parke wall, cast downe about threescore fadom, enter within it, and take the way to Mirabell, leauing the kings army vpon their left hand. The artillerie planted in a place of aduantage, doth much indamage their battalions, and forceth them to runne into the valley for shelter. Here impatience transports the King. Hee sees the enemy disordered, and thinks they are amazed: moreouer, he had intelligence, that the Duke of Alançon had defeated some Spaniards that would haue passed on the right hand, & had taken from them four or his owne Cannon hinders their execution. The Imperials desired nothing more, then to haue the King out of his fort, and to be couered from his Artillerie. They now turne head against him which was directed to Mirabell. The King (supported with a battalion of his Suiſſes, beeing his chiefe strength) marched directly against the Marquis of Saint Ange, who led the first of the horsemen, ouerthrowes them, killes many, and the Marquis himselfe. But oh villanie! The Suiſſes in steade of charging a battalion of the Emperours Lanſquenets, which did second their men at armes, they wheele about, and go to saue themselves at Milan. The Marquis of Pescara came to charge the King with his battalions: Francis brother to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Norfolk, who led about five thousand Lanſquenets, marched resolutely against him, but they are suddenly inuironed with two great battalions B of Germans, defeated and cut in peeces: the Suiſſes thus retired, the Lanſquenets lost, the whole burthen of the batraile lay vpon the King, so as in the end being hurt in the legge, face, and hand, his horse slaine vnder him, charged on all sides, defending himselfe vnto the last gaspe, he yielded vnto the Viceroy of Naples, who kissing his hand with great reuerence, receiued him as prisoner to the Emperour.

At the same instant, the Marquis of Guast had defeated the horse that were at Mirabel, and Anthony de Lema issuing out of Pauia charged our men behind. Thus (seeing the pitifull estate of the Kings person) all giue way, all seeke to saue themselves by flight. The Duke of Alancón seeing no hope of recouerie, preserues the reward in a manner whole, and pas- C seth the riuier of Tesin. The Vant-guard (for a time) maintained the fight, but in the end it shrunke by the death of the Marshall of Chabannes. This day deſtroyed vs of a great number of the chiefeſt Noblemen of France, amongst the which the Marshals of Chabannes and Baron of Buzançois, Beaupreux Marafin the chiefe Quirie of the Kings stable, and about 8. thousand men. The Bastard of Sauoye Lord Steward of France, died of his wounds beeing prisoner. There were taken, Henry K. of Nauarre, the Earle of S. Paul, Lewis of Neuers, Fleu- D leray, Montpelat, Boissy, Curtion, Langey and many others. Of the enemy there died about seauen hundred, few men of marke besides the Marquis of Saint Ange. Triunlee and Chan- dion who remained at Milan, aduertised of the ruine of their armie, returned with their men into France, so as the very day of the batraile, all the Duchie of Milan was freed from the French forces. The next day the King was led to the Castell of Pisqueton, vnder the guard of Captaine Alarçon, alwaies intreated according to the dignitie of a royall person, but so farre-forth as the qualitie of a prisoner would permit. The Duke of Albanie was farreinge-ged in the Realme of Naples, and all passages by land were by this disgrace stopt. To draw E him out of danger, the Regent mother to the King, giuing order for the affaires of the Realme, sent Andrew Doria Generall of the Kings Gallies vnto him, with la Fayette the Vice-admirall being at Marseilles: who (without any losse of men, but of some scouts, chased by the Colonniois euen to the very gates of Rome) returned safely into France. The estate seemed now neere a shipwracke, as well by the imprisonment of the head, as by the death of many worthy personages, who might haue serued greatly in the preseruatiō thereof. But God by many corrections would often chastise France, but neuer ruine it. And now touching the King of England (who was then readie to imbarke for Calais) he suddenly changed his hatred into loue, so as growing ielous of the Emperours exceeding greatnesse, the Regent hauing intreated him by John leachin a Geneuiois her Ambassador, to giue eare to some mild intreatie, rather then to inuade the Estate of a captiue Prince: he promisseth all succors both of men and money for the Kings deliuerie, and without any demand of restitution for his charges he dismisseth his armie.

In the meane time, the Emperour aduileth in Councell, what course he should hold with the King. The Bishop of Osime, the Emperours Confessor, is commended to haue aduised him

The King of England offers all loue to the Frenc King beeing
a prisoner.

A him to shew a brotherly loue, and to set him free, referring this notable victorie to the expresse will of God: shewing that the chiefe vse thereof should be the peace of Christen-dome, threatned with a totall ruine by the Turkish armes, whereof we shall soone see farall effects. But the aduice of Fredericke Duke of Alba, a man of great authority with the Emperor, was of more force. He yielded to the Kings liberty, but with so excessiue conditions, as it might haue beene the meanes, for Charles to lay the foundation of an absolute Monarchy in Christendome.

According to this aduice, he sent the Earle of Reux, his Lord Steward, to offer the King liberty, so as he would reſeigne all the rights he pretended in Italie; restore the Duchie of Bourgongne, as belonging to him by right, with Prouence and Daulphiné for the duke of Bourbon, to incorporate them with other lands, which hee had formerly enioyed, and to make all together a Kingdome. Moreouer the Emperour offered to giue him his sister in marriage, propounding many other conditions, so absurd and voide of reason, as it is better to let the curious read them in the Originals themselves. Amongst all losses, that of liberty toucheth nearest; but our Francis hauing learned to withstand all aduersitie with a constant resolution, I will die (said he) a prisoner, rather then make any breach in my realm for my deliuerance. Whereof I neither will nor can alienate any part, without the consent of the soueraigne Courts and Officers, in whose hands remains the authority of the whole realme: Wee preferre the generall good before the priuate interest of Kings persons. If the Emperour will treat with me, let him demand reasonable things, which are in my power, then shall he find mee readie to ioyne with him, and to fauour his greatnesse. And to re-deeme his liberty with honour, and his subjects content, who wonderfully desired his enlargement, he then offered, To marry his said sister, widow to the King of Portugall, and to hold Bourgongne for her dowrie, the which should belong to the children that should come of this marriage, to reſeigne his interest to the realme of Naples and the Duchie of Milan: to accompany the Emperor with an army both by land and sea, when he should go to Rome to receiue the Imperiall crowne. Was not this properly to giue him all Italy in prey? To yeeld vnto the duke of Bourbon his offices, lands and moueables confiscated, and the reuenues receiued by reason of this seisure, and to giue him to wife the Duchesse of Alancón his sister, newly a widow by the death of the duke of Alancón, instead of Eleonor, the widow of Portugall, which had beene promised him: to content the King of England with money, and to pay what sums of money should be set downe for his ranſome.

Herevpon the Earle of Saint Paul, hauing corrupted his gards, escaped out of prison, and ioyntly with the Earle of Vaudemont, and the Marquis of Saluſſes, treated by the means of Francis Earle of Pontrefine, with certaine Princes and Captaines of Italy, to stay the King from being transported out of the Duchy of Milan, hoping that the Potentates of Italy (feareing least the Emperor should seeke to supplant them) would seeke his maiesties deliuery with their common forces. And the Venerians being now aduertised of the reconciliation of the English with the King, retired themselves from their league with the Emperour.
But the Viceroy discouering these stratifies, gaue the King to vnderstand, that he had commandment from the Emperour, to passe him into Spaine, that beeing there, their maiesties by a gracious and fauorable enteruiew, would easily conclude a peace, which should cause his liberty. So the King vnderſtanding that the duke of Bourbon pursued his marriage in Spaine with Eleonor, yielded to this passage, hoping shee would rather desire to marry a King of France, then a Prince dis-inherited. They imbarke the seuenth of Iune, and within few daies after (the Emperour hauing commanded, that hee should be receiued, withall the honour that might bee, as hee passed) they arriue happily in Castille: the King was lodged at Madril, a place of hunting and pleasure, but farre from the sea, or the confines of France.

The Emperour would not admit the King to his presence, before the accord were made, or in such times as there were no doubt thereof: for the aduancing whereof a truce was concluded vntill the end of December, during the which Marguerite the Kings sister, Duchesse of Alancón, came with a large commission into Castille, to treat with the Emperour.
Her arriual was very pleasing and healthfull to the King: who finding him so sicke, as few men hoped for his recovery, she did more reuiue him then all the Physitians art. But hauing found the Emperour (who was come to visit the sicke King) constant in his vnreasonable demands, especially for the restitution of Bourgongne, whereunto the King would not yeeld, but vpon the former condition, or that they might trie it by law, to whom it belonged, and seeing that the King had recovered his former health, she returned into France, leauing with the Emperour, the Archbishop of Ambrun, afterwards Cardinal of Tournon, and John de Selue, chiefe president at Paris, to pursue the treaty begun, bringing with her an ample declaration from the King, whereby (reseinuing vp his crowne) he gaue her power to inuest the Dauphin his sonne, the King remaining resolute, rather to continue in perpetuall prison, then to passe any thing to the preiudice of his realme.

The King
set at liber-
tie.

But the Emperour seeing the King constant in this resolution, in the end yeelded to his Maiesties deliuey, whereof we will set downe the most important points; That within six weekes after his deliuey, he should conserue the Duchie of Bourgongne to the Emperour, with all the dependences, as well of the Duchie, as of the Countie, the which should hereafter bee sequestred from the Soueraignty of the realme of France. That at the very instant of his enlargement, they should deliuey into the Emperours hands, the Dauphin, and with him the duke of Orleans, the Kings second sonne, or twelue of the chiefe Noblemen of France, such as the Emperour should name, to remaine as hostages, vntill the restitution of the said lands, and ratification of the peace, with all the Articles, by the generall Estates of the realme, and vpon the restoring of the Hostages, they should deliuey vnto the Emperour the Earle of Angoulesme the Kings third sonne, to bee bred vp with him, the better to assure and maintaine the peace. That hee should reseinue vnto the Emperour, all his rights pretended to the Estates of Naples, Milan, Genoua and Ast: That hee should quit the Soueraignty of Flanders and Arthois, and should marry Eleonor, sister to the said Emperour, with two hundred thousand crownes dowry, and Jewels fit for her estate, and the Emperour should renounce all his pretensions, to any place belonging to the Crowne of France, especially to Peronne, Mondidier, Roie, Bologna, Ponthieu and other Seigneuries, lying on either side the riuer of Somme. Without doubt, these were hard conditions, and beyond all the bounds of reason. But the King being a prisoner, garded, and not his owne man, of what validitie could they bee in law? It was therefore in his power to redeeme his children by money. These be the fruites the Spaniard would gather by his victory, to teach the French not to fall againe into their hands. The iudicious reader may consider, whether they bee growne wise by their owne losse.

Then the King and Emperour did visit one another againe, with great demonstrations of loue: they shewed themselves together in publike places, had often, long, and secret discourses, they went in one Carosse together, to see Queene Eleonor, to whom the King was made sure. But for that in the midst of all these shewes of loue, the King was at no more liberty then before, but more carefully garded: who would not haue held this accord to bee full of discord, this alliance without loue, and the most part of the articles extorted by force, would bring forth the fruites of their ancient ialousies? A lesson for Princes that be victors, to containe themselves within the limits of reason, for whatsoeuer is forced by violence, is not durable. Some daies were spent in these actions: then the King was conducted to Fontarabie, where exchange was made of his Maiesty, with his two sonnes, beeing yet very yong. At Bayonne the Ambassadors of Charles demanded the ratification of the treaty which the King should giue at his entrie into the Realme, but hee could not alienate the Bourguignons without their consent, and therefore he answers, that he will shortly assemble the Estates of the countie, to know their mindes. Let vs see then what followed, and begin somewhat higher.

After they had transported the King into Castile, Francis Sforza fearing least the Emperour should retein the Duchy of Milan to himself, together with the excessive sum of twelue hundred thousand Ducats, which he demanded for the expences hee had made in the conquest, and defence of the sayd estate, considering also, that part of the Spaniards were gone into Spaine with the Viceroy, part were with the duke of Bourbon, many laden with spoile, were retired into diuers places. And the Marquisse of Pescara, was in bad termes with the Viceroy, he perswaded himselfe, that the rest of the troupes might bee easily ouercome, if the Marquis would giue his consent. Sforza therefore, by the aduice of Jerome Moron his

Chancellor,

A Chancellor, did found the Marquisse his minde, he propounded vnto him, to cut in peeces, those companies which remained within the estate of Milan, and to make him King of Naples, if the Pope and the Venetians would agree. A sufficient spur to prick forward an ambitious man. The Pope did not dislike it: the Venetians shewed themselves most affectionate, all ioyntly doe malice the greatnesse of Charles. The Marquis at the first gaue care vnto them, but hauing discovered the whole practise to the Emperour, and growing suspect vnto the rest, hauing accepted the Lieutenantcy of Lombardy, of the Emperour, hee publickly put in execution what he had in charge, to preuent these imminent dangers, as he should thinke most fit. And first he seized vpon Moron (whom he made to confesse all the conspiracy, charging duke Sforza, as culpable and consenting to all that had passed) hee made him to reseinue vnto him Cremona, Treffe, Lecque and Pisqueton, the keyes of the Duchy of Milan, hee forced the Milanois to take the oath of fealty vnto the Emperour, and Sforza to shut himselfe into the castle of Milan. But when as the Marquisse had reduced him to all extremities, death takes him away before he could enioy the fruites of his malice. The duke of Bourbon did succed after him.

The Marquis
dies.

There was great like-hood, that the Emperour beeing in quiet possession of the estate of Milan, all the rest, especially the Pope (lying betwixt Lombardie, and the Realme of Naples) would remaine in prey. To preuent Charles his attempts (who made shew to inuest the duke of Bourbon in the Duchy of Milan, if Sforza were found guiltie of the crime, whereof they accused them) a league was made at Cognac, betwixt the Pope, the Kings of France, and England, the Venetians, Florentins and Suisses, for the common liberty of Italy, and the restoring of Francis Sforza to the Duchy of Milan, being besieged, as we haue sayd.

A league
against the Emperour.

This league was signified by the King, to the Viceroy of Naples, to the duke of Traieto, and to Alarcon, whom the Emperour had sent, to bee fully satisfied of the Kings intent, who excusing himselfe, that hee could not performe his promise for the alienation of Bourgongne, as very preiudiciall to the crowne, hee offered to accomplish all the rest, and for the ransome of his children, to pay two Millions of crowtes. According to this treaty, the Pope sends to field eight hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horse, and eight thousand foote, vnder the charge of Gai Earle of Rangon, and John de Medicis Colonel of the Italian foote. The Venetians sent eight hundred men at armes, a thousand light horse, and eight thousand foote, commanded by Francis Maria duke of Vrbin. Laude was the first object of their armes, the which by the intelligence of Lodowike Vistarim, a Gentleman of that towne, they surprisid from fiftene hundred Neapolitaines, whom the Marquisse of Guast, and Anthony de Leua, had lodged there, vnder the charge and command of Fabrizio Maramao.

These happy beginnings, should haue made the heads of the league to haue proceeded in their course speedily and valiantly. By the taking of Laude, the way was open euen to the gates of Milan: the enimie had no more meanes to succour Cremona, and if they had speedily aduanced towards Milan, they had found them in great perplexity and confusion: the citizens oppressed by the tyrannicall vsage of the Spaniards, breathed nothing but rebellion, but the duke of Vrbin, terrified with the very name of Spaniards, marching slowly like an Abbot, and staying a whole day in euery lodging, to attend the Suisses, without the which he thought it dangerous to approach neere Milan, by his slow and faint proceeding, he caused an irreparable losse and blemish to his owne reputation, and to his maisters. For hauing by his long delaies, giuen the duke of Bourbon leasure to enter into Milan, with eight hundred Spaniards, before the army of the league could approach, the fouldiars of Milan refused courage, charged the Artillery in the night, and so terrified the duke, as hee presently retired his army, desiring rather, said he, to repaire the forepassed error, then to persist in it, seeing they had approached so neere Milan, contrary to his opinion, where expecting no resistance, he knew that a longer abode would wholly ruine the league. He trembled for feare, at the report of the Spanish forces, and yet would make shew as though hee had to deale with men made of snow, who without striking stroke, would suffer him to reape the fruites of his pretended victory. So the duke retired to Marignan, being resolute, not to dislodge, vntill hee were fortified with twelue thousand Suisses: without doubt, a hundred thousand men cannot assure a feareful minde. It was a foule error, at the beginning of 1526. of a long and dangerous voiage. The Imperials freed from this army, repaired the Rampars and Bulwarkes of the Suburbes, disarmed the people, thrust forth such as were suspect, and lodged the souldiers in the citizens houses: Who insulting ouer their hostes, as in a towne of conquest, forced them to furnish victuals, clothes, and money, abused their wiues and daughters, compelled seruants to discouer their maisters wealth being hidden, to conclude, they practised all acts of inhumanity, which licentiousnesse doth commonly breed in this nation being a Conqueror.

The miserable estate of Milan.

Being thus oppressed, they repaire to the duke of Bourbon, being newly arriued, and with pittifull complaints, teares, and lamentations, they beseech him to ease their miseries. The duke, after he had imputed the causes of these infolencies, to the want of pay for the army, he promised to lodge them else-where, so as they would prouide thirty thousand crownes for the entertainment of one moneth, and the better to countenance his promise, he wished, In case that euer any extortion were committed, that he might be flaine with a Harguebuse, as the first enterprise he should be at. A praier which we shall soone see take effect. The money was gathered, but the people finding no fruits of his promise, the pittifull estate of the multitude being spoiled, nothing mollifying the cruell infolency of these barbarous souldiers, many not knowing to whom to haue recourse, cast themselves head-long from the tops of their houses, many hanged themselves, many ended broth their liues and miseries, by other horrible and strange kinds of voluntary torments.

The second siege of Milan.

The castle of Milan yeelded.

Cremona taken by the confederates.

Francis Sforza was at this instant ready to yeeld vp the castle, when as the confederates, fortified with five thousand Suisses, newly arriued, drew the duke of Vrbina a second time before Milan: but this was to make a second discouery of his indiscretion and cowardise, for being still ready to number his souldiers, possessed with a strange feare, and seeking rather meanes to flie then to fight, Sforza prest by famine, and want of courage in the duke of Vrbina, yeelded vp the castle of Milan, to the duke of Bourbon, the 24. of Iuly, and retired himselfe to the confederates, who put Laude into his hands. Then the Kings army arriued, lead by Michell Antonie Marquis of Saluces, consisting of foure hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse, and foure thousand Gascons, and within fewe daies after, the twelue thousand Suisses, leauied in the Kings name, encouraged the duke of Vrbina to returne towards Milan, where leaving part of his men at armes, the Popes troups, and the foresayd Suisses, he went with the Venetian foot to fortifie Malatesta Baillon, who with three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, and eight thousand foot, besieged Cremona, and so prest it, as they yeelded by composition, the which was likewise deliuered vnto Sforza.

The Colonne capitulate with the Pope.

Rome surpris- ed.

Euery one hath his turne, saith the Prouerbe: the Pope had bene the principall Author of the Kings sending the duke of Albany into the estate of Naples, and now hee solicits his confederates againe to invade the realme, supposing things could not succeed happily, if the Emperour were no where else encountred, but in the Duchy of Milan. But whilest he seeks to fire and burne his neighbours house, it fallies vpon his owne head. Ill counsell is commonly dangerous to the giuer. All these warres had bene plotted in the Councell at Rome, was it not reason he should reape what hee had sowne? The Pope vrged his confederates to send a part of their sea-forces into the Realme of Naples: which consisted of foure Gallions, and sixteene Gallies for the King, thirteene Gallies for the Venetians, and eleuen for the Pope, ouer all the which, Peter of Nauarre was appointed Generall at the Kings instance, notwithstanding the Popes persure in fauour of Andrew Doris, whom he had entertained. The Colonne vnable to resist such forces, did cunningly strike faile, and to busie the Pope vntill the Vice-roy's returne from Spaine with the army at sea, they did capitulate with him the two and twenty day of August: To retire their troups to Naples, with the which they did molest the territories of the Church, and on the other side the Pope should remit all offences past, and reuoke the monitory which he had published against Cardinall Colonne. This reconciliation made the Pope in a manner to dismiss all the horse and foote, which hee maintained vpon the territories of the Church against the Colonne, and to disperse the rest into townes about Rome, growing cold in his designe to invade Naples.

The Colonne cared not to wrong the Pope with the preiudice of their honour, but hauing no meanes to make open warre against him, they straine all their wits to circumuent him

A him by fraud. Fayning therefore to suppress Agnane, defended by two hundred men in the Popes name, they flie with all speed to Rome the twentieth of September, with eight hundred horse and three thousand foote, they seize vpon three gates, sacke the Popes palace, and the ornaments of Saint Peters Church. There were present in person Africanus Colonne, Don Hugues de Moncade, Vespasian sonne to Prosper Colonne (the mediator of the accord, and who had plighted his faith, for himselfe and the rest) Cardinall Pompe Colonne, to farre transported (saith the Originall) with ambition and fury, as hauing conspired to put the Pope cruelly to death, hee had resolved to force the Cardinals to make choise of himselfe, and to install him in the chaire being vacant. The Pope in the beginning grew resolute, like vnto Boniface the eight, when hee was surprised by Sarre Colonne, but in the end B conuired by the Cardinals that were about him, he retired himselfe into the castle of Saint Angelo; where Don Hugues hauing receiued the Popes oth, and the Cardinals, Cibo and Rodolphe his cousins, for hostages of his safety, capitulating with him in tearmes of a Conqueror, he forced the Pope to promise, To retire the army of the league, out of the Estate of Milan, and not to giue any succours to the confederates, for foure moneths.

Times for punishments, are noted in the Councell of Gods diuine prouidence, who ment to giue two notable stroakes with one stone, as we shall shortly see. This truce was wonderfully commodious for the Emperours affaires. Milan had bene vanquished at length: Genoua oppressed by the confederates army at sea, cryed out for bread, and the small store of victuals which came by land, did but keepe them in breath for some few daies. But behold two great effects diuerted by the comming of George Fronsperg, who knowing the extremity of Gaspar his sonne, Colonel of the Lansquenets, which were within Milan, hauing stirred the Germains, with hope to enrich themselves with the spoile of Italy: he led a good number of horse, and foureteene thousand Lansquenets, who receiuing euery man a crowne, followed him to the succour of Milan. The Marquis of Salusses, and the duke of Vrbina aduertised of these succours, abandon the siege of Milan, with an intent to cut off their victuals, and to charge them at the passage of some riuier. But the dukes accustomed delaias had giuen Fronsperg leisure to assure himselfe of the field, so as the league could no way annoy him, but by light skirmishes: in one of the which Iohn de Medicis having his thigh broken with a faucon shot, retired to Mantoua, and there died, within few daies. This death was an absolute victory to the aduerse party, for he was young, wife, and a valiant captaine. Laude and Cremona did cut off the victuals from Milan, and the duke of Bourbon being freed from the siege, hauing no more meanes to maintaine his army, after hee had by strapadoes and other tortures wrested some money from the citizens to pay his Spaniards, he left Anthonie de Leua in the city, and entred the territories of the Church, with an intent to possesse Placentia. To preuent him, the Marquis of Salusses (leaving the duke of Vrbina in field) put himselfe into it, so as the duke of Bourbon (seeing the towne well manned, and the Venetian army to follow him) left Placentia, and by the duke of Ferrares aduice (whom the Emperour had won vnto him) being ioyned with Fronsperg, he marched directly towards Rome.

E The Pope (to bee reuenged of the outrage receiued by the Colonne) called the Earle of Vaudemont, brother to the duke of Lorraine, issued from the house of Aniou (a house greatly desired by the ancient partisans thereof) to the realme of Naples. The Earle accompanied by Rance de Cere, with about ten thousand foote, and some horse, entering into the Realme, had taken Aquila, Salerno and many other places, chased Don Hugues de Moncade, and raised the siege of Freselon, which the Imperials had besieged, when as the Vice-roy of Naples required of the Pope in the Emperours name a sur-cease from armes. The Pope had no money to maintaine so long and heauie a burthen of the warre, there were greater difficulties in the enterprise of Naples then hee expected, the King did not seeme F willing to make warre out of Italy, as he had promised in the articles of their Capitulation, neither did hee furnish, besides his part of fortie thousand crownes a moneth for the common warre, the twenty thousand, which he ought euery moneth for the expedition of Naples, the French gallies were so ill furnished, both with men and munition, as they remained fruitlesse at Sauonne, not attempting any thing: the succors of the King of England were farre off, and vncertaine, the tedious, and variable proceeding of the duke of Vrbina did vex him, Iohn de Medicis dies.

1527. him, the approach and threats of the Imperiall army at the gates of Rome, did amaze him: All these considerations made him conclude a truce with the Viceroy for eight moneths, whereby either party called backe his men speedily, deliuered vp the places taken, and caused the army at sea to retire. This was an other meanes to lull the Pope a sleepe a litle before his ruine.

For, threecore thousand Ducats which Pope Clement had giuen in regard of this truce, were not sufficient to satisfie two paies due to the duke of Bourbons Lanquenets, the Germans and Spaniards gaped greedily after the sacke of Rome, which had beene long promised them. The truce did nothing stay them, from shewing all acts of hostility, they spoyled the countries of Bolonia and Romagna, and then camped before Rome, the next day, the duke of Bourbon causing a furious assault to bee giuen, marching in the head of his troups, with a ladder in his hand, was slaine with a Harguebus shot. Philbert of Chalons, Prince of Orange (who marched besides him) to conceale it from the souldiars caused his body to be couered with a cloake, and following the charge hotly, he forced the suburbs and the city. The victors entring, put about foure thousand men to the sword. It is to be supposed, the slaughter had beene greater, if the death of their generall had beene knowne, they spoule friend and foe indifferently, Prelats, Temples, Monasteries and reliques. They ranfome both secular, and religious men. They sacke the Cardinals palaces (except such as had redeemed their goods, and such as were fled into their houses) with exceeding sums of money. And which is worse, many being spoiled by the Spaniards, were fleeced againe by the Lanquenets, being seasoned for the most part with Luthers doctrine, and by consequence passionate enemies to the sea of Rome. To conclude, Rome is subiect to all the insolencies of a conquered towne which they meane to ruine.

The Pope besieged in his castle of Saint Angelo, sent for the Vice-roy of Naples, hoping that he would make him some better composition. But comming to Rome, hee found the Imperials nothing pleased with his gouernment, who had chosen the Prince of Auranges for their generall, with whom the Pope (voide of all hope of succours) agreed the sixth day of Iune: To pay unto the army foure hundred thousand ducats, a fourth part presently, the rest as sundry termes: to remaine prisoner with thirteene Cardinals that did accompanie him, untill the first hundred and fiftie thousand were paid, and then to goe to Naples, or to Caicte, to attend how the Emperour would dispose of them. To giue in hostage for assurance of the money, the Archbishops of Siponte and Pisa, the Bishops of Pistoia and Verona, Iames Saluiati, Simon Ricafoli, and Laurence brother to the Cardinal Rodolphe: To deliuer into the Emperors hands (to hold so long as he pleased) the Castle of Saint Angelo, the forts of Ostia, Cinis-a-mecchia and Cinis-a-castellana, with the cities of Placentia, Parma and Modena. The accord being made, Alarcon entred the castle with three companies of Spaniards, & three of Lanquenets, lodging the Pope verie straightly and with small liberty.

This insolent and hard proceeding against the Pope, to the scandale of al Christendome, caused the Kings of France and England to make warre in Italy, at their common charge, to free the Pope, and his Cardinals beeing besieged both with warre and pestilence, and to restore him to the possessions of the Church, the King of England contributing for his part threecore thousand angels a moneth: and to confirme the league betwixt the King and the Venetians, they promised to entertaine ten thousand Swisses in common, the King furnishing the first pay, and they the second, and so consequently. The duke of Milan with the Venetians should likewise entertaine ten thousand Italians. Odes of Foix Earle of Lautrec was made generall of the whole army, and passed the Alpes with a leauy of fixe thousand horse, fixe thousand Lanquenets, ten thousand French and Gascons, and ten thousand Swisses. Then Andrew Doria was entertained by the King with eight gallies, giuing him thirty thousand crownes pay euery moneth. Before they came to open warre, the two Kings sent ioyntly to the Emperour, to demand the Popes enlargement; the restitution of the children of France, with an offer of two millions of crownes for their ranfome, the preservation of the estates and gouernments of Italy, and finally a generall peace, which the Emperour accepting, the duke of Orleance should marry with the daughter of England, but hauing refused these articles they did sweare and solemnly proclaime their league the eight day of August. The expectation of Lautrecs forces was great, and the confusions of the

A new league against the Emperour.

1527. A the Imperiall army great, being disperfed by the plague about Rome, and so diminished as there scarce remained ten thousand men of all the Emperors forces. Lautrec had no sooner set footing in the marches of Lombardie, but hauing intelligence that the Earle of Lodron had sent two thousand Lanquenets to Bosco, in the territories of Alexandria, he beleagard them, battred it day and night, and the tenth day of the siege forced them to yeeld, at his discretion, who keeping the captaines prisoners, dismissed the souldiars; but upon condition that the Spaniards should return into Spaine, through France, & the Lanquenets into Germany, through Swisserland, but these were afterwards receiued into the Kings seruice, vnder the Earle of Vaudemont Colonel of the Lanquenets. This smal victory was the fore-runner of an other, of greater importance. Andrew Doria generall of the Kings gallies, made hot wars against the Genouois, so as no ship durst goe to sea along the riuer of Genoua, and Cesar Frigese aduertised by his friends that were within Genoua, of the great scarcety of victuals which did presse the Inhabitants; beeing sent by Lautrec, with two thousand men by land, he kept them so short, as in few daies there was neither corne nor cattail for the Inhabitants. The bellie is an importune solicitor, especially when many mouthes crie for meate. The Genouois had no more hope of helpe, but in hazarding some gallies to sea. They arme some, and send them out by chance, to seeke victuals, foure laden with corne were taken by the French gallies, foure returned fraught with corne, and one with other marchandise: and nine were gone forth of Genoua to west them, when as hauing newes of C Frigeses approach, they abandon their gallies, to goe to charge him. In the meane time Andrew Doria arriues, he compasseth in these gallies in the port of Genoua, burnes one and takes all the rest, whilst the Genouois (hauing ouerthrowne the first they encountred) chased them so farre, as they being cut off by the French betwixt the towne and them, they were all defeated, and Gabriel Earle of Martinengue their generall taken prisoner. This misfortune with sundry other crosses and losses of money and diuers ships, the famine hauing brought them to the last extremity, reduced the towne to the Kings obedience, whereof Lautrec made Theodore Trinuice Gouvernor.

The losse of the Lanquenets had wonderfully daunted them of Alexandria, so as although Alberic of Bel-ioueuze had some-what reuiued them with a supply of a thousand men, yet the rough and continuall battery of Lautrec, forced the Earle of Lodron to enter into composition, whereby the Lanquenets departed with their baggage, taking an oth not to carry armes against the King; nor his allies for fixe monethes. The taking hereof brought Vigue, with all the countrie of Lomeline and Biagras to the Kings obedience. Anthony de Lena had not within Milan about a hundred and fiftie horse and five thousand Lanquenets and Spaniards, beeing ready to abandon the towne (doubting to bee vnable to defend it, with so few men and so many difficulties) and to retire to Pavia. But Pavia was ill victualed; and moreouer his army could not liue there vpon extortion and spoile, as it had done at Milan. Hee therefore sends Lodowike of Bel-ioueuze to Pavia, with two thousand five hundred men, and resolues him selfe to defend Milan. Lautrec followes him, and besiegeth it on the castle side, and the Venetians on the other part: hee makes a breach, and takes the towne at the second assault, hee leaues it eight daies in spoile to the souldiars, and leads away Bel-ioueuze (who lately for a quarrel with Frederick of Bossole had forsaken the King) prisoner at Genoua. All which places according to the treaty were restored to Francis Sforza. Milan wauered, the confederats did sollicit the taking thereof. But it was thought good to leaue this thorne in the Venetians feet and Sforzaes, for beeing both freed from feare of the Emperour, who (hauing this passage stoppt, should draw no succors out off Germanie) would haue beene lesse affected to fauour the King in his enterprise of Naples. Moreouer it was a meane for the King to make a more easie treaty of peace with the Emperour, of whom (leauing the estate of Milan) hee might with more ease obtaine the liberty of his children, according to the treaty with the Emperour, by the Ambassadors of France, England and Venice. But the King desiring that Sforza should stil stand in need of helpe, gaue the Emperour more means to speake bigge. He was of a great spirit, and neuer daunted in aduersity. Hee protests, that neither loue nor force, shall make him to alter any of the conditions before propounded: and his proude demands make prooffe that hee had no inclynation to peace. As the Venetians and Sforza labored to stay the French forces in Lombardy:

1527. so the Pope pressed them to drive the Imperiall army out of the territories of the Church. A He therefore passeth the river of Po the 18. of October, with an intent to attend the rest of the Lansquenets commanded by the Earle of Vaudemont, which were not yet arrived, to be in the Suisses place, being for the most part retired.

Lautrec had no sooner turned his backe, but Anthony de Leu came and recovered Biagras the eighteenth day of the said moneth, and prepared to passe into Lomeline to rake Vi-geue and Nouarre: but Lautrec aduertised of this attempt, sends backe Peter of Nauarre with six thousand French foote, and some men at armes, who chased the Spaniards into Milan, and settled Sforza in Biagras. The Lansquenets being arrived, Lautrec took the way to Placentia, where the duke of Ferrara (it may bee) well pleased to see the Pope, against whom B he had beene long incensed, receiue some disgrace leaving the Imperials, ioyned in league with the King, and there was concluded the marriage of Hercules his eldest sonne, with René the youngest daughter to King Lewis the twelfth. The Marquis of Mantoua a friend to the strongest, did likewise ioyne with the confederats.

The Emperour then foreseeing, that the inuasion of the realme of Naples by Lautrec, would force him to call backe his forces, which he had in the territories of the Church, hee sent his Commission to set the Pope at liberty, which done, after many treaties hee agreed, the last of October, To attempt nothing against the Emperour, neither for the estate of Milan, nor the Realme of Naples. To pay three hundred and fifty thousand ducats, that is three score thousand presently to the Lansquenets, and thirty five thousand to the Spaniards, the like somme within fifteene daies, and the rest three months after. The Pope to free himselfe from prison, fled to those remedies, which hee had before his restraint neglected, he made Cardinals for money, the most of them (saith the history) being vnworthy of so great an honor. Necessary it was, that the Court of Rome should thus bee disgraced, that they might meddle lesse in worldly affaires, and looke to their spiritual duties. The 10. of December was come, when as the Spaniards shold conduct the Pope to a place of safety, but knowing the bad affection of the Spaniards, especially of Don Hugues de Moncade, Vice-roy of Naples, by the death of Launoy, and fearing a worse condition, or some other change, he deceived his guards, and the night before (disguised like a marchant) he went secretly out of the castle, and saued himselfe in Oruieto: but his hostages paid his ranfome. A rare example to be noted in the Church, D since the time it came to that greatnesse: To see a Pope issued from one of the greatest families in Italie, fallen from so great a dignity, to loofe Rome, to bee a prisoner, and to haue all his estate possessed by the violence of Christian armes, then in few moneths, to bee restored to his seat, and by the meanes of the eldest sonne of the Church to recouer his estate, greatnesse and authority. Without doubt the Emperour, suffering himselfe to bee so much preft, for the Popes deliuey, shewed, that the Counsell of Spaine was more gouerned by ambition, then deuotion.

The Pope being at liberty, hee exhorted the confederats to draw their companies out of the territories of the Church, that by their example the Imperials might make their retreat according to promise, as in deed they did: he gaue thanks to Lautrec in particular, for that E hee had assisted him in his deliuerance, adding, that hee was as much bound vnto the King, and him, as if he had beene freed by his forces. But the Moore changeth not his hew. He held (saith the history) his accustomed disposition, hauing not (by his imprisonment) left his craft, and couetousnesse. As the Kings of France, and England, required him to reioyne his armes, and meanes, with them and their allies, sometimes hee fed them with hope, that hee would employ himselfe for a generall peace, and the good of all Christendome, sometimes with excuses, that wanting men, money and authority, his vnion with them would bee fruitlesse, and giue the Imperials occasion to wrong him in many respects. Lautrec staid at Bolonia, attending directions from the King, either of a full resolution of peace, or to proceed in his course of armes. The Emperour offered to settle Sforza F in his estate, and to compound with the Venetians, Florentins and other confederats. But the Emperour and the King stood vpon the point of honor, which should trust other. A point which plainly discouered the bitternesse of their spleene. The King would not be bound to draw his army out of Italy, before he had recouered his children, yet he offered to put hostages into the King of Englands hands, for performance of whatsoever he should bee bound vnto, vnto, if vpon the deliuey of his children, he did not presently withdraw his army. The Emperour grew obstinate, saying that he could not trust him, who had once deceived him. The Ambassadors of France and England tooke their leaues of the Emperour, and according to their masters Commission proclaimed warre against him. The Emperour accepts it cheerefully, but to stay the Ambassadors instantly, to send them fifteene leagues from Bourgos (where then the Court of Spaine remained) to giue them a gard of shot, and halberds, and not to suffer them to conferre, or to write in any sort. Was not this to violate the law of Nations? The fire is now kindled, they dreame of nothing but warre. Lautrec proceeds in his course, he takes the way to Rimini, Ancona, and Recanate, chaceeth the Imperials before him into the realme of Naples, where we shall soone see the exploits of his armes.

B The King aduertised of the detention of the bishop of Tarbe, his Ambassador, who was afterwards made Cardinal of Grandmont, he committed Nicholas Perrenot Lord of Granuelle, the Emperours Ambassador, to the Chastelet at Paris, and staid all marchants, subjects to the Emperour. But this was not all. The Emperour had before time at Granado, when as they treated of a peace betwixt them, sayd: That hee would willingly end all controuersies with the King, by a single combat of his person against the Kings: he now deliues the same words vnto the Herald that denounceth warre vnto him, adding: that the King had basely, and treacherously broken his faith with him. The King would not haue refused it, but his Ambassador did then wrong him, in concealing this speech. It may be the Emperour had such an intent. He was a most valiant Prince, but our Francis did yeeld nothing vnto him in courage. He had no sooner intelligence of his challenge, but calling to- C gither, the twentie eight of March, all the Princes, all Ambassadors, with the whole Court, into the great hall of the palace at Paris, sitting in his royall seate, hee caused Iohn Robertet, one of his Secretaries of Estate, with a loud voice, to read a Cartell signed with his owne hand: that the Emperour, accusing the King to haue falsified his faith, had spoken vntruely, and as often as he did speake it, he did lie. To the end therefore hee should not defer the deciding of their controuersies, hee wished him to appoint the field, and hee would bring the armes, the King protesting, that if afterwards the Emperour should write, or speake any thing preiudiciall to his honour, the shame of the delay should redound vpon himselfe, seeing that the combat is the end of all writing. Without doubt, this proceeding had beene more seemely for Knights, then for such Princes; and no enterprises are commendable, but so farre forth as they agree with the dignitie of their Persons, and States.

And for that Granuelle refused to take vpon him this charge, the King dismissing him, did accompany him with an Herald, to present this writing vnto the Emperour: Within few daies after, Henry King of England, sent him the like desie, and did put away Catherine his wife, daughter to Ferdinand and Elizabeth Kings of Spaine, whom hee had married being widow to Arthur his elder brother. A diuorce which Pope Clement granted, vpon promise that Henry should, for his safety, maintaine him a gard of foure thousand foote.

In the meane time Lautrecs forces preuailed in the Realme of Naples, with such E applause of the people, as, whether for affection of the French, or hatred of the Spaniard, almost all the townes, sent to offer their keyes, and gates. Peter of Nauarre had chased the Prince of Melphie out of Aquila, and reduced all Abruzzo to the Kings obedience, the whole estate of Naples was readie to set vp the banners of France, when as the Prince of Orange hauing assembled within Troye, and thereabouts, five thousand Germaines, five thousand Spaniards, and fifteene hundred Italians; hee made Lautrec to vnite his forces, which were disperfed, and to turne head to the enemy, with an intent to fight with him. Hee wanted the sinews of warre, the Kings assignations failed, so as hee could not long maintaine the burthen of the warre: the aduantage of men, victuals, and the field, did inuite him, he must therefore attempt some great matter. Hee goes to field with three thousand French, whereof the Lord of Bury was Colonel, foure thousand Gascons, vnder the command of Peter of Nauarre, and the Lord of Candale, eight thousand Germaines commanded by the Earle of Vaudemont, three thousand Suisses vnder the charge of the Earle of Tende, with ten thousand Italians, &c. approached nere the enemy, but there was no means to draw him out of his fort. Many daies were spent in skirmishes. In one of them, three hundred 1528. hundred horses coming out of their battailions, which marched after the artillerie, were A charged by Moriae and Pomperant (it is that faithfull Achates to the duke of Bourbon, whom the King had drawne to his seruice, and honored with a company of fifty men at armes, for the good seruice hee had done him at his taking at Paui, hauing freed him from some souldiars, that had inuironed him in, and not knowne him) were wholly defeated, and their ensignes, and guidons carried away.

Lautrec offered bataille, yet well pleased not to fight in the absence of Horatio Baillon, who brought thirteene ensignes of foote, whom Iohn de Medicis had long before trained in the exercise of armes. But behold, a heauy signe of a fatall defaster, the windes were so violent, and the skie so troubled, as all the tents in the French campe were ouerthrowne, and many men slaine. Baillon arriues, the enemy packs vp his baggage, stops the bels of his moyles, and marcheth through the woods directly to Naples, without sound of drumme or trumpet. It had beene a goodly thing to pursue these runawaies. The French captaines flew after them in their hearts, but Lautrec said. I will haue them at my mercie, and without losse of my men. But the wit of man is ignorant of future destinies. Don Hugues de Moncada and other chiefe seruants to the Emperour, did so hate the Prince of Orange, as without doubte, they had shut the gates of Naples against him, the which had giuen the French a great advantage, but the soueraigne Iudge of armes had otherwise decreed. The Prince of Orange being dislodged, Lautrec sent some troupes of French horse and foote with the black bands (which were those of Baillon) to goe before Melfe, which might cut off the victuals from the army lying before Naples: the Prince thereof defended it with three thousand men, who by their continuall sallies had much indamaged our troupes. They made a small breach with two Cannons, and the Gascons burning with heate, offer themselves to the assault, the blacke bands follow them, without any commandement or direction from their captaines. A volley of shot makes them retire, killes many Gascons, and some threescore of the black bands. At night they renew the battery, and make a second attempt; but with like successe, yet at length they carry it.

The next day they haue a supply of artillery, wherewith they make two great batteries. The peasants (which were in great numbers within Melphe) mutine for feare, they are indeed more fit to amaze, then to serue at need. The souldiars terrified with this tumult, abandon the defenses and recouer the castle, they enter the towne, spoile it, and kill of souldiars and Inhabitants fixe or seuen thousand: they take the castle by composition, and the Prince with his wife and children prisoners. Barleta, Trani, Venouse, Alcoli with all the places there abouts, except Manfredonia, yeeld to the victors fortune, who prepared a great masse of victuals for the seige of Naples, the Venetians troupes hauing fortified the army with about two thousand men. Capoua, Acerre, Nola, Auerse and all places there abouts, hauing voluntarily opened their gates, made the way easie for Lautrec, who campt before the walles of Naples, in the end of Aprill the Imperials were resolu'd, onely to defend Naples and Caiette. It was a great matter to haue chased the enemy out of the field, and to keepe them coopt vp, within the capitall city. But alas! what shall become of so great a multitude of men? our French must learne once more, to their cost, that all their strange enterprises attempted farre off, haue bene mournfull graues vnto them. The issues of death belong to the eternall God.

Melphietaken.

Lautrec imploies all his wits, in the siege of Naples, but who can hope for any happy successe? The city was full of men of defence, and the meanes to famish it very vn certaine: for the gallies of Philippin, Nephew to Andrew Doria, being vnable to stoppe vp the port, some ships fraught with meale stoale in: those of Venice came nor, the enemies light horse (which were many) cut off the victuals from our men, the ordinary grossenesse of the aire, the continuall raine, the discommodities of the souldiars, who for the most part lay open, filled the campe full of diseases: the Kings slow prouision, and the negligence of the Treasurers, were the cause that no money could passe the mountaines: the Venetians, of two and twenty thousand ducats which they should contribute euery moneth, did owe threescore thousand, and that little which Lautrec did gather of the custome of the cattaille of Apulia, was imploied for the defraying of his ordinarie expences. The number of the defendants was great, their experience in deeds of armes well tried, being Naples besieged.

The discommodities of the siege.

A being nine or ten thousand old souldiars. It was therefore better to besiege, then to assaile Naples, and to prouide that they might not be releued with victuals, neither by land nor sea, Philippin Doria kept the gulph of Salerne, and the Imperials relying vpon the valour and strength of their men, conceiue a hope to ouercome him. This resolution was necessary for the Spaniards, they make choise of a thousand Spanish shot, and diuide them into fixe Gallies, foure Foists, and two Brigantines. Don Hugues the Vice-roy, Gobbe an old sea captaine, and almost all men of command, will be partakers, and to amaze Doria a farre off, by a shew of a greater number of ships, they make a long traine of fisher-boates, & send two gallies before, giuing them charge to retire at the enemies approach, that they might draw them into the open sea. Doria aduertised of the Imperials counsell by faithful spies, makes three of his gallies to disperse themselves, as if they fled, to the end that turning, they might (through fauour of the winde) charge them in flanke and in poupe: and followed with five gallies, he marcheth towards the enemy. The greatest stratagems consist in expedition: the first blow is worth two. The Spaniards presumed, that compassing in Doria, with the smoake of their Canon to take from him his sight and marke. Doria preuents them, and for the first check, hee carries away with one Canon-shot, forty men out of the Admirall, amongst the which was the captaine and many officers: the other peeces fitly discharged, doe likewise disorder them. On the other side, the gallic of Don Hugues discharging her Canon, killes the captaine of Dorias galley, and hurts the maister, with some others. The approaches are made, and a furious charge is giuen with their shot and other armes. These two fight with great courage; three other Imperials presse two Genouoises, and seemed to haue the better, after the death of many men of either side, when as the other three which made shew to flie (hauing gotten into the open sea) they turne the prow against the enemy, beate in peeces the Admirall, and an other called Gobbe, take their foists, sinke some, burne others, kill their men, breake their armes, and fighting hand to hand, and foote to foote, in the end they get both the aduantage of the combate, and the honour of the victory.

Don Hugues de Moncada Vice-roy of Naples, Fieramosque, with many other Gentlemen and Captaines, and aboute a thousand men, were slaine and remained as a prey for the fish. Two Spanish foists sore battered recouered Naples with great difficulty: the Prince of Orange caused the maister of one of them to bee hanged, the other went and yeelded to Philippin Doria. The Marquis of Guaft, Ascanius and Camillo Colonne, the Prince of Salerne, Saint Croix, le Riz, Gobbe, Serenon, with a great number of chiefe men, were taken prisoners. These are goodly beginnings in so famous a siege, which fill the French with great hopes of a happy successe, and the Imperials with a strange amazement. They see the flower of their men buried in the waues, they haue lost the command of the sea, and are blockt vp so neere at land, as they haue no meanes to bee releued with victuals, they haue no meale but by their hand-mills, no money for their souldiars, the plague did daily diminish their numbers. Staby, Saint Germaine, Fondy, and all the country about, yeelds to the conquest: the Prince of Melfe ioynes to that party, the people of Calabria seeme very willing to come vnder their command; but the point of a totall victory consisted either in the conquest or the defence of Naples. Our men were much annoyed for fresh-water, diseases increased, the which did greatly wast the army, the enemy being stronger in light horse, did cut off their prouisions by their daily sallies.

A victory at sea gotten by Philippin Doria.

Lautrec without doubt a great captaine, but absolute in his opinions, left most of his horsemen disperfed at Capoua, Auerse and Nola, so as the black-bands hauing no horse to second them, came often with disaduantage from their skirmishes. The report was, that they prepared an armie for the sea at Marfeilles, but it was onely in imagination. The Venetians more carefull of their priuate interest, then of the generall good, fitted themselves of those places which should bee their portion of the conquest. The Pope had no other defeigne, but to recouer the authority which his house was wont to enioy at Florence. Thus there appeared many difficulties on either side, yet such as there was an expectation of victory for the French: for in the end there arriues two and twenty Venetian gallies in the gulph of Naples, the tenth of Iune, which depriued the besieged of all commodities at sea, & threatned them with a general famine. But see what caused the total ruine of our French.

1528. The Emperour in the midst of a losse, makes a great gaine. We do commonly sinke vnder our owne burthens, and are the cause of our owne miseries. The infidelity of the Genouois is herein detestable: but we may obserue a goodly lesson for Princes, to endure much of a rude seruant, when hee is profitable vnto them, and that they must neuer hope to recouer him, when he is chased away or lost. Lautrec aduertised of the fore-said victory, commanded they should send the prisoners into France, Philippin puts them into two gallies, with that intent. But the bootie was too good, and might easily draw a Genouois soule to dispencc with his faith. As they passed by Genoua, Andrew Doria staied them, couering his secret descignes with this pretext; That the King had not satisfied him for the ranfome of the Prince of Orange, and other prisoners, which hee had taken at Porte-fin during the siege of g Pauia (the which had beene set at liberty, a peace being concluded at Madril with the Emperour) neither yet for the entertainment of his gallies, without the which hee could no longer maintaine them. That if it pleased his Maiesty to doe him right, and yeeld vnto the Genouois their accustomed commands ouer Sauone (the King thinking to keepe Genoua in awe, had transported the traffike of marchandise, and the custome of salt to Sauonne) with their ancient liberties, and priuileges, hee would deale with the people, that for assurance of his faith, he should furnish the King with twelue gallies entertained in the which hee might place such captaines, and fouldiars, as he should thinke good, reseruing onely two gallies, for the gard of the port.

A strange and insolent course for the seruant, to prescribe a law to his master. But the losse of such a seruant was the losse of Genoua, of the Realme of Naples, and of the army which beseegeed it. But these demands of Doria, being found vnreasonable by the Counsell, especially by the Chancellor du Prat, a fower man, and of great authority, the King sent Anthony de La Roche foucault Lord of Barbezieux, with the office of Admiral into the East-seas, and a Comission to seize as well on his Maiesties gallies, as of those of Andrew Doria, yea and of his person, if hee might finde the meanes. Andrew aduertised of this charge, retired himselfe to his gallies, deliuered vp the Kings, left his pay, and practised by his Spanish prisoners, he followed the Emperours partie with the freedome of Genoua, vnder the Emperours protection, the subiection of Sauonne to the Genouois, a pardon for himselfe, who had beene so great a persecuter of the Spanish name, entertainment with the Emperour for twelue gallies, and threecore thousand ducats yeerely pay, with many other honourable conditions: during which treaty, his Nephew Philippin, not onely kept ill gard, but also priuilege releued the besieged with victuals, and in the end, retired himselfe from Naples, with all his gallies. This departure of Philippin, caused the Venetians (who wrought from the sea-shore vntill they met with the trench, which Lautrec had made betwixt the towne and Mount Saint-Martin, which the enemies had fortified) to leaue their worke, and looke to gard the sea. This was the first effect of Doria's retreat, to preiudice the French armie. Behold the second, whence followed the ouerthrow of their enterprises, and the losse of their infinit charges. The fifteenth day of Iulie, the Venetian gallies returne into Calabria, to prouid biscuit. So the port remayning open, the besieged received a great refreshing at such time as necessity had brought them to Lautrec's deuotion, who (norwithstanding the plague) resolving rather to die, then to retire one foot backe from the place, he solicited the King, to supply him with money, & men in their roomes that had died of the infection. The King sent the Prince of Nauar, brother to Henry King of Nauarre, but with so small a troupe (whereof the greatest part were voluntary young gentlemen, who marched onely for pleasure, and to win honour) as he was forced to send some out of the armie, to conduct him safely from Nola to the campe, and to receiue some money which hee brought. This charge was giuen to Candalle's, Nephew to the Marquis of Salusses, who passing in his returne before Naples, was charged by the Imperials, who issued forth in great troupes, being hurt (his men put to rout and himselfe taken prisoner and brought to Naples, and then redeemed by exchange for one of theirs that was taken in the fight, he died of his wounds. Hugh Earle of Pepoli was likewise exchanged for an other, and their troupes were diminished about two hundred, that were slaine and taken. A hard forerunner of a fatall checke, which within few daies shall daunt our warriors.

Now behold a pittifull Catastrophe of these two armies. The Imperials, by their daily sallies, 1528. A sallies, prouided them things necessary, and do often cut off the victuals from the French armie, take their baggage and forrage, euen at their forts, and their horses at the watering, their hopes increase with their aduantages: their Lansquenets mutine no more: euery one esteemes it a glorie to haue suffered: contrariwise, the others decay, both in force and courage, the horse dis-band some to refresh themselves, others to auoid the plague: the footmen faint, hauing no horse to second them: the plague began to cease at Naples. & increased amongst our men. The Earle of Vaudemont, Gruffy with many other Captaines, were already layed in their graues: the Prince of Nauarre, Camillo Frionlee, and almost all the men of command were sicke: and that which did most import, Lautrec stricken with sickness, could not redresse those things, which did hourly tend to ruine. Renee de Cere, whom he had sent towards Abruzzo, to make a leaue of foure thousand foote, and fixe hundred horse, found the Treasurers who payed him with their ordinary answer. I haue not a farthing, the king hath no money in his coffers. The enemies did so belay the wayes, as they could not go to Capoua: euery man almost was sicke in the armie, the footmen were almost wasted: Simon Romzini, a braue Knight, and of the French partie, had beene defeated in Calabria. Somme had beene sackt with the slaughter of a troupe of men at armes, and light horse. Most commonly there were no victuals in the campe: they wanted water, all the Cesterns beeing drie: and to heape vp their miseries, Lautrec dying the 15. of August, interred with him all his braue desseignes.

C The head failing, all the members faint and soone decay. Moreouer, we obserue in this Nobleman, that no man (how wise and valiant soeuer) is alwaies happie: for vertue and fortune, haue alwaies beene at hatred and mortall warre. The King did honour his funerals at our Ladies Church in Paris, with a mourning pompe fit for one of his children. The Marquis of Salusses tooke vpon him the gouernment of the armie. A man of courage, beloued and well followed by men of warre: but it decreased, and disorders increased daily.

The Earle of Sarni with a thousand Spaniards, chased three hundred foote from Sarni which were in garrison there: and followed with a greater troupe, he tooke Nola from Valerius Vrsine, who beeing retired into the Castell, attended two thousand men which the Marquis sent him, the which beeing charged in the plaines of Naples, were put to route. D Fabrisio Miramoa issued out of Naples with foure hundred men, and finding Capoua in a manner forsaken, he straight-way entred into it. So the French abandoning Pozzuole, put the garrison into Auerse, a place of great importance for the Campe.

But Capoua and Nola beeing lost, they could hardly recouer any victuals. So as the armie beeing no longer able to subsist, did rise in the night to recouer Auerse. The Imperials discover their departure, they pursue them, defeat the battaile vpon the way, being led by Peter of Nauarre, and the reereward commaunded by Pomperant, Negrepelisse, and Pau; Camille Trinuile; They take the Nauarrois with many other Commanders, and men of qualitie, and beseege the Marquis in Auerse: who hauing no means to defend himselfe, sent Guy of Rangon to parle with the Prince of Auranges, and did capitulate with him, as followeth: That he should leaue Auerse with the Castell, artillerie, and munition. That as Lieutenant General to the King, he should remaine prisoner: That he should imploir his autoritie to cause both French and Venetians to yeeld vnto the Emperour all the Realme of Naples: That the men of warre should yeeld and deliuer vp their ensignes, guidones, banderolles, armes, horses and baggage, but such as had command might euery one carry away a horse, or a moyle, at their choyce: That the strangers should not beare armes against the Emperour for sixe moneths. So all the companies were defeated, all the Captaines dead, taken or fled: and this accord was a conclusion or scale of the miserie of the French in the Realme of Naples, and a confirmation of the Spaniards greatnesse in Italy.

Things hauing succeeded after this manner, the Marquis was carried sicke in a Litter to Naples, where within few dayes after he died. During the sege and after, there died the Earls of Lautrec & Vaudemont, Charles Prince of Nauarre, Candalle's, the Barons of Grandmont, Buzançois, de Conty, the L. of Tournon and his brother, Claude of Estampes L. of la Ferte Nabert, la Val a Daulphinois, Gruffy, Morlac, d'O, Pomperant, Montdragon, Louppé, Cornillon, Grutture, Maumourri; the elder Iarnac, Boninet, Hugh Earle of Pepoli, Count Walse, with so great a number of others, as of so many men at arms there remained not a hundred and

Naples raised

1528. and of so many thousand of foote, there hardly escaped foure thousand : but let vs see the A successe of our forces in the estate of Milan.

The Duke of Brunswike, hauing passed the riuer of Adice the 10. of May, with ten thousand Lansquenets, and fixe hundred horse well armed, hee marched to the succour of Naples. And the King, to crosse his desseignes, opposed the Earle of Saint Paul, brother to the Duke of Vendosme, with fixe hundred men at armes, fixe hundred light horse, vnder the commaund and gouernment of Boissy: fixe thousand foot led by Lorges, and three thousand Lansquenets by Monteian. The Earle had commandement from the King, to follow this Germaine Duke at the heeles, if he directed his course to Naples, and to engage him betwixt the two armies: but necessarie prouisions for his troupes causing the Earle to make a fruitlesse stay at Ast, gaue the Duke libertie to take by composition Pescara, Rivolte, Lunate and almost all the other places vpon the Lake of Garde. This little successe drew him to the seige of Laude, but in vaine; the valour of the besieged, the plague among the besiegers, the policie of Anthony de Leua (who would haue no companions of the bootie, nor so great forces as might prescribe him a law in his gouernement) tooke from them all hope to recouer any money, considering the pouertie of Milan, and the difficultie of victuals, whereof there was great want in Lombardie: the Lansquenets mutining returned home in disorder, the thirteenth of Iuly.

The Earle being thus freed from this thorne, and ioyned with the Dukes of Vrbino and Milan, recouered what the Imperials had seized on, and all that they held betwixt Po and the riuer of Tefin vnto Pavia, which then obeyed the Emperour: for after the passage of Lantrec to Naples, Anthony de Leua aduertised that it was carelesly kept by Peter of Lungene, with foure hundred horse, and a thousand Venetian foote, and by Hannibal Pissinard a Cremonois with three hundred foote, he scaled it in the night, and surprized it by assault. Biagras and Arone were by the same meanes brought vnder his obedience. The confederates meaning was to assaile Milan sodenly, but a continuall raine breaks their way going to the port of Verceil, by the which they should enter, so as they change aduise and went to campe before Pavia. They battered it with twentie Cannons, and made a reasonable breach where they disputed who should haue the point of the assault, the French and the Venetians affecting this honour equally. The lot fell to the Venetians, who gaue it: but skirmishing coldly and farre off, Lorges moued with choller and impatiencie to see them so faintly pursue the aduantage which fortune had giuen them, thrusts himselfe betwixt them and the breach, and takes it by force, before the Venetians could approach. Florimond of Chailly and Gransay (who did second Lorges on either side if neede should be) were there slaine, and the ensigne which marched before them. Peter of Birague died, being shot in the thigh. There were slaine within about feuen hundred, almost all Lansquenets. The towne being taken, the Castle yeelded by composition.

But this victorie is crossed with a notable losse. The plague was great at Genoua, and for this reason the towne was almost desolate. Andrew Doria imbraceth this occasion: he approacheth neere the towne with some gallies, enters it with small resistance, ruines the Chasteler speedily, and in the end receiues it by a composition made with Theodore Triumler, being vnfurnished of men and money. The Genouois being restored to their libertie, raze the Chasteler, establish a new forme of gouernment, name a Councell of foure hundred Citizens, by whom all the Officers and dignities of the Cittie should be chosen: they abrogate the law, whereby all Gentlemen were excluded (a good expedient to banish all partialities) they relerue in their important affaires, the preheminence which Andrew Doria had deserued in recompence of the libertie which hee had purchased for them, who (neither meddling with the election of their Duke, nor any other magistrates, neither yet with the gouernement of the treasor) made his authoritie lesse hatefull, and this new policie more pleasing. Afterwards they tooke Sauonne, and the better to hold it in subiection, they ruined the fort, and filled vp the hauen with stones.

The Earle of Saint Paul, relying on the word of some Citizens, who promised to giue him meanes to surprize the Town, parted with speed out of the Duchy of Milan, with three thousand foot and some horse to second them: but hauing no prouision of victuals, but for foure and twenty houres, and no artilerie with them, all turned to smoake, and he retired to Alexandria,

A Alexandria, to winter the rest of his troupes, his Lansquenets being already retired, and the French halfe diminished of their numbers for want of pay. The spring being come, the Earle of Saint Paul goes to field with those small troupes he could gather together: he takes Mortare, a strong towne well flanked and with double ditches full of water: Nouarre abandoned by Conte Philippin Tormiel, Vigeue and almost all other places on this side the riuer of Tefin: yet all this was nothing, seeing the towne and castle of Milan, with other chiefe places were in the Emperours power. The Dukes of Vrbino and Milan aduertised, that the French armie kept the field, came and ioyned with them at Marignan: yet all these armies united were not sufficient to assaile Milan, the Venetians hauing not the moitie of twelue thousand men, which they should entertaine by the articles of the League. Moreover, Anthony de Leua was newly releued with three thousand Spaniards, which came from Naples: They resolute therefore, that (to cut off the victuals from the Imperials) the French should march to Biagras, the Venetians to Cassan, and Sforza to Pavia: but the Earle of Saint Paul did wonderfully affect the enterprize of Genoua. Andrew Doria departed the 8. of Iune with his gallies, to guard the Emperour who passed into Italy. This absence put the Earle in good hope, that Cesar Fregeze (to whom the King had promised the gouernement of Genoua) would make the towne reuolt with some few foote.

This was to take a mightie Wolfe by the eares, which will bite them shrewdly that thinke to lay hold. They had behind them too vigilant an enimie. According to this desseigne, the Earle in stead of Biagras arriues at Landriane, the twentieth of Iune: but in the night a great raine doth so swell the riuer, as he had no meanes to passe his artilerie. Anthony de Leua aduertised of the Earles stay, parts from Milan, ouertakes the Earle (who was busie in pulling downe an old house, to haue some peeces of Timber, to put vnder the carriage of a peece, that was myred) and chargeth him before he had in a manner discovered him. At the first the Earle forceth the Spanish shot to retire into the battalion of their Germaines, and the French Lansquenets had repulsed those that had passed a little riuer, which diuided the two armies: but pursuing and following them to the banke, they were greatly annoyed by them that were opposite on the other side. Guy Earle of Rangon, had in the morning taken the way to Pavia with the foreward, so as he had no notice of the fight, until it was past time to succour them. John Thomas of Galere and the Castellain of Laude, Colonells of Italian foote were already well aduanced: and leauing them engaged that were desirous to fight, they retire on the one side and saue themselves likewise in Pavia. John Ierojme of Castillon and Claude of Rangon, Commanders ouer two thousand Italians, performed wonders. But the Imperial horsemen, hauing passed the riuer with a great battalion of Germaines, our Italians turne their backs, our Lansquenets yeeld to their countermen, the Earle and Annebault with those few horsemen which remained, made the retreat, alwaies turning their faces to the enimie, until they were stayed by a brooke, which the Earle was not able to passe, through the weaknesse of his horse: whereas hee and almost all that followed him were put to the sword, or taken prisoners, except Annebault and some few Lances, which leaped ouer the ditch: the footmen were all defeated, the artilerie lost, and the baggage taken.

After all these stormes and confusions: after so many fatal sweats caused by the waight of their arms: was it not now time to take breath? The Alpes and high-pointed Pyreneé mountaines, bee they not sufficient barres to restraine vs within our bounds, and to be contented to enioy and defend that which belongs vnto vs? was not so much blood spilt sufficient to make all Italy drunke? Such pittifull spectacles of French mens bones, wherewith the plaines of the estates of Milan and Naples were made white, had they not force and vertue to take from vs all future desire to beare armes in such mortall conquests? Without doubt they had reason to make this complaint with the auncient Church: All our enemies haue opened their mouths vpon vs, they haue hissed, gnashed their teeth and said: we haue confounded them, this is the day which we expected: we haue found it, we haue scene it. And with the like repentance to crie. Remember O Lord what hath chanced vnto vs, behold and see their reproches. Turne vs vnto thee O Lord, and we shall be turned. Behold now the pitiful relickes of our Frenchmen, hatefull to strangers, scorned of all the world, beaten on all sides, returning home with their shirts tyed vpon their shoulders, who hauing scarce breathed foure yeares, we shall see

1529. see againe fall to armes. This vnfortunate successe of our men, hauing caused armes to cease in a manner throughout all Italy, the Emperour and Pope both beeing bare of mony, treated of some articles of peace. The Emperour had no inclination thereunto: yet hee could not graunt it in a season more beneficiall for himselfe. The King sought it: two notable afflictions drew him thereunto, the imprisonment of his children, and the ruine of so many armies, with the wasting of his treasor. But one especiall consideration did moue him. If the confederats had discouered his intent, they might haue preuented him, and by their agreement with the Emperour excluded him from a League with any of them: and by consequence haue brought him to that point, as he should haue bene forced to accept far lesse tolerable conditions of peace. Louise the Kings mother, and Marguerite, Aunt vnto the Emperour by the fathers side, did treat it at Cambray, furnished with authoritie and Councell from both their Maiesties, where finally they concluded: "That the king should pay 2. millions of Crownes for the enlargement of his children: that is, 12. hundred thousand crowns, when as the said children should be in France and at libertie: Hee should deliuer the lands which Mary of Luxemburg, mother to the Duke of Vendosme had in Flanders, Arthois, Brabant and Hainault, and those which the Duke of Montpensier, cousin-germaine to the said Duke, did possesse in the said Countries, for 4. hundred thousand crownes to be redeemed within a certaine time: and for the other foure hundred thousand remaining, he should acquite the Emperour off so much to the King of England, which he had lent vnto him, and fiftie thousand more which the Emperour did owe vnto the English, for the indemnitie of the marriage betwixt the Emperour and Mary, daughter to the said King of England, whom he had left, to marrie with the daughter of Portugall. Moreouer, he should vngage the Flower-de-luce of gold, enriched with pretious stones, and a peece of the crosse which Philip the Emperours father had ingaged to the King of Englands father for fiftie thousand Crownes. That the King should renounce the Soueraignie of Flanders and Arthois. That he should marrie with Eleonor the Emperors sister: and if they had a sonne, he should haue the Duchie of Bourgoigne. That he should restore whatsoeuer he possessed in the Duchie of Milan, and the Realme of Naples. That he should disanull the Duke of Bourbons processse, restore him to his honour, and his children to their inheritance, and generally all others that had bene spoiled by reason of the warres. These Articles thus concluded, were read and published in the great Church of Cambray the fift day of August. But could the King renounce such pretensions, seeing they were inheritances purchased to the Infants of France by the succession of Claude their mother, daughter to Lewis the 12. Duke of Orleans, of whom depended the said succession of Milan?

This treatie did greatly moue the confederates, for that they were not acquainted with it, especially the King of England: notwithstanding his secret desseignes made him to temper his choler. He meant to put away Catherine his wife, Aunt to the Emperor, and daughter to Ferdinand King of Spaine, saying, As it was true, that she had bene before married to his eldest brother, wherewith the Pope could not dispence, belonging to the law of God: which conclusion he obtained by the means of the Lord of Langey, in the Vniuersities of Paris, Pavia, Padoua, Bologna and others. The Emperour and his Ministers crost him in this desire. This quarrell had neede of a strong support. To make vse of the Kings fauour at need, he lent him the said summe of foure hundred thousand Crownes, to be payed in foure yeares: he forgaue him fiftie thousand Crownes, and gaue the Flower-de-luce to his god-sonne Henry Duke of Orleans.

The tenth of May was come, when as the Deputies should meete at Bayonne, for the exchange of the Infants of France, with the payment of their ranfome. Monsmorency, Lord Steward and Marshall of France, came for the King; for the Emperour came Velsques Constable of Castille: the Crownes are told and put to the prooffe: but beeing found somewhat altered by the aduice of the Chancellor du Prat, who thought to make it a benefit to the King, forty thousand Crownes more payed the interest of the whole summe. There were about foure moneths spent in the tryall of these Crownes: and in the beginning of Iuly, the Daulphin of Fraunce and the Duke of Orleans came to the riuer which runnes by the walles of Fontarbie, and diuides France from Biscay. A great boate was fastened in the middelt of the streame, with anchors and cables, that the sea which flowes twice a day,

A a day, raising the boate to the height of the water, might serue as a bridge: and ouerthwart this great boate, they made a barre, to the end that the boate which carried the Infants of France, and that which brought the money for their ranfome, beeing fastened on either side the great boate, the Frenchmen should passe into that where the Infants were, and the Spaniards where the ranfome was. Thus it was performed, and they came accompanied with Queene Eleonor, to meete the King: their father betwixt Roquhart of Marfan, and Caprieux, in a little Abbey of Nunnies, where the King and Queene were married an houre before day. Then taking their way by Bourdeaux, Cognar, Amboise and Blois, they came to S. Germane in Lay, attending the preparatiues for the Queenes coronation at S. Denis, and her entrie into Paris.

B The Emperour beeing thus assured of the King, who above all others might troffe his desseignes, he is now resolved to be crowned. To this effect, he must winne the Pope (for he must receiue the Crowne from him:) and the Pope who desired some notable reuenge of the Florentines, for the iniurie they had done him during his captiuitie vnder the Imperials (they had spoiled all the goods belonging to the Medicis, and chased them and their adherents out of the estate of Florence) was easily drawne to the Emperours will; yea with such extraordinarie priuiledges, as the Emperour fitting himselfe to the Popes passions, settled the foundation of that admirable greatnesse, which his house doth at this present ioy in Italy. The Pope hauing granted the Crowne to the Emperour, which he could neuer obtaine of his predecessor Iulius: vpon condition, that for recompence thereof, he should succour him with an armie, to restore them of his name to their auncient authoritie within Florence, he imbarques at Barcellona, lands at Genoua, passeth to Placentia, and at the Popes request, restores Francis Sforza to the Duchie of Milan: but he reserves in his owne power the Castles of Milan and Cremona: he marieth the said Sforza with his neece, daughter to the King of Denmarke, a prisoner, and dispossessed of his realme: and on S. Matthias day (so famous for his natiuitie, and the taking of the King before Pavia) hee receiued the ornaments of the Imperiall dignitie from the Pope.

One scruple with-held the Emperour from resolving against the Florentines. The Turke besieged Vienna in Austria, with two hundred and fife and twentie thousand fighting men: but the valour of Philip Count Palatine, the Earles of Solme and Rokendolf, and the succours brought by Ferdinand Arch-duke of Austria, and King of Hongarie, hauing forced the Infidels to take their way to Constantinople, with shame and losse, the Emperour gaue the charge of this warre to the Prince of Auranges, who ioyning with Don Ferdinand of Gonzagua, and the Marquis of Guast, takes from the Florentines, Cortone, Arezzo, Lastre, Pistoia, Prato, Volterra, Empoli, camps before Florence, and reduceth the Cittizens to extremitie: but as he marched to encounter some forces that came to succour the besieged, meaning to winne the horse, or to loose the saddle: he was slaine in the charge beeing in the head of his troupes, performing (saith the Originall) rather the office of a man at armes, then of a Generall.

E The succours notwithstanding defeated, the Florentines (after a long and painefull siege of eleuen moneths) fell in the end into the Popes power: who by many and sundrie punishments of death and banishment, did so weaken the Cittie, as in the end (the power of the Medicis beeing more free) they haue settled the Soueraignie in their family. The Duke of Ferrara had in time purchased fauour with the Emperour: and happie was he, for without it they would haue clipt his wings shorter. Wherewith the Pope was so greatly mouued, as he would not ratifie the sentence, by the which the Emperour had condemned the Ferrarois in an hundred thousand Crownes to the Pope: neither would he accept the money, nor the rent, which according to the auncient custome, the said Duke caused to be offered vnto him, at the feast of Saint Peter following: and euen then beganne to studie how he might secretly oppresse the Duke by ambushes, or find some matter or occasion to wrong him openly, with the ayde of great Princes. But he did not fore-see, that death would soone cut off the thred of his life, and interre with him the issue of his desseignes. The present estate of things promised in shew a generall peace betwixt these two great Princes, but their minds had other impressions: That of our Francis, with a wonderfull desire to be reuenged for the rigorous conditions of the treatie of Cambray, beeing forced to renounce the 1531. the Soueraignties of Flanders and Arthois, auncient members of the Crowne of France, A and to quit his rights to the estates of Milan and Naples, the which had wonderfully discontented him. That of Charles, who feared lest the King or his successors should draw those Provinces within the bounds of the Realme, and by the recoverie of the Duchie of Milan, molest him continually in the possession of Naples and Sicily. To exclude the King from all hope, the Emperour thought best to restore Sforza to the estate of Milan, that hee might rule him at his will and pleasure: and for a time giue good contentment to the Potentates and Common-weales of Italy, to sequester them from the alliance of France, and make them enter into a defensiu League for the said Sforza: the first motion or occasion, which within few yeares shall transport our armes beyond the mountaines. There were diuers others which toucht as neere. Sauoy lyes upon the way or passage from France to Lombardie: therefore to lay a strong barre before the King, if he should reuiue his auncient quarrels and pretensions, the Emperour sold to Charles Duke of Sauoy, the Countie of Ast with the appertinances, beeing the auncient patrimonie of the house of Orleance, to tye him to his command, and to draw him to this League, as hauing now a priuate interest in the warres of Lombardie. Moreouer, he employed the mediation of the said Duke, to withdraw the Swisses and Grisons from the Kings friendship to his. These were new motives of new troubles, and for one enemy, he had two: they al had priue perswaders, who desirous of new broyles, anchored the hope of their priuate affaires, vpon the generall troubles of Christendome.

A scarre scratched too hard, breakes forth easily: a noble courage wronged, doth with like facilitie feelee an outrage. Here we obserue a publike preiudice done to the Crowne, and a priuate contempt to the Kings person. A notable wrong, cutting off from the Soueraignie two rich neighbour Provinces. A contempt, for that we see Sforza issued from a meane stocke, and the sonne of a bastard, (oftentimes termed by the Emperours owne mouth, a traytor and periured) preferred before the King, brother-in-law to the said Emperour, and his Maiesties children, whom no iust title, but onely force of armes could exclude. Let vs adde hereunto a third sting, sufficient to animate any generous mind: vnder a colour pretended, that they sought to steale the Infants of France secretly out of prison, the Emperour had put most of their Officers into the Gallies: and although hee had beene often summoned by the King, by vertue of the treatie of Cambrai, yet would he neuer enlarge them. Let the iudicious Reader iudge, which of these two did first infringe the Articles of the said Treatie.

But the vlcers of precedent warres, beeing not yet well cured, and the King calling to mind the calamities to come, they dissuaded him from taking armes. It was better to trie a friendly course, and seeke to recover his owne by money, rather then by force. With this desseigne he sends Rabodenges to the Emperour. The Regent and Queene, assist and labour for an interview betwixt the Emperour and King. The Emperour aduertiseth the Pope, and doth assure him, that whatsoever he treats with the King, hee will conclude nothing with him to bring him into ialousie. The Pope dares not rely vpon this promise: he complains of the King, that without his priuities such practises are managed. The King excuseth himselfe, alledging, that they were not so farre forward, as it deserved to be lightly imparted to his holinesse: notwithstanding, he surceaseth the said practises, and the death of Louise the Kings mother and Regent, chancing the 22. of September, did quite dissolue them. There are other matters which shall hereafter import. The Emperour sought to force the Princes and other estates of the Empire, to receiue Ferdinand his brother for King of Romans, making them to allow of the election made of him, to the preiudice of the golden Bull, and contrarie to the ancient orders of the said Empire. A leuaine, which shall cause the ciuill warres, that hereafter shall afflict Germanie. Moreouer, these Princes pretended, that the Emperour failed in the performance of many things promised by him, touching the rights, priuiledges, and liberties of the Empire. So as John, Elector and Duke of Saxonie, John Frederick his sonne, William and Lewis Dukes of Bauaria, Philip Landgrave of Hessen, with many other Princes, make a generall league, for the fore-said causes. And now seeing the King discontented, that the Emperour had newly discovered vnto the Pope the treatie of their interview, mediated by the Ladies, and that the King had many and lawfull occasions to 1532. A to giue care to the perswasions which were made often vnto him, that the Emperour did but seeke to lull him asleepe, while that he did fortifie himselfe with men, money, and alliances: they intreate the King to enter into their association, by vertue of an auncient league obserued long before betwixt the Empire and the Crowne of France: they send him an authentically copie of their treatie, that he might know their intention was not to make any inuasion, but for the defence of the Empire, the which they did foresee, that Charles the fifth did seeke to subuert; and to make it hereditarie to his house, to the great preiudice of the neighbour Princes greatly troubled with the Emperours exceeding ambition, and iniurious outrages.

The King to giue two strokes with one stone, imparts this matter to the King of England B his perpetuall Allie: asketh his aduice and counsell, how they two together might enter into this league without breach of the treaties they had with the Emperour: and in the end, by Pommery his Ambassador, he doth capitulate: "That the King of England beeing assailed by the Emperour, he should succour him with twelue shippes well appointed and victualled, with fife hundred men at armes, French, and three thousand foote. And in like case, if the King were inuaded within his Realme, the King of England was bound to furnish him the like proportion of shipping, and with fixe thousand English men, both the one and the other to be entertained at his charge that was assailed. That either of them beeing assailed, should stay all Marchants, that were subiect to him that did assaile, that should bee found within the territories of their obedience, & deliuer them to him that was assailed, to redeeme such as had beene seized on by the aggressor, in the beginning of the war. That neither the one nor the other Prince, should hereafter treat or make alliance with any other Prince, Potentate, or Commonaltie without the consent and association of either of them."

And they treated likewise of the meanes how they might best vndertake to resist the Turk (if he did persist to inuade Christendome:) whereupon their Maiesties concluded an interview at Bologne: the 28. of October they made a new treatie: That to giue more perfect proofe of their zeale and desire to enlarge Christendome, and to summon other Princes by their example, considering that the Turke, notwithstanding his retreat, had left a good part of his forces in Hongarie, they should assemble together by their ioynt forces, an armie of fourescore thousand men, whereof there should be ten thousand horse with artillerie requisite for the said Campe. And besides this treatie, these two Kings had many causes of discontent: Our King found himselfe grievously wronged, for that the Pope and the Emperour with their partisans, had newly made a League for the defence of Italy, whereof they had declared Anthony de Lena to be Generall. The King of England had no lesse cause to complaine of the wrong, hee said the Court of Rome did him, touching the matter of his diuorce, seeking to force him, either to goe in person to Rome, or to send, with expresse deputation, men of great account that should stand to the Popes Iudgement.

An insolent proceeding in like cases, chanced among soueraigne Princes: seeing that such a businesse of that importance, and touching the conscience so neere, did will deserue, that according to the vsuall custome; they should send Iudges to the place: it beeing reasonable, that the persons should speake personally, and not by their Attorneys: and very vnreasonable, that a Soueraigne Prince, leauing the rule and gouernement of his estates, should go and plead his cause at Rome. Moreouer, he did complaine vnto the King, of the exactions of the Romane Church, vpon the Clergie and people of England, and did instantly require, that they two should send their Ambassadors ioyntly together to the Pope, to summon him to appeare at the next Council to heare of the extorsions he did vnto Princes and Christian people.

The King proponed like abuses. The Pope had dissembled with him touching certaine tithes which hee had graunted him to leaue vpon the Cleargie: and the French Church complained of him, of the vndutifull and new exactions, which vnder colour of pietie they made at Rome for the expedition of Bulls, by meanes whereof all the treasor was daily carried out of his Realme, to the preiudice of the Clergie, which grew poore: the Churches were not restored; nor the poore clothed nor fedde: their yearely rents were excessive, no equalitie in them; many Officers newly created, which were payed vpon the dispatch and expedition of Bulles, ouer and aboue the iust price which they were wont 1533. in former time to pay: the Offices which fell void, were sold to the great benefit and profit of Saint Peter, enterpayning many groomes, Chamberlaines, Protonotaries, their seruants, Gardiners and others: and for the repairing of Saint Peters Church, a great summe of money was leauied, the which they did afterwards imploy, to make warre against the King. Yet the King would neither wholly allow, nor dis-allow of the King of Englands complaints: but for that the Pope had feat him a promise, by the Cardinall of Grandmont, of an interview at Nice, or Auignon, after the Emperours returne into Spaine, he requested the King of England to attend the issue of their parle. These griefes of the French Church had bene presented vnto the King in the assembly of the Estates of the Countrie and Duchie of Brittain, with many other things, farre from that charitie which ought to be in the Church. In the said Estates it was concluded: That Francis the Kings eldest sonne, Dauphin of Viennois, should be acknowledged Duke of Brittain: That the eldest sonne of France should hereafter carry the titles of Dauphin of Viennois, and Duke of Brittain: and the said Duchie should for euer be incorporate to the Crowne. So the treatie made by the mariage betwixt K. Charles the 8. and Anne Duchesse of Brittain, and others following, were dis-annulled in regard of the said Duchie. As these things passed in England, William of Bellay, Lord of Langey, promised the Germaine Princes in the Kings name, That for the affection he bare to the preservation of the priuiledges, rights, and customes of the Empire: if the Emperour (with whome hee desired to obserue inuiolably the alliances and treaties he had with him) would in that case employ his forces to their oppression, he would succour them with all his power: so as neither his men nor money should not be employed to the offence of any of his confederates, namely, of the Emperour, but onely to defend the rights and priuiledges of the Empire. A great desseigne is alwayes shadowed with goodly shewes. Hereupon the Emperour came to Bolonia, to conferre againe with the Pope. The Kings of France and England, well informed of the Emperours bad disposition, and especially the English, of the Popes to him, by reason of his pretended diuorce: they sent the Cardinals of Tournon and Grandmont, the Popes seruants, that vnder color to accompanie him at this interview, they might imploy their authorities, that nothing might be done to the preiudice of their Maiesties: or at the least they should giue intelligence of their conclusions. And the said Cardinals had commission to lay open vnto the Pope, the griefes and complaints of the two Kings, and to summon him to make reparation: if not, they would take order for it. So as his Holinesse might well perceiue, that they two together were not to bee contemned: and to wish him to consider wisely, of the support and profit he might draw from these two Kings, and what disgrace otherwise in discontenting them, especially the King of England, whose cause the King did no lesse affect then his owne. For (said these two Princes) if we come to demand a generall Councell, and his Holinesse doth not grant it, or delays it, we shall take his delay for a denyall; and calling it without him, we will easily iustifie the fact with other Princes, who producing the like or greater complaints, would in the end forbid their subiects to send or carrie any money to Rome. If his Holinesse (for so did our Francis protest) will proceed by censures against me and my Realme, and that I be forced to go to Rome for an absolution, I will passe the Alpes so well accompanied, as his Holinesse shall be glad to grant it me. The scandals of Rome haue already withdrawne most part of Germany and the Cantons from the obedience of the Romaine Church. It is to be feared, that if these two mighty Kings seuer themselves for want of iustice, they shall find many adherents, and these two, together with their open and secret allies, may make such an attempt, as it will be hard to resist. That if his Holinesse be disposed to moderate things (especially towards the King of England) there is hope, that at the first interview, all may be ordered by mildnesse, before they should proceed to greater bitternesse, by a generall summons from both the Kings.

Thus the King spake vnto those Cardinals whom he sent to Rome. But we haue elsewhere obserued, that men of the Church do commonly preferre the Popes respect, before the seruice of such as employ them. These men flea the Ecce by the tayle, and in steade of following their instructions from point to point, beginning with rigour, and ending with mildnesse, they take a contrarie course. They feared (sayd they in their iustification) that his Holines holding the wolfe by the eares, pressed on the one side, sometimes with promises, sometimes with threats by the Emperour: and on the other side, in a maner despairing euer to find

The Duchie of Brittain incorporate to the Crowne.

The Kings of France and England complained of the Pope.

A find grace or fauour with the King, should in the end cast himselfe into the Emperours armes, and runne the same fortune with him. To draw him therefore to the French partie, they offer the Pope in the Kings name: To make him Iudge and Arbitrator, of such controversies and quarrels, as he had with the Genouois, the which his Maiestie pretended were not contained in his renunciation. And the better to draw him, they renewed (without any speciall commission) the proposition first made by Pope Leo, and after reuiued by Clement, of the marriage of Henry Duke of Orleans, with Katherine daughter to the Duke of Vrbino. This did greatly please Clement, who then began to hold vp his head, and resolved to strike whilst the yron was hote. This match was wonderfull honourable and beneficiall for his Holinesse, and helped much for the ratifying and support of his house, the which hee had in singular regard.

The Emperour did presently discouer, that vpon the coming of these Cardinals, the Popes affection to him was greatly altered. And vpon the first discouerie of this treatie of mariage, he employes the Lords of Cannes and Granuelle, to break it in fauor of Francis Sforza, with the said Duchesse of Vrbino, and to perswade the Pope that this practise was artificially brought in by the King, to entertaine him onely, but not with any intent to conclude it, considering the great disparitie of their degrees and qualities: and seeing these two Cardinals (said hee) had no sufficient authoritie touching this alliance, it was an euident proofe of the fraude. But by meanes of this marriage, the King thought to strengthen his house, and to get new footing in Italy: and the Pope did thereby free himselfe from the feare of a Councell, wherewith he was threatened from France, Germany, and England. While the Cardinals attend a Commission from his Maiestie, to conclude this marriage, the Emperour continued his pursuite, for the assurance and declaration of his league, comprehending the estate of Genoua. And the better to vnite it, he required his confederates, to make a taxe among them, for the pay of such Souldiers as should be fit to entertaine in Italy for the peace and quiet thereof: that the first payment should be presently consigned into the hands of a Banker of Genoua, and that the Emperour should not bee tyed to any contribution, in regard of his great charge to resist the Turkes inuasion, and to preuent the attempts of such as would trouble the common quiet of Italy, whereof there was now great

D likelihood. By the force of his perswasions, the matter was in a manner concluded. But through the liuely reasons of the French Cardinals, and the Lord of Velly, Ambassador for the King, shewing, That the Emperour had no other desseigne, but to entertaine his armie vpon the frontiers of Italy, at other mens charges, beeing readie to assayle the King vpon all occasions, without any charge to himselfe: and that without doubt the King (hauing reason to looke to his affaires,) would encounter him with another armie on the frontiers of Italy, in the Marquisate of Salusse or in Dauphiné, which would breed no quiet, but troubles and combustions throughout all Italy (for two armies beeing neere, they willingly fall to blowes) they concluded, not to make any consignment, but that euery one of the confederates, should taxe himselfe for his portion (any warre chancing in Italy) and should giue a caution for his part, the which did amount to an hundred or sixe-score thousand Crownes a moneth. So the Emperour sent three thousand men out of his armie into Spaine, as many likewise to Naples, and the rest he dismissed.

Then came authoritie from the King to the Cardinals and his Ambassadour, with an expresse clause for the confirmation of the marriage. And the Emperour seeing himselfe frustrate of his intent (to make the Pope declare himselfe openly against the King,) he embarked the 8. of Aprill at Genoua, and sayled towards Spain: the Pope went towards Rome, whether the aboue-named Cardinals did accompanie him, alwaies insisting by the Kings importunity, that the troubles of England might be pacified, before the fall of that great storme which threatned the Church.

F But the King of England wearied with the Popes dissembling & delaies (whome he then called but Bishop of Rome) vpon the matter of his diuorce, he caused it to be decided by the English Church. The Archb. of Canterbury, Primate of England, being President: where, by sentence of the said Church, his mariage was declared void, & the dispensatio void, as giuen in a case that was not dispensable, and which is not in the Popes power, nor in the churches: according to this sentence, he left his first mariage, and took to wife Anne Bullen, and in her name did publish an ample Treatie, against the authoritie and preheminences of the Church of Rome, resolute to sequester himselfe wholly, if the Court of Rome did him not iustice. These newes beeing published, the Emperour growes in choler, threatens to raise all the world against England: takes his Aunts cause in hand, summons the Pope to admit the like iustice to her that was put away, as her cause required: if he doth it not, he protests with an oath to be reuenged. The Colledge of Cardinals stormes, they enuiour the Pope, and all with one voyce demand iustice against the attempts of the King of England, and the Arch-bishops, hauing taken knowledge of a cause, the deciding whereof belonged to Iudges deputed by his Holinesse: His Holinesse desired to temporize, and to make a more quiet end. He did foresee, that proceeding to condemnation, and hauing no meanes to execute it really, were a fruitlesse enterprise, and would make his Apostolick authoritie contemptible, hauing no meanes to put it in execution without the Emperours assistance: besides, they had a great let, which was the strict alliance of the most Christian King with the English, who ioyning their mutuall forces, offensiue and defensiue, might ingage all Christendome in more mortall warres then euer. Notwithstanding, in the end (as well to gratifie the Emperour as his Cardinals) hee pronounced his censures against the King of England, if within a certaine time he made not reparation of the said attempts. Then hee prepared for his interview with the King, notwithstanding all the crosses which the Imperials gaue him, transforming themselves into as many shapes as Proteus, to draw him from this resolution: all which are to be read in the Originals.

Nice had beene appointed for this effect: the Duke of Sauoy had freely offered it at the Popes request, holding himselfe happie (said he) that so holy a worke should be treated of in his countrie. And in truth it was his best course. The Pope did affect this place, that hee might by this meanes reconcile the Duke vnto the King, who for many respects (as we shal note hereafter) was discontented with him. But the Emperour forgetting nothing which he thought might serue to breake off this interview, gaue him such goodly reasons, as afterwards he let men vnderstand, that this assembly was nothing pleasing vnto him. Marseilles supplied the defect of Nice. Patience beeing moued (saith the Prouerbe) turnes into furie. If the King to this time had many motiues of discontent, now is he prickt to the quicke, which will soone draw him to reuenge. The vniust death of the Seigneur of Marueilles, who was a Gentleman of Milanois, bred vp in Court, since King Lewis the 12. one of the Quiries, and now Ambassadour for the King with Sforza Duke of Milan, yet secretly, hauing besides his instructions and letters of credit, a priuate letter directed to the Duke, in recommendation of some businesse for the said Marueilles: to the end, that if the Emperor should grow iealous of the Duke, he might by meanes of the said letters, iustifie his being there, not in qualitie of an Ambassadour, but onely for his owne priuate affaires. It chanced the first of Iuly, that Marueilles accompanying the Duke through the cittie, a Gentleman Milanois of the house of Castiglion, (hauing either by chaunce, or of purpose pickt a quarrell) demanded of one of Marueilles seruants, to whom he belonged: he answered, I serue the Lord of Marueilles of France, who is there? Nay (replied Castiglion) Marueilles of the galowes: which was a very ignominious word. Another following his Lord, takes hold of this speech, and in the end, reprocheth the Milanois, as hauing spoken ill against such a personage: the Milanois denies it: the lye is giuen on either side, and the French-man offers to maintaine it with his sword. Castiglion happily disdainig a man of baser qualitie then himselfe retires, two of his seruants draw their swords, but they are parted. Afterwards Castiglion gathers together ten or twelue Rustians, with Harguebuzes and Pertuisans: he passeth and repasseth often before Marueilles lodging: one euening he meetes fife or sixe of his seruants, offers them violence, but they retire: Marueilles complained to the Capitaine of the Iustice, and intreates him to take order, beeing loth to seeke reuenge of their wrongs, or that they should continue to wrong them.

The Capitaine makes no account thereof. Castiglion continues his course, and sets againe vpon Marueilles seruants: but the first feare had made them wise, they defend themselves, kill him, and put his followers to flight. The next day being the 4. of Iuly, the Capitaine goes in the morning, to take an Inuentorie of Marueilles goods, puts him into prison, and all his seruants he could find: giues the strapado to one about fourscore yeares old, being deafe

A for very age, to wrest some confession from him against his matter: he suffers not any of his friends to speake with him, or to see him: teares in peeces, disdaining to read the iustifications (which according to the custome of Milan some of his friends had presented him in writing:) and the Sunday following, after midnight, first informed of the Dukes pleasure, he cuts off his head in prison, and causeth his bodie to be cast vpon the marchants meeting-place. A horrible and insolent proceeding against so notable a person, beeing publike, sacred and inuolable! If it shall be lawfull so to violate the law of nations, what safetie shall Ambassadors find with them to whom they are sent?

The King demands satisfaction of this wrong of the Duke: he writes to the Emperour, and to all Princes and Potentates of Christendome; as hauing all a priuate interest in this publike iniurie. The Duke excuseth himselfe by Francis Tauerne his Chancellor, Nephew to the said Marueilles, who alledgeth, that the Duke his master did neuer acknowledge Marueilles to haue the place, nor to hold the ranke of an Ambassador: but as a priuate man, his vassall and subiect, he had suffered iustice to be done, for the murder committed on the person of one of the ordinarie Gentlemen of his house. That Marueilles was a man of a vicious conuersation, seditious, scandalous, a concealer of murderers and conspirators against the life of the Duke his master, who for these causes had often let him vnderstand that his stay at Milan was not pleasing vnto him.

An vnkinde Nephew (he was sonne to Marueilles sister) and a bad Aduocate in a badde cause. Had not Sforza belyed himselfe in a letter of his owne, dated the seuenth of December 1532. whereof the King had the Originall, where he did giue him to vnderstand, that his coming from the most Christian King, (to whom he was, and desired to be a most humble seruant) was very pleasing vnto him, and that for many respects, he should alwaies haue bene welcome to Milan? And could Tauerne be ignorant of Marueilles qualitie, seeing that he himselfe had procured this charge for his Vncle, beeing at Fontainebleau, and propounded this meanes of priuate recommendation to the Duke, to serue as a shadow against the Emperours iealousies? Moreouer, he knew his Vncle had letters of credit to the Duke, and his instructions signed with the Kings hand. But the hastie proceeding from Friday to Sunday following, the execution done by night and without the peoples priuie (who perchance would tumultuously haue opposed, fearing to incurre the reuenge, which without doubt the King would take) do they not plainly discouer, that the fact was not excusable, nor to be iustified?

The Emperour made answer to the Ambassador de Velly, that Marueilles had well deserved death, not beeing acknowledged for an Ambassador, but for a priuate Gentleman, subiect to the Duke, and following his owne priuate affaires, beeing nothing moued, when as Velly presented him the Dukes letters vnto the King for his allowance: whereby it appeared what place Marueilles held with the Duke. Thus seeing himselfe more assured of Sforza, he sent into Flanders for his Neece, the youngest daughter of Christierne King of Denmarke, according to the promise which had beene made him at Placentia. About this time the Pope made his entrie at Marseilles in great pompe, set vpon a young Ass: he was carried in a high chaire vpon two mens shoulders, followed by his Cardinals, and the Duchesse of Vrbin apart, accompanied with a great number of Ladies and Gentlemen. There was nothing readie for a Councell, which the Princes of Germanie did sollicite with great vehemencie: neither was there any intent of reformation. But expecting the oportunitie of this generall conuocation, a Bull was sent forth to stay the course of religion, which passing from Germanie into Suifferland, and from thence into France, did greatly multiply. Then the marriage betwixt the Duke of Orleans, and Katherine de Medicis Duchesse of Vrbin, was consummated by Clement the 7. her Vncle: who in the end of their parle, at the Kings request, created foure Cardinals, the Cardinall of Veneur, Bishop of Liseux, and chiefe Alimner to the King, one of those three notable houses, Chastillon, Chambre, and Giury. This done, the Pope embarked for Rome the 20. of Nouember, and the King tooke his way to Auignon. Here the King resolved in his priuie Councell vpon a request made vnto him, as well by Christopher, son to the Duke of Wirtemberg, both in his owne name, and his fathers, spoiled of their estates seuentene yeares since, by the Emperour Charles, and Ferdinand his brother: as also by Lewis and William Dukes of Bauaria his Vncles. The mother of 1533. Christopher, was daughter of a sister to Maximilian, Grand-father to the said Emperour, and King of Romaines, and the consummation of the marriage of Eleonor their sister with his Maiestie, gaue the father and the sonne hope, that the King in fauour of this alliance, interposing his authoritie for them that were spoiled, should either procure restitution of Ferdinand for these Dukes, or refusing Iustice, to purchase him the hatred of all Germany, which in the end might by open force dispossesse him of the Duchie of Wirtemberg, and of the name of King of Romaines. The King did greatly desire to see these Dukes restored to their estates, and to that end would willingly haue opened his purse, to weaken the Emperours and his brothers forces, and by the same meanes, to confirme the amities which he had purchased in Germanie, and to procure new, requiting the Emperour, who sought by all meanes to take from the King his ancient alliances. But he sought to colour the protection of these afflicted Princes in such sort, as no man might iustly challenge him to haue broken the treatie of Cambray. He therefore sent the Lord of Langey, with commission to do for these Dukes whatsoever were in his power, not directly contradicting the conuentions: and to conclude, the consignation of an hundred thousand Crownes, into the hands of the Dukes of Bauaria, with a sufficient bond to his Maiestie: reseruing notwithstanding this clause, That his money should not be employed to the inuasion of any one, but onely for the defence of the ancient customes and priuiledges of the Empire. The publike and priuate perswasions of Langey, were of such efficacie, as that ancient and great League of Sueue (which had continued three-score and ten yeares, to the benefit of the house of Austria) was dissolved. But for that the re-intigration of these Dukes, could not be made but by armes, they couered it with this expedient. That the Duke of Wirtemberg should sell the Countie of Montbeliard (whereof he was Lord) vnto the King, for sixe-score thousand Crownes, upon condition that he might redeeme it: which money he might employ to his use, either in peace or war, without any breach on the Kings part, to the articles of Cambray. So the Landgrame of Hessen, chief of this present League, and the Dukes of Bauaria and Wirtemberg, with their allies, went suddenly to field with an armie, before the Emperour or his brother could crosse their attempts, restoring them that were spoiled, to the possession of their Duchie: and soone after they repaid the Kings money, within thirty or forty thousand Crownes, for the which the Dukes of Bauaria were answerable: and the Countie of Montbeliard was restored vnto the. Let vs now see what Catastrophe the Popes rash censure, given against Henry King of England, shall cause. Henry was wonderfully incensed against the Apostolicke See, by reason of the iniustice (he said) was done him; in that they had refused to send him Commissioners to take knowledge of his cause, and of the contempt done to his authoritie, in that they would disdainfully force him to abandon his Realm, and appeare personally at Rome. Notwithstanding, by the perswasions of John du Bellay, Bishop of Paris, (whom the King had sent vnto him, presently after his interview with the Pope) hee granted, that in case the Pope would surcease from the said sentence, vntill he had sent Iudges to be heard, that he would likewise surcease from his intention, to withdraw himselfe wholly from the obedience of Rome. The Bishop offers himselfe to go to Rome to that end. Henry intreats him, and assures him, that hauing obtained his demand, he will giue him authority presently, to confirme what he had yeilded vnto. The matter was not yet desperate, but the Consistorie of Rome gaue so short a time to haue an answer from the King of England, as the Poste came short two dayes at his returne. The terme expired, they proceed hastily to the confirmation of the curses and censures, notwithstanding the Bishops instance, to obtaine sixe dayes delay, seeing the King of England had wauered sixe yeares before he fell. Two dayes were scarce past, after the prefixed time, but the Poste arriuing with authority and declarations fro England, the which did greatly amaze those hastic Cardinals, who afterwards could find no meanes to amend that which they had marred. The matter (saith the Original) was so hastied, as that which could not be finished in three Consistories, was done in one. This indignitie done to the King of England, and the small respect they had to his Maiestie, caused both him and his Realme to shake off the yoke of the Romane obedience, declaring himselfe immediately vnder God, supreme head of the Church of England.

In the mean time, the King not able to get by Iustice, a reparation of the vnworthy death of his Ambassadour at Milan, hee studied to haue his reuenge by armes. To this end following Estate of England.

A following the example of the Romans, hee erected in euery Prouince of his realme, a Legion of sixe thousand foote, vnder the command of sixe Gentlemen, who for euery thousand should haue two Lieutenants, and vnder euery ensigne five hundred men, who in time of peace, should once a yeere make a generall muster, and the captaines should know their names and surnames, with the dwellings of euery one, to haue them ready at all commands. Then hee sent William Earle of Furstemberg, into Germany, to make a leaue of twenty ensignes of Landsquenets, and demanded passage of the duke of Sauoy, through his countie, to be reuenged of the wrong done him by the duke of Milan. The Sauoisien refused it, which caused our Francis to demand the portion of Louyse of Sauoy his mother, sister to the said duke, children to Philip duke of Sauoy. Philip had to his first wife a daughter of Bourbon, by whom he had Philibert duke of Sauoy, and Louyse the Kings mother. Then hee had to his second wife, a daughter of Ponthieure, by whom hee had Charles, who is now in question, and the Earle Geneua, afterwards duke of Nemours. Philibert was dead without children, and therefore the King challenged a good portion in the succession of Sauoy, his mother comming of the first marriage, and sole heire to the sayd Philibert. But the Kings deputies not able to draw any reason from Charles, vnto his Maiestie, hee must seeke that by force, which hee could not get by a friendly and gentle composition.

New moethes of warre in Sauoy.

The Kings first stratagem, was to bring a part of Renee de Ceres company into Geneua, to succour them against Charles, who besieged it. The second was to stirre vp to the Bernois, allies and neighbours to Geneua, who taking the towne into their protection, went to field with ten or twelue thousand men; made the duke retire, spoiled him of a good part of the lands that were vnder his obedience, chased away the bishop of Lanzauna, and ioyning it to their iurisdiction, they remaine still in possession thereof. The Emperour returned then from his victory of Tunis against Barbarossa, and seeming desirous to make a more stricter league with the King, hee offered him a pension of a hundred thousand crownes a yeere, out of the Duchie of Milan, for any one of his children, whom hee should name: hee treated the marriages of the Daulphin with the Infant of Portugall, daughter to Queene Eleonor, and of the duke of Angoulesme, with such a one as the King should well like of (it seemed that hee ment the Infant of Spaine) to the end that by these new bonds (sayd hee) in the honour and profit of the mightie conquests, which they should make vpon Greece.

All this was but cunning. The Emperour was tired, and his forces were wasted by the toiles of warre, and the great heat they had endured. And the King beeing readie with a fresh and mighty armie, threatned the Duchies of Sauoy and Milan: hee must therefore busie him with some baite, and at the least stay the exploits of his forces. The death of Francis Sforza, presents a new occasion. By this death the Emperour pretends to bee freed of that bond, and that hee might dispose of this Duchy at his pleasure. The captaines promise to hold their places of the Emperour. The Emperour giues hope, not onely to dispose of the sayd Duchie to the Kings liking, but also to conclude of a generall warre, against the Turke: in the which hee offered to impart with the King, the good or euill that should growe thereby, and of the faith and reunion of the Church, namely for the reducing of Germanie and England, to the generall beleefe of Christians, and of a generall peacetime. In the meane time hee prepared for warre, hee caused Cont Nassau to make a great leauey in Germany, and called backe Ferdinand Gonzagua into Italy, with his Spaniards which remained in Sicilia.

The Emperors disunion.

The death of Francis Sforza.

Thus all the negotiations and practises of these two great Princes, gaue sufficient signes of open warre: there wanted nothing but a iust occasion for either of them to blame his companion, and to lay vpon him the causes of the first inuasion. The Emperour required moreouer, that for the quiet of Italy, the King should desist from the action of Geneua. That excluding the duke of Orleans, from the estate and Duchie of Milan (the which the King demanded for his second sonne, according to the treaty made with the Pope at Marseilles) the duke of Angoulesme, for that hee was farthest from the crowne, should be inuested.

That the King should send him the sayd duke of Orleance, to assist him at the conquest of A Alger which hee pretended. The King desired greatly to maintaine true friendship with him, and to vnite it by as strong alliances as the Emperour offered, that the greatnesse of the one might not breed any ieaousie in the other. As for the action of Genoua, he was content to surcease that controuersie, vntill it might be decided by good and lawfull meanes, to renounce for euer his pretensions to Naples, and to cause the said duke of Orleance to yeeld vp his quarrell to Florence and Vrbino, with such security as the Emperour should require: so as his second sonne might be inuested in Miland. He promised the Pope (which was Alexan- der Farnese, vnder the name of Paul the third successor of Clement the seuenth) summoning all Princes to that end, to employ his forces, to make Germany and England obey the sentence and decree of the Church, and to employ himselfe in fauour of the said Emperour, to the States and Princes of the Empire, that they should ioynly receiue his brother Ferdin- and, for the true and lawful King of Romans. He offered to succor the Emperour in his holy warre with a certaine number of gallies, and men entertained, promising to accompany him the yeere following, in the voiage of Constantinople, with all his forces.

But to exclude the duke of Orleance from the inheritance of his Ancestors, which his eldest brother did willingly yeeld vnto him, in fauour of his marriage, to install his youngest sonne, was it not to sow dissention and cause warre, betwixt them whom he desired to breed vp in peace and brotherly loue? And to what end did the Emperour demand the duke of Or-leance, but rather to hold him in manner of an hostage, then to make any shew of loue or trust? On the other side, to giue hope, that hee would compound with the King touching Milan, and to vrge this claime vehemently, that all should bee managed without the Popes priuity, who no doubt would seeke all meanes to crosse it (said the Emperour) if hee should vnderstand they had treated without imparting it vnto him, and notwithstanding to giue intelligence to the Court of Rome, by Andrew Doria, and to assure him; that although hee gaue care to the Kings ministers, yet would hee not conclude any thing without the aduise and consent of his Holinesse: was not this a corrupt proceeding, seeking to breed a ieaousie and distrust betwixt the Pope and his Maiesty?

The King (weariend with these long dissimulations and delaies, without effect) sent the Lord of Beauuais vnto Venice, to make a new league with the Senate, and the King of England sent the bishop of Winchester to the same effect. The Emperour had some intelligence thereof, and to crosse the Kings desires, hee sent Du Prat, a Gentleman of his house, to make a new league of Lansquenets, and Andrew Doria to Genoua, to prepare his army by sea, but vnder colour of his enterprize of Alger. Who would not then iudge, but in steed of a confirmation of peace and loue, all things tended to open warre? Nothing could detain these inuincible warriors, but that the Emperour, after so great a dissipation of his forces, could not so sodenly repaire his armie, and the King making a scruple to bee the first assailant, would not incur the blame, to haue broken the treaty of Cambray. But without breach thereof, many motives of discontent, had long incensed him against the duke of Bourbon. The Jewels which the duke had engaged, to borrow money for the duke of Bourbon, and to fauour his rebellion against the King, the letters of congratulation hee had written for his taking at Paulia, his purpose to withdraw the Swisses from the alliance of France, the purchase of the county of Ast, his refusall to lend Nice, for the enteruiew of Pope Cle- ment and his Maiesty, and to giue him passage against Sforza, the detention of his Mothers inheritance, which the King could not by any gentle meanes drawe his Vncle to restore.

This must be tried by the sword. The King therefore sent Francis of Bourbon, Earl of Saint Paul, who before the duke could oppose his forces, conquered all Sauoy, except Montmelian, where Francis of Charamont a Neapolitane commanded, who wanting victuals, and without hope of succors, in the end yeelded vp the place, to depart with baggage, and afterwards condemned by the duke, he followed the victors fortune, and in the end did good seruice to the crowne. Then the Emperour granted (by the Lord of Cannes and Granuelle) the Duchy of Milan to the duke of Orleance. But when the security and conditions of his instalment came to be demand, they made answer to the Ambassador de Velly, that it was sufficient for that time to haue granted the principall, the rest should bee treated of with Philip Chabot

A Chabot Earle of Busançois, Admirall of France, who should presently arriue (they supposed he should first make a voiage without any forces) and that they must keepe this conclusion secret from the knowledge of his Holinesse. All this discouered plainly, that it was a tricke of their ordinary craft and dissembling, to lull the King a sleepe in the beginning of his course.

At the same instant, the King hath newes sufficient to giue him a certaine impression of the Emperours designs, that the Pope had bene duely aduertised by the Emperours ministers, of all these practises, which he would haue secretly managed: that the Venetians, at the vrgent request of the Emperour, were entred into a defensive league for the Duchy of Milan, in fauour of any one he should inuest: that he offered great matters to the King of England, to draw him to his deuotion: that Du Prat passing by Milan, had deliuered speeches quite contrary to the hopes and promises which the Emperour had giuen: and that in Flanders he had made great preparation for warre. That the Emperour tooke vpon him the protection of the duke of Sauoy. And for the sixth point, the preparations made by Andrew Doria. It was therefore resolved, to proceed in Sauoy and farther, without breaking off (on his part) this negotiation with the Emperour.

To this end, the King sent (for his Lieutenant generall) the Earle of Busançois Admirall of France, with eight hundred Launces: whereof the seuerall cptaines were James Galiat, maister of the horse, and maister of the Ordinance of France: Robert Steward Marshall of France, René of Montican, Francis Marquisse of Salusses, Claude of Annebault, Anthony Lord of Montepesat, John of Estouteuille Lord of Villebon Prouost of Paris, Gabriel d'Ale- gre, Charles Tiercelin Lord of Roche du Maine, and John Paul de Cere. A thousand light horse, vnder the command of the Lords of Esse, Terme, Auffun and Verets of Sauoy.
Twelve thousand of his Legionary men, that is two thousand Picards, commanded by Mi- chel of Brabagcon Lord of Cany, and Anthony of Mailly Lord of Auchy. Two thousand Normans, vnder their captaines La Sale, and Saint Aubin the Hermit. Two thousand Champanois, lead by John d'Anglure Lord of Iour, and by the Lord of Quinsy. A thousand of Languedoc, vnder the Knight d'Ambres. Foure thousand out of Daulphiné, vnder the Lord of Bresieux, and others. And a thousand vnder the Lord of Forges, the Kings ordinary Cup-bearer, of al which bands René of Montican was Colonel: six thousand Lanfquenets, lead by William Earle of Furtemberg: two thousand French, nor Legionaries, lead by their captaines Lartigue-Dieu, Blanche Anguer and Wartis a Nauarrois. Two thousand Italians, vnder the command of Marc Anthonie of Cusan, a Gentleman Milanois, and a thousand vnder captaine Christopher Guaco, eight hundred Pioners, six hundred and fourescore horse for Artillery, and the charge thereof appointed to be vnder the gouernment of Claude of Coucis Lord of Bury.

Count Philip Torniel, and John Iaques of Medicis Marquis of Marignan, marched before, to stop the passage of Suze, but Annebault aduancing with the troupes of Daulphiné, pre-uented them with speed, chased them before him, from lodging to lodging, and at the first E summons, puts into the Kings hands the townes of Turin and Chiuas. Don Laurence Ema- nuel John Iaques de Medicis, and John Baptista Castaldo, camped vpon the riuier of Doaire. The French and Lansquenets, impatient to attend the making of a bridge, wade through the water cuen vnto the breasts, repulse the Imperials, and make them retire towards Vercell. A gallant Legionary (to whom the History ought this name) swimming through the riuier, brought away a boate in despite of the enemies shot, for the building of a bridge. The Admiral, to encourage the rest according to the Kings command, caused a gold-ring to bee gi-uen him, in view of the whole army.

The Emperour was vpon termes of his departure from Naples, to make his entry into Rome, when as these happy beginnings made him to renew the treaties of an accord: but F with such slow proceeding, as a man might easie iudge, that his onely intent was, to stay the King in his course, labouring to entertaine him with doubts, hopes, and delaies. In the meane time, hee sollicites the Pope to declare himselfe on his partie, hee assured the duke of Sauoy, to cause all he had lost to bee soone restored to him againe, he hastened the leauy of his Lansquenets, causeth his horsemen to aduance, drawes Artillery and Munition out of Imperiall townes, makes them to march towards Italy, protests againe to the Pope, that hee would would neuer yeeld Milan to the King, nor suffer him to possesse one foote of land in Italy, A he solicited the Court of Rome, the Senate of Venice, and all other Potentates of Italy, to oppose against the inuesting of any stranger in the Duchy of Milan. These were vehement presumptions, to shew, that the Emperour meant not to treat but armed, which caused the King to command his Admirall to proceed in his first course, (hee had temporised by his Maiesties commandment, attending the issue of this new parle) and to march against Verceil: and if hee encountered his enemies with equality, to fight with them. There were three thousand men, to defend Verceil, and foure miles aboue, Anthony de Leua camped with about sixe hundred horse, and twelue thousand foote, not as Lieutenant to the Emperour, but as capitaine generall for the league of Italy, cutting off the passage to Caguin, and Hanniball Gonsagua, Guy Earle of Rangon, and some other pensioners to the King, who had brought for his seruice, fise hundred light-horse, choise-men, bred vp in the former warres, and sixe thousand foot. The Admirall therefore, to be assured of Anthony de Leua, demands free passage for the fore-said pensioners. I will (answered Leua) giue them assurance, so as they come for the league of Italy. A sufficient answer to begin the warre, whereof the King would by no means be the first author.

During this time, the Emperour made his entrie into Rome. An entry, which by the ruine (amongst other buildings) of that ancient temple of peace, gaue the most curious occasion to iudge that his entry was not with an intent to confirme a peace, as he gaue hope by his speeches, but contrariwise, to deface all memorie thereof. His actions did afterwards confirme many in this opinion, for after Charles his first parle with the Pope, the bishop of Mascon and Velly, Ambassadors for France, the one to the Pope, the other to the Emperour, learned from the Popes owne mouth (who said hee would remaine a Neuter, as a common father to maintaine Iustice, and yet oppose against the obstinacy of him that would not yeeld to reason) that the Emperour would neuer condescend, to giue Milan to the duke of Orleans. This was the chiefe point, and either party growing obstinate, vpon the effect of this clause, what accord could bee expected? This holy father was little affected to the house of Medicis, and therefore would hardly haue bene pleased, to see a daughter of that house Duchesse of Milan. To conclude, the Emperour did submit his instalement, to the Popes liking: and the Pope did promise verbally, to yeeld vnto it, if the Emperour would consent, yet did hee freely shew, that the Emperour entertained this practise of purpose, to abuse the King, whilest that hee should fortifie himselfe with alliances, men, and money, and yet (as it were) giuing scope to both parties: I thinke (sayd the Pope to the French Ambassadors, replying that this condition sayling, the King their maister would neuer come to any conclusion) that things cannot passe, without a breach, for that the Emperour neither will, nor can giue Milan, without the consent of some, who in my opinion will neuer yeeld.

These were the Venetians, whom the Emperour did coldly intreate to like of this clause, but in effect to contradict it: and all in generall, would haue no duke of Milan, who might at any time, vnite this goodly estate to the crowne of France, for (sayd they) the duke of Angoulême being inuested in the Duchy of Milan, although hee depends on the King his father: yet marrying one of the Emperours Nieces, (he offered him the widow of Sforza) his wife would bee of the Emperours faction, and so matters should remaine in suspence, whereas the duke of Orleans, besides many other obstacles, must bee onely at the King his fathers deuotion: and as husband to the Niece of Pope Leo, and of Clement, would not cease to pretend an interest in the estates of Florence and Vrbin, and consequently, by new pretended quarrels, trouble the quiet of Italy.

In the end, the Emperour in a speech made to the Pope, in the presence of all the Cardinals, and many Ambassadors, as well to shew (sayd he) his good meaning, and how much he desired the peace of Christendome, as to bee cleared hereafter, before God and men, hee offered againe three conditions to the King. The first to giue the Duchie of Milan to one of his children, so as thereby hee might confirme a good and durable peace, maintayning notwithstanding that it could not bee, so long as the King continued obstinate in fauour of the duke of Orleans. The second was, to fight with the King, hand to hand with like armes, and hostages, in an Island vpon a bridge or boate, or in any other place of safety, to auoide

A auoide greater effusion of blood, being reasonable that they, by whom such great combusions did grow, should decide their quarrels in person.

A Spaniards bragge.

But vpon condition, that the victor should giue his forces to the holy Father, to maintaine the celebration of a Councell, to reduce them that were rebelled and sequestred from the Church, and to the suppression of Infidels, and the vanquished should assist the victor with all his power. Requiring moreouer, that this combat being accepted, the King should pawne the Duchie of Bourgogne, and the Emperour that of Milan, both to bee adjudged to the victor. The third was, a protestation neuer to take armes, but forced, foreseeing that the warre would be so cruell, as the victory would bee of small profit to the victor, and should but open a passage to the common enemy of our faith. And to conclude, hee added, that what he had propounded touching a peace, proceeded not from any feare, hauing neuer sought peace in losse, but could well giue it to them that were vanquished. But contrariwise, three good and iust reasons gaue him an assured hope of victory. That he was not the beginner of this warre. That the King had begun it in a season of great aduantage for the Emperour. That he found his subiects, capitaines, and souldiers so well disposed, as if the Kings were like vnto them, hee would craue mercie with his hands and feete bound. The second article of the three, and the last, being but bragges, were by the Ambassadors (as shalbe noted hereafter) concealed from the King. The Pope requested them, that without preiudice to the King, they should suppress what might incense his Maiesty, adding thereto the explication, which the Emperour himselfe did afterwards make of his words, at the request of the French Ambassadors (desirous to know if the Emperour had any meaning thereby, to charge the King to haue done any thing preiudiciall to his honour, or if his intention were to challenge him) hee publicly declared: that what hee had spoken, was but by way of aduice and proposition, as being more fit, and of lesse inconuenience, then to expose the liues of so many thousands, fighting for their quarrells, to the mercie of armes, to decide it betwixt them two, with the perill of their owne bloods: not meaning in any sort to taxe the King, whom he knew to be a great Prince both in courage and person, much lesse to defie him, and in the presence of his holinesse, without whose permission hee would not attempt such an action. So as the King answering onely to those articles whereof hee was aduertised, sayled in these.

The Emperours protestation.

The Emperour hauing thus published his protestation, tooke his leave of the Pope, who displeased in shew of the neere breach of peace, resolved bee a Neuter, not assisting either party with counsell or fauour concerning the warre. In the meane time the Admirall (hauing expresse commandment from the King, & afterwards re-iterated by John Cardinall of Lorraine (sent by his maiesty to the Emperour) not to attempt any thing whereby the Imperials might frame any iust complaint) had retired his army towards Saint Germaine, with an intent to assure himselfe of the towne of Yuree, and of all the valley towards the Swisses, to receiue men for the Kings seruice, if they should come to open warre, and to succor Turin when need should require.

E But hauing intelligence of that Emperours care, to increase his force, and that Anthony de Leua was resolved to passe into Astifan, to cut off his victuals behind, he sent Montpelat with two hundred men at armes, foure thousand French-foote, and eight hundred Italians, to seize vpon Fossan, Vignon, Sauillan, Cony, Mont-deuis and other townes thereabouts: And to prouide for the fortification of Turin, he sent Stephen Colonne with a hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foote. From words in the end they fall to blowes. The Emperour hetherto fed vs with good words, now hee discouers himselfe, and to make an open declaration of warre, he makes three ambies to assaile at one instant, the Prouinces of Picardy, Prouence and Champagne. To crosse him, the King disperfeth foureteene, or fiftene thousand of those men which he had in Piedmont, to fortifie those places, which hee held beyond the Alpes, and calls backe his Admirall, to the end the might lay all the blame of this inuasion vpon the Emperour. Considering moreouer, that the Admiral (hauing placed his garrisons) had bene too weak in field, he sent Commissions, with great sommes of money to Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendosme, Gouvernour of Picardy, Grandfather to the most Christian and victorious King last deceased, and to Claude of Lorraine, duke of Guise, Gouvernour of Champagne, brother-in-law to the said duke, to leaue sixteene thousand

The Kings preparation for the war.

1536. fand aduenturers, to diuide them into frontier towns, & to prouide for the victualing, & fortifications therof. At Marfeils he placed Anthony of Rochefaucault, Lord of Barbezicuz. In Dauphiné, John Lord of Humieres. In Guienne, Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, for his Lieutenants, and gouernours in the said Prouinces. And himfelfe (refolute to oppofe against the enemy, fome fortified places vpon the frontier, to make him to confume time, men, munition, victuals and money, in the fiege and battery thereof) affembled the reft of his forces neere to his owne perfon. The Admirall retyring out of Piedmont, left Glande Lord of Annebault, to command within Turin, as the Kings Lieutenant, with a hundred men at armes, and three hundred light-horfe, led by the Lords of Auffun, Termes and Effé four thousand five hundred foote, vnder the enfeignes of the Lords of Auchy, Cany, Sale, Quincy, Lartigue-Dieu, Blanche and Anguar, and two thousand Italians, vnder the charge of Marke-Anthonie of Cufan, of all which footmen, Charles of Coucis, Lord of Burie, was head and Colonel generall, and the reft of the army Francis Marquis of Saluffes commanded.

This was to giue the pufe to keepe to the veriest thiefe, but his treachery was yet couered with a great fheue of hypocrifie. He had long determined to reuolt. Feare, and hope moued him thereunto, feare to loofe his eftate, hope, to bee fauoured by the Emperour, in the caufe he pretended to the Marquisat of Montferrat. Moreover hee was a man curious to know what was to come, and did fuperftitiously beleue Southfaiers, who had fore-told him, that the Emperour fhould this yeere difpoffeffe the King of his Realme. The first act of his treason appeared in this, that the enemy being neere, and strong, hee fayd hee had neither order nor meanes to fortifie any place in time, or to make it tenable, but that of Turin, and that to put in more men then thofe that were, were to loofe them wilfully. The fecond was, when as the Lords of Montpefat, Roche du Maire, Villebon, the Knight of Ambres, Saint Aubin, the Earle of Pontreme and other captaines were refolued to attend the enemy in fome place of importance, before hee came to Turin, and had concluded to put themfelves into Foffan, after they had receiued commandement to hold Foffan or Cony onely for fifteene daies, to keepe the Imperials occupied; hee difcovered this defigne to Anthony de Leua, aduifing him to come thither with fpeed, promifing to deliuer into his hands, both the towne and men that were in it: and in fteed of fending to Foffan the meale, a culuerin, three Canons, powder and bullets, which hee had drawne out of Cony; hee conueied thither, but one Canon, a Culuerin, five barrells of powder and fome bullets, but of an other fize, he put all the reft into his houfe at Rauch, and retyred the night following. A horrible treason: hee had bene brought vp with the King, from his infancie, well maintained during the life of the Marquis Michel Anthonie his brother, and honoured with the order of Saint Michel. And which is more, his Marquisate hauing bene adiudged vnto the King for the treason, and rebellion of John Lewis, the eldest of the houfe, after the deceafe of Michel, the King had not onely inuefted him, but alfo giuen him freely out of the conquest of Sauoy, to the number of feenteene townes; the flowre of Piedmont, amounting to more in reuenue, then the Marquisate; amongst the which Sauillan, Cony, Foffan, Cauallimont, Mont-Deuis and others, which hee pretended to be ancient appurtenances of the fayd Marquisate.

According to the aduice of Francis of Saluffes, Anthony de Leua, leauing at Turin (which he had beleagard) ten thousand men, to continue the fiege, came and camped before Foffan the twelfth day of Iune: makes his approches, beginnes his trenches, many of the affaylants loofe their liues, fewe of the befieged. The third day, the Canon plaies, but flowly. The Marquis affured them, that fhewing themfelves before one gate, the befieged would goe forth at an other, they goe forth indeed, but not like men that fled. The baron of Castelpers Lieutenant to Montpefat, led the horfe, VVarté the foote. The Imperiall Lanfquenets were lodged fome-what farre from blowes, and therefore their gards were but weak. VVarté doth charge them, and at the first giues them a great checke. Castelpers arriues, and re-enforceth the alarum. Anthony de Leua fends a good number of Spaniards, to cut off our men in their retreat, and they whom he had appointed to gard the trenches, feeing euery one runne to the alarum, would likewife haue their share in it. Saint Petre Corfe appointed with Villebon to gard the Bastion newly begunne; within the towne, perceiving the trenches

Foffan be-

A gallant fal-
lie.

A trenches vn furnifhed, iffue forth with fome Champanois and Normans, kils fiue and twenty, or thirty men, and puts the reft to flight. Anthony de Leua fends the reft of his men which remained, to fecond them, and himfelfe beeing old, and full of the gout, is carried forth of his lodging to faue himfelfe, they follow him; but thofe which carried him, fet him in the come, where the height of the eares couered him, from fuch as fought him. It is a rashneffe, yea in the greateft captaines, to contemne an enemy. Anthony de Leua building vpon the hope which the Marquis had giuen them, left the befieged a gate free, thinking they would retire to Cony. But this was a refrefhing vnto them, for of feuen wels which they had in the towne, fiue were dried vp in two daies. Anthony therefore perfwaded, that the befieged attended fome more honeft excuse, and colour for their retreat, hee plants foure Canons in battery, and makes a breach for twenty men in front. Foffan had no ditches, fo as the Imperials might more eafily affaile, then the French could defend the wallles. But Anthony would refrefue his Spaniards for fome better enterprife: they were old fouldiars, and the whole hope of this army. The Italians would not march, vnleffe they were paid, and the Germanes (who held themfelves of no leffe reputation, then the Spaniards) would not hazard themfelves alone. So the breach continues twelue daies in this fort, giuing them leifure to repaire it, and to make a trench within, and a rampar well flanked.

The time the King had appointed, was now expired: they had no wine, nor meale, but fome come, and no milles, and the Marquis had maliciously fent away the workemen they had to make any. Moreover, the King commanded them, not to hold it fo long, as very neceffity fhould force them, to accept a difhonorable composition. But it was a point of honour, for the one to demand, and for the others to giue a composition. In the end, the griefe which Anthony de Leua conceived, to spend the time before apaltry hens-roust, which might haue bene better imploied, and the great defire thofe within the towne had, to doe the King good feruice, in affaires of better importance, made them to enter into capitulation: whereby at the end of the moneth, they departed with their armes, and enfeignes difplayed, leauing nothing in the towne but the artillery, munition, and their great horfes, which were about 16 handfuls and foure fingers high, except twelue, at the choife of the captaines, and came to refrefh, and to horfe themfelves a new at Marfeilles, honoured by the King, with three moneths pay, besides that which was due. But the enemy had fmall profit by their horfes, for they had filled them before with new come, fo as when they came to water them, moft of them burft with drinking.

Let vs here obferue fome other Spanifh brags, but boldly incountred by a French liberty of fpeech. Eight daies after the capitulation was figned, the Emperour came to visit Anthony de Leua's campe, accompanied with the dukes of Sauoy, Alua, Bauaria and Brunfwick, the Princes of Salerne and Bifignan, the Marquis of Guaft, and many others: hee caufed his army to bee put in bataille, and findes it goodly, and pleafing to his minde: hee calls Roche du Maine, la Paliffe (the onely fonne of the Marshall of Chabannes deceased) and Affier (the onely fonne of the maifter of the Kings horfe) who remained for hostages of the composition: hee imbraceth la Roche courteoufly, whom hee had heard reputed to bee a gallant Gentleman, caufeth him to couer his head, by reafon of the heat of the funne: and faies, that to doe him a pleafure, hee will fhew him his army: My Lord (answered la Roche) to fhew mee your army goodly, as you esteeme it, were contrary to all content I fhould be better pleafed to fee it poore, and ruined: vnleffe the King my maifter and you would agree together, & not bring two fuch goodly armies to fight, as yours, and that which the King will fhortly oppofe against you, to the preiudice of al Chriftendome. If you were both well aduifed, you would agree & hold, both the Turke and al others in fubiection. But to think to ouerthrow one another, were a mere folly. And if the first army the King fhall oppofe against you, fhould chance to bee vanquifhed (which God forbid) he will within 15. daies raife another, yea and at need, would fhew you as many gentlemen on foot, as you haue men here of al forts. VVhereupon the Emperour faid, I am not ignorant of the Kings forces, fo are mine well known vnto him. As for an accord, I will neuer ftop mine eares against that motion, fo as it might be made as it ought. This being fpoken he commanded the Marquis of Guaft, to conduct them about the army, and to dine with the Princes of Germany: that after dinner he would fee them againe. After dinner the Emperour fayd: How thinke you of mine armie?

Leua* forced to flic out of his campe.

1536. I finde it very faire (answered La Roche) it is pittie you employ it not in some other desaigne. The Emperour replied, where thinke you I will employ it? La Roche answered, into Prouence. The Emperour said, The Prouencals are my subiects (he did commonly peruse the mappe of Prouence, and had already deuoured this Prouince in imagination, but hee shall finde the situation stronger then in his mappe, and men of a firmer mettall then paper) La Roche answered: you shall finde very rebellious, and disobedient subiects. The Emperour replied: How many daies towney is it from hence to Paris? La Roche answered: if you meane battailes, at the least a dozen, if the Inuader (meaning the Emperour) haue not his head broken at the first. The Emperour smiled, admiring his wit: and some one of the assistants (who knew Terrcelin well) said, I told you before my Leage, he could speake well if hee list. Then the Emperour taking the word, gaue him assurance that hee would giue eare to any proposition of peace, so as it might be worthily treated of.

And in truth hee doth reuiue it, but this was to haue speedier meanes to send newes to the Earle of Nassau, and to receiue intelligence from him, that both his army; and that which the Earle led vpon the marches of Picardie, might at one instant inuade the frontiers of the Realme. Moreouer, attending the yeelding vp of Fossan, hee made at Sauillan, Montdeuis, Cony and Tende, great prouision of biscuit, and beasts of burthen to follow the campe with this biscuit, and other victuals to supply the waste which hee did foresee. Some, and the greatest number, councelled him to pursue the recovery of the countie, which the King had wonne from the duke of Sauoy, by meanes whereof hee might plant a strong bar against the French forces, and first to settle a sure peace beyond the Alpes, before hee came to make warre in France. Other men clawed him where it did itch, and by a more pleasing then holefome Councell perswaded him to take his way to Prouence.

The Earledome pleased him greatly, gaping wonderfully after it; for the commodity of his passage vpon the Mediterranean sea, hoping that, as Italy should take breath, and new courage after the ruines and desolations where-with it hath bene continually shaken these thirtie yeeres, the spoiles & ruine, which he should draw after him, chasing, destroying, amazing and making desolate the people of France, Paris in the end; and the crowne of France should bee the prize and recompence of his victories. But hee reckoned without his host, Marseille in steed of making his entry into the Realme, shall shamefully make D him retire into Castille.

Many inticements drewe him into France. Wee haue had (sayd hee) almost for these twenty yeeres, a continuall victory against the enemy. The Duchy of Milan which wee now possesse, is a certaine testimony of our triumphs: wee haue reason to retaine the same resolution in this warre, and the same hope which conquerours ought to haue: and leaue vnto the French, terror and dispaire, which commonly doth accompany the vanquished. Wee are superiors in number, men of better constitution, more practised in the art of warre, and leauing some part of our forces on this side the mountaines, wee haue sufficient remaining to encounter the enemies power. But that which will giue vs the victory, wee march against one that hath broken his faith (the iudicious reader may consider which E of these two Princes had most right, whether the Emperour, taking vpon him the protection of the duke of Sauoy, or the King seeking his right by force of armes, which hee could not obtaine by reason from his Vncle.)

Doubt not but wee haue God for vs, hee is a iust Iudge, and a rigorous reuenger of the breach of faith. Moreouer let vs not feare, that the French King can fortifie himselfe on this side the Alpes: hee will prepare all his forces against this armie, but I haue an other, ready to inuade Picardy, and besides, the Empreffe prepares one in my Kingdomes of Spaine, which shall come by Languedoc, to ioine with mee. I leaue an other to assaile Champagne and Bourgongne, in the hottest of these warres, the which shall performe as much for my seruice as the rest. Having so great preparatiues, and in so many places, and the King so surpris'd as hee cannot in time assemble sufficient forces to encounter so many armies, it is impossible but on some one side, wee should make a passage by force, euen into the heart of his Realme. Wee haue good intelligences and manage great practises. This spake the Emperour. But, Doeft thou know the decrees of heauen (saith the eternall reprehending man) and wilt thou dispose of the government thereof vpon earth? What were these first conceit of his passage into France.

A. these great practises and secret intelligences, which the Emperour vaunted to haue in France? A politike Commander dorth commonly vse this kinde of speech, to giue courage to his men, and breed ieaousie and distrust in his enemy against his subiects. Hee had some secret practises vpon the towne of Langres (but the Inhabitants were too faithfull to their King, and since in these latter daies, haue giuen sufficient testimony of their obedience to the crowne) some held that the Marquis of Salusses had partakers of his treachery, and William duke of Bauaria said openly, that many in France, holding the same party, would discouer themselves at need.

B But whatsoeuer it were, that which gaue a more liuely impression: Francis Dauphin of Viennois, the Kings eldest sonne, whom his maiestie (going from Lions, to see his army which hee ment to oppose against the Emperour) had left sicke at Tournon, dies the fourth day of his sicknesse, beeing about twenty yeeres old, bred vp by his father, in singular expectation of all the world, to prooue in time, a great and most excellent Prince. And Sebastian Earle of Monte-cucullo, found guilty of poison, and for that cause was drawne in peeces with foure hories within Lions, had by his confession declared, that the Emperour had once enquired: if hee knew the order and manner of the Kings eating and drinking. An attempt so wicked, as it is scarce credible, that so wretched and damnable a treason should enter into the heart of so generous a Prince. Notwithstanding when Don Ferdinand of Gonzagua presented the sayd Sebastian to the Emperour: saying, that hee was ready to execute that which hee had promised vnto him, and to Anthony de Lena: if the desaigne extended vpon any places of the French obedience, why did hee informe himselfe of the Kings eating and drinking? Besides, during these practises, why did Don Lopes of Sora, Ambassador for the Emperour at Venice, inquire who should reigne in France, and against whom the Emperour should pursue these warres, in case the King and his children should die: If hee had not bene acquainted with some fatall practise against the said Princes.

Thus the Emperour, resolute to passe, against the opinion of the clearest sighted (as hee afterwards confessed vnto the King with his owne mouth: who hauing till then seemed to follow Councel, did now rashly follow his owne head) and now by diuers and many expeditions, of diuision of places, offices, captainships, gouernments, gifts of townes and castles, deuouring (by presumption) the goods of the Kings subiects and seruants, hee left ten thousand men to continue the siege of Turin, and for the affaires of Piedmont: hee diuided his army into three troupes, for the greater commodity of the passe, and appointed their Rendezuous at Nice, and thereabouts. In the first were the men at armes, with the Lansquenets of the Lord of Thamise, conducting the artillery and the baggage, who tooke their way by the riuier of Genoua. In the second Don Ferdinand of Gonzagua, generall of the light-horse and with them some Neapolitane men at armes, the Lords of Iseltstein, Dietrich, Spech, Wolfe, Dietrich of Kuttinghem Colonels of the Reistres, then the Marquis of Guast with the Spaniards and Emperours household, and at their tayle Anthony de Lena, with the Lansquenets of Marc Ebenstein: after whom marched the Emperour, in the midst of a troupe of Spaniards, followed by the Lansquenets of Gaspar of Fronsberg, taking the direct way from Fossan to Nice. In the third, were the Italians, which tooke their way by Cony. On the other side the King made his necessarie prouisions at Lions, and providing for all parts where the enemy might enter, hee sent Claude of Sauoy Earle of Tende, and the Lord of Bonneuall his Lieutenants generall in that army, to ioine with William Earle of Furtemberg Colonel of his Lansquenets, and other captaines placed towards Cisteron, vpon the passages of Roque-sparuiere, Terreneue, and other approaches, to spoile the corne, either standing, or in the barne: to draw all that might bee into strong places: to beate downe all ouens and milles, which might any way helpe the enemy, to burne the horse-meat, to beate out the heads of their wine vessels, if they did not speedily retire them, and to cast corne into their wells to corrupt the waters. All the people, both great and small, were so wonderfully affected to the publike good, as euery man forgets the griefe of his priuate losse.

The Lords of Mas, Calds, Carsts and many others, pricke them forward by their example, themselves setting fire on their corne, barnes and milles, and causing good fellows 1536. to drinke their wine. And for that the King had not yet all his forces vnited, to present himselfe with honor and reason in person before the Imperials, his maiesty appointed the Lord of Montmorency, at that time Lord Steward and Marshall of France, his Lieutenant generall as well on this side as beyond the Alpes, to seize vpon Auignon. But for that the King would consult with him, more at large of these great affaires, he sent Robert Steward Lord of Aubigny Marshall of France, to that end, with eight thousand Swisses, who kept the enemy from the sayd towne. Montmorency hauing in Auignon imparted to the Marshall of Aubigny and other Commanders, the meanes which seemed most conuenient for the managing of this warre, he came to Aix, viewed the situation of the place, and finding it hard to fortifie, by reason of certaine little hilles neere at hand, which looking into the towne, might serue as a cavalier or Mount for the enemy to plant his ordinance on, he caused all that might be, to be transported, razed the portalls & such defence as it had, and abandoned it, leauing it empty and vnprofitable for the enemy. The Emperour was now in the plaine of Cannes, and the next day Don Fernand Gonfagua, who led the foreward, should aduance with eightene hundred horse and fixe thousand Lansquenets (whereof the maister of the campe marched sometimes three or foure leagues before the whole army) Monticane, a hardy and aduenturous Knight, seeking oportunity in the beginning of this warre to doe the King some notable seruice, resolved to see if he could surprise this maister of the campe. Boisfy no lesse couetous of glorie, would bee his companion in this enterprife, they part with about eight-score horse, and three hundred foote, and encounter Don Ferdinand with his horse-men, who came to take lodging for the foreward in the towne of Luc, on this side the riuier of Argence, and gaue him an alarme: but vnable to fight with so great a troupe, they found the retreat, and all tired come about the shutting of the euening to Brignoles.

Aix abandoned.

The defeat and taking of Monticane and Boisfy.

Don Fernand, aduertised by them that went and came, of the small number of our men, takes a troupe of choise men, marcheth speedily after them, and causeth all the rest of his forces to follow: hee passeth on the one side of Brignoles, and laies a great ambush where our men should passe the next day, and doth compass them in betwixt his troupe and the ambush: at the breake of day hee chargeth into the village, and seekes to force some barricadoes which the capitaines had made to stay them, whilest they arme and go to horse-backe, they kill some at the first, and loofe aboue forty. Monticane and Boisfy take the field, they place capitaine Wartis with his foote-men on the wings of their horse-men, marching close couered with their shot to get to Aix, maintaining still the shock of the enemy, they kill and hurt many in the narrow waies, whereas the enemy could not stretch forth his troupes. But thrust into the open champion, assailed by their whole force, charged by the ambush vpon one of their flanks; the Lansquenets approaching, this present supplie giues courage to the enemy, and the perill, without hope of succour, makes the French to faint: they all giue way, all are ouerthrowne, and of al this troupe but three men at armes escaped, but were slaine or taken. Monticane, Boisfy, the other capitaines, and many Gentlemen which had followed them (desirous to make prooffe of their persons) are taken prisoners. There were slaine of the enemies (besides the wounded) fixe score men, and two hundred horse: but the number preuailed aboue valour.

The Emperour hearing of this victory, did not forget to make a triumph, publishing it throughout all the world, as if hee had defeated all the Kings foreward. Without doubt this lightnesse allowed by Montmorency, at the importunate request of the vnder taker, purchased to the enemy, those which were doubtfull and vncertaine, what partie they should take, confirmed his adherents, and strooke feare into them that were contrarie. This first encounter might giue courage to the Imperials to seeke the Constable in Auignon, yet hee sees no reason to hazard a bataille in open field, before hee had sufficient forces to encounter so great a power. To put himselfe into Auignon, were to hazard himselfe in a Towne not defensible, and hardly to bee fortified so speedily as necessity required.

Marfeilles was the onely fronter towne, sufficiently furnished with all things necessarie to endure an Imperiall siege: but to leaue all the rest of the waie open to the enemy, had beene to giue him meanes to fortifie on either side of the riuier of Rosne, at his pleasure, and

A and to draw vpon him (without resistance) a flourishing and glorious army. It was therefore better to let the Emperour know, that for an vnfortunate encounter they had neither lost courage, nor hope: with this desaigne Montmorency lodgeth his men in field, and chooseth the place for his campe, betwixt the riuers of Rosne and Durance, the one did furnish his army with victuals and other commodities: the other serued as a Ranpar and barre against the enemies approach. And to cut off all meanes and liberty to runne to forrage, to learne newes of the French campe, and to found the passage of the riuier at his pleasure, without contradiction, he placed garnisons in all townes and places, to be held on the other side of the water.

B The King on the other side was at Valence, where like the Maister of a ship commanding from the Helme to the prow, hee sent daily new forces to the Constable, fortified the towne, and assembled such a power, as if any mischance had ruined this first army, the Emperour had had the King presently ready to giue him a second bataille. Let vs now change our climate, and make an escape into Picardy. Henry Earle of Nassau, and Adrian of Croy, Earle of Reux, Lord Steward of the Emperours house, beeing entred into Picardie, did at the same instant, spoile all places in their passage which were of weake resistance, but besides the taking of Bray vpon Somme, they did no great exploit; for beeing repulsed from before Saint Riquier, they lost some of their Artillery, and a great number of their men for a sleight enterprife. Charles duke of Vendosme, with three hundred men at armes, and fixe thousand foote, hauing forced them to repasse the water, reuenged the wrong they had done vpon the frontier, hee tooke and spoiled some small townes, castles and villages vpon the marches. But seeing the enemy fortified with two thousand men, the which hee hoped to surprise at Marolles, an open towne, hee repassed the water, not to hazard his forces rashly, attending the comming of Claude duke of Guise his brother-in-lawe. Amongst other places vpon the frontier not defensible, hee had appointed to abandon Guise.

The Earle of Nassau in Picardy.

The Earle aduertised by his spies, of the hast they made to carry away their moouables and victuals, to driue away their cattaile, and that the garrison of the castle, carefull to free the towne, and to beate downe the defences which might any way accommodate the enemy, did negligently gard the approaches, hee marcheth ether with speed, surpriseth them in disorder, and kills some before they could recouer any place of safety, hee summons the castle: some preferring life before honour, cast themselves ouer the walles into the ditch: the rest amazed, yeeld the place at the enemies discretion. A basenesse vnworthy of Nobility, so as those which were found to bee Gentlemen, were degraded, and both they and their posterity, declared peasants, and subiect to taxes.

Guise beeing sackt, and all the country about burnt, the Earle carrying away a bootie of men, cattaile and goods, marched against Saint Quintin. But beeing aduertised of the good order the duke had set for the guard and defence of the towne, hee turned sodenly, and tooke the way of Peronne. It is strong by nature and situation, but at that time not well fortified, nor sufficiently manned to withstand so great a power. Hee therefore passeth the riuier of Somme aboue Aplincourt, abandoned as not defensible, and spoiling, burning and making the whole country desolate, hee camps before Peronne about the middelt of August. The Lord of Sercu, Colonel of the Legion of Picardy, puts himselfe into it with a thousand men, and the Marshall of La Marke with a hundred men at armes. Misfortune is good for something. The darkenesse of the smoke which the fire of the Farmes and Villages burnt by the enemy, had caused, couered the passage of our men, in view of the Imperials. In the meane time, the Dukes of Vendosme and Guise, leauy new bands in Picardy and Champagne, to ioyne with the Lansquenets, which Nicholas of Rusticis did bring. Let vs leaue Count Nissau assailing, and the defendantes valiantly encountering his attempts, vntill that the Emperour after his first disgrace receiued before Marfeilles, shall bee blemished with a second at Peronne, in the persons of the Earles of Nassau and Reux, and let vs see what happened in Piedmont, after the yeelding of Fossan.

Peronne besieged.

The troupes which Guy Earle of Rangon, Cesar Fregose his brother-in-lawe, Cagnin Gonfagua, and other Italian capitaines, pensioners to the King, had leauied, were broken, Warre in Piedmont, by

by reason of the last hope and practise of peace, cunningly given out by the Emperour. A Now they renew them by a new Commission from the King, so to crosse the Imperials in Italy, as he might thereby diuert the great forces they had in France. Rangon Lieutenant for the King in this army, leaued two thousand men, Caguin as many, Cesar Frego the like number, and two hundred light-horse: the Lords of Paluoina a Vicount of Milan, Peter Strapsi a Florentine, Balthazar called the Cheualier d' Azzala Ferrarois, either of them a thousand men. Beringer of Caldore, a Neapolitane, Earle of Monte de Rife, and John of Turin a Florentine, euery one five hundred, Auerol of Breslan foure hundred; Bandin of Tufcane foure hundred, and two hundred light-horse, and the Lord of Tais (a Frenchman borne, but sent into Italy, to receiue the Earle of Mirandola into his Maiesties seruice) B two hundred light-horse. An armie of great hope, whose exploites wee shall soone see. Annebauld and Bury, beeing straightly besieged in Turin, performed the parts of good and vigilant captaines, and well practised in matters of warre, preventing both the enemy, and the citicens newly reduced to the Kings obedience, from daring to attempt any thing against them, and by their daily sallies, bringing prisoners, and store of cataille, returned victors within the circuit of their wals. Maramao had gathered together within Ciria all the corne and victuals he could get thereabouts. Annebauld aduertised thereof by his espials, sent Esse with seenty horse, and Auchy, and Cany, leading either of them five hundred foote: who parting towards the euening, came to the wals-side before they were discouered, they plant their ladders, surprise the towne, put all to the sword that made resistance, C loade their beasts of burthen with victuals, and booty, and retire to Turin without any encounter. This happy victory brought vnto the besieged the conquests of Riualles, Veillane and Saint Ambrois. The garrison thus reuiued, aspires to greater enterprises. The Emperour had left in Sauillan, sixteene peeces of artillery, with all their prouision of bullets, poulder, and other necessaries, and a good supply of armes. The garrison which hee had placed there, forraging without feare in the villages about, gaue them hope to defeat them, and to surprise the towne. Marc Anthony of Cusan captaine of two thousand Italians, demanded the execution of this stratageme, with his troupes: they giue him for companion Chambray Lieutenant of Annebauld's company, with threescore choise horse. But they loose an ox, to take an egge: vpon the way they are aduertised by their scouts that certaine free-booters D of the enemies, laden with a great spoile, were presently retired into a castle adioyning. They turne head, and take the castle by assault, and sacke it, it may bee more greedily then wisely. For whilst they are busie at the spoile, the alarum is giuen in the country, and some troupes enter speedily into Sauillan, draw the bridges, ramper vp the gates, and man the walles, and the defences. The towne beeing furnished, the suburbs remaine in spoile, they beate in peeces two great Canons, they carry away all the armes, and make booty of all they finde good. In the meane time James of Scalenghe approached, with about foure thousand men, as well of his owne troupes, as of the peasants gathered together. Our men making a vertue of necessity, troupe together, and goe closely to field, charge the enemy running hastily to surprise them, beeing dispersed in the streets, and busie at the spoile: E they make them turne their backs, kill about three hundred, hurt many mo: and of nine ensignes winne seuen, the horse-men flying, pulled away the other two, from them that carried them, seeking to saue them. In the end, John Iaques of Medicis, Marquis of Marignan, came to succour them, with two thousand Lanquenets, beeing called by Scalenghe, our men hauing their bodies tyred with trauell, and their armes with striking, resolute to retire, and send to Annebauld for succours. Alegre, an aduenturous and wise captaine, brings them two hundred horse, who arriuing when as our men were in danger to bee defeated, entering amongst the enemies, killing and chasing, gaue their companies (half tyred) leisure to take breath: and through the fauour of twelue hundred foote, which followed Alegre's troupe, doe retire with their booty, and baggage safely into Turin. A shot F which Cusan receiued in the head, caused him to remaine at Pignerol, where soone after hee died: leauing a happie memory of his valour, and a great griefe to his friends for the losse of his person.

The Emperour approached now to Aix, hauing receiued some losse by the way, not so great as troublesome, in regard of the quality of the persons. The peasants, and mountainers,

A rainers, lying in ambush, in the straights, and narrow passages along the Alpes, and issuing forth sodainly, sometimes vpon the scowts, sometimes vpon the reere-ward, stayed them euery two hundred paces, to defend themselues: hauing no meanes to offend this swarme of men, who beeing charged, vanished by crooked and vknowne wayes. Fiftie men of the Countrie resolute for all euents, had shut themselues in a fort, called our Ladies tower: with an intent to shoote at the Emperour in the passage, and all of them at one instant to discharge their harguebuzes. But they take Martha for Mary: they kill a Nobleman with a rich coate of armes, and followed by a troupe of men which did him great honour. The Emperour brings the Canon, batters the Tower, and forceth them to yeeld at his pleasure: and to purge the offence they had made, sends them all to be hanged. B Moreover, beeing aduertised that a great number of peasants, women, children, and cattle, were hidden in a peece of ground enuironed with wood on the side of a mountaine, he caused the wood to be fired in many places about the wind, so as all were miserably burnt or slaine. A stratageme which did so incense the people against the Emperour, as neuer any one of his men fell into their hands, but he made tryall of a most tragicke and cruell death. These first fruites might induce the Emperour to draw a consequence from the lesse to the greater, in comparison of these people vnacquainted with armes, with those whom nature and exercise had instructed, and to make him know, that it was no small enterprife to assaile a King of Fraunce at his doore. But this troubled his mind. Hee thought in the beginning of this warre to haue so C disgraced the King with the Germains and Suisses, as he should draw no men from them. Norwithstanding, aduertised that besides the eight thousand Suisses leuiy by Lewis of Anguerrand, Lord of Boisfrigault, Stephen d' Agne Lord of Beauuais, and William Lord of Liernay, Gentlemen of the Kings house, had made a leauie of the like number, all which had in a manner ioyned with the Marshall of Montmorency, who had now about thirtie thousand men in his campe: he is now much grieved in his heart, that hauing in the former warres wonne so many happie victories, vnder the command of his Captaines, now marching in person with so strong and mightie an army, after that hee had proclaimed his triumphes throughout the world, he should performe no honorable exploit of warre. Therefore the 15. of August he makes choice of three thousand Spaniards, foure thousand Itali- D ans, and five thousand Lanquenets, and takes in his companie the Duke of Alua a Spaniard, Alphonse d' Aualos, the Marquis of Guast, and Don Fernand Gonzague Italians, and the Count Horne a Germaine, followed with all the flower of his horsemen, and aduanceth neere to Marselles: he goes himsele in person to view the towne, beeing couered with the ruines of a house lately beaten down, and puts foorth the Marquis to make a conuenient place for the planting of his artillerie against the weakest part of the Towne. This resolution had bene good, when as the Kings forces were not yet vnited, and his subiects terrified by the sudden and vnexpected entrie of so mighty an enemy. The Centinell vpon the rampars discovered the Marquis: they send foorth men to compasse him in behind, if there were no more then those which appeared with him. He retires towards the place from whence hee E parted, and by his retreat he discover a greater number of men, behind that ruined house. They set vpon them that issued forth, and some Cannon-shot scatter the stones, kill some, and hurt others.

This first amazement carried the Emperour to his Campe, after that hee had appointed the Duke of Alua and the Count Horne, to stay about Marselles: and the Marquis of Guast with twelue hundred horse, and fixe ensignes of foote to go and view Arles: that if they found it not able to be taken by assault, he would come thither with all his forces. In the meane time, least the first that sallied foorth, should fall into some ambush, they send other fresh men in fregats and boates armed, who going along the shore, get about the place, where they had seene the glistering of their armes: who landing take a compasse among the myrtels and other bushes which grow in that Countrie. The Duke discouers them, and to busie them, sends certaine horses, to draw the whole troupe which followed vpon them. Our men had the like dessein, and when as the enemies whole strength appeares, they seeme amazed, retire without order, and draw them that pursued towards an open plaine, commanded by the Cannon, then turning their backs they saue themselues among the bushes. The Cannon playes, and passing through the Imperials, makes heades, legges, and 1536. armes, to flie into the ayre so pittifully mangled, as the cries of them that died, the terrour A of them that fled, and the amazement of them that were sound, turnes them all into a hasty flight, and the fouldiers hidden in the bushes, make a furious salley vpon them that fled: the Duke gathereth againe his men farre from the shore into a valley couered with rockes and hilles, and hauing viewed them, he found his number greatly diminished, amongst others, those of the Count Horne, and of another Germaine Captaine his neere kinsman. The Marquis of Guast had already discovered, that they had taken downe a little hill which did ouerlook the Towne of Arles, vpon the which a few peeces of Artillerie being planted, would haue held the towne in great subiection. Arles is seated vpon Rofne, at the point where it parts in two, and runs with two mouthes into the sea: making an Island, which they B call Camarola. John Carracciol a Neapolitane, Prince of Melphe, commanded there, as the Kings Lieutenant with a thousand foot Gascons, of the troupes of John de Foix Earle of Carmaine: a thousand Champagnois vnder the command of John Anglure Lord of Iour, two thousand others vnder the ensignes of the Lords of Marieu of Daulphiné, la Goute a Bourbonois, du Palais of the Countie of Foix, and the Baron of Rixou of Languedoc, to every one five hundred, and Bonneual about an hundred and thirtie men at armes. As the Marquis lying in ambush behind certaine wind-mills, viewed the weakest parts of the Towne, being discovered, Anthony of Ancienuille Lord of Villiers, Commissarie of the artillery, plants two peeces of artillery directly against these mills, as if the Marquis, seeing them giue fire, had not slipt aside, hee had there ended his dayes. So as the Marquis (frustrate of his C hope, either to surprize or to force the Towne of Arles) tooke his way to Marfeilles.

Marfeilles was beseegeed by the Duke of Alua, more in shew then with any hope to force it, and onely with an expectation to draw the beseegeed to some rash salley, or to haue the Kings armie to come and succour them, and then to fight with them with an aduantage. With this desseigne, the Emperour lay so neere, as at the first dislodging of the French Campe he might easily preuent them, and ioyne with his forces. But those within the towne had good and wise Commanders, who suffered their men not to issue forth but to good purpose, and alwaies to the enemies losse. As for remoouing of the Campe, Montmorency would not hazard the estate, nor the forces of the King his master: he hopes by the route of his enemies armie to preferue his owne: and according to the aduertisements hee had of the D Imperials desseignes, he restrained or gaue libertie for the execution of his Councils and commandements. The surprise of Brignoles had made him more warie: yet not to daunt the courage of his men, he continually studied of reuenge, vexing the Imperials with daily alarmes, encounters, and charges, and all without any losse or preiudice.

The Daulphin comes to the Campe.

The King being aduerted of the approches which the Emperour had made to Marfeilles, Henry the new Daulphin and Duke of Brittain desired to make prooffe of his person in so iust and honourable a warre, and against so worthie an enemy, obtaines (by his instant sute, & the intercession of such as might preuaile much with his Maiestie) leaue to go to the campe. Not to command presently (said the King) but to learne to command hereafter, and vnder the Lord Steward, (as another Palantes vnder Aeneas) to passe his apprenticeship in the art of warre. His comming made the youth to crie for bataille, whensoever they went to consult, whether it were more expedient to approach neere their enemy, or to prolong the warre by temporizing and delays: and many which till now had followed the last opinion, were carried away to the contrarie. Many considerations moued them, the Kings forces able to encounter the Emperours, the presence of a young Prince, burning with desire to trie himselfe in the warre, the dishonour (as they said) in suffering the Town of Marfeilles to be beseegeed, the meanes they had to defeat their enemies, before the Emperour could bring all his forces to succour them, who for want of victuals were constrained to lye disperfed.

But the Lord Steward, and the wisest heads found it farre more safe to win the victorie F without striking stroke, cutting off the enemies victuals as they had done before. Marfeilles was well fortified, furnished with all necessarie munition, manned with valiant Captains, & men of resolution. Contrariwise, famine and pestilence which did much afflict, and daily increase in the Emperours campe, would soone ruine his forces. It was now neere at hand: The peasants had lately carried away, slaine, and hurt, all the beasts which carried the biscuit that

A that was made at Toulon, and consenting to molest them by these affronts, they brought the Imperiall armie into wonderfull wants and necessities. Moreover, the daily checkes which the French-men at armes gaue vnto the enemy, made the Emperour thinke of his retreat. It was therefore a wise constancie and resolution of the Lord Steward, not to subiect the importance of this warre, to the discretion of a doubtfull hazard. There is no lesse honour to vanquish an enemy by counsell and gouernment, then by bataille: and not to hazard himselfe to the chance of armes without necessity, it is an abusing of the bloud and liues of men.

Hereupon newes comes to the King, that his armie beyond the Alpes had brought most part of Piedmont vnder his obediencie; and all the Marquisate of Salusses, except some Castells. His Maiestie (using his rightes) might haue annexed this Marquisate vnto Daulphiné, whereon it depends, as confiscate, by the rebellion and trecherie of the Marquis Francis. But let vs heare an act of his naturall clemencie and bounty. John Lewis brother to the said Francis, was prisoner at Paris for the like rebellion. The King set him at libertie, he did inuest him in the Marquisate, receiues his oath of fealtie to him, and against all other men: hee causeth money to be giuen him, to furnish him and his traine, and then sends him to take possession. Francis within few weekes after came to Carmagnole: John Lewis receiues him into the Castell, and suffers himselfe to be so carried away with sweet words, as hee sweares by nothing, but by the confidence he had in his brother Francis. Francis was farre more malicious and cunning. John Lewis, against the aduice of Saint Julian (a Gentleman Gascon bred vp in the house of Salusses, whom the King had sent with John Lewis to obserue the actions, and the going and comming of this new Marquis, being a simple and dull man) he suffers himselfe to be drawne out of Carmagnole, and to be lead to the Castell of Valfeniere, where Francis detained him prisoner, and then seeks to recover the places of the Marquisate. Saint Julian foreseeing the issue of this subtil stratageme, practised Saluador d'Aguerres by his perswasions, and receiued of him in the Kings name, the stronge Castell of Vrezeul, a beame in Francis his eye, which kept him from being absolute Marquis. Andrew Doris comming then from Spaine, brought victuals and money to the Emperour, vpon whose arriual he made a Proclamation throughout the Campe: That all men bearing D armes, should be ready to muster (without doubt the great decay of his armie, the which from fiftie thousand men that he had parting from Nice, he found decreased to 25: at the most, did touch him to the quicke) to receiue money, and prepare to depart vpon the day assigned, every man to be furnished with eight or ten dayes victuals. This proclamation made the king suspect, that he meant to come and assaile his campe, or to march after the Duke of Alua to the siege of Marfeilles. And seeing the Emperour was there in person, the King did hope to haue meanes in the midst of these great armies, to effect the contents of the challenge he had before sent to the Emperour by an Herald, as we haue heard. But his Maiestie was no sooner come from Valence to his campe neere Auignon, as he was giuing order to prepare to receiue or giue bataille, newes comes vnto him, that the Emperour with all his Campe, is dislodged from Aix, leauing behind him (besides the dead bodies which were infinit, the ayre being corrupted round about) a great multitude of sicke men, which could not follow the armie, neither on horse-backe nor on foote: and taking the route of Spaine, he left the towne of Aix spoiled with all the desolations which warre could bring forth, except fire from which the Emperour did preferue it. Onely the pallace, and especially the Chamber that comprised was abandoned to the fire, at the instance of the Duke, of Sauoy, who would aske in person at the burning thereof, hoping (it may be) to abolish the memorie of the rickes, whereby it appeares, that Piedmont belongs to the Earledome of Prouence. But the Lord Steward had foreseeing this inconuenience, sending the to a strong place of his named Baux. The King gaue money to repaire the losses. Amongst his chiefe F champions, the Emperour lost Anthony de Lema, Mark Buthlein, another Captaine of Lanquenets his kinsman, the Count Horne, Baptista Castalde, and many other men of accompt. Let vs apply here that holy Oracle speaking of Senacherib King of the Assyrians: T by bragging hath come vnto mine eares, I will put my ring into thy nostrils, and my batt into thy mouth, and will make thee retorne the way thou camest. And thus said the Eternall touching the King of the Assyrians: he shall not enter into this Cistile, neither shall he shoot an arrow therein, he shall not Exploits in Piedmont.

The Emperours retreat.

1536. not present himselfe before it with shield nor cast, &c. Behold the Earle of Prouence in imagination, who had lately threatned the Prouinces of this Realme with fire and sword, and swallowed vp the Crowne thereof by presumption, ashamed and confounded in his retreat hauing lost halfe of his troupes, turmoyled by the peasants, who vsing the armes of his sicke men, and of those that were dead, seaze vpon the passages and streights, beate downe the bridges vpon the riuers, which were then very violent, charge them in front, in flanke, and behind, and the light horse-men led by the Earle of Tende, Bonnemal, Langcy, and Iohn Paul de Cere follow them so close, as they had no meanes to forrage, leauing the waies from Aix to Freius, couered with dead carcases, and men languishing, harnesse, lances, pikes, harguebuzes, and all other armes pel-mel on a heape.

The King resolued to march after them, and wheresoever he should overtake them to giue them battaile, and so passe into Italy, where at that instant he had a mightie armie in field. But he is diuerted from his desseigne by letters from the Marshall of La-Marke. Hee had no more meanes to hold Peronne long, the wals were beaten downe in many places, famine pressed the beseege, they wanted harguebusiers and powder. So the King caused some part of his men at armes to march speedily, and tenne thousand French foote, resolute to follow after by great marches, to raise the sege, or to recouer the Towne before the enemy should fortifie it and furnish it with victuals. God would preserue him from this toyle, and giue him leysure to take breath. The Imperials being alwaies repulsed, with losse from many and sundry assaults, the myne wherein they had long laboured, prouing fruitlesse, (besides the death of Philip of Boulinuilliers, Earle of Dammartin, ouerwhelmed in the ruines thereof, in a countermine he made to blow vp the enemies myne (whose death was reuenged, with the slaughter of three hundred Lanquenets, and twenty of their men at armes, at the last assault giuen by the Tower that was vndermined,) and the towne being releued with siue hundred shot; every one carrying ten pounds of powder, chyring by meanes of a Generall alarme, giuen by the Duke of Guise with two hundred horse; and all the trumpets he could recouer, they dis-lodged in the night, about the middest of September, continuing their burning as they had begun.

France (by the grace of God) is now free from enemies. But nothing is perfectly happy. There are crosse newes which trouble the Court. The English Ambassadors that were neere the King, ill-affected to his Maiestie, and without doubt, no faithfull seruants to their master giue him intelligence. That the Emperour seeing, that he could neither by spoyle, or any other meanes, prouoke the King to battaile, made shew of a retreat, to draw him to pursue him, and so to fight, or else retire to take a greater leape, and to invade Prouence suddenly, when as the French forces should be farthest off: That the Emperour himselfe (the better to colour his departure) gaue out, that famine and mortalitie had diminished his forces of one third part, and the rest had run the like danger, if he had not retired: yet notwithstanding he had no such want of victuals, as was supposed, and since his comming out of Italy, had not lost aboue two thousand men. That since the taking of Montecian and Boisy, no man durst giue any alarme to the Emperours Campe, nor yet follow it at their dis-lodging.

These Impostures and false impressions had wrought such effects with the King of England, as Pomeray being sent from the King, to three ends: To satisfie him of the truth, touching the enterprise of Prouence: To procure his liking of the marriage of Magdalen a daughter of France, with the K. of Scots, and to learn the K. of Englands intention, vpon the motion before made, touching the mariage of the duke of Orleans with Mary of England daughter to the said King: he had much ado to alter him in any thing from the opinion he had conceived. But the marriage of Scotland did so inuense the King of England, as hauing layed open vnto Pomeray his griefes and the causes of his discontent vpon this Article, hee sent him backe without any conclusion, being loth to haue his neighbour so highly allyed. There comes another matter of greater importance: the Countrey of Tarentaise in Sauoy had lately shaken off the French yoke. To reduce it to his obedience, the King sent the Earle of Saint Paul, Duke of Estouteville by his wife, with some French troupes of horse and foote, and the Earle of Furstemberg with his company of Lanquenets, to whome, for the purging of their offence, the Countrey was abandoned to the spoile,

The cause of warre betwixt England and France.

A spoile, with the Towne of Conflans. Being thus punished, they afterwards performed the duty of subiects, and the Duke returned into France with much honour. Let vs now discharge our promise, and conclude the yeare with the exploits of the assembly made at Migenoua: and to this effect they came speedily and closely, hoping either to surpris it, or by the partisans of Cesar Fregese, to become masters of the town: but a Luquois of the troupes of Count Guy, stealing away in the night, had discovered the enterprise to the Citizens. So the Earle retiring his campe halfe-a league from Genoua, betwixt two mountaines, he suddenly caused many ladders to be made, which prouing too short, made the successe fruitlesse. These Captaines had no Cannon to make any batterie: moreouer, Turin being beseege, required their presence.

They therefore turne head. The Imperials aduertised of the Earles approach, abandon the sege, and leaue the field at the deuotion of this new army. The Lord of Annebault, seeing the Campe dislodged, sallies out after them, and in passing takes the tower vpon the bridge of Pau by composition (the taking whereof the Emperour had so highly commended) and the Lord of Burie tooke Groillan: the corne and wine that was found there, serued to refresh Turin. The town of Quiers was taxed by the Imperials at siue and twenty thousand Crownes: but whilest the souldiers were busie to force the Inhabitants to pay this sum, Annebault sent certaine Captaines, who surprized the town from foure hundred souldiers, which kept it in the Emperours name. Montcallier sent presently to offer obedience: and the Castell of Carignan yeelding, did furnish Turin with about three thousand sacks of meale, packt vp readie to send to the Campe. Salusses, Quieras, and many other places of the Marquisate of Piedmont did homage vnto the victors. The King sent to refresh Annebault and his troupes both with horse and foote: he drew them out of Turin, sending two thousand French foote vnder the command of Captaine René, and la Godiniere: and two thousand others, vnder the Cheualier Birague: and for gouernour he sent Bury, to whome he gaue the company of men at armes, which Francis of Salusse being reuolted, did command. But behold an act as remarkable, as it is rare, proceeding from a singular affection: and what will not a braue Knight do for his mistrisse? Vpon the first newes of the Emperours descent into Prouence, the King of Scotland did arme sixteene thousand men, to come and succor the King without his request or priuie, (sayes the Originall) and nothing stayed him from comming in time vpon the generall hope of a battaile, but a contrarie wind, which had put him backe twise. The King had assured himselfe of his new conquests, and hauing giuen order to the frontiers of his Realme, returned into France.

The King of Scotland came to meete him at la Chapelle, betwixt Tarare and S. Saphorin in Lionois. and there he demanded one of his daughters in marriage. The auncient alliance of the realme of France and Scotland, was considerable. The Father of this King had bene slaine in battaile against the English, for the partie of King Lewis the twelfth, and should his kind affection be denied? So the marriage betwixt him, and Magdalen of France, was concluded in Blois, and solemnized the first day of the yeare following. Great prosperities are oftentimes accompanied with some crosses, else the vanity of our senses, would easily transport vs; and we would attribute that to our owne valour, which belongs to the great Iudge, and moderator of battels: behold pittifull first-fruits, in the gouernement of the Lord of Bury at Turin. Oftentimes he is taken, that thinkes to take. The Emperour had ad-iudged Montferrat to the Marquis of Mantoua, against the Duke of Sauoy, and Francis of Salusses who pretended it: and those of Cassal would not accept of him. Bury during these garboiles, practiseth Damian Curtial a Captaine in the garrison at Cassal for the Emperour. Damian promiserh to deliuer him a gate. Bury leades thither Christopher Gouast, with twelue hundred Italians, whereof he was Colonel, and some number of horse vnder the Lord of Tais: and at the first becomes master of the town.

But the mattockes, shouels, and other instruments for Pyoners, which William Earle of Biendras shold haue prouided with the money he had receiued to that end, to make a trench suddenly betwixt the town and the castle, whilest that Count Guy should come to succour them, with the artillerie to batter the Castell, were yet to buy. Whilst they seeke for others to make trenches, the Marquis of Gouast had leysure to assemble his forces within Ast, and 1536. to enter into the Castle, by the field-gate, and so into the towne. Twelue hundred men A were not able to withstand the furie of this vnexpected storme. He maintaines the shocke, and enters fight: but in the end beeing forced by the enemy, he is taken prisoner. Tais, Gnaß and al the rest were slain or taken. Biendras, Damian, and other Marchants saue themselves. We find the fault when it is done. It is good to obserue it to make vs wise. He should haue imparted this enterprize to Count Guy, who should haue drawne his armie nere vnto Ast. The Marquis fearing to loose the one, and not to saue the other, had contained himselfe within his walles. Guy Guffroy Lord of Boutieres was appointed Gouverneur by the King in Buries place.

Pursue against the Em-perour in su-stice.

The snow, yce, and slipperinesse of the winter stayed the course of the Garrisons in Pi- B cardy. And whilest the season kept them from doing any memorable exploits, the King laying open in his Court of Parliament at Paris (in the presence of the Peeres of Fraunce, and Princes of the bloud, forty or fiftie Bishops, many Officers of the Crowne, and other great personages of all Estates) the lawfull armes of a Lord against his vassall that hath committed a trespasse: he sent to summon the Emperour, vpon the frontiers by a Herald, to come and plead what he should thinke good, against the demaunds of his Maiesties Aduocate and Proctor generall: concluding, that in regard of the rebellions and trecheries of the said Emperour against the King, his naturall Prince, and Soueraigne Lord, by reason of the Earledomes of Flanders, Arthois, Charolois, and other places, holding of the crowne C of France, they should be adjudged confiscate and vnited to the Crowne. And no man appearing for the Emperour, the demand of the Kings Councell was registred according to the forme and tenure vsuall in those cases.

For the execution of this sentence, the Lords of Annebault, Tais, Termes, Auffun, French-men: More of Nouate, Francis Bernardin of Vimercat, Italians: George Capusse- mens, and Theode Manes, Albanois, either of them commanding two hundred light-horse, Bies Seneshall, and Gouverneur of Boullen, and Cregui Gouverneur of Monstreuil, Cap- taines of fiftie men at armes: hauing victualled Therouenne in view of the Earle of Rieux, who issued forth of S. Omer with sixe hundred horse to preuent this stratageme, the King parting from Amiens, (whereas Charles Duke of Vendosme then died, much lamented of the King and Realme, a braue Prince, and well deseruing of this Crowne, for his many and D notable seruices) the King in the end of March, sends William Earle of Furstemberg to field with eight thousand Lanquenets, the Lords of Sereu and Auchy (who were slaine at the first approches at Hedin) Heilly, S. Senal, Picards, Bacqueille, la Salle, and S. Aubin, Nor- mandis: Quincy a Champanois, Haraucourt a Lorraine, either of them leading a thousand men: and many other bands of Germains and French, amounting all to siue and twentie thousand men, whereof Montmorency (Lord Steward) was Lieutenant generall for his Maiestie.

Hedin is of consequence to the King, for the preferuation of his other places in Picardy: and beeing in his power did wonderfully annoy the enemy. The towne abandoned by the Garrison, they retire into the Castell, the which was taken without resistance, but the Earle E of Reux had well furnished the Castell for the defence of a place of importance. Captaine Samson an old Knight of Namurs, a great souldiar commanded there with 1500. men, vnder the Ensignes of Boubers and Vaudeuille. They make their approches, and many Cap- taines perswaded that the thickest of the wall, maintained with a great rampar, would ne- uer admit any breach, they come to vndermine. The Prince of Melphe, the Lords of Bar- besieux, Bury, Villiers, Corneilles, vndertake the worke, and cast downe halfe a Tower passing from the Towne to the Castell, but that part which ioyned to the Castell standing firme, the place was not much weakened. The King then resolues to attempt it by batterie, and he himselfe shewes the place where to plant the Cannon. At the approches Lusarches and Pont-briant, well experienced Commissaries of the artillerie, with many Cannoniers F and others loose their liues. The Cannon planted vpon the brinke of the trench, plays two dayes together, and the third they make a breach of thirtie sadomes. The Kings pre- sence beeing the rewarder of vertue, sets many young Gendemen on fire, beeing desirous of reputation, and before that order be giuen for the assault, carries them to the toppe of the breach. But they find the like valour in receiuing them: some are slaine vpon the place, others

A others returne fore wounded. Charles of Bueil among others, Earle of Sancerre, a young Nobleman who followed the steppes of his Ancestors vertue, Aubigny Lieutenant to Ser- en, and Damiete ensigne-bearer of the said Company, testified by their deaths the hope of their youth, if the chance of armes had lent them a longer life. Haraucourt a Lorraine and his brother his Lieutenant, sonnes to the Lord of Paroy Lieutenant to the Duke of Guise, in the gouernement of Champagne and of his companie of men at armes, Flieures sonne to Mardicque, and many others returned backe lame. Yet this attempt amazed the besee- ged, and helpt the Generall. For when as they see the order the King had giuen to assaile them in the morning, a great number of men at armes on foote, with siue or sixe hundred light horse-men, all the rest on horse-backe, the whole army readie to be put in bataille if B the enemy approached, some appointed to march first, others to second them, and some to releue them that went to the assault, the resolution and courage of the night past, made them enter into composition, whereby they departed with their baggage, leauing the ar- tillerie, munition, and victuals. The King committed it to the guard of Sereu, giuing him a company of fiftie men at armes and a thousand foot. S. Paul neere vnto Hedin might much annoy him, and reduced to the Kings obedience, crosse the garrisons of Betune, Arras, Li- liers, and other places thereabouts: Annebault did this exploit, and Anthony of Castell, an Italian Ingenour vndertooke the fortification of the towne and Castell. Liliers abandoned C by Lieuin Captaine of the towne, was by the Lord Steward and Duke of Guise, visiting the Country, added to the former Conquests, and left vnder the command of Martin du Bel- lay Captaine of two hundred light-horse, ioyning vnto him la Lande with a thousand foote, to keepe them of S. Venant and Maruile, from annoying the forragers and victuallers of the French army. The Bourguignons had fortified an Island, at S. Venant vpon the riuier of Lis. The Lord Steward vndertakes to force it, and takes with him the Earle of Furstemberg, with eight thousand French and Germains. At the first the beseege repulse the Lanquenets, kill some, and wound many. And now the day began to faile, when as Charles Martel Lord of Bacqueuille, and La Lande discouering one part of the trench worse manned then the rest, they crosse it with their Normands and Picards, and come to handie blowes, they loose some men, and kill many of the enemies, force the trench, the rampar and the bastion, D they compell them to abandon and leaue their defences, and make way for the rest of their companies and troupes to enter, who chasing the enemies, make a great slaughter of men, to reuenge the death of their companions. They presently set vpon the second fort, the bridge whereof was croft with great long peeces of wood, ioyned one to another, and betwixt, manned with good shot, defended with a mill of stone well pierced, and furnished with harguebuses of Crocke, and other shot. But nothing is difficult to a resolute mind, and the first flying to the second fort, stricke terror into them: they force them, and put them all to the sword: The number of the dead was esteemed twelue or fiftene hundred on both sides, the place spoiled, the bootie carried away, and the houses burnt.

There passed no day without an enterprize of one side or other, courses, and recourses; E prises, and reprises, of men, victuals, and places ill guarded, or riot guardable. The King seeing the Emperour had no armie readie, able to crosse his new conquest, content for that yeare to haue taken Hedin, and fortified Saint Paul, he caused Liliers to be burnt, (refer- ring the Abbey of Nunnes and the Churches) and the wals to be beate downe, that the enemy lodging there, should not annoy Therouenne and S. Paul: he gaue the gouernment of Saint Paul to John d'Estouteuille Lord of Villebon, Prouost of Paris, with his company of men at armes: that of Moyencourt named de Hangeft, to Martin du Bellay, with his two hundred light-horse, and two thousand foote, commanded by the Captaines la Lale and S. Aubin Normands, Blerencourt and Tuile Picards, euery one siue hundred, and in the castell a thousand men, vnder the charge of René of Pallietiere. He left the Earle of Furstemberg in F garrison at Dourlans, with his Lanquenets, and an hundred men at armes, vnder the gui- dons of the Lords of Estreé and la Roche du Maine. But these bands were so ill compleate, as they made not halfe their numbers, then hauing in like sort provided for other places, he brake vp his campe, and dismissed his troupes, to giue order for the affaires of Piedmont, where the enemy grew strong.

The King thus disarming, the Earle of Bures armes fourte and twenty thousand Lan- quenets, 1537. quenets, 6. thousand Wallons, and eight thousand horse, and resolves to charge the Lanf. A quenets, lodged neere to Dourlans, to make the seege of Saint Paul more easie, which hee meant to attempt. By the surprise of some letters, he learned that the fortifications of the place required yet twenty daies time, to make it able to repulse the enemy. He changeth his opinion, and turning head to Saint Paul, makes his approaches the tenth of Iune, notwithstanding the many sallies and skirmishes of the beseegeed: he recouers (by meanes of a great hollow way, which the sodaine arriuall of the Imperials would not suffer them to make euen) the point of a great Bulwarke vpon the way to Mouchie: they vndermine day and night, shoot sixteene or eighteene hundred Cannon shotte, make a breach of three or foure hundred paces, and by the furie of 7 or 8 peeces of artillerie, force Martin de Bellay, Blerencourt and Tuille to abandon the breach which looks towards Dourlans, their chiefe and almost onely defence: he giues an assault with fife or fixe hundred men, onely to view the breach: and by the thunder of their Cannons which battered all along the breach, and into the towne, they kill, or at the least hurt, aboue a third part of the defendants: those which were set to defend the breach, being forced to lye flat vpon their bellies. They discover the breach, draw seuen or eight ensignes more into the ditch, which diuided the great bastion from the towne, they had had no leysure but to make two Courtins of pipes full of earth, to defend the way which went from the bottom of the trench into the towne: they set fire to the props which supported the point of the bastion that was vndermined: it sinks downe, and presently ouerthrowes all them that defended this point into their trenches: they giue the assault by that place, and are valiantly receiued by La Sale, and Saint Aubin. But during the assault, those which the enemy thrust into the trench, winne the Courtin made of pipes, force fife and twenty or thirty shot that kept it, and enter the towne pelmel with them: they come behind them, (who performing as much as valour and nature could do) defended the bastion, and cut in peeces all they incounter.

Those which defended the breach, ignorant what passed on the other side, had already endured a furious assault, when as behold, those which were entred by the port of the great bastion, come and charge them behind, and the greatest number surmounting the lesse, at the first charge they kill Moyencourt, and his brother d'Une, they massacre in the furie of the fight, seauen-score of the companie of Du Bellay, and the most part of that of Villebon: D Villebon and Tuille were taken prisoners by Tonnoire a Spanish Captaine, du Bellay and Blerencourt were saued by Pofe a Germane Captaine. La Pallatiere forced in the castell by the bulwarke which was not yet in defence remained prisoner: but the contention of some (euery one maintaining that he had giuen his faith vnto him) was the cause of his death. Finally, sparing neither men nor children, wiues nor maidens, religious men nor Nunnes, about 4. thousand fife hundred persons tryed the pittifull chance of a horrible and cruell victorie, whereunto they are commonly subiect, who against the lawes of armes undertake the defence of a place not defensible, or that is not readie to withstand the violent attempts of a mightie army.

Saint Paul being burnt, the castell and all the defences razed to the ground, the Imperials come before Montrueil. Montrueil was ill furnished: Canaples Gouvernor of the towne entred but three or foure daies before, with a thousand foote, and some two hundred horse of the bands of Normandie: but the towne not being tre-nched, it required at the least fixe thousand foote, and three hundred men at armes. So the Earle of Bures lodgeth a part of his campe at the port of Hedin, one part at the Celestins vpon the way of Therouenne, and a part at the gate of the great market towards Abbeville: hee plants his artillerie in three places: makes a breach along a great courtin from the gate towards Hedin to the port of the great market, and then prepares for the assault. The breach was reasonable, but the trenches full of water made the access difficult. On the other side, the defendants were troubled with many disauantages. Two batteries of the enemies kept them from coming to the breach: and being at their defence, they lay open vpon both the flanks, and had no meanes to couer themselves: besides, their number was not sufficient to keepe the one halfe of the bafe towne, so as the enemy coming to the assault, had the rest of the towne at his discretion, the which is of a great circuit.

These considerations made Canaples demand Composition, and the Earle intending the Saint Paul recovered by assault.

A the conquest of Therouenne, to prevent the next victualling, which hee did foresee, hee graunts the men of warre to depart in armes with bagge and baggage, and to the inhabitants to carrie what goods they could about them. This done, the want of men and powder which he knowes to be in Therouenne, inuities him to this enterprife. Francis of Montmorency Lord of Rochport, then Lieutenant generall for the King in Picardie, knowing the importance of Therouenne and the enemies desseigne, besides three-score men at armes, an hundred foote and some hundred dead payes which kept it, he sent the Lord of Cany, Lieutenant of the company of the young Duke of Vendosme (whom we shall see King of Navarre, and father to our most Christian King lately murdered): Fondras Lieutenant to Cany B the sonne of Dampierre guidon to the Daulphin, leading foure-score men at armes, and S. Brise foure hundred foote. He comes before it, make his approaches, plants his Cannon in batterie, forceth our men to abandon the castell which had but two towers (the English Talbot hauing taken the towne in the yeare 1513. had razed the castell) and makes a breach in the towne wall, about two hundred paces long, but hardly to be forced: our French-men retyring, had made a trench behind them, and made the rampar in such sort, as the enemy winning it, should fall into a trench well flanked.

When as the Imperiall army began to march against Saint Paul, the King sought to raise his army, hoping (according to the promises of the fortificators) it would hold out vntill that succours should come. Now the Daulphin accompanied with Montmorency Lord Steward, Commander of the army vnder the Daulphin, giues the rendezvous towards Abbeville, to the Earle of Furstemberg, and to Nicholas de Ruffies, newly arriued with foure thousand low Germanes, warlike men, and in good order. Whilest the Daulphin attends the rest of his troups, the beseegeed giue him notice that they had great neede of shot and powder, for the furnishing whereof, they choose Annebauls Generall of the light horse. With this desseigne, Annebauls followed with an hundred men at armes, and sixteen hundred light-horse, made choice of foure hundred harguebuziers, vnder the charge of Biendras, euery one carrying a sacke of leather bound about him full of powder: many voluntarie Gentlemen desirous of honour, (a braue ambition if wee could temper the heate of youth) augment this troupe, resolute to be either taken or defeated, rather then to faile of their enterprife. The Imperials hauing intelligence of this desseigne, go to horse to prevent the execution: and the French light-horsemen, prickt forward by these yong Noblemen, desirous to trie their valour, giue them an alarme. Mischance is good for something. It was night, and the darknesse hindering their enemies foreward from knowing their battaile, which came from another side to ioyn with them, they charge, and kill one another. whilest that our shot enter into Therouenne without discouerie: being entred, they make a signe, whereby Annebauls should make his retreat, and might haue done it without danger. Notwithstanding, aduertised that his light-horse were in skirmish, he sought to retire them. The enemy preuents him, and cuts off his way at the passage of a bridge. Here begins the combate, and so violent, as the greatest checke falls vpon the Imperials. But in the end all the horsemen arriue, Annebauls is ouerthrowne, taken prisoner, and neere vnto him the Earle of Villars, the Lords of Piennes, d'O, and Sansac, Captain George Capussemont, Francis Bernardin, and almost all, but some which had before passed the bridge. Those (amongst the which was Aufsun) retire to Hedin, change their horses, post to the place of combat: find the Imperials in disorder, dreaming no more of any enemy: they charge them, defeat them, take a great number, and recouer many of their companions that were prisoners: and so cut off a great part of the glorie which they did challenge for such a victorie. In the meane time the Daulphine and the Lord Steward had gathered together about sixteene hundred men at armes, two thousand light-horse, ten thousand Germanes, and twelue thousand French, with the which they pretended to succour the beseegeed, or to force the Imperials to fight with disadvantage: when as the treatie which Mary Queene of Hongary, sister to the Emperour, had made by the meanes of the Duke of Ascot, for the procuring of a peace or truce, caused a suspension of armes for three moneths betwixt the King and the Emperours countries of the Netherlands, vntill that matters being pacified, there might be a generall peace concluded betwixt these two great Princes and their allies. Let this truce now carrie vs beyond the Alpes, to see the estate of the forces in Italy.

The ordinarie iealousies, diuisions, and partialities of Capitaines, which thinke themselves equall in authoritie and reputation, and of like vse for seruice, is commonly of dangerous consequence. The composition which Cagnin of Gonsagua made with the Imperials at Carignan, without the priuie of Guy Earle of Rangon, Lieutenant generall for the King on that side the Alpes, had discontented the Earle, and on the other side, Cagnin complained, that they had cashiered some of his foot-men, and in case Count Guy should dye, or leaue the place, the King had substituted Cesar Fregose his brother-in-law, without any respect of the auncient seruice of his house, and his breeding in the Kings seruice, from whom he had not fallen as the Earle had done, although he had bene fought vnto with many profitable conditions. These quarrels did so increafe, as after many complaints and reproches B vpon the point of honour, Guy and Cesar banded ioynly against Cagnin, framed a challenge vpon some writings published to the disgrace of the said Cesar, vnder the name of Aretin, whereof they held Cagnin to be the chiefe author. William of Bellay Lord of Langey, sent by the King to heare the griefes of either partie, hauing giuen Count Guy and Cesar Fregose, to vnderstand what preiudice their quarrell with Cagnin would be vnto his Maiesties seruice, and that by the articles of the Kings order, the Knights may not without the leaue of their superiour (which is the King) send nor accept of any challenge one against another, Cagnin offered not to wrong the Kings seruice, and to deferre the combate, vntill the seruice were ended, so as after the answer he had made vnto the challenge, Cesar had not written or said any thing that should come vnto his knowledge, whereunto he should be bound in honour to answer: and vnder colour to go to the bathe for his health, he obtained a passport to retire himselfe to his house, with promise that if it pleased the King to giue him an honorable charge, he would returne with a troupe fit to do him seruice: and that how-soeuer, he would neuer weare a red crosse.

During these contentions the Imperiall army increased daily, and the Kings decreased, so as the Lord of Humieres sent by the King for the affaires of Piedmont, could not be master of the field, without a bodie of foure or fife thousand Lansquenets or Suisses, and some supply of men at armes. To this end the King causeth his light-horse-men to march into Piedmont, after the conquests of Hedin and Saint Paul, and sent to Christopher Duke of Wirtemberg, who brought ten thousand Lansquenets to passe the Alpes, and to ioine with D Humieres. But vpon the coming of the Imperials before Saint Paul, the King being forced (as we haue seene) to countermaund his light-horse, he sent the Baron of Curton, La Fayette, Brissac and others, leading three or foure hundred men at armes, and two hundred light-horse, Lasigny, and Allegre, either of them commanding a thousand foote.

The Marquis of Guast had at that time deliuered into the Marquis Francis hands, all the Marquifate of Salusses, except the Castels of Verculo and Carmagnole. Two hundred Italians held it for Count Guy: the Marquis of Guast doth summon it, and vpon their refusall approcheth the artilerie. Francis Marquis of Salusses (knowing the place) brings two Cannons on the right hand going from the towne to the castle, breakes downe two houses to couer himselfe in stead of Gabions: himselfe playes the gunner, and shootes two volleys. A souldier of the castell discouers him (but knowes him not) and shootes him through the body like dead with a musket. The Marquis of Guast causeth him to be couered with a cloake, and then againe sends to summon the besieged, promising them an honourable composition: they depart with bagge and baggage, and the Marquis seeing them passe, commended their good endeuours. But when he came to demand what he was that had shot so well from one of the windowes ouer the port, the souldier both ignorant of the Marquis intention, and of the effect of his shot, presents himselfe vnto the Marquis, who against the Capitulation caused him to be hanged at the same window. The King hauing afterwards reduced the Marquifate to his obedience, did inuest Gabriel Bishop of Aire in Gasconie; who married the daughter of the Admirall Annebaut, but dying without heires he left the said Marquifate to the Crowne. The coming of Humieres and the Lansquenets had shut the Marquis of Guast with his troupes into Ast and Verceil, who by his retreat left Pignerol, Chiuaus, Montcallier and other places abandoned to these new Conquerors. But at the first, want of the chiefe sinewes of warre, makes the Italian bands to mutine, whereby our men loose tenne or twelue dayes, during the which the Marquis had

1537.

A leisure to hasten his Lansquenets, leuied by the elder brother of William Duke of Furstemberg. Humieres had no sooner pacified the Italians with a portion of their pay, but hee frames an enterprise vpon Ast, where the Marquis had left his brother-in-law, Don Antonio of Arragon Lieutenant for the Emperour, with two thousand foote and two hundred horse. The Lansquenets require the charge to make the approches, and take it from John Paul de Cere, who had a meaning to discharge it well. About midnight Humieres comes speedily to see their lodging and finds nothing done. Some exclaiming first would haue made their cause good: others storme (their pay being now out) and protest, that if it bee not satisfied, they will wrappe vp their ensignes, and sound a retreat. They had reason, it is an ordinarie course, when as the chiefe force of an armie consists in a mercenarie nation. B Humieres searcheth all the purses in the campe, makes for euery company fife hundred Crownes, and with this bone did somewhat satisfie their greedinesse. But in the mean time the besieged, giuing the alarme to the Campe, they bring in seauen companies of foote, and three hundred horse to their succours. Thus the small likelihood to force the Towne, and lesse to famish it, seeing that for want of pay, the strangers were no men of resolution, Humieres leaues the Towne of Ast, to surprise that of Alba. About eight hundred Spaniards, were parted from Alexandria to enter into it. John Paul de Cere meetes them, chargeth and defeateth them, so as at the arriual of the French, the Cittizens of Alba vnsurrounded of souldiers, yeelding to the yoke of obedience, gaue occasion to them of Quiers C to follow their example.

This absence of the armie made Cesar of Naples, Gouverneur of Vlpian, a man aduice and vigilant, but unfortunate in his enterprises, to attempt Turin. Turin had in it but two companies of foote vnder de VVartis and d' Angart, weake forces for a place of such importance, yet the Inhabitants were well affected to this Crowne. Cesar subornes a Corporall, a Gascon, to deliuer him the next day of his guard, a bulwarke of the towne right against our Ladies Church. Such base people should neuer know the day nor houre of their watch. The night being come, he brings ten ensignes of foote, and some three hundred horse: the souldier giues him notice by a signe of the most conuenient place to plant his ladders, he settes them vp, and before the alarme was in the towne, he puts fife ensignes into the bulwarke: two or three base souldiers whom the traitor had of purpose drawne in with him, saved themselves by flight. Boutieres Gouverneur of Turin hearing the alarme, goes into the streete, followed onely with the Suisses of his guard, and some Gentlemen: he findes the townsmen armed, and resolute to do their duties, hee marcheth directly into the bastion with no armes but a halberd, shuts the gate by which they came from the said bastion into the Towne, (the darknesse of night had hindered the enemy from seeing it open, the which preferred the towne: for whilst that Cesar made fitte his ladders to enter into the Towne, the alarme grew hore) VVartis arriues with two hundred shot, and forceth the enemy to abandon the bulwarke, hauing lost seauen or eight score men, at whose departure the souldier payed for his offence with his life.

This attempt, the bad inclination of the forraigne forces, the quarrels betwixt Cesar Fregose, who led the fore-warde, and John Paul de Cere, Colonell of the Italian foote: the controuerfies of Brissac with Aluibal of Gonsagua Earle of Lanuolare: six thousand Spaniards and twelue hundred horse, being entred into Montcallier, and threatening Turin, but weakly furnished with men, made Humieres to leaue Julio Vrsin in Alba with a thousand foot vnder his charge, and a thousand more vnder Artigue-Dieu and Peter Stroff: in Quierres Cesar Fregose with the like number of men, such as he would choose, and with the rest of the armie turnes head towards the enemy to surprise him at Montcallier. The Marquis of Guast aduertised of this dessein, puts the rest of his troupes into the said place. This enterprise proving fruitlesse, and Humieres not able any longer to hold his strangers without pay, he sent Francis Earle of Pontremie with sufficient forces, to make good Pignerol against the Marquis, who threatened to surprize it, to take from the French all means of retreat and succours in keeping the passage of Suze. Then hee supplied Turin with two thousand French foote, commanded by Allegre and Lasigny: Quierres with a thousand men of the bands of Aramont, besides eight hundred which the Knight Assal gouernour of the place had: Sauillan with a thousand Italians vnder the command of John of Turin, leading the

Lansquenets,

1537. Lanquenets and the rest of the troupes into the Marquise of Salusses, to attend newes and A money from the King for their pay, for want whereof this army serued to small vse. The Marquis of Guast seeing Humieres retired into Pignerol, whither the violence of the Lanquenets had driuen him, there to attend their pay: hee sent thirteene ensignes of foote, to Siria a small towne vpon the mountaine, to keepe the valley of Suze in subiection, and by the taking of the Castles of Rioule and Villane, to take from them of Turin all meanes to the hearing newes out of France. So the way by the valley of Suze being cut off, and that of Pignerol by the meanes of Montcallier, Carignan, and Carmagnole which the enemy enioyed: Humieres being ill obeyed by the Lanquenets (whom they forced to pay vpon their old rowle, although their number of ten thousand were halfe decreased) and those of Turin, prest with want of victuals, and money, which they could not endure after S. Andrewes day, B the King was in danger to loose all Piedmont.

Piedmont in danger to be lost for want of money.

The Marquis hauing taken the towne of Quiers by assault, with Alba and Quieras by composition, was become master of the field, and held Pignerol, a great and vast Towne, so streightly begirt, as no victuals might enter, when as the King by a supply of five and twentie thousand Crowns, which he sent to Boutieres, made an entrie for the Countie-men to bring victuals to Turin, which before was shut vp, for want of payment for their wares: then he caused the bands of the Earle of Furtemberg, and of Nicholas de Rusticis march to Lions, vnder the command of the Daulphin his sonne and of the Lord Steward, with ten thousand French foote, commaunded by Monteian, followed by foureteene hundred men C at armes, and light horse, attending a leaue of foureteene or fifteen thousand Swisses, which the Earle of Tende made for his Maiesties seruice: resolute to march after himself in person. And not to leaue his realme vnfurnished, he left the gouernement of Paris, and the Ile of France, Picardie, Normandy, and other Countiees about, to the Duke of Orleans his younger sonne: he lent backe the Duke of Guise into Bourgongne, and Champagne: Henry King of Nauarre his brother in law into Guienne and Languedoc, and the Lord of Chastel-aubriant into Brittainie.

The Daulphin accompanied with Anthony Duke of Vendosme, parts from Lions about the tenth of October, gathers together in Daulphinie some three thousand Legionaries, and the remainders of Humieres armie, which were come out of Alba and Quieras: he forceth D the passage of Suze against Cesar of Naples, who kept it with ten thousand men, chaseth them two miles, wins all their baggage, makes the Marquis to retire all his forces to Rioule and Montcallier, leauing Pignerol at libertie, opens a way by the taking of Villane from two hundred Spaniards which were cut in peeces, addes to his conquests Rioula, abandoned by the Marquis, turnes head to the enemy, incamped on this side the riuer of Po, right against Montcallier: but hauing the bridge to fauour him, to retire when he pleased, he begins the skirmish with his light-horsemen against theirs, kills many, takes some, and loofeth few, he chaseth all their troupes beyond the bridge, who breaks it after them, but with the hazard of their liues that remained behind. Those of Montcallier, come with a great shew of affection and repaire it: and then receiue into their Towne all the souldiers which the Daulphin E had left to guard the riuer, whilest the army passed at Carignan. The Marquis dislodging still, left in Quiers Don Anthony of Arragon his brother-in-law, with foure thousand men, and himselfe recovered the Countie of Ast.

Thus our men beeing at libertie on all sides, become masters of Poirien, Riue de Quiers, Villeneufue d'Ast, Montafie, Antignan, and of all other forts, vnto the gates of Ast, of Quieras, Alba and Fossan, whether they retired all the corne of the Countie, which did serue for the victualling of the campe and places of conquest. About thirtie thousand sacks of corne, which the Marquis had gathered together, but had not lezsure to bring fro Montcallier, and much other munition found in diuers places, supplied Turin for a year. During these actions, the King comes accompanied with the Earle of Saint Paul, the Cardinal of Lorraine, and many other great personages. And as his Maiestie tooke counsell at F Carignan, with the Daulphin, and the Lord Steward, newes comes vnto him, that the Garrison of Vulpian kept the valley of Suze, and for that Rioule nor Villare had any horsemen to stay their incursions, they did wonderfully annoy those that followed the Campe. He presently sent away Martin du Bellay, and very happily. They had newly feared vpon fixe

A fixe moyles laden with money for the payment of the army, driving the moyles, and the treasurers in the midst of them. Du Bellay passeth the riuer of Douaire, intercepts their way, and ouertakes them three miles from Vulpian, hee makes them to leaue the moyles, and onely with the losse of the treasurers, which they carried away, brings them safe to Rioule.

The conclusion of this Councell was, to besiege Quiers, where the King would imploy the first fruits of his last forces. But the great commander of battailes, giues him a more fauorable issue. The truce of Picardie had giuen libertie to the Queene of Hongarie, and likewise to the King, to send some Gentlemen into Spaine, to mediate a peace, or a general truce: and the deputies had so well performed their charge, as a suspension of B armes was concluded on either side, from the eight and twentieth of Nouember vntill the two and twentieth day of February following, whereby euery one enioying that whereof he should bee found seized at the time of the publication, the garrisons of Turin, Vorlin, Sauillan, Montdeuis and other frontier places, were not slacke to enlarge their limits, as farre as they could, nor to put men in the Kings name into all the small places, and castles thereabouts.

Three daies after the truce was proclaimed, the Marquis of Guast, came to kisse the Kings hand, whom he receiued very graiously, and the King making the Lord of Saint Monticam gouernour of Piedmont, he left William of Bellay his Lieutenant generall in Turin: Francis Earle of Pontremie at Pignerol, the Baron of Castelpers at Sauillan: Charles of Dros a Piedmontois at Montdeuis (hee had surprised, and kept the place from the Imperials, when they were the strongest in field) Lodowike of Birague, at Vorlin, and Nicholas of Rusticis at Carmagnole: he dismised his Swisses, and taking his way to France, hee sent the Cardinal of Lorraine from Lions, with Montmorency the Lord Steward to Locate, where the Emperours deputies should meet, concerning a peace betwixt their Maiesties. The confusions had bene great, and their spleene not easily to bee pacified, which made them to prolong the truce for fixe moneths more. After all these toyles, and painefull endeours, the loyall seruice of the most worthy deserued reward, which made the King, being at Molins, to aduance Anne of Montmorency to bee Constable of France, the place beeing voide by the D reuolt of the Duke of Bourbon: he gaue his place of Marshall to Monticam, and that of the Marshall La Marke deceased, to Claude of Annebault. It was now time to suppress these infernall furies, which had so long troubled the quiet of Christendome with such fatall combustions, and that the Pope (doing the office of a common father) should therein imploy his authority. Hee procures an enteruew of these two great Princes at Nice, and himselfe assists, being about threecore and fiftene yeeres of age, in the begining of Iune. Their mutuall hatreds, had taken too deepe rootes in their hearts, and that fatall and bloody checke, which his brother Ferdinand King of Hongary had lately receiued from the Turke, had nothing mollified the Emperour. Time doth pacifie discontents. Ten yeeres were sufficient, or neuer, to dispose both the one and the other to a general peace. The Pope E therefore seeing that by the full deciding of their quarrels, hee could not confirme a final peace, hee propounded a truce for ten yeeres, the which they concluded betwixt their countiees, and subiects, and then euery one returned home. But Charles was borne to bee a perpetuall scourge to this realme, and many yeeres shall not passe before hee put vs in alarum with an vnworthy and base motiue of new confusions.

An enteruew at Nice.

Let vs now see how hee worketh like a foxe, to produce effects for his owne benefit. The Emperour Policy. The Gantois being oppress with many extraordinary tributs, had spoiled the Emperours officers: who growing desperate, and seeking to fortifie themselves against the reuenging wrath of Charles, they secretly offer obedience to the King, as to their Soueraigne Lord. The King performing the duty of a good brother, and faithfull friend, giues the Emperour intelligence thereof. The Emperour deuiseeth by some notable examples, to suppress the Gantois insolencies. But the passages thither were not very certaine. By Germany, the protestants might some what hinder him. By sea, a storme might as well cast him vpon the coast of England, as vpon Flanders: the diuisions hee had with the King of England by reason of the marriage of Queene Catherine his Aunt, would not suffer him to take any assurance from him: France was very commodious for him, to this end, hee demands the 1539. the Kings word for his safety, and among other toyes, hee promisseth, in case he gines him an assured passage, to inuest him, or one of his children, in the Duchy of Milan. But (oh notable policy) he desires not to bee prest to signe these promises, To the end (saith he) it may not be spoken, that I haue done them by constraint to obtaine a passage, and requires the King to take his word for assurance. This was to build a castle vpon a quick-sand.

The Emperours passage through France.

Notwithstanding the King iudgeth another mans heart and intentions by his owne, hee grants his brother-in-law such assurance as he demands. Being sicke, he parts from Compiègne, to goe to meet with him, sending his two sonnes to Bayonne, to receiue him, and to accompany him to the place where the King and hee might meete (which was at Chasteleraud) giues him authority to make entrees, and to deliuer prisoners, in many townes of the realme, as if hee had bene in his owne country: feasts him in all places, causeth him to bee conducted by his sayd children vnto Valentienues, the first place of his owne territories, where hee is moued to confirme that which hee had promised before his departure from Spaine, but it was to no effect. The Emperour defers the matter, vntill hee had conferred with his Counsell of the low countries. It may bee hee would haue kept his promise, if hee had found the Gantois so desperately affected, as hee must needs haue vsed the aide of France, to force them to obedience. But seeing themselves abandoned by the King, they sought and found mercy, vpon certaine conditions which hee prescribed them. And the Constable, who (relying vpon the word of such a Prince as the Emperour) had giuen the King assurance, was for this cause in disgrace with his Maiesty, and retyred himselfe from Court to his house: from whence wee shall see him called and restored to his dignities.

Let vs obserue the craft and subtilty of the Spaniard, to bring the King into dislike with his friends and allies. The Venetians were ill satisfied of the league they had made with the Emperour against the great Turke: their treasure was wasted, and their estates (after that great and famous victory in Hongary) were in danger. They were (for their owne safety) ready to enter into a treaty of peace, or of a long truce with the Turke. To breake this, the Emperour solliciteth the King to enter into this common league, and the King perswaded thereto, sends (by his instigation) the Marshall of Annebault (Lieutenant generall for his Maiesty in Piedmont, by the death of Momian, lately deceased) to goe in company with the Marquis of Guast to Venice, and the Lord of Gié to the Pope, as sollemne Ambassadors, and to giue them hope, that the King of France ioyning his forces to theirs, all ioyntly together, would make an army both by sea and land, to extirpate the race of the Ottomans out of Europe. The Emperour strooke three stroakes with one stone, hee disswaded the Venetians from all accord with the Turke. He bred a hatred and dislike betwixt the King and the Turke. And put the King of England in ielousie: who could not well like of this great alliance and fraternity, which the Emperour did cunningly make (shew to haue with the King. So as the English being perswaded, that the King had with-drawne his loue, he grew strange, and began to assure himselfe of the Emperour. And which is more, all the Kings other confederates, seeing that honourable and respectiue entertainment giuen to the Emperour, and the Ambassadors of both their Maiesties ioyntly sent into Italy, they conceived many causes of distrust, blaming the King in leaving them at need to the Emperours mercy, from whom they could not expect (if hee did vanquish them in warre) any better vsage then that of the Gantois.

Budens died.

This yeere William Budus Maister of Requests, died at Paris, a man of singular learning and godlinesse, to whom all men that loue learning are much bound, hauing by his learned and laborious writings, eased them of much paine: whose credit with the King, and the Cardinall Du Bellay, caused honest pensions, according to that age, to bee giuen to those whom we call the Kings readers, and professors, a fountaine from whence are sprong so many great riuers, that in the end they are spred ouer all Europe. The extreame heate, and great drouths, did likewise make this season the more memorable, by the name which it carries yet, of the yeere of Roasted Vines. The Emperour hauing by his dissembling disappointed the King of his hopes, it was now needfull to satisfie his friends and allies, touching the truth of things past: for (to incense all the Potentates of Christendome against our King) the Emperour had vnder-hand giuen them to vnderstand, that the King treated with him

A him of matters to their preiudice. To this end hee sent Cesar Fregose to the Senate of Venice, and Anthony Rinçon a Gentleman of his chamber to the great Turke. The Marquis of Guast hath some notice thereof, and to surpriue these Ambassadors with their instructions and letters of credit (which notwithstanding were not found about them, the Lord of Langey, who could not disswade them from the passage of Po, had so preuailed with them, as they sent their instructions vnto him, to conuey them vnto Venice an other way:) hee sets watches vpon all the passages, especially vpon the Po, knowing well that Rinçon, a bigge fat man, would rather passe by water then by land, and causeth them to bee murdered in their barke, passing at Cantalone, three miles about the mouth of Tesin, putting all the water-men into the dungeon of the castle of Pauia, as well those which carried the Spaniards, that were the murderers, as the French: they were souldiars of the garrison of Milan, and of the said castle. An odious and reprochfull act. Some packets comming from Venice to the King, and from the King to Venice, were surprisid, and the carriers wounded by men attired after the Marquises deuise.

Ambassadors

murdered.

But see the notable policy of Langey, to discouer the truth of a fact which the Marquis thought to haue managed so secretly, as it should neuer haue come to light. Gifts (saies an ancient) pacifie both Gods and men. Langey findes a meanes, by money, to file a sunder the grates of the prison towards the castle ditch, with secret Files: drawes forth the Marriers, winnes some of the faction to the Kings seruice, learns from them the number, the names, and the nation of the murderers, the order, the manner, and the houre of the murder, and all other available circumstances to incounter the dissembling of the Marquis, who making a good shew of a bad cause, seemed to enquire carefully of the crime, by the captaine of the iustice at Milan. The Emperour was then at the Diet at Ratisbone, where he granted an Interim to the Protestants, that is to say, vntill a Councell were held to determine all controuersies of religion, euery one should peaceably enioy the beleefe and ceremonies whereof hee then made profession: and in doing this, the restoring of the duke of Sauoy to all his estates, was granted at the Germains charge.

Ferdinands
army defeated
by the Turke.

Soone after, William of Roquendolse Lieutenant generall for Ferdinand King of Hongary, was defeated before Buda, with the losse of twenty thousand Germains. It was a great shame for the Emperour, being nere to so mournfull and fatall a check, if hee should not employ his forces in his brothers fauour. He vndertakes againe the voiage of Algier in Afrique, with an intent (that if passing through Italy, hee should finde the Kings affaires disordered, and his forces dispersed) to attempt some thing against him, making account that the King would not faile to be reuenged of the violence and wrong done vnto him, in the persons of his Ambassadors. But the good prouision which the King had made in Provence, and in Piedmont, by Langey his Lieutenant generall, caused him to passe on without any further attempting. Being at Luques, he had conference with the Pope, and the King, sent his Ambassador vnto them, to demand satisfaction for the crime: but he was put off with shifts. The enterprise of Algier was vnfortunate, the violence of the windes, the continual raine, the stormes and haile, with all the iniuries of the ayre, had coniuured against him: breaking some of his ships, hee was beaten backe with great danger of his person, and losse of his men.

The Emperour
goes to Algier without successe.

Hetherto the Marquis had as couertly as hee could, disguised the matter: but finding now that all men had discovered his deuises, that notwithstanding the death of the Ambassadors, hee could not decipher the Kings desaigne, that the King demanded as well from the Emperour, as from the Estates of the Empire, satisfaction for this foule fact: Now to make his cause seeme good, hee writes to the Estates which were assembled againe at Ratisbone, for their common defence against the Turke, whereby he maintaines, that he committed no act that might touch him for breach of the truce, and in shew to iustifie himselfe of the crime wherewith he was charged: There are (saith he neither denying nor aduowing the fact) two waies of iustification, the one ciuill, the other Knightly. I offer so maintaine ciuilly, that there is no breach of truce growne by mee, and to deliuer into our holy fathers hands (the protector of the truce) both my selfe, and all those the King shall thinke culpable of this act, so the end the truth might be knowne: and if any Knight my equall will charge me with any such fact, and proue his saying by armes. I will maintaine that hee hath spoken falsely, and as often as hee shall

The Marquis
of Guast iustifies himselfe.

1541. shall charge mee with the like, so often shall hee speake falsely. Wee doe often shadow a lie with such good words, as it giues it a colour of truth. But did hee thinke by this brauadoe, to prouue his innocency? the retreat of those murtherers to him, bringing them all prisoners that were left aliue within the boates, to the end there should bee no meanes to discouer this infamous murther: the detention hee made of the water-men, whom hee afterwards transported into other prisons vnder his command: the penall Edicts hee did publish in places where the fact might bee knowne, against them that should bee found discouraging of this action: the ill vllage of them that had spoken of it: the fauours, honours, and aduancements, giuen to them that had bene the actors: the depositions of prisoners freed by Langey, were not all these sufficient witnesss, to crie vengeance against the Mar-quisse? Langey answering to the pretended iustifications of the Marquisse, was the Knight to make triall thereof, by the one or the other way. But the Marquisse had no such meaning.

The reasons that moued the King to warre.

Wee haue heard how the King demanded of the Emperour (being in conference with the Pope at Luques) satisfaction of the murther, audaciously and against all diuine, naturall, and humane lawes, committed vpon the persons of two of his especiall seruants, men of estate, and of reputation by their birthes, hauing by their merits deserued, the one an honorable degree amongst his chiefe Gentlemen: the other an especiall place amongst the greatest Noblemen. They would haue satisfied him with friuolous reasons and excuses, perswading him to leaue the abolition of their blood, to the forgetfulness of time, which might haue bene an imputation to his Maiesty, either of want of wit and iudgement, or of valour and courage. Profit vrged the King, honour prickt him forward, and necessity constrained him, to vse those meanes which the law of Nations did allow to him which doth acknowledge no other superiour: and three chiefe reasons did vrge him thereunto. Vnder this colour of peace, the Emperour had a thousand practises vpon the frontiers of his realme: and the King had no sooner cut off one of this Hydras heads, but presently there riseth vp an other or many mo. Moreouer, this truce allowed the trafficke and conference of eithers subiects, by meanes whereof so many treasons were practised. Neither could he draw his subiects from the commerce of the Low-countries, belonging to the Emperour, without expresse prohibitions, the which by consequence would argue hostility. But that which did most moue a noble and generous spirit: he had good and certaine intelligence, that the Emperour (seeing warre proclaimed, in case he did not within a certaine time make satisfaction for the aboue named murthers) made his account, that vnder colour of zeale to the common-weale of Christendome (filling the eares of the whole world with a goodly and great enterprife, against the enemies of the faith) hee would raise great forces, and prouide great preparation, at the cost and charge of his most credulous subiects, lying most open and nereft vnto the Turkes inuasion, and coniure the most Christian King to assist him either with men or money.

If then the fumes of an Affricane or Turkish voyage, had bene proclaimed through the world, before that warre were denounced betwixt these two Princes, those which were not acquainted with the deuises of the one, would haue imputed the stay of so holy an enterprife to the other. Let vs adde, that howsoeuer, hee must intertaine men both in Italy, and vpon the frontiers of Languedoc and Prouence, for that both a truce, and warre were of equall charge vnto him. There were two meanes to begin the warre: the one profitable and lesse honest. Many thrust him on, some with discontent, others with reuenge, some with couetousnesse, some with desire of innouation, or some other priuate passions, offering to seize vpon diuers places for his Maiesty, the conquest whereof, might bee a worthy reward for a long and doubtfull warre. The other was more honest, but of lesse profit, iust and not couetous. The Duchy of Luxembourg, and the countie of Roussillon were worthy motives in general, besides the priuate interest of inuasion, which the King had against his enemy. The Emperour did possesse them both, without any lawfull title. Luxembourg, by the succession of Charles and Philip dukes of Bourgogne, his great grandfather, and his father, who had by force dispossessed the true and lawfull Lords of the said house, who had substituted our Francis, by a new grant into their rights and actions, besides the ancient rights, which the Kings of France haue euer pretended thereunto, and especially, since the purchase

A purchase which Lewis duke of Orleans, brother to King Charles the sixth made. Besides that the Lords of la Marke had of late transported their pretensions vnto him, of the said Duchy. Roussillon, by the two scrupulous restitution of Charles the eighth, being abused, and deceived (faith the original) by friar Oliuer Maillard, his confessor, a man in shew holy, but in effect an Hypocrite, and corrupted with money by the King of Arragon, to sell and deceive his master. King Charles hauing no power to make this alienation, in preiudice of the crowne, neither the King of Arragon, nor his successors, accomplishing the conditions annexed to the contract, Charles now Emperour, was but an vsurper, and a violent possessor.

The situation of Luxembourg was commodious to receiue the Germans that came vnto the King: but more, by this approach, to fauour the duke of Cleues, whom the Emperour did threaten to make the poorest man in Christendome. So the King sent Charles duke of Orleans, his yongest sonne, accompanied with sixe hundred men at armes, sixe thousand French, and ten thousand Lansquenets, and Claude duke of Guise commanding the army vnder him: Francis of Bourbon duke of Anguien, brother to Anthony duke of Vendosme, the Earle of Aumale, eldest sonne to the duke of Guise, the Lords of Sedan, Lamets, Rochedu Maine, la Guiche and many others, men of resolution, valour, and experience. And for the enterprife of Roussillon, Henry his eldest son Daulphin of Viennois, assisted by the Marshal Annebault, for the chiefe conduct of the warre: & for an assistant in those military toiles, the Lord of Montpensar, Lieutenant for his Maiesty in Languedoc. Parpignan is the chiefe city of this country: the onely barre, and bulwarke of Spaine towards the South, the conquest whereof drew after it not onely the losse of that which the Emperour possessed on this side the mountaines, but laied open al the Prouince beyond it: and the King conceiued, that assaying it (being vnfurnished of many necessaries, for the maintayning of a great siege) either honour, or feare of losse, would draw the Emperour to fight, and with this hope, hee prepared the rest of his forces to march in person. But this was but a great shew, without any effects.

The duke of Orleans hauing assembled his troupes, betwixt Verdun and Dun-le-Chastell, he besieged, battered, and tooke Danuiller, a place of Luxembourg: where there came to Dioyae with him the Baron of Hedecq sometimes Lieutenant to the Earle of Furstemberg, the Earles of Mansfeld, and Pignelin, and the Colonel Reichs, with their regiments of Lansquenets, making about ten thousand men. Then came Count Reingraue to the Kings seruice, a yong Nobleman, and resolute, who promised in his person, many good parts, as wee shall hereafter see. Danuillier being burnt, as not defensible, had opened the way to Luxembourg: but newes comes, that a part of the wall was false at Yury, the duke turns the head of his army thither, makes his approaches, plants three Canons and a halfe vpon the brinke of the ditche, but vndiscreetly, without gabions, without trenches (this was to contemne the enemy too much) and without any couering for them that garded the artillery. The garrison sallies forth in the open day, in view of the army, and tie ropes vnto the ordinance, but the weight of them was the let they could not drawe them into the ditch, wherevpon they burnt their carriages and dismount them. They make trenches, and batter it towards Ardennes: they make a reasonable breach, but it was not assailed. In the midst of the breach, the besieged had a Casemate in the bottome of their trench, the which could not be taken from them without great slaughter of them that should attempt it. They draw from Sedan, Mouzon and other nere townes a supply of artillery and munition, and make a new battery: the besieged (being amazed) demand a parle. The bastard of Sombret, the Lord of Noyelles, Hannuyer, capitaine Famas, Gyles de Leuant, and others vnto the number of two thousand men, defended the place, the which could not bee assaulted without hazard and losse of men. So it was concluded, they should depart with their baggage, and to carry with them sixe faucons with munition to discharge them sixe times a peece. Then William duke of Cleues fortified the Kings army with ten thousand Lansquenets, and sixteene hundred horse, led by Martin de Rossan Marshall of Gueldres. William had lately espoused (but without any consummation of marriage, by reason of the Infants base age) Joan daughter to Henry of Albret and of Marguerite the Kings sister, whom hereafter we may see, by the nullity of this contract, to marry with Anthony of Bourbon duke Iuoye (which men held the strongest place in the country, and best furnished with men, artillery and munition) by their yeelding, caused Arlon to open her gates at the first summons. Luxemburg seemed of a harder issue. It was kept by three thousand foote and foure hundred horse. But the trenches, the approches and a breach made, although not reasonable to giue an assault (considering the trench was very deepe cut off the rocke) did so amaze the besieged, as they yeelded to depart with their baggage. The Earles of Mansfeild and Piguelin promised to defend it against all men: but wee shall shortly see how they will discharge their duties.

Montmedy a small place situate vpon a mountaine, so as they could not approach but on the one side, mooued with this happy successe, yeelded at the first view of the Canon. To conclude, such was the successe in this expedition, as onely Tionuille remained in the Emperours hands of all the Duchie of Luxemburg. But the great desire the duke of Orleance had to be at the battaile, which, in shew, was to bee giuen before Parpignan, drew him to Montpellier, where the King remained attending the progresse of the sayd siege of Parpignan, to bee ready to receiue the Emperour, if hee came to succour it. The duke had no sooner dismissed his army, and turned his backe to Luxemburg, leauing the duke of Guise as Lieutenant generall for the King, but the Imperials presented themselves before the towne, and receiued it very easily of the Earles of Mansfeild and Piguelin: and by the recouerie of Montmedy did wonderfully endamage all the French troupes at Stenay, and along the Meuse, if the duke (assembling what hee could of those companies, hee had dismissed) had not chased them from Montmedy, before they had any time to bethinke themselves. A stratageme which did pacifie the Kings wrath, for the dismissing of so gallant and braue an army, in the heate of their most honourable and happy successe. It is commonly sayd. That youth can doe what age doth know but cannot doe. What did this youthfull escape of the duke of Orleance benefit, preferring a desire of vncertaine glorie, before the fruits of an assured conquest? No increase of his reputation; small assistance vnto the Kings troupes, if hee had bene vpon the point of battaile, and a great preiudice to his Maiesties affaires: for this voyage of Roussillon, being wonderfull sumptuous, and of no profit, he might with great honour haue continued his victories, the which hee had so happily begunne.

Let vs now obserue the successe of this enterpryse. Annehaute hauing brought vnto the Daulphin, being at Auignon, eight thousand Suisses, sixe thousand French foote, of the old bands, whereof Charles of Cossé, Lord of Brissac was Colonel: sixe thousand Italians, foure hundred men at armes, and sixteene hundred light horse, whereof the Lord of Termes was generall; and Montpesat hauing ioyned with him at Narbonne, with his legion of Languedoc, and part of that of Guienne, sixe thousand Languenets, and a great number of Suisses, newly leauied, who being ioyned with their country-men, made about foureteene thousand, so as the whole armie was esteemed forty thousand men of all nations, two thousand men at armes, and two thousand light horse. The rough entertainment the Imperials gaue them at the castle of Saulles, with their Canon and Culuerin, made them to coniecture, that the intelligences which Montpesat (the first fire-brand of this attempt) pretended to haue, were vncertaine.

And what successe could Parpignan promise them, finding it very well fortified with plat-formes, well manned, and well furnished with artillery, and munition? what assurance could the assailants haue in a plaine field, behind gabions which they could not fill but with sand? The long time which was spent in assembling so many sundry nations, and the fruitlesse stay of Annehaute, sixe or seuen weekes in Piedmont, had giuen the defendants time to preuent their enemies designs. Moreouer winter approached, and the Emperour might well keepe the place without hazarding of his person or trying the chance of battaile, wherevnto the King fought by all meanes to draw him. This was the meanes to take cold, and to consume himselfe in vaine. Vpon the first raine there had bene no meanes to retire this army, by reason of the floods which runne on all sides from the mountaines, the which the neerenesse of the sea makes to ouerflow the champion country that lies neere it, so as being shut vp betwixt two seas, and the mountaine, the enemy would easily haue prevailed. The King

fruitlesse.

A King foreseeing these dangers, retired the Daulphin and his army, knowing but too late, that hee had bene ill serued. These flourishing troupes, fresh and resolute, might haue bene most profitably employed in the estate of Milan. But the assurance they gaue the King, to take Parpignan at the first, of two parties made him chose the worst. Moreouer, in an army there is alwaies some one of those that are of the Councel (being ialous, and enuying that any other should doe better) loue rather to crosse and frustrate designs, then to aduance them.

In the meane time, Anthony duke of Vendosme, Gouvernour and Lieutenant for the King in Picardie, suffered not his armes to rust: the enemy lurkt in diuers places, which did greatly annoy Ardres, and the country about Bologne: namely Montoire and Tournellon, the first being strong of situation, vpon a little hill, at the entry of the county of Oye, discouering all that come out of Ardres. The other vpon the edge of the county of Bologne, going from Ardres to Saint Omers, belonging to the count of Bures, one of the strongest places of the country. The taking and razing of these two, was the destruction of many others which held for them, and yet the enemy being the stronger in men, made some shew to try his forces. But on the other side, the country of Piedmont, was left in prey to the enemy, by reason that Annehaute, had carryed away the troupes for the enterpryse of Parpignan. The Marquis imbracing this occasion, assembled his forces at the bridge of Esture, a fit place to haue the riuers at commandment, and whereof he pleased, on this or the other side of Po, to assaile Piedmont. Langey Lieutenant for the King in Piedmont, to crosse the Marquis, drawes a company of foote out of euery towne, makes an enterpryse vpon Cony, Quieras and Alba, being ill furnished with souldiars. The vndertakers for Cony and Alba, wander in the night, and the day approaching, made their voyage fruitlesse. Aussun Gouvernour of Sauillan, & Centall of Riez, appointed for Quieras, planted their Ladders, notwithstanding the day breaking had giuen the alarum in the towne, they force it, and the castle hauing but one horse, and two sacks of meale in it, yeelded, after they had fasted six and thirty houres. Centall being made gouvernour, manned it with two thousand souldiars, which he leauied, as well vpon his owne lands, as else-where.

The Marquis posted to succour them, but the distance of the places required three daies journey. Hee tooke his reuenge vpon Villeneufue of Ast, Poiring and Cambian, small places not fortified, resolute to passe the Po, and to campe at Marignan, to take from the French all the plaine country, and to famish Turin and Pignerol, with the other places, which they held on this side, and to take from them all commodity of the Marquisate of Salluses. Five thousand foot, with some few men at armes, and light-horse-men, which Langey might oppose against the Marquis, who lead fiftene thousand foote, and two thousand five hundred horse, were not sufficient to stop his passage. But the industry of a well aduised commander, doth often that which force cannot effect.

Hee comes first to lodge at Carignan, fortifies himselfe speedily, and with continuall skirmishes, keepe the Marquis from forcing of the passage. The waters were low (it was in the moneth of Iuly) they might easily wade through both aboue and beneath Carignan, these two armies had already camped fiftene daies one against an other, and the weakest in number was almost tired. Langey himselfe with his exceeding toile, was growne lame, yet hauing his tongue and his spirits free, hee winnes from the Imperiall army, sixe thousand Italians: so as weakning his enemy, hee fortifies himselfe. The Marquis amazed, and fearing lest these should suborne the rest of his troupes, retires to Villedestelon and Quiers. It was a goodly thing to pursue them, and the Suisses had accepted of this proposition: but in steed of passing the Po, being muined by the perswasions of some, they turne their Ensignes directly to Pignerol, and Boutieres with them. Langey seeing himselfe abandoned, diuides his last-come Italians into Caselles and Siria, betwixt Turin and Vulpian, leaues about fifty souldiars in the castle of Carignan, and causeth himselfe to bee carried to Turin.

The Marquis hearing of this soudaine departure, sends to summon the place, and threatens the souldiars with death, if they attend the Canon. They yeeld at the summons. It was likely the Marquis would finish the forte which Langey had begunne. Hee therefore sends his brother Martin du Bellay, Gouvernour of Turin thither. Du Bellay sends

M m m

1542. sends before him capitaine Marnille, and the Earle Maxime, Anthony de Sesse, his two Lieutenants, with about fifty horse, to obserue the enemies countenance. The Earle leaues his companion in garde, and by a Trumpet, demands to speake with the capitaine of Carignan. This capitaine goes forth vnder his assurance (the Earle knew him well: he had sometimes serued him:) the Earle tels him, they are sent to inuest him, attending the troupes, and the Artillery, and assures him, that if hee makes any delaie, it will not be in his power to saue his life. So the capitaine terrified by this stratagem, deliueres the castle to the Gouvernour of Turin, who tooke order, the like inconuenience should not happen.

Then the Marquis, after two assaults, giuen in vaine to Chiuas, and repulsed by Ierosme of Birague, hee stayed at Casal, and Cesar of Naples, to open the way from Vulpian to Turin, hoping to recouer againe the Italians, lately fallen from him, came to assaile Cazelles. Langey discovering this defeigne, appointed the Cheualier Villegagnon to command them, who sent backe his enemy with the losse of about foure-score men, leaving his Ladders in the trenches, for a pawne of his vaine enterprise. Barges stopt the passage from Pignerol to Ruel, and did then greatly annoy the places which obeyed the French, beeing in the midst of them. The Marquis retired from Casal could not succour it in many daies. And therefore not to suffer the Suiffes to growe dull, for want of exercise, Boutieres by the commandement of Langey, parts from Pignerol with sixe Canons, finds a Conuent fortified, ioyning to the castle, without the taking whereof the castle might not bee attempted: hee makes a breach, takes it by assault in foure and twenty houres, and puts three hundred Spaniards which had the garde thereof, to the sword. Then hee approacheth the castle, makes a breach, and compounds with the besieged, that if within sixe daies the Marquis, or some for him, came not strong enough to raise the siege, they should depart with their liues. The Marquis aduertised of this composition, postes to succour them, and Boutiers beeing too weake to attend so great a power, retires to Pignerol.

In recompence whereof, Langey takes from him the castle of Montault and some other places in Monterrat, beeing hard to bee recouered in winter. And to pull so troublesome a thorne out of his foote, hee causeth Vasse, gouernour of Pignerol, to practise Paul Monnet capitaine of Barges, and then with some bands newly come from France: hee marcheth with speed to the said place, plants foure Canons in battery, and by meanes of a hole which hee made in the Tower, although not reasonable for a breach, hee receiues both the place & captain to the Kings seruice. The time fitted well for the war, and the King beeing loth to loose the oportunitie, and to imploy some part of the forces that were retired from Parpignan, sent the Lord of Annebault, with the regiment of Reichbroc, into Piedmont, with the old Italian bands, and the French, all the light-horse, and foure hundred men at armes. This new armie, might in shew (whilest the Marquis of Guast was at Carmagnole, doubtfull where they would make their first attempt) haue surprised Casal, and other places where Langey had intelligence. With this defeigne, hee secretly kept boates vpon the riuer of Po: within foure and twenty houres they might goe downe by water, and the Marquis could not come to succour them in lesse then foure daies march. Moreover, a friend (whom hee entertained neere vnto the Marquis) assured him to deliuer ouer vnto the French three thousand Lansquenets, and a thousand Spaniards, the which hee himselfe should lead, and cause them to bee surprised at a passage nere to Villedestelon, where they had no meanes to escape: so as passing the Po by night, they had sent some foure hundred horse, betwixt Carmagnole, and Villedestelon, and opposed the army betwixt Villedestelon and Quiers. Without doubt Langey beeing lame of his limmes, imployed all his wittes, to discover the Imperials purposes, and still to get from the enemy. But Enuy hath alwaies sworne the ruine of vertue. Some enuious persons breake off these two defeignes, and disswaded Annebault from these great enterprises.

Langey seeing his proiect croft by his enemies, hee parted from Turin with the Kings good leave, to acquaint him with many things touching his Maiesties seruice, which hee could not commit to any mans report: but death preuented him at Saint Saphorin, vpon the Mountaine of Tarare. The Marquis dislodging from Carmagnole, had left so few men in Cony, as a sodaine assault had carried it at the first. To this end Annebault parts with foure

A foure Canons, and causeth Rinoles to come with the Regiment of Reichbroc. The bridges of Carignan and Montcallier were broken, so as the Lansquenets must passe at Turin. Du Bellay Gouvernour of the towne, and Lieutenant for the King on this side Po, prepares their lodging, to imploy them as they passe. The Tower of Saint Bony, Chastillon, Saint Raphael, and other small places, vpon the Mountaine of Monterrat, did wonderfully annoy Turin: They could not goe to the places of Monterrat, whence the victuals (especially wine) came in great abundance, without being discouered.

He mounts foure Canons, departs with some troupes of horse, three ensignes of Frenchmen of his garrison, and the sayd Germaines, plants his artillery before Saint Bony, makes a hole, the Lansquenets giue the assault, force it, and put all they finde armed to the sword, except the capitaine, who was hanged by the lawe of armes, for that hee had endured the Canon in so weake a place. Chastillon could not bee battered but from an other mountaine opposite, and the horses could not draw vp the artillery. The Lansquenets, bestir with the prey of Saint Bony, force it vp by maine strength, and the besieged, beeing foure hundred good men of warre, terrified with the vse of Saint Bony, yeeld to depart with their baggage. Those of Saint Raphael, and some other places, send to demand a composition, and retreat. Onely Chastillon was defensible, and commodious for the gard of the passage, all the rest were razed.

The Lansquenets hauing ioyned with Annebault, hee besiegeth Cony, ouerthrowes a peece of the wall, and giues an assault, but it was the place which was best fortified: a great rampar behinde the breach, staies our men, the which after an houres fight they are forced to abandon, with the losse of many men of seruice: and the night following, two hundred horse, and eight hundred foot beeing entred, made the Admirall to sound a retreat, eight Canons diuided into two batteries, had so troubled the defendants, as not able to answer the diuers assaults, the towne in shew had bene wonne. But errors are knowne after they are committed. Vpon the retreat, the Earle Maxime, Anthony Marnille, and Thiède Bedaine an Albanois, encounter 200. Imperiall horses, neere to Bra: they charge them, de-seate, and take the most part of them, and the enemy hauing abandoned many small places, the Admirall reduceth to the Kings obedience Villeneufue d'Ast, Poring, Cambian and Riue de Quiers.

Winter did cut off all meanes of more happy successe. So dismissing his army, and sending the Lansquenets of Colonnell Reichbroc into France, hee tooke his way to Mont-Cenis: Mont-Cenis is subiect to tempests, as well as the sea. The way is straight, restrained by two mountaines, when any storme ariseth, the gusts of winde doe gather together balles of snow, vpon the tops of the hilles, which growing great as they roule downe, ouerthrow all they meet, and they to whom the straight is not knowne (for oft-times, the guides are lost) runne many times into caues full of snow. Annebault was in this danger, most part of them that did accompany him, found their graues vnder the snow: some loose their eyes, others die with cold, some returne benumbed of their feete, others of their armes, and hands, and few of this whole troupe inioyed his perfect health: himselfe was neere vnto a fatall end, if some men attending the end of the storme, in litle caues, had not preferred him from the iniurie thereof.

At that time, the King determined a reuenge against the inhabitants of Rochelle, and the neighbour Islands which were mutined against the Kings officers, for the custome of salt. Being arriued at Rochell, they assembled all in the garden, where his Maiefty did lie, confessed their rebellion publikely, and most humbly craued pardon for their offence. The furie of a King (saith the wise man) is the messenger of death: but a wise man will pacifie it. And the cheerefull countenance of a King is life, his fauour is like vnto a cloud, bringing raine in due season. The King mooued with the pittifull noyse of this people, crying for mercy, with their hands lift vp, kneeling on the ground, and teares in their eyes: did graciously remit their offence, freed the prisoners for this offence, deliuered their armes, and the keyes of the towne, commanded the garrisons both of foote and horse, to retire: receiued them into grace, and restored their liberties, and priuiledges: without doubt, A King maintaines his throne by clemencie. In the meane time, many practises, and enterprises, are made against Turin.

An enterprife
vpon Turin.

The Marquis of Guast, did at sundry times send vnto the Iudge of Turin, being borne at A Quiers, a number of carts laden with wine: and within the vessels which were as long as the carts, many armes, harguebuzees, pertuisans and corselets, to arme fourescore men, the which he should receiue into his house, disguised like councitrimen, bringing victuals to the market: who at the first tumult they should heare at the towne-gate, should issue forth armed, and seize vpon the Court of gard, in the market place, whilst that other souldiars armed with Iacks, and shirts of maile, morians, swords, daggers and targets, brought in five carts of hay, fixe in euery one (the hay being so cunningly laied, as cutting a cord within, the bundels would fall downe) should fight with the gard at the port, and fauour the entrie of eight hundred horse, and five thousand foot, which should be ready at the alarum. But the enterprife being discouered, made the Iudge to loose his head.

The enemy notwithstanding, lets not to proceed to the execution of his carts of haye, B in the absence of Bellay, whom his priuat affaires had called into France, after the death of his brother: and the twelfth of February, Boutiers, Lieutenant for the King at Turin, was well advertisid of some carts which were preparing at Ligni (an imperiall towne nere vnto Vulpian) but not of the manner of the former enterprife. They hazard their haye. Raimonet commanding at the gate, causeth Perrichon his Lieutenant to thrust a pike through the first cart, he drawes it out all bloody, the souldiars leape forth, and the first thrusts Raimonet through the body, with his sword. Raimonet takes him by the throat, and stabs him, his companions likewise come forth, force the gard, seize vpon the armes that hang vp, and become maisters of the port. Valiantly without doubt, but some-what too soone for them, their succours were a mile or more from the first bridge.

Captaine Saluadeur de Aguerre (who deserues to be registred, hauing a great share in the preseruacion of the towne) hauing then the gard of the place, hearing the alarum at the gate, and crying Sauoye, turnes head with his troupe, repulseth the five that were slipped out off the first cart, and goes directly to the gate. A well aduised Smith, who dwelt neere the gate, goes vp, and with a great hammer breakes the chaine, and lets downe the Portcullis, so as the Imperials could not enter. Boutiers and Maurins arriue, they shut the gates, kill some of the souldiars that were betwixt the gate and the Portcullis, the rest creepe vnder the Portcullis being too short, and Casar of Naples (who not many daies before, had left D three of his souldiars hanged at Turin, being executed for an other conspiracy against the towne) seeing his enterprife made frustrate, retired without the losse of any, but of his Lieutenant, who was slaine with the Canon. On the other side, the duke of Cleues made warre in Brabant, and had wonne some places from the Emperour. So as the Bourguig-nons turning all their forces against him, giue the duke of Vendosme meanes to victu-all Therouenne, to take Lilliers by composition, being a strong place, betwixt Aire and Betune, at the entrie of the marsh: to burne the towne, beat downe the gates, and to make it and many other places about Therouenne, Saint Omer, Aire, Betune, altogether vnprofitable for the enemy. And to the Earle of Aumale eldest sonne to the Duke of Guise, accompanied with the Lords of Laual, Saint André, Escar, Dampiere, Chastai- E guerau, Eguilly, and a great number of other young Gentlemen occasion to quicken the enemy with continuall skirmishes, and assaults, most commonly carrying away the aduantage.

Exploits in Picardy.

The happie successe, and the fauourable season, inuited the King, in the beginning of Iune, to goe to field with all his forces, with an intent to assaile Auennes, being vnfurnished of men. To this end hee sends the admirall of Annebault, newly aduanced to that office, by the death of the Admirall of Brion, that attending his comming, hee should inauest the towne; and sent to the duke of Vendosme, to come to him to Chateau Cam-bressis, which was the Rendezuous for all the army. So the King had the Admirals armie, as a forward on his right hand, that of the duke on his left, and his Maiestie in the midst. F Longuenall and Langey, with their companies of men at armes, and La Lande with a thousand foote, goe before, by the Admirals commandements, they take the fort by assault, which the enemies had built vpon the bridge of the riuer of Estruell: and before the towne had any knowledge thereof, they put to the sword three hundred men, that had the gard thereof. In this amazement, if they had furiously assailed the towne, in shewe it

Landrecy and other places taken by the French.

A it had beene forceable. Notwithstanding Landrecy, the castle of Emery, and some other places taken and fortified, gaue entry into the country of Hainault. Landrecy is situat vpon Sembre, a small riuer, but deepe and strong vpon the bankes, which issuing out of Oise, in the Duchy of Guise, runnes by Chastillon, Landrecy, Marolles, Emery and Maubeuge: then it runs into the Meuze neere to Namur. Beyond Sambre, is the Forrest of Mormaut.
Langey foreseeing that the garrison might vse the same stratageme, they had done in the yeere 1521. had placed a hundred horie betwixt the Forrest and the towne, that being fortified by the Admiralls comming, they might cut off the retreat to them that were assailed.
But as we haue said else where: Enuy doth alwaies crosse braue designses. The Admirall in steed of fauoring the enterprife, calls back them that were on the other side of the riuer, being ready to performe a worthy exploit. And the enemy seeing the way open, retires into the Forrest, and at their dislodging, consumes the whole towne to ashes: and not able to saue any thing but the Church, they burne their victuals and munition, which was sufficient to feed the Garrison of the towne a whole yeere. To repaire and make it defensibie, the King gaue the gouernment thereof to La Lande, who by a counter-trench couered it from a mountaine on the Forrest side, which lookes into the towne: he made three great bul-warkes, and filled the castle with earth to make a platforme, seruing as a flanke to the bul-warkes. Let vs marke an other fault, no lesse remarkeable. The duke of Vendosme, marching by the high country of Arthois to the Rendezuous, had suddenly reduced Bapaume to his C obedience. Auchimont, with the souldiars and citizens of all sexes, being retired into the castle, had but one well, which being dried vp in two daies, would haue brought them to the dukes mercy, when as hee receiues a second charge from the King, that vpon paine of disobedience, and to incur his disgrace, he should come the same day to him to Chateau Cam-bressis: so as he left the besieged at liberty.

The King hauing his forces vnited, he found the number to be about eighteene hundred men at armes, whereof the commanders were, the Daulphin, the dukes of Orléans, Vendosme, and Guise, the Earles of Saint Paul, Aumale and Brissac, the Marshall of Biez, the Admirall, Dampiere, Maugeron, Bosffy, Longuenall, Bonneual and many others, the number whereof would bee tedious: eighteene hundred light-horse vnder Brissac their Colonel: D twelue thousand Legionaries, Picards, Normands and Champanois, and twelue thousand low Germaines. The castle of Emery might bee fortified, and serue to second Landrecy: To that end the King sent the Daulphin, with part of the army, and some artillery. The Lord of the place, was at the warres in Gueldres, and they which kept it, yeilded vpon the first approches. Langey with his company of men at armes, and an esaigne of the legion of Picardy, was left for the defence and fortification of the place. The taking of Barlemont, an other cattle vpon the same riuer opened the passage vnto Bains, and to the gates of Monts in Hainault. Maubeuge was the enemies store-house, when as hee made any attempt against this Realme, and the towne being vnfurnished of men, able to attend the Canon, the inhabitants yeilded to the Daulphin, who (leaving Heyley captaine of a thousand men, of the E legion of Picardy, and Saint Yue with five hundred) he retired to the army.

The castle of Emery taken.

The army camped tenne leagues from Bains, and Bains was the ordinary retreat of the Imperials returning from the warre in Guelderland, who for the distance of the French campe, did lodge securely in the suburbs and villages about: considering that there were no horse-men at Maubeuge, Langey giues intelligence to Maugeron, that they had meanes to doe a braue exploit with honour and profit. Hee comes with his company of men at armes, and fourescore of the Admirals, and parting by night, they take (in their passage captaine Saint Yue) with fifty Harguebuziers on horse-backe, of the Garrison of Maubeuge, they lay an Ambush halfe a league on this side Bains, within a wood, and send La Mot Gom-drin Lieutenant to Maugeron, who remained sicke at Maubeuge, to enter the suburbs of F Mons, and by the firing of some houses to take from them of the towne the knowledge of the enterprife of Bains: and then to retire themselves into the ambush, in case they were charged, and they send M. ruiile Lieutenant to Langey (who commanded the ambush) the Vidame of Chartres, la Rocheignion, and the Harguebuziers on horse-backe, to surprise the Imperials in their suburbs, at the breake of daie. Euery thing was executed accordingly. About fixe-score horse, arriuing the night before, slept at their ease: they Mmm 3 awake

1543. awake them some-what rudely, and carry them away prisoners, spoile the Villages about, A returne to diuide their rich booty at Maubeuge. At the same time the Earle of Aumale tormented the garrisons of Auennes with continuall skirmishes: but still with the decrease of their men, and no lesse of his.

The Imperials surprised at Bains.

The prisoners of Bains had assured the King, that the towne was vnfurnished of men of defence. Hee therefore sends the Daulphin and the Admirall to subdue it to his obedience. But at the first approach they found themselves abused. The Imperials had the next day after the alarm, put fiftene hundred Lansquenets into the towne. Moreouer, for want of well viewing the fort, they had indiscreetly planted the Canon against the strongest part: the battery did small harme, many died there, and many returned wounded. B Alegre amongst others, a young man, who for his age had made good prooffe of his person, lost his life. Gaspard of Coligny Lord of Chastillon (he shall hereafter play many parts vpon the Theater of this History) for one of the first exploits of his armes, had a shot in the throat. So the great number of Germanes which entred into Bains, the want of munition and victuals (the Daulphin having brought but for two daies) the enemies which assembled at Monts, and at Quefnoy le Comte, the danger the King did foresee, in keeping his troupes diuided, the feare that going in person to ioyne with his sonne (with whom were his chiefe forces, hee should bee constrained to leaue the fortifications of Landrecy imperfect: his Maiesty drawes the Daulphin vnto him, hee causeth him to beate downe the defences of Maubeuge in his passage: and (for that the Emperour was wont to assemble C his forces there that came out of Germany and the Low-countries) to fire the towne.
Trelon and Glavon, places betwixt Auennes and Simay, did greatly annoy the frontiers of Tierasse and Champagne. Bonnenall and Stenay, Lieutenant to the duke of Anguien (who was in Prouence, as wee shall shortly see) had commission to preuent it. Being come to Trelon, with two thousand French, and foure thousand Lansquenets, those within at the first sight of the Canon yielded to haue their liues sau'd. Glavon afterwards submitted with the like facility. Both being burnt, but their fortifications not ruined, shall serue againe to lodge the Imperials.

Emery remained still whole, but it might not bee made fit to endure the attempts of a mighty army in twelue daies. Moreouer it must bee furnished with victuals. Two riuers D not to be waded through, betwixt Landrecy, and Emery, made the victualing difficult. A-uennes did cut it off, and the Commissaries of the victuals reported, that to put victuals into Emery, were in time to famish the army, and to take away the meanes to victual Landrecy, for the want of carriage, which was greatly hindred by a continual raine three weekes together. And that which did most import, newes comes to the King, that the Emperour armes, and approached neere the countries of the duke of Cleues, whom hee might not abandon to the pawes of a roring Lion, who had long time vowed his ruine. So the Towers of the Dungeon of Emery, and the portall of the walles flying into the ayre by mine, and other meanes, serued to fill vp the trenches.

Hitherto wee haue made warre with small resistance, hereafter wee shall haue a stronger E party, and by consequence more glory to crosse the Emperours attempts, whilest that the famine, and the winter driues him from before Landrecy. In the end of Iuly, Landrecy was in such estate, as without any support of an army, the fortifications might well bee continued, leauing some troupes at Guise, and the duke of Cleues (against whom the Emperour banded all his power) appealed to the King for succours. The King therefore to diuert the Emperours forces, to draw him to battaile, and to trie if he were accompanied with the like happinesse, leading his forces, in person, as he had beene by his Deputies, or at the least by the taking of Luxembourg, to make the way easie to succour his ally, he sent the duke of Vendosme to encounter the enemies attempts, vpon the frontiers of base Picardy, and to fauour the necessary victualing of Landrecy: and for the execution of his enterprife, F hee appointed the Duke of Orleans, vnder the conduct of the Admirall of Anne-bault. The Prince of Melphes, whom the King had left in Guise, with three hundred men at armes, and Brissac, Collonell of fiftene hundred light-horse, assembled to goe and ioyne with him about Rheimes. And the Eatles of Reux and Roquendolfe, with the forces of the Low-country, came from a skirmish at Landrecy, which they did hope to surprise,

A surprise, being vnfurnished of victuals. As they trouped together with a desseigne to attempt the castle of Bohain, newes comes that La Hunauday and Theau de Bedaigne an Albanois, (either of them being Captain of two hundred horse) were lodged neere vnto the castle of Bouhourie, making account to dislodge so earely, as they might come in time to part with the General. To surprise them, the Lord of Liques, Lieutenant to the Duke of Ascots companie, drawes eight hundred choice Bourguignon horses out of the Imperiall troupes, two hundred Englishmen, (the King of England being then fauoured by the Em-perour, pretended to invade vs, as we shall hereafter see) and foure ensignes of foot-men.
But lest he should come too late, he leaues them behind him, and marcheth before with his horsemen. At the first they charge Bedaignes lodging, who whilest the enemy was breaking open the gate, had leysure to put on his Cuirasse: he goes to horse-backe with his Lance in his hand, forceth furiously through them, ouerthrowes them: he meetes, and ioynes his troupe with La Hunauday, who was likewise on horse-backe. Aché and Bertrand of Foissy, Lord of Crené, Captaines of two hundred Harguebuziers on horsebacke, being lodged at the same Abbey, post to their succours: they force the bridg which the Imperials kept, and ioyntly with the light-horsemen repulse the enemy.

The Imperi-
als charge the French in their lodging, and are repulsed,

The alarme is giuen at Guise. Theau de Mares arriues with his two hundred light-horse, to second his companions: and Brissac borrowing about three-score horse of the Prince of Melphes (his troupes had already taken the way to Marle) goes to their ayde: hee is aduerti-C sed by Bedaigne, that the enemy (feare to haue the whole army vpon them) began to wauer: all the troupes ioyne and charge them suddenly: they ouerthrow their horsemen vpon their foot, which aduanced and put them to rout: they pursue them speedily, leaue three hundred dead vpon the place, carrie away sixe hundred prisoners, and winne foure ensigs and two cornets. The rest of the Imperiall armie going to assaile Bohain, hearing of this defeat, and doubting they should be forced to fight with the whole army, grew amazed, and retired to Quefnoy le Comte. The Duke of Orleans having already by the taking of Saint-Mary (for Montmedy and Yuoy were vnder the Kings obedience, since the first conquest made by the said Duke) Danuilliers, Vireton, Arlon, and other places, made his approaches to Luxembourg: he prest it with two batteries at a corner of the high towne towards France, D the one crossing the other: the one was committed to the Duke of Aumale, the other to Peter Stroffy a Florentine, kinsman to Pope Clement deceased: who (being lately come out of Italy) had brought three hundred Tuscan souldiers, all men of note and commandement: two parts armed with pikes, the third with Harguebuzes all with gile corselets. The towne was defended by foure hundred horse well appointed, and three thousand sixe hundred foote well armed, vnder the command of Gyles of Leuant, a man well esteemed by the Imperials, and John de Hen one of the Lords of Metz: yet at the fifth or sixth volley of the Canon, hauing demanded composition, they departed with their baggage.

Longueuill entred as Gouvernour with his company of men at armes. Anglure with a thousand of the Legion of Champagne: Haraourt a Lorrain, and the Vicount of Riuiere, com-E manding either of them sixe hundred men: and Ierom Marin a Boulenois, sixe-score Italians. The King hauing passed the Feast of Saint Michael there, and performed the ceremonies of the order, he disposed of the fortifications of the towne: then he prepared himselfe to succour Landrecy, which the Imperials beleeged, leauing the legionaries of Champagne and Normandy vnder the Cont Burienné, to fauour the victualing of his new conquest, the which he had committed to the Prince of Melphes, being assisted with the companies of men at armes of the Lords of Sedan, Lametz, Brienne, Langey, Estauges, La Mailleray: two thousand Lansquenets led by Fresnay, and ten thousand Legionaries.

The munition was prepared at Stenay and Mouzon: and for want of carriages which they had purposely stayed on all sides, the campe was so oppressed with famine, as the Captains F themselves had no bread to eate. So the souldiers being impatient and ill-affected: disdai-ning moreouer to see themselves disappointed of the sack and spoile of Luxembourg, wher-of they were in hope, they mutine and returne home to their houses: so as of ten thousand about three hundred remained vnder their ensignes: and Captaine Tauernier (whome the Duke of Orleans had left in Arlon) hauing spoiled the towne, tooke the same way with his company. Without doubt these poore townsmen newly conquered, shewed themselves

selues more faithfull then this wretch, who was appointed to defend them. They giue notice, that they had shut their gates against the Imperials that were come to ceaze on their towne: and that hauing taken their oath of fidelicy vnto the King, they were resolu'd to keepe their faith, so as they might be releued. Ten or twelue thousand Lansquenets were assembled vpon Mozell to hinder this victualling. Notwithstanding through the helpe of the men at armes, and the Lansquenets of Freinay, Luxemburg was victualled for three moneths, in despite of the enemy, and Arlon supplied with fixe hundred men, and such a quantitie of munition as the time would permit. The taking of Luxemburg had giuen the King meanes, to lend the Admirall with foure hundred men at armes, and ten thousand foote, to succour the Duke of Cleues, in whose fauour this warre was chiefly attempted. But the Duke after the taking of the towne of Dure, hauing no meanes to auoide the storm which threatned him with apparent ruine, nor long to withstand so great a power, made his peace with the Emperour, yeelded vnto him the Duchie of Gueldres, the County of Zutphen, and the forts of Heusberg and Sittart, to dispose thereof at his pleasure. At the same time Don Fernand of Gonzagua, Licutenant generall for the Emperour, beseege'd Guise: but being aduertised of the Kings arriuall at Coucy, who marched with great speed to incounter the Emperour, he resolu'd to make his retreat to Landrecy. Brissac with a number of men at armes, and harguebuziers on horse-backe, lies in ambush in a wood, to surprize them in their dislodging, and sends Theau de Bedaigne with his band, to enter skirmish with the Imperiall light horse-men, and to draw them (if it were possible) into the ambush. But Bedaigne not able by skirmish to make them abandon the body of their army which marched towards Landrecy, Brissac puts forth fixe hundred horse, to giue a furious charge, and he followes with his whole troupe to second them. Our men making a gallant charge, ouerthrow all they incounter: they kill and take prisoners, amongst others Don Francis of Esté, brother to the Duke of Ferrara, Capitaine Generall of all the Imperiall horsemen: and they presse the rest so hotly, as Gonzagua gathering together all his battalions, is forced to turne head to saue the rest. So Brissac suffered him to go on his pretended way, to ioyne with the Earle of Roux, who had long time before possessed the Fort of Landrecy.

Landrecy besieged.

Now are all the Imperiall forces before Landrecy, eightene thousand Germans, tenne thousand Spaniards of the old band, fixe thousand Wallons, ten thousand English, thirteene thousand horse, of the ordinarie bands of the Low-countries, Cleuois and high Germans. The campe being lodged, and the artillerie planted, the Emperour makes three batteries of fixe and fortie peeces against the bulwarke of Orleance, against the Castle, and against the bulwarke of Vendosme: and to keepe the defendants from making of any rampar, or comming to the defences, the bulwarkes and Courtins being not yet halfe finished, they plant a long Culuerin vpon a little hill towards the Forreft of Mormaut. This peece did wonderfully annoy them, and they had no ineanes to charge the Lansquenets which did guard it but on the one side. The river that passed by the trench of the base town, which they had abandoned, ranne betwixt them. Ricarnulle with forty horse, and Saint Simon with thirtie foote and some pioners, vndertake to seaze vpon this peece. They passe the water, surprize the Lansquenets, put them to route, draw the Culuerin by maine strength to the bulwarke of Orleance, turne the mouth of it against the enemy, and from the rampar kill many Bourguignons with their small shot, being come to the trench to rescue it. The King aduanced, but the Emperour (to do some notable exploit before his arriuall) ouerthrow a great part of the wall, making it very easie to assaile, and to take from the beseege'd all meanes to defend this breach, he put them into a portall of the base Towne which was abandoned: and about it he plants certaine field-peece, which commanded the breach. The souldiars were now brought to halfe a lose of prouant-bread a day, and to drinke faire water. So whilest they were well-affected, and had some courage (for men ill fed, and tyred with continuall labour faint soone) they must take his lodging from the Imperialls. Three hundred men appointed by La Lande and Esse, assaile them one morning at the breake of day, and before they could come from the Campe to succour them, they dislodge them. The breach inuities them to the assault: but the Emperour considering the valour of the defendants, fore-seeing that he should hardly take it by force, without the losse of many of his men, 1543.

A men, he makes his accompt that famine, and the continuall toyle of warre would in the end vanquish them.

The want of victuals, the weakenesse of the place, and the insupportable trauell which they must necessarily endure day and night, made the beseege'd to hazard Ruelle a Normand Capitaine of fixe hundred men in Landrecy, to aduertise the King, that extreme necessity would soone constraineth them to yeeld, but no force, whilest they had a man liuing. The King assembles his campe at La Fere vpon Oise: and knowing the resolution of these braue men, he went to lodge at Chateau Cambresys, holding it more honorable to turn head to the enemy, then by delays to make them thinke he would not fight: hee gaue charge to Landrecy to gather together all the fat Cattell, all the meale, and all the horses of labour hee could, that whilest the King should feede the Emperour with the hope of a battaile, they might refresh the beseege'd. The 29. of October he had drawne into Capelle twelue hundred sheepe, nine score cattell, fixe hundred sackes of meale, with so many horses and men: euery one carrying a sacke vpon his horse. The enemy scoured the countrie with a thousand or twelue hundred horse. Notwithstanding Landrecy hauing ioyned with Sansfear troupe, being resolute to passe on; or to sell their liues dearely, he causeth his peasants to march in battaile like to men of warre, to the end the enemy discouering them afarre off, should hold them to be men of another qualitie. Thus they brought their victuals safely to Landrecy, and then retiring a contrarie way, to that where the Imperials attend them, they returned safely to la Capelle. Our men are now victualled for fifteene dayes, but they haue need of rest, and the place to be refreshed with men.

Landrecy victualled.

The Emperour finding the King to approach, retired on this side the water, gathering together all his forces, which were before diuided; and his Maiestie embracing this occasion, sends the Earle of Saint Paul and the Admirall of Annebault, to retire them out of Landrecy, who had suffered much for his seruice, and to supply the place with fresh souldiers. They left the Lord of Veruein for the Kings Lieutenant, commanding a thousand men of the Legion of Picardie, and Rochbaron fixe hundred. La Lande and La Chapelle Rainsonin, in recompence of their good seruices, were made Stewards of the Kings house, and Esse a Gentleman of his chamber. The Dukes of Neuers and Aumale, the two brothers of Rochefoucault, the Lords of Andelot, Brest, Creuecœur, Bonniuet his brother, S. Laurent of Brittany, Mouy, S. Phale, and many other young Gentlemen, (who, to winne honour by some worthy exploits, had voluntarily entred into it) were rewarded according to their qualities. The souldiers were made Gentlemen during their liues, and such as had offended the law pardoned. The King had now put in execution one of his chiefe desseignes, in view of a great Emperour. Winter was comming, the continuall raine had made frustrate all their attempts of warre: and the long aboad of the two armies, had broken the wayes fixe leagues about. The Emperour camped high with aduantage, hauing a valley and a small brooke not easie to be passed betwixt both the armies. There was no reason to passe the water, and mounting to fight with the enemy. The Emperour likewise would not passe, to giue the first charge. So his Maiestie giuing the enemy hope by fires and great noyse, that he would fight, made his retreat towards Guise. The Emperour aduertised in the morning that the army was dislodged, he commanded Fernand of Gonzagua to follow, who (the better to discouer them) intended to put some men into a wood where they must passe, but it was too late: the wood was full of French Harguebuziers, who receiued these aduenturers so gallantly, as few escaped to carrie newes vnto their companions, of the manner of their retreat.

A braue retreat made by the French.

The Emperour followed with the rest of his forces, whilest the skirmish was maintained in the wood. Gonzagua seeing himselfe seconded by his chiefe Commander, drew forth a thousand or twelue hundred horse, with a good number of shot, and English light horsemen, on the right hand towards Bohain. But all in vaine, the Canon and baggage (hauing passed the wood) followed the King in safety who marched before, and the Dauphin holding the middle, with eight hundred men at armes, and fourteene thousand Suisses, hauing left Brissac with his light horse-men, and foure hundred men at armes to second him: moreouer the Suisses were behind in the battaile, and himselfe on the wing to support them, with an intent to fight with the Emperour if he passed the wood: but hee forced the enemy to retire, 1543. retire, not daring any more to appeare: many of his men were slaine, many taken, and few A of ours. The season was not fit to campe: so the King, to refresh his army, sent the Marshall of Biez to S. Quenin with foure hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foote to oppose against the Emperours desseignes vpon that frontier. The Lansquenets to Crecy vnder Cere, the Suisses to Assy: and he lodged the rest of his army along the river of Oise. And the Emperour seeing that he had lost his labour before Landrecy: and that hee had with losse and dishonour followed the French-army, he retired to Cambrai, winning much more with the Foxes skin, then he had done with the Lions: for by meanes of their bishop, who was of the house of Croy, perswading the light-beleeuing Cittizens, that the King meant to seaze vpon their towne, to spoile them of that ancient right of neutrality, and to incorporate them to the Crowne, hee made them yeeld to the building of a cittadell, by the B which of Free-men they are now become slaues; and this cittadell shall hereafter serue as a buckler against Landrecy. We haue here omitted, to describe the exploits of the Duke of Anguien in Prouence. The King had sent him to receiue the army by sea, which Barberousse brought to his succour. Being at Marceilles, Grignau Gouvernor of the towne, did acquaint him with an intelligence which he had with three souldiars of the garrisons of the castell of Nice, who promised to deliuer him the said castle. The Duke well informed of the Kings pleasure, beeing loth to commit himselfe rashly to the discretion of traitors, who might as well sell the stranger, as their owne countrie, armed foure Gallies, and sent them before vnder C the command of capitaine Magdelon, brother to the Baron of S. Blancart, himselfe with eleuen other Gallies, tooke the sea, and the aduantage of the wind, either to second his men, or to retire at need. When as Magdelon approached to Nice, fixe Gallies issue forth to inuest him, and fiftene more led by Ianetin Doria, chase him vnto the port of Antibio.

Magdelon hurt with a cannon-shot, died soone after: the Gallies beeing abandoned were a prey for Ianetin, and the Duke discouering by Moone-light, that Ianetin came to surpris him, retired speedily to Toulon without any losse.

A false pre-dise vpon the castle of Nice.

Hereupon Barberousse arriues at Marceilles with an hundred and ten Gallies. The King pretends Nice to be his, and heretofore engaged by the Earles of Prouence, to the Duke of Sauoy for a summe of money. They assaile it, and within few dayes bring it to composition. But without the castle, this victorie was fruitlesse: the castle seated vpon a high and D steepe rocke is hard to batter, and more vncasie to vndermine. So Barberousse seeing the time spent in vaine, and winter approaching, retired his Gallies to Toulon: and the Duke vpon hope of a battaile, came to the King to Cambresie.

The taking of Nice drew the Marquis of Guast to succour the castle: but aduertised of their liberty, he employed his forces else-where. Montdeuis was the first place of the kings obedience in Piedmont, which made head in his returne: and Boutiers hauing few French-foot to man it, he was forced to put in Suisses. The Suisses are more fit for the field, yet are they commended to haue done their duties. But after many assaults, and royles, want of vitualls, & despaire of succors, made them enter into capitulation: the which was il-observed E by the Spaniards: for they were stript, and many put to the sword. A wound which shall prooue bloudie to the Spaniards at the battaile of Serisoles. This victorie caused the Marquis to passe the Po, and to take from our men the commoditie of all the plaine of Piedmont on this side the water, (for that which they held on the other side, as Sauilan, Beine, Roque de Bau, and Cental, were without hope of succour) hee turnes head towards Carignan, whether the Lord of Auffun, and Francis Bernardin of Vimarcat (hauing no forces to make head against eightene thousand men, and to take from the enemy all meanes to make vse thereof) they razed the fortifications which were made the yeare before by Langer. But they had no meanes to finish their enterprife, nor leysure to recouer Moncallier, for the enemy meeting them at the passage of a riuer, slue many, and tooke the greatest F part of them prisoners.

This losse was readie to be seconded by that of Luxemburg which the Earle of Furstem-berg (a man variable in his parties) beseegeed in the Emperours name, with twelue thousand Lansquenets, and a good number of horse. The beseegeed wanted victualles, and the winter had not bene so violent in twenty yeares. They diuided the prouant-wine with bat-chets, and it was sold by weight, and then the souldiers carried it away in baskets. The King being

The Capitulation broken.

A beeing loth to loose any part of his conquests, sent the Prince of Melphe, with about foure hundred men at armes, Brissac Colonnell of the light horse, and some foot. The Earle seeing that the extreame frosts did kindle the courage of the Commanders and souldiers, who marched with an intent to fight with him, raised his campe & tooke his way to Germanie.
The Prince retired Longueval and his troupes, hauing bene long kept in, to enioy the libertye of the fields, leauing the Vicount of Eustauges, surnamed Anglure, with his company of men at armes, and fiftene hundred foot in it: then he disperfed his armie into Garrisons in Champagne and Picardy, to make head against the enemye the rest of the winter, and to preserue the last conquests. On the other side, his Maiestie knowing that the Imperials army was master of the field, he supplied Boutieres his Lieutenant in Piedmont, with B foure thousand French foote, leuied by the Lord of Tais in Prouence, Daulphiné, and therabouts, and fise thousand Gruyers (to ioine with the fise thousand Suisses, entertained in Piedmont) with some three hundred men at armes. With this supply he recouered the field which he had long before lost, tooke many small places betwixt Verceil and Yureé, forced Saint Germaine (a towne vpon the way from Chiuas to Verceil, where the counter-scarfe of the trenches is as high as the wall, so as the Cannon cannot beate at the foote thereof) to plant the ensignes of France, and then he marched before Yureé, and beseegeed it on all parts. But he had small credit with the souldiers: and the King was discontent with him, for that he had so lightly suffered the Marquis to fortifie at Carignan, and to victuall C it without any resistance. He therefore sends Francis of Bourbon, Duke of Anguien in Bou-tieres place, to be Lieutenant generall in Piedmont.

The Kings army in Piedmont.

The Duke hauing taken charge of the army, he marched downe the Po, and at the first subdued Palezol, Cressentin, Defanne, and other places thereabouts, to make the way casie to Carignan, the which kept all the plaine of Piedmont in subiection, which the King desired infinitely to haue in his power. But the meanes to force it: It is a place in a plain coun-trie, it was fortified with fise goodly bastions of earth, courtins, & a great trench, defended by foure thousand the best souldiers of all the Imperiall army, so as their onely hope to re-couer it was to famish them. To this end he burnt the bridge they had vpon the Po, whereby they might daily haue refreshing from Quiers, Ast, and other places vnder their command; and to cut off the victualles they had on this side the Po, hee went to campe D at Vimeux two miles beneath Carignan. They receiued also many commodities from Pancellier vp the riuer: a fort built vpon the said way a quarter of a mile from Carig-nan, cuts off all: and to enioy the riuer of Po freely, he builds a bridge of boates two miles beneath Carignan, with a fort at either end, manned with foure ensignes of Italians. Then passing the water, he went to campe at Villedestelon betwixt Carignan and Quiers. The Marquis made hast to assemble his forces to succour the beseegeed, and came to lodge at Carmagnole. Holding this lodging he might fortifie himselfe, and suffering our men to die for hunger in a country already wasted on that side Po, he found the Marquisate of Saluf-ses full of all commodities, wherewith he might without danger refresh Carignan. The E Duke prevents him, and lodging at Carmagnole, driues the beseegeed to that extremity, as within few weekes they were drawne to the Kings obedience. Carignan was the chiefe tro-phée of the Marquis victories: he was loth to loose it without some blowes, and the Duke as loth to loose a prey which was readie to fall into his hands.

So the Court filled with the hope of an approaching battaile, that gallant nobility which had alwaies so willingly gone to horse-backe at the first bruite of a battaile, would now haue bene loth to haue lost the sport. All post thither, some with leaue, others without. Gaspard Lord of Chastillon, Francis of Vendosme Vidame of Chartres: the Lords of Saint Anaré, Dampierre of the house of Clermont in Daulphiné, Iarnac, the three brothers of Bonniuet, Bourdillon, Escar, the two breethren of Genly, Asier master of the Ordinance, la Hunauday the onely sonne of the Admirall Annebault, Rochfort, Lusarche, Wartis, La Signy: to conclude, the Court was left in a manner naked: namely of those, which as the Sunne-rising, F followed the Daulphin, and he was not held an honest man that would not haue a share in it.

A happie arriual: they were all men of accompt, they had by this voyage emptied their owne, or their fathers coffers, and the Dukes treasure was so wasted, as both He, his Treasurers,

1544 rers, and all the rest of the campe had emptied their purses, and for want of money the souldiers would haue bene lesse courageous in this occasion that was offered. But what would not these braue Noblemen do for the Kings seruice, and the authoritie of so gallant a prince that commanded: With their voluntarie lendings, the Duke contents his troupes, attending forty thousand crownes which Langoy brought. This was the fourth part of that which was owing to the strangers: but they must seeke it elfewhere. The Emperour leuied a mighty army in Germany, to inuade the frontiers: moreover, a great storme threatned vs from beyond the seas, which soone after fell vpon Boulen and Montreuill.

They had no meanes to content the souldiers, if they had not presently found out the want of their numbers: they therefore resolute on Easter euen the seuenth of April, to make a priuate muster of euery company apart, and giue them hope to recieue money the next day. But they did fore-see, that Easter day would not passe (the armies beeing so neere without some blowes) and by consequence the enemies presence and the necessitie of fighting would easily make them deferre the souldiers pay. And so it proued. The Marquis set forward with an intent to passe on this side the riuer of Po, to keepe our men on that side the water, without victuals and without money, and to recouer the Marquisate of Salusses: being assured to find corne and meale there to victuall his campe, and the towne besieged, forcing the French army in the end to seeke their retreat. Without doubt this had bene there ruine, for the souldiers beeing vn timer, what meanes was there to keepe the field? and retiring into townes the Marquis would haue spoiled Piedmont, burnt the country, driuen away their cattell and ruined the countri-man. This was his desseigne, and to recieue ten thousand men at Yuree, which the Earle of Challan brought, and with this supply to passe by the valley of Aoult, into Sauoy and Bresse, whilest the Emperour shold make some great attempt vpon the frontiers of Champagne.

But he reckoned without his host. The Duke takes counsell, and resolues to fight with him on the way before he should recouer a country of strength, and to that end giues the foreward to Bontieres, (who vpon the newes of this bataille was returned from his house) takes the bataille to himselfe, and commits the rerward to Dampierre. On Easter day euery man is vnder his ensigne, they discover the Imperials marching from Serifolles to Sommeriue, and the Duke to diuert them, sends forth Aussun with his troupe and some shot vnto a high ground of aduantage, who placing his harguebuziers in a little groue, seeks to draw the enemy by skirmishes into the ambush. But the Marquis dares not charge home, he feares some disorder before he had discovered his aduersarie. The Duke marcheth with about three hundred horse, and the rest of his shot, and going to the hill, puts all his horse in bataille vpon the side, and in the midst plants three mynions, which shooting against a battalion of the enemies, standing in the valley, kills some men, and giues a shew of bataille. So the Marquis fearing to be fought withall as he lodged, retired to Serifolles from whence he parted. Night approached, and the Duke seeing the Marquis returne to Serifolles, retired to Carmagnole, leauing two hundred horse to obserue the enemies countenance in the night, then an houre after mid-night he goes to field.

The Marquis seeing this retreat, perswaded himselfe, the French would passe on the other side of Po, and leaue him the passage: so as changing his desseigne, he parts an houre before day, to ouertake him before he should passe the riuer. To returne to the fort which they had left, had bene (by some signe of flight) to daunt our men, and to giue courage to the enemy, necessitie therefore presseth both the one and the other to fight. The Imperials had ten thousand men more, and the aduantage of the place: they had recouered that high ground from whence our men were parted the night before: they should haue kept it, seeing their meaning was to returne. On the right hand of our men marched the Prince of Salerne with tenne thousand Italians, seconded by eight hundred horse sent by the Duke of Ferrara, to succour the Imperials. In the midst Aisprand of Madruce with many other Germaine Colonells and Captaines, who commanded tenne thousand Lansquenets all in white armour: and on the left, (right against our Gruyens) Don Raimond of Cardone with a battalion of fixe thousand men old souldiers, halfe Spaniards, the rest Germans: betwixt these two nations the Marquis of Guast with the like number of horse: on the other side of the Spaniards the Prince of Sulmona, sonne to the deceased Don Charles de two armies.

Langoy

A Langoy Viceroy of Naples, Colonel of all the horse, with the like number of horse: tenne peeces of Cannons by the Germans, and as many by the Spaniards, placed with such aduantage as our French could not march against them, but they shot into the midst of their battalions. Thus they marched in forme of three great battalions of foote, either hauing a wing of horsemen. Their order being viewed, the Duke brings his army into the like forme: on the right hand a battalion of the old French bands, beeing about three thousand besides the shot, led by the Lord of Tais their Generall, hauing on the right hand the light horsemen vnder the Lord of Fermes: on the left hand Bontieres with fourescore men at armes: then on his left hand a battalion of Swisses, of about three thousand men, supported on their left hand by the Duke of Anguien with a great troupe of horse: and on the Dukes left hand foure thousand Italians, and Gruyens hauing on their left Dampierre, with all the Guidons and archers of the men at armes. The troupes thus disposed and ordered, he sent forth before the batailles about eight hundred shot, for a forelorne hope, led by capitaine Montluc: eight peeces of artillerie before the battalion of the Swisses, and the like number before the Gruyens.

At the Sunne-rising the two armies stand one against another: the skirmish begins, and whilest that either army seeks to get the flanke of his enemy, they continue vntill eleuen of the clocke. In the end, the enemy finding himselfe too strong by a third part, hee comes to the charge. Tais aduanceth to fight with the Prince of Salerne, but he was commanded by the Marquis, not to stirre before he gaue him charge. So Tais seeing the Prince make no shew to march, and that our Swisses being weake in number could not withstand the shock of the Imperiall Lansquenets, which came to charge them: he turnes the head of his battalion, and comes neere to the Swisses, Bontieres beeing betwixt both. The Imperials likewise change their desseigne, and of their great Squadron make two, one against the Swisses, the other against the French.

At the same instant the horsemen of Ferrara approached to charge the French battalion in flanke when as the armies should ioyne. Termes with his light horsemen beeing loth to attend this hazard, chargeth them furiously, breaks and ouerthrowes them vpon the prince of Salerne: and thinking to be well followed, chargeth into the midst of the Princes battalion: but his horse was slaine and himselfe taken. A happy charge, for without it, it was likely the Prince of Salerne had marched vpon the flanks of the French battalion, and whilst that he was couered with the Ferrarois that were driuen vpon him, the French and Swisses had leysure to deale with their Lansquenets: Who falling vpon the Swisses and French, fought long with the like armes and a doubtfull euent, till that by the ayde of the Frenchmen at armes led by Bontieres, all the Imperiall Germans were broken. The Marquis seeing his Germaines in rout, vpon whom he had anchored his chiefe hope, retires apart without striking stroke, and by this meanes makes the victorie easie for Dampierre vpon the enemies horsemen who supported the Spaniards. But this old battalion of Spaniards and Germans incounter our Italians and Gruyens with great aduantage: at the first charge they are surprised with feare, and all but the Captaines, which fought in the foremost ranks, flie.

Without doubt it was wisely aduised of the Duke to leaue the Swisses whome he promised to assist, to second these poore amazed foules, for without him not one had escaped. He suddenly chargeth these old souldiers, and taking one corner of their battalion, forceth through them, and leaues not any ensigne of the whole battalion standing: yet not without great slaughter of his men. The Lord of Affier, the Baron of Oyn, Lieutenant to the Earle of Monttrauel, Montsaillais ensigne to the Baron of Curfoll, de Glaine, Gouernour of Ca-hors, Cornille and the Dukes two Squires ended their dayes there. Saint Amand (otherwise called Rochesmart) and Fernaques were found among the dead carcases languishing of their wounds: yet they were afterwards cured: many others were slaine or hurt, whereof foure- teene or fiftene were Captaines or men of account, but he that feares leaues, must not go into the wood.

But this is not all, for the front of the Spaniards (who by the voluntarie route of our men that ranne away, had no foote-men to encounter them) come furiously and charge the Duke, who hauing no foot-men to second him, loofeth more at this second charge then at the first: and to increase the danger (which had bene sufficient to daunt a mind inclining

We may truly say, hee is well kept whome God keeps. The Duke was readie to bee swallowed vp, when as retiring on the right hand, to free himselfe from the Imperials shot, which compassed him in on all sides, the Spaniards had newes of the defeat of the rest of their men. They see at the same instant some troupes rally themselves vnder the Cornet of their enemies Generall. So their first heate grew some-what cold, and they beginne their retreat, but they had no time to finish it. The Duke appoints Aussun with about fiftie horse to charge them vpon the flanke, and himselfe with those that came vnto him, followed them in the tayle. All giue way, all flie, euery man seekes to saue himselfe, some in the wood, some in cottages: they beate downe and kill, all are taken or slaine, few escape.

He wins the battaile.

The French pursuing the victorie a mile, and especially the Suiffes, incensed with the foule warre the Imperials had made at Montdeuis, and crying in reuenge of that day, Montdeuis, Montdeuis, put all they encountered to the sword without mercie. In the meane time the Prince of Saleme, seeing the whole defeat of the Germaines and of their horsemen, made his retreat without any great losse. And the Marquis of Guast posted away to Ast: but at his departure he had said vnto the Citizens: That if hee returned not a Conquerour, they should shutte their gates against him. They take him now at his word. Without the cowardie of the Gruyens, the battalion of Spaniards had in shew beene defeated at the first charge: the Duke of Anguien had not receiued so fatall a checke in his troupe, the retreat of the Prince of Salerne had not beene so easie: and pursuing the Marquis, they might haue ouertaken him, before he had recovered Milan or any place of safety. But the necessitie this braue Duke had to be succoured at need, made this happie victorie vnperfect in that respect. There were slaine of the enemies about fifteene thousand of all nations, in lesse then a quarter of a league.

Number of the dead and prisoners.

Of Germaine prisoners there were two thousand, siue hundred and twenty: Alsprand of Madruce their Colonnell, was found among the dead bodies maymed in many parts of his bodie: Spaniards sixe hundred and thirtie, amongst them Don Raymond of Cardone and Mendoza, with seuen or eight other Spanish Captaines. Don Charles of Gonsagua and many other Italians. The spoile was great and rich, an hundred thousand Crownes in mony, & plate, 15 peeces of artillerie, all the bridges they had brought to passe the Po, much munition, meale, and other victuals wherewith they presumed to releue Carignan, about eight thousand corcelets of Milan, and moueables of diuers sorts of great value. Of the French two hundred slaine and of men of name, besides the aboue-mentioned the Ensigne-bearer to Aussun and his Nephew: Charles of Dros Gouvernor of Montdeuis, Desero of the Countie of Nice, Colonnell of sixe ensignes of Italians, the Colonnell of the Gruyens a Dauphinois, in the absence of their Earle: la Melle a Prouençall, Captaine Passin a Dauphinois: Barberan and Montault Gascons, and few others: of the Suiffes, the Baron of Saxe was hurt in the throat with a pike, and none else of accompt.

If the Duke of Anguiens arriual had beene pleasing to the army, farre greater was the reputation which he got by this famous victorie with al the nations of Europe, and the credit he purchased with men of warre, commending his wisdome in so young yeares, admiring his valour, and louing his courtesie and bounty, vertues worthy of a great Prince and Generall of an army. This bloody victorie had terrified the whole country, and amazed Milan. The Marquis of Guast stricke vp the drumme, and twenty dayes were spent before that any man came to his colours. Moreouer, the King had made a new leuie of fixe thousand Grisons: the Duke of Somme, the Earles of Petillane, Mirandola, Martinengue, Peter Stroffy, Valerio Vrsin, Robert Malatesta, and many others leuied an army to ioine with the Duke of Anguien.

There was some likelihood after so furious a battaile, to deprive the Emperour of the estate of Milan. But he armed vpon the Rhine, his troupes were ready to invade the frontier.

The

A The English were at sea, and the King had rather need to draw forces out of Italy, then to supply them. The Duke therefore to draw them speedily to the Kings deuotion, sends the Lords of Tais with the French bands, two hundred men at armes, sixe great Cannons with some other peeces, to force some places vnder the Emperours obedience. Saint Damian a place of Montferrat, had not plantd the French nor the Spanish ensignes: notwithstanding beeing without hope of succours, they yeilded to the yoke, vpon condition that they should haue none but a French garrison. Montcallier followed, beeing a strong place: Vigon, Pont d'Eure, S. Saluador, Fresenet of Pau: to conclude, all Montferrat, except Casal, Trin and Alba yeilded their neckes to the French obedience. And the Duke going to campe at Carignan, did by many forts so restrain the sallies of the beseged, and the entrie of victuals, as extreame necessitie hauing forced them to demand composition, they departed with their armes only, without ensignes or drums, taking an oath not to carry arms for fixe moneths against the King nor his allies. This done, the Duke sent vnto the King, six thousand French souldiars of the old bands, and six thousand Italians to oppose against the Emperours inuasions.

Effects following the victorie.

On the other side the Duke of Somme, with the other of the French faction, hauing leuied ten thousand foot, but few or no horse, came to ioine with the Duke of Anguien: and the Princes of Salerne and Sulmona attended with a number of horse and foote, to fight with them at the passage of a riuier. They send to the Lord of Tais to demand a conuoy of horse. He promiseth but performs nothing. And they (not able to retire without shame) charge the foot which were farre from their horsemen, and put them to route: but they consider not, that leauing a place of strength, they giue the enemy the aduantage they had of them. The horsemen come and charge them in flanke, as they had broken their ranks, thinking to haue gotten the victorie, and put them to flight, they take many prisoners of qualitie, kill few, and no man of marke except Vakrius Vrsine, the rest saued themselves at Quieras and Carignan. We commonly say, that a small ayde doth a great good. The footemen beeing overcome, an hundred men at armes had made the victorie absolute.

This checke doth not daunt them. The Duke of Somme beeing newly deliuered from prison, (the Prince of Salerne his Kinsman had freed him, fearing lest the Emperour should do him some disgrace) and Peter Stroffy gathering together sixe thousand men of this shipwracke at Mirandole, meaning to ioine with the Duke of Anguien at what price fouer, he beeing vnfurnished of forces, for besides the twelue thousand men he had sent vnto the King, all his Suiffes (except two thousand) had beene for want of pay dismissed. They giue ouer the playne, and passe out of Parmesan with much toyle, by the mountaines of Genoa.

The Marquis aduertised of this new leuy, gathers together what forces he could of horse and foot, drawes forth his garrisons, and to stop their passage attends them at the foot of the mountains. They aduertise the Duke: who hauing no men, but for the guard of his places, resolues notwithstanding to effect two things at once, and both to surpriue Alba where they had left no men but for the gards of the gates, and to succor Stroffy, and finding means to aduertise him, that he should march towards Alba, whereof the enemy was left in doubt. The Duke comes thither on the one side, and Stroffy on the other: he makes a hole in the gate towards the mountaine, on the other side of the water, about ten foot long: prepares to giue an assault, and Stroffy the scalado, which the beseged seeing, they grow so amazed, as they yeeld the place, and depart without carrying away of any thing.

The Marquis makes haft to succour them, but knowing the Towne to be lost, frustrate of his hope, he retired, and the Duke hauing taken many places thereabout, returned to Carnagnole. Within few daies after the Marquis practised a suspension of armes, which beeing confirmed by their two Maiesties, there followed a truce for three moneths. Let vs now see the enemies attempt inuading the realme. The Emperour had no sooner found the King of Englands discontent, (whereof the marriage of the King of Scotland had bene the chiefe motiue) but forgetting, or rather dissembling the iniuries he had receiued, he winns him to his deuotion, although he had assured the Pope neuer to treat any alliance with him, vntill he had repayed the offence done vnto the sea of Rome, intitling himselfe supreme head, vnder God, of the Church of England, and punishing them which maintained the authority of the Pope and the Church of Rome.

Warre in Picardy.

Saint Disier befeeged.

The death of the Prince of Orange.

Thus two grey-hounds tearing one another in peeces, lay aside their choller to runne after the wolfe their common enemy. And for that, during the warre of the Dukes of Wirtemberg, by the bond of the Princes of Germany with the King, the Emperours desseignes had bene greatly crost, now perswading them (and aboue all the Protestants) that he hath done more then his duty to the French King, for the calling of a Councell, to call backe them that were strayed from the vnion of the Church, and to resotme the Pope and his Ministers (but the King onely had hindred this assembly) to gve him prouision of men and money, and ioyntly to band with him to the destruction of this realme. So hee sends the Earle of Furtemberg with an army before Luxemburg, which hauing maintained the sege to the extremitie for want of victuals, the Vicont of Estauges was forced to capitulate, and to depart with baggage. Commerce was the second triumph of his victories, Ligny in Barrois the third, being the way for victuals which came to him from Metz and Lorraine. The castell is commanded by two or three mountaines, and the beseegeed not able to stand to their defences, came to parle, when as the Imperials entring behind, compassed them in, that were come to the breach, attending the assault: and take them prisoners with small slaughter. Without doubt the place was not to withstand the force of an Emperour, beeing in person: neither was it so contemptible, but it deserued an honest composition. But the Earle of Brienne Lord of the place, and Rouffy his brother, Eschemais and Gonzalles, who commanded about an hundred men at armes, and fiftene hundred foote, won small reputation. Doubtlesse the Earle of Sancerre will winne farre more honour in the defence of Saint Disier, a place ill flanked, ill rampared, and vnworthy to oppose against an Imperiall army. Whilest the King assembled his forces, beeing tenthousand Suisses, sixe thousand Grisons, sixe thousand Lanquenets (whereof the Duke of Nevers was generall) and the twelue thousand men which came out of Piedmont: he sent the Earle of Sancerre, to Saint Disier (whither the Emperour turned the head of his victorious army without contradiction) with the Duke of Orleans company, of an hundred men at armes, whereof hee was Lieutenant, and some other troupes of horse: La Lande and the Vicont of Riuere either of them with a thousand foote. The Emperour beeing come before the towne, hastens his approaches and trenches, makes two batteries, and plants sixe great Culuerins towards the castell, to beate into the towne, and to hinder their ordinarie sallies, he turned the water out of the ditch, and brought them to the vse of three wels onely, which hardly could furnish the souldiers: and by a continuall battery makes them carefull to repaire it. La Lande was tyred with this toyle, and retiring at night to his lodging to refresh himselfe, a Cannon-shot passing by the breach through the Towne, takes off his head, whose losse was much lamented beeing a valiant Gentleman and a good souldier. In exchange, about the same time the Prince of Orange going to visit the Emperour in the trenches, a Culuerin shot into a heape of stones, hurt him in such sort as he died, to the great greefe of the Emperour and his whole army.

The breach was reasonable, and they come to the assault. Eightene ensignes of Spaniards go to it and fight hand to hand with them which were beseegeed, for an houres space. The Emperour causeth nine or tenthousand Germans, to aduance speedily to succour them: but if the assault was fierce, the defence was no lesse valiant. Our men ouerthrew the Spaniards from the breach into the ditch by maine force. The Emperour sends about eight hundred men with veluet cassocks, and bourguinets on their heads: they turne them likewise downe. Eight ensignes of Germans renew the assault with many small barrells of powder and wild-fire. They are likewise repulsed with such shame and losse, as all their engines and deuises remaine in the ditches at the defendants discretion: (and very happily, for they wanted powder) and seuen or eight hundred slaine in three assaults, gaue a certaine testimony of the valour of the beseegeed. A Cannon shot did miraculously take away the Earles sword which he held in his hand without hurting him, but lightly in the face.

This braue defence made the Emperour thinke, that the beseegeed would accept of an honorable composition. He sends a trumpet to trie their minds, but hee had no audience. So the Emperour ceaseth his batterie to come to the mine. The beseegeed discouer it, and in the night send forth Limieres a Norman Captaine, who force the Spaniards to abandon the trenches, which they had brought to the bulwarke of victory: they bring some pioneers into

A into the Towne to tell newes, and cuts the rest in peeces. Moreouer, the Duke of Aumale beeing at Stenay vpon Meuze, did greatly annoy the Imperials campe, and cut off their victuals from Bar-le-Duke. They must therefore seeke to win by policie, what they could not get by force. The Lord of Granuelle had surprisid a packer, wherein he found the Alphabet of the Ciphre, whereby the Duke of Guise did communicate with the Earle of Sancerre. By this meanes he counterfeits a letter in the Dukes name, and makes an vnknowne man to giue it secretly to a French drumme, returning from the enemies armie for some prisoners, that he should deliuer it to the Earle. The contents were, that the King knowing in what want of victuals and powder they were ready to fall, commanded them to make so favourable a composition, as their men might be saued, hauing yet no meanes to succour them. They had endured fixe weekes sege, their victuals and munition grew short, and their powder was not sufficient to indure another assault. So they obtaine twelue dayes truce, during the which, they should vnderstand from the King, if he had meanes to succour them: or if he would be pleased, that for want of succours within the time, the horsemen should depart with their armes and horses, their Cornets displayed, and caskes on their heads: their footmen with their armes marching in battaile, ensignes displayed, and drums sounding, carrying with them all their iewels, and foure peeces of artilerie furnished, at the choice of the beseegeed. This treaty pleased the king, and they departed according to the capitulation. As honorable a composition as cuer was read of, for men beseegeed by so great an Emperour, with all the forces of the western Empire, in a bad place which had no better esteeme then a Country towne.

But what was the moriue of this easie accord? The Emperour was not ignorant of the small hope they had of succours, and that within few dayes famine would bring them to his subiection. But he would take from the King of England, (who camped before Boulon and Montreuil) all colour of excuse, and let him know that the fault was not in him, if the treatie were not fulfilled, according to the which, without any stay elswhere, they should ioyne their forces neere vnto Paris, (the which vnited together, would haue made threescore and tenne, or foure-score thousand foote, and eightene or twenty thousand horse) and to force the King to fight with disadvantage, or to suffer his country and subiects to be ruined before his face. Moreouer, he did foresee, that the Daulphin camping vpon the riuier of Marne, with the bands come out of Piedmont in good order, and well armed, would make him consume his army, whilest the king made a bodie of forty thousand men, the which confronting him beeing fresh, lustie, and resolute, might cause him more losse and dishonour then he had receiued in Prouence.

And therefore the Emperour, to proceed in his conquests and desseignes, which he had with Henry King of England, came to lodge at Vitry in Parthois. Here he learns that the King of England is not resolu'd to passe on, before he had reduced Boulon and Montreuil to his obedience: the first dislike which shall soone draw the Emperour to Bruxelles. Hee considers, that the trauels past at Saint Disier, and want had greatly wasted his souldiers: that to proceed, were to ingage both his men and his person in a Labyrinth, from whence hee should not easily free himselfe with honour: that hauing in front a mighty army, still prospering, hunger (besides the Kings power) would be sufficient to force him to make a shamefull retreat: that if the English take Boulon and Montreuil, he will impart nothing to him of his conquests; that beeing strong on this side the sea, he will be more obstinate when there shall be any question to treat with him. So as he begins to tast of some proposition of peace, mooued before Saint Disier by the Lord of Granuelle, and his Confessor a Spanish Monke, of the Order of Saint Dominick, and of the house of Gasmans. A day is appointed for the meeting of the Deputies at La Chaussée, betwixt Challons and Vitry. For the King there came the Admirall of Annebault, and Chemans, Keeper of the Seale of France: for the Emperour, Fernand of Gonzagua: and to know if the King of England would enter into it, they sent the Cardinall of Bellay, Raymond chiefe President of Rouan, and Anbspine Secretarie of the State and Treasurer.

As the Emperour camped towards the riuier of Marne, a league beneath Challons, and within two leagues of the French armie, a riuier beeing betwixt both, William Earle of Furtemberg, parted about mid-night with a guide only, to view a foard which he had in former

A treatie of peace.

1544. times passed, when as he came into France for the Kings service. Being come to the foard A he leaues his guide vpon a banke: fownds it, finds it easie and passeth the riuier. But he discovered not some Gentlemen of the Kings house, and part of the Admirals company, who had the guard that night, who without giuing any alarme, put themselves betwixt the riuier and him, take him without resistance, lead him to the Campe, know him, and send him to the Bastille at Paris, from whence he shall not depart, vntill he hath payed thirty thousand Crownes for his ranfome. In the meane time the Emperour sees his army readie to breake for hunger: they cut off his victuals behind and on either side. And if that goodly Capitaine whom the Daulphin had sent to draw into Espernay the victuals thereabouts, to breake the bridge vpon the riuier, and to spoile the corne, wine, and other prouisions, which could not be faued, had carefully executed his commission, the Emperour (disappointed of the munition and victuals which he found in Espernay, and hauing no meanes to passe B the riuier) had not in the end enioyed those commodities, which hee found in Chasteau Thierry, another store-house of the French campe, whereby his troupes languishing for hungar, recovered some strength.

In the end the Daulphin being come to campe at La Ferté vpon Iouarre, and hauing sent a good number of men to Meaux, to hinder the Emperours passage, who deuising to make his retreat by Soissons, he takes his way by Villiers-coste-Retz, and vnder-hand resumes the proposition of peace with the King. The King knowing that a bataille could not be giuen in the heart of his realme, so neere vnto his capitall city, without a very doubtful and dangerous consequence, and the losse of men, and in case he should vanquish, the King of England, and the Earle of Bures would encounter him with as mighty an army as his owne: that by the losse of one, and (perchance) two batailles, his realme were in danger: that winning them he should get little, especially vpon England being an Iland: Moreouer, the Marshall of Biez was almost forced to yeeld vpon Montreuil to the English, for want of victuals and succours: the sufficiency of the Lord of Veruein Gouverneur of Boullen, as we shall shortly see, was not without cause suspected: and without a conclusion with the Emperour, hardly could these two important townes be releued.

The King therefore sent the Admirall of Annebault againe to the Emperour, being in the Abby of S. John des Vignes in the suburbs of Soissons, where in the end was concluded: D That Charles Duke of Orleans should within two yeares after, marry with the Emperours daughter or his neece, daughter to Ferdinand King of Romanes, and at the consumation of the said marriage, the Emperour should inuest the said Duke of Orleans in the Duchy of Milan, or in the Earldome of Flanders, and the Low-countries, at the choice of the said Emperour. And in exchange, this done, the King promised to renounce all his rights pretended to the said Duchie, and the Kingdom of Naples, and to restore the Duke of Sauoy to the possession of his countries, when as the Duke his son should enioy the said Duchy of Milan or the Earldome of Flanders: and all things during the terme of 2. yeares, as well on this, as on the other side of the Alpes should remaine in the same estate, as they were at the truce made at Nice. So the Emperour deliuered vnto the King on this side the E mountains, S. Disier, Ligny, Commercy: and the King Yuoy, Montmedy & Landrecy. Steynay was deliuered into the duke of Lorrains hands, & the fortifications razed. On the other side the Alps, the Emperour had nothing to yeeld but Montdeuis, & the King, Alba, Quieras, Antignan, S. Damian, Palezol, Cresentin, Verruë, Montcal, Barges, Pont d'Esture, Lans, Vigon, S. Saluadour, S. Germaine, and many other places which he possessed.

These treaties thus concluded and proclaimed beyond the Alpes, the Duke of Angien returned into France, with as great glory and honour, as a wife and valiant Prince could desire: and the Emperour retired his army (which the Earles of Reux and Bures led ioynly with that of England:) he dismissed his owne, and parting from Soissons, tooke his way to Bruxelles, accompanied beyond the frontiers by the duke of Orleans, the Cardinals of F Lorrain and Meudon, the Earle of Laual, la Hunauday and others. The Emperour is now out of the realme: let vs also seek to send the King of England beyond the seas. Henry the 8. King of England, according to the league he had with the Emperour, landing at Calais, with an army of thirty thousand men, fortified with ten thousand Lansquenets, and three thousand Reistres, which the Earle of Bures led, & the troupes of the Earle of Reux, chiefe of the army of

A of the Low-countries for the Emperour, he found Picardie very much vnfurnished of men, the King had with-drawne his forces towards Champagne, to oppose them against the Emperour: and the duke of Vendosme being weake in men, had fve places of importance to furnish, Ardre, Boullen, Therouenne, Montrueil, Hedin, all equally exposed to the inuasion of the English.

Henry therefore seeing no army to withstand him, making his account to carry a legge or an arme of the body of this realme, sent the duke of Norfolk and the Earles of Reux and Bures to besiege Montrueil, and himselfe went and camped before Boullen. The Marshall of Biez was gouernour, but when hee saw the enemy turne the point of his army towards Montrueil, hee left the Lord of Veruein his sonne in law, to command in Boullen: B (from which hee was dissuaded by some, to whom his sufficiency was well knowne) assisted by Philip Corse a capitaine very well experienced in armes, the Lords of Lignon and Aix, otherwise called Renty, young, and without experience, with their regiments, and halfe the company of a hundred men at armes, of the sayd Marshall: and hee put himselfe into Montrueil, with the Constables company of a hundred men at armes, lead by la Guiche his Lieutenant (a man of great experience in the Arte of warre:) Genly, capitaine of foure enignes of French foote, the Earle Brenger and Francis of Chiaramont, Neapolitans, either commanding a thousand men.

C At the beginning of the siege of Montrueil, the duke of Vendosme aduertised of a conuoy of victuals, which came from Aire and Saint Omer to the enemies campe, garded by eight hundred horse, and twelue hundred Lansquenets, with foure meane Culuerins, to fortifie themselves, if they were charged: hee sent the Lords of Villebon, Estree and Eguyly, with their companies of men at armes, to busie the enemy, vntill that hee might come with his company of a hundred men at armes. Chastaigneray, with fifty of the Daulphins, and Senerpont with the like charge, who arriuing in troupe, charge the enemy, breake them, put them in rout, and besides the dead, carry eight hundred prisoners to Therouenne, winne two Culuerines (the other two remaying, for that their carriages were broken) and foure enignes of Lansquenets.

D On the other side, the Kings prefence before Boullen, kindled the courage of the besiegers, and daunted Veruein, the head of the defendants, a man of no worth. The first approach of the Canon killed his heart: and amazed with the furious battery of the enemy, after he had endured a kinde of an assault (but whilest that Philip Corse stood by him, who being slaine with a Canon shot) hee sends presently to sound the intent of the King of England, and yeelds him the towne by composition: that the men of war, and citizens, should depart with their baggage: and thus hee deliuered him the place, with all the artillery, munition, and victuals, whereof there was great store. The inhabitants refuse this bad composition: the Maior offers, with the townes-men, and those that were well affected, to keepe the towne. A shew of loue very commendable in this people, but in such an action hee should haue proceeded farther, and haue lodged the capitaine, where he might haue yeelded E a good account to the King, and by the effect, haue performed what was offered. Without doubt, his Maiesty would haue allowed the enterprize, as done for the good of his service: for the capitulation was no sooner concluded, and hostages not yet giuen, but a horrible tempest of wind and raine, ouerthrowes all the enemies tents, and leaues not one standing, and the soyle being fat and slippery, they had no meanes to mount to the assault. An vndoubted signe of the present assistance of heaven. Moreouer the Daulphin marched with speed to succour them: who by his approach, had made the King of England to change his designe. But, sayd Veruein, I will not breake my word with the King of England. A foolish, and impertinent scruple, to continue constant in a treacherous promise to the enemy, and to make no conscience to breake his faith to his natural and Soueraigne Prince. A scruple F which shall soone make him iustly to loose his head on a scaffold at Paris.

This peace with the Emperour, had greatly impayred the King of Englands forces. To surprise their campe before Montrueil, and to take Boullen from them, before they had fortified it, the King causeth his army to march with speed. But the duke of Norfolk, fearing least the French army would come betwixt Boullen and him, and cut off his retreat, he raysed his campe, and went to ioyne with the King of England: who knowing his forces, being Siege of Montrueil.

1545. being diuided from the Emperours, would be vnable to incounter the Kings army, hee imbarked a part of his great artillerie for England, and leauing the duke of Somerset for the gard of his new conquest, he retired to Calais.

The haste he had to dislodge, caused him to leaue part of his artillery, victuals, and munition, in base Boullen, being fortified onely with some small trenches: for the surprising whereof, the Daulphin sent in the night, two troupes, led by Fouquerolles and Tais, and to second them, hee leaues fixe thousand Grisons in a valley. Fouquerolles and Tais enter the place, cut all in peeces they meet, winne both the artillery, and munition, and thinke to haue gotten an absolute victory: but for want of making a stand, of ten or twelue ensignes betwixt base Boullen, and the high towne, to hinder their sallies, and to leaue some troupe in battaile in the market place of the base towne: five or fixe ensignes issue forth from the high towne, and finding souldiars in disorder, busied at the spoile, they put them in rout.
Fouquerolles was slaine, Tais hurt, and no perswasions of the captaines could euer stay the rest, but they cast themselues confusedly among the Grisons, to saue their liues: yet were they (saith the Originall) as good souldiars, as any were that day in Europe: but in matter of enterprises, if all accidents be not foreseene, it is too late to repaire them, when the disorder is happened.

The French
defeated.

Day being come, and the raine falling in such abundance, as the most part of our shot had no fire: the victuals by reason of the bad way could not follow, all the country of Boullenois was wasted, spoiled, and burnt, euen vnto Montrueil, and from Montrueil to Abbe. ville (which were feuteene Leagues) no grasse, nor forrage for their horses. So the Daul-phin hauing receiued newes from the King, dismissed his Suisses and Grisons, leauing the Marshall of Biez in Montrueil, with the French and Italian bands, which came out of Piedmont, and retired to the King his father, at Saint Germaine in Laye. Then died James King of Scotland, leauing by his death, his Realme in prey to his neereft neighbour. To saue it from oppreffion, and keepe the people in the obedience of the Queene Dowager (hee had taken to his second wife the daughter of the duke of Guise) the King sent (with a good number of men, and money) the Earle of Lenox of the house of Steward, Nephew to the deceased Marshall of Aubigny. The Earle being young, and ill-aduised, hauing in his vaine and riotous expences imployed the Kings money, and fearing to be accused of theft, retyred to the King of England, who desiring to vse his seruice, and to tie him by some notable bond, caused him to marry a Neece of his, daughter to his sister, mother to the deceased King of Scots. The King aduertised of this reuolt, sent la Broche a Gentleman of Bourbonnois, wife and well aduised, to giue counsell and comfort to the widowe, and soone after, the Lord of Lorges Earle of Montgomery, to crosse the King of Englands attempts against the Scots.

Boullen besieged by the King.

But in caring for the affaires of an other, should hee neglect his owne? Boullen possessed by the English, was too great a beame in his eye; it was an open port for the enemy to take footing daily, and to fortifie himselfe within the realme. They therefore make great preparations by sea and land, to dislodge them. By sea hee sends capitaine Paulin (hereafter Baron of la Garde) into Prouence, to bring five and twenty gallies out off the East seas, into the Ocean, by the straight of Gibraltar, and eight, or ten Carracks of Genoa: but they came so late, as they serued to no vse: most part of them perished at the mouth of Seine, for want of expert Pilots. By land hee raiseth a mighty army, vnder the command of the Marshall of Biez, to campe before Boullen, the riuer betwixt both, attending his army by sea, and there building a good fort vpon the point of the tower of Ordre, to keepe the enemy within their walles with the Canon, and to cut off all meanes for the ships to enter into the haven, to succour the towne: making account to goe afterwards in person, to besiege Guines, and there to fortifie: to keepe Calais, and the land of Oye in subiection, and by that meanes to famish Boullen. But man purposeth, and God disposeth: we shall see both Boul-len and Calais, by other meanes, and at diuers seasons, reduced to the obedience of this crown. According to these designs, the King sent Cont Reingrane, the Colonells Reichbroc and Lodowike to fill vp their regiments of Lansquenets, to the number of foure or five thousand a peece, and to ioine with ten thousand men, which hee leauied in Gascony and Languedoc. This done, his Maiesty tooke his way to Normandy, to embarke his army at

A at Newhauen, and being at Touques about Midfomer, hee discovered his army out of the Leuant seas, then vpon the assurance which the Marshall of Biez (hauing receiued the Lanfquenets, and fixe or seuen thousand pioners) gaue him, that by the midst of August the fort of Boullen would be in defence, he caused his navy to set saile, wherein the Admirall of Annebault commanded. But behold a pittifull beginning. As they come to weigh anchor in the Carraquon (which was the goodliest ship of the western sea, and the best sayler being of eight hundred tunnes burthen, in the which the Admirall should fight) fire takes the gunners roome, and consumes it to ashes. Many, to auoyde the fury of the fire, leaped into the sea: the galleies saued many, and many were cast away, the fire takes the artillery (there were a hundred great peeces of brasse) which sinking all that was before them, behind or on the sides, forced the other ships to goe roomer. A hundred and fifty great ships, three-score barkes, and five and twenty gallies set saile, the sixth of Iuly, and bent their course towards the Isle of Wight, and the haven of Portsmouth in England, where the English had three-score ships, well appointed for warre.

The King of France his army against England.

The Admirall resolved to fight with them, made choise of thirty ships, to accompany that wherein he would fight: Boutieres coasting this squadron on the right wing, with thirty six ships, and the baron of Curton on the left, with the like number: The aduantage of the place where the enemy lay, defended one the on side by some forts, and on the other with rocks, bankes and sands couered with water, which lie in the midst of the way, and make a narrow and crooked entry, disswaded him. To draw them to sea, the gallies aduance, skirmishing with their Canon, and fighting, they retire towards their squadrons. The calmness of the sea, without any winde, or great current, shewed it selfe fauourable to our men, for the space of a whole houre in the morning, hauing meanes to gouerne their gal-lies at pleasure, and to annoy the enemy, who for want of winde lay open to the French artillery. So the Mary-rose one of the best ships of their fleete, was sonke with the Canon, and off five or sixe hundred men, onely five and thirty escaped: the great Henry which carried their Admirall had made the like end, if the neere ships had not succoured it. And greater losses threatened them, when as the wind changed, and became good for them, preferred them from perill, and serued them to charge our ships with full sayles: which change was so sodaine, as the English ships pursuing our gallies, were ready to ouer-run them, if by a great assurance of the Commanders, and expetience of the saylers, and rowers, hauing no Canon in their poupes, they had not speedily turned their prowes, who (being without the reach of the Canon) slacke their course, seeking to draw the enemy out of the rockes and bankes, as they had beene directed.

Some English pinaces (these bee ships more long in forme then round, more narrow then our gallies, swift, and easie to gouerne, and which better command the currants in that sea) followed with an incredible swiftnesse, and with their artillery, did wonderfully annoy our gallies, when as the Prior of Capua, brother to Peter Stroffy, impatient of this brauadoe, turnes his gally against a Pinace, which aduancing his companions, was ready to grapple with one of our gallies in poupe, and forceth him to retire to the body of the battaile. And our Admirall hauing now put his ships in order, and ready to giue the signe of battaile, he sees the enemy retire from the chase, and returne to their hold. In this conflict, they loose some slaues, few souldiars and no men of account.

They must now prepare an other baite. The King of England was at Portsmouth, and the Admirall (burning his country, and killing his men in his sight) imagined that the indignation of this wrong, the compassion of his subiects blood spilt, the sacke and burning of his country, would force him to send forth his ships, to succour them (being not about two Canon shot off,) or else the subiects wrongs, being no way releued by the presense of their Prince, would breed some sedition, and mutiny in the country. Hee therefore makes three sundry landings, to diuide the enemies forces. The one by Stroffy, vpon a little fort, furnished with artillery, which did beate our gallies in flanke, and manned by the countrymen, who seeing the resolution of our men, abandon their fort, and fle to a wood nere by, some behind were slaine; and the houses about it burnt. The Lord of Tais, and the Baron of la Garde, both Generals, the first of the foot, the other of the gallies, land in another place, they incounter some squadrons of foote, who by couert waies in the woods, were gathered

1545. gathered together, to fight at their aduantage: they make head against our men, and hurt A some, but the rest of the troupes marching in bataille, make them abandon the place, and flie to recouer their straights, where they could not follow but in disorder.

Marfy and Pierrebon capitaines of gallies, were hurt in their landing, at an incounter of the English, but to draw them in grosse to fight, it was not possible, and lesse meanes to charge them on their owne ground. Neither capitaines nor souldiars wanted will, but the danger was too apparent. They must slip downe a narrow channell, where but foure ships could goe in front, and the like number of the enemies ships might easily defend it. They could not enter, but with the tide and winde, and the foure first ships repulsed, had fallen backe vpon the rest of the fleet, and disordered them. They must of necessity fight nere vnto B their land: and fauoured by their forts and Canon, had they not meanes to hinder the approach, to the great preiudice of our fleet? and our ships bording and grappling, the force of the current had driuen them on ground one vpon another. There was as little reason to fight at anchor, the cables might be cut, & this inconuenience auoided, the danger was not lesse, for the nature of the current is to turne the prow, so as our ships in steed of the prow or the broad-side, must haue presented their poupe to the enemy. Moreouer, their anchors not able to stay the ships sodenly, by reason of the violent turning of the streame, either the anchor or cable might breake, and by consequence cast the ships on ground.

The French
consule to take the Isle of Wight and to fortifie it.

They therefore propound two things in counsell, either to saile into Picardy, to fortifie the Kings army, and to cut off all succours from Boullen, or to fortifie the Isle of Wight. C Many reasons perswaded the most part to the last opinion: for hauing the Isle at their deuotion, they might easily become Lords of Portsmouth, one of the goodliest ports of England: and forcing the enemy to maintaine a continual army both by land and sea, to crosse the Conquerours designes, it would consume them in exceeding expences. Moreouer, they kept the passage of Spaine and Flanders: and might in time till the Island, and make it yeeld victuals sufficient to maintaine men for the garde thereof.

Without doubt this was an oportunity which hath not since happened, to oppose a strong barre betwixt both the realmes. But let vs say, that hee which holds both land and sea, within the palme of his hand, would leaue this Island in the power of her ancient and lawfull Lord. But howsoeuer, the Admirall might easily haue left foure thousand men, and D 4 thousand Pioners, for the defence of the Island, as he did to fortifie the Kings army before Boullen, after the ouerthrow of the Cheualier d' Aux, a Prouencall and capitaine of the gallies of Normandy, leauing his fleet well manned. As the Admirall lay at anchor before Boullen a Westerne winde ariseth, and makes him to seeke harbour vpon the coast of England. Beeing at the Perrais, and there kept by force of winde, and a swolne sea, the English fleet thinking to haue the aduantage, imbarke speedily, beeing a hundred good ships, and come with full sailes against our men, hauing the winde in poupe. The violence of the windes, and the greatnesse of the seas, which might haue taken from our men the vse and seruice of their gallies, gaue them hope of victory. On the other side, the Admirall feared that the tempest would driue him to shoare, or force him to weigh anchor in disorder (for E that the bad weather would not suffer them to keepe together) and with great danger to passe the Straite at Calais, or else to take his course towards Flanders, and so they might stop his passage in his returne, moreouer foule weather might stay him so long, as hee should want victuals, and in the meane time, the enemy (who to attend him at the passage, would come to Boullen) would disturbe the Kings forts that hee pretended to make, the which hee desired by all meanes to preuent.

And therefore following the aduice of his capitaines, he attends at anchor the change of the tide. The next day the winde and tide fauours him, so as hee desires to incounter the enemy. The night passeth, and at the breake of day, the English army appeares. Hee followes them, but was so becalmed, as hee could not aduance but with the tide. Either seeke F to get the winde, and coasting neere, salute one another with the Canon. Some ships are funke, and some men perish in the sea. In the end, the enemy seeing our men to haue gotten the wind, set saile, and take their course to the Isle of Wight, hauing both wind & tide, which carried them without disorder to their Port, and the night approaching ended the combat. The enemy hauing recouered a safe Port, the Admirall tooke his course towards Newhauen,

A hauen, to refresh his army, and to land many sicke men languishing in the ships. This was about the middest of August. 1545.

In the middest of August, the King meant to execute his enterprife vpon Guines, where- of we haue spoken. His army was of twelue thousand French, twelue thousand Lanque- nets, fixe thousand Italians, and foure thousand Legionaries, a thousand or twelue hundred men at armes, and seuen or eight hundred light-horse. But the fort before Boullen was no more defensible then eight daies after it was begun: First not built vpon the point, as it was appointed, right against the Tower of Ordre, but against base Boullen, so as it could no way stop the entry of the ships into the hauen. The Marshall of Biez excused himselfe, that they had giuen him to vnderstand he should find no water there, and that the souldiars could not B lodge, for the violence of the winds. Secondly, hee relied vpon this Ingenor, Anthony Mellon an Italian capitaine, who was held to bee a man of experience, and a good souldiar, who being ignorant of his measures, made the worke fruitlesse for two moneths.

The Marshall notwithstanding assures the King, that within eight daies, the fort would be defensible, but it was no more forward, then at the first day. And to couer this defect, he lets the capitaines vnderstand, that he is aduertised, how the enemy assembled at Calais, to come and succour Boullen by land, holding it in danger to bee famished: hee was therefore resolved to passe the riuer, and to abandon the fort. And without imparting of any thing to the Lord of Estrée, Marshall of the campe, who contradicted this designe, hee C leaues three or foure thousand men in the fort, and goes to lodge at Mont-Lambert, within Canon-shot of the towne, to make head against the enemy, and to fight with him, if hee came to succour the towne. But what likely-hood was there, that the English beeing weaker in force and numbers, would hazard a bataille, and by land (seeing that one ship would carry more victuals then a thousand carts) come and victual a towne, which daily hee might refresh by sea, without danger, in sight of the enemy. But in effect, it was a great honour for the Marshall of Biez, to see so many yong Princes subiect to his command: and if Boullen had bene recouered, hee had lost the authoritie to command so goodly, and mighty an army. The hope of a bataille made all the youth in Court post to Mont-Lambert, the dukes of Anguien, Neuers, Aumale, Thouars Lord of Tremouille, the D Earle of Laual and others, who by continuall skirmishes, sometimes with gaine, sometimes with losse, did trie their valours with the besieged. And the King relying vpon the assurance hee had of the Marshall of Biez, aduanced, hoping that the Bul-warkes, and the Courtines of the fort, had bene in such defence, as hee might haue employed his army else-where. But there are two reasons which diuert him: The one priuate, which was the death of the duke of Orleans his youngest sonne, who surprised with a Quoridian feuer, which they held to bee pestilentiall, died the eight day of September, in the Abbey of Forest Moustier, betwixt Abbeuille and Montrueil, being three and twenty yeeres old, leauing a second griefe to the father, to haue lost two sonnes at such times as they grew capable to ease his decaying age: and without doubt, the waywardnesse which made this Prince melancholike and difficult, will hasten the course of his life, to bring him to his graue. The other was publike: the Prince of Melphe beeing sent to visit the fort, hauing considered the time of the foundation, and the terme it required to come to the perfection, reported, that winter would bee well passed, before it should be made fit for seruice, without the assistance of an army.

Death of the duke of Orleans.

So the King seeing his hopes lost, and the season spent, for the effecting of his designes, he retired towards Amiens, to the Abbey of Saint Fuscien. In the meane time the nere- nesse of the Kings campe at Mont-Lambert, did inuite both nations, daily to make great skirmishes. One day amongst the rest, the duke of Aumale, seeing our men withstand a charge of the enemies but faintly, and were ready to be ouerthrowne: making a count he should bee F seconded by his troupe, hee fals vpon a company of English, which went to charge our French vpon the flanke, and at the first approach staies them, but being stroken with a lance, betwixt the nose and the eye, it breakes in peeces, and left the tronchion halfe a foot within his head: without doubt, we may admire the generosity of this young Nobleman, who for so rough a charge, lost neither stirops, nor vnderstanding, to free himselfe from those which had compassed him in, and his admirable patience in induring the paine, when they came to draw Skirmishes before Boullen,

Winter approached, and the King considering that his enterprise vpon Guines was frustrate: aduertised moreover, that the English made a new leauy in Germany of tenne thousand Lansquenets, and foure thousand horse, to come with this supply and raise the siege at Boullen, hee fortified all the approaches in the country of Tierache, and about Aubenton, Veruein and Guise, to stop their passage. He sent the Marshall of Biez to invade, ruine and burne the land of Oye (for that Calais, Guines and Hames, which the English held vpon the maine land, had no other reliefe but out of that county:) and to dispose of the affaires as occasion should serue, he marched towards la Fere vpon Oize.

Decription and sack of the land of Oye.

The land of Oye contains about foure leagues in length, and three in breadth: a maiish very fertill in pasture, hauing on the one side the sea, and at the one end towards the sea B Calais: at the other end Grauelin, of the county of Flanders: towards the land, and along the bankes of the Marish, is the towne of Guines, and the castle of Hames, and at the end towards Arthois stands Ardres. For the safety of this county, the English had made great trenches towards the firme land, the which were commonly full of water, and fortified with Rampars: and to flanke them, forts and bastions well manned to defend the entrie into the country. The affection which euery one bare vnto the Kings seruice, made them to passe the channels which flowed into the country, directly against the forts: They assaile them, force them, and put all to the sword they finde. Two thousand English come to their succours, the French-men at armes, charge and defeate them, and kill the most part: the rest cast C themselves into the trenches, where the horsemen could not follow: foure score or a hundred of our horse, with many men at armes, testified by their deaths or wounds, the fury of this encounter. The English were strong, both in high and base Boullen, and in the Tower of Ordre (this Tower was built by Iulius Cesar, the second time hee passed into England, to haue a Lampe vpon the top of it, to direct his ships, if they should be diuided by any storme at sea, as in his first voyage) and the retiring of our troupes, made them to enterprise vpon our fort, which was made on the other side of the water, right against base Boullen. Seuen D or eight thousand choise men, come an houre before day, and mount foderly to the top of the rampar, where they might easily enter in many places without any ladders. Thibault Rouhaux Lord of Riou, Lieutenant for the King within the fort, finding his succours farre off (saies the originall) watched in the night, and rested the day. If the enemy charged furiously, hee repels him with no lesse assurance, kills all them that mounted, ouerthrowes the rest, and puts them in rout, so as by this gallant repulse, he was afterwards freed from the attempts of the English.

A leuuy of Lansquenets
for the English made fruitlesse.

We must now plant strong barres against the Lansquenets, which come to succour the King of England. They were lodged at Fleurines, a great vilage in the cuntry of Liege, ten leagues from Mezieres. Mezieres was of great importance, if the enemy had surprised it. And the Emperour fearing that this great swarme of men, finding his countries vnfortified of souldiars, would doe some harme, had hindred their passage through his territories. This refusall might haue made the Germanes to haue sought a passage by force E through the realme. So the King to crosse them, sent Languey into Mezieres with a thousand foot, and the horsemen of Bourgongne, and part of Champagne: hee sent Longueuil his Lieutenant into Champagne, to muster the Legion of the country, and manned the passages where hee thought the enemy would attempt. Hee sent the duke of Anguien into Guise with three hundred men at armes, and a number of foot. In the end the Lansquenets hauing staid three weekes at Fleurines, doubtfull where they should make their passage: the day of their pay being come, and the money yet in England, they turne their ensignes, and returne home the same way, leading with them the King of Englands Treasurers for assurance of their entertainment. Our Francis is now freed of a great care. By the death of the duke of Orlance, the chiefe conditions of peace made with the Emperour were void: so his F Maiestie sent from Folambray nere to Couffy, the Admirall Annebault, and the Chancellor Oliuer to enter into a new treaty. The Emperour was at Bruges, and determined to send an army against the Protestants and commonalties of Germany, who yeelded him no such obedience as he required of his subiects, and with this designe hee went to Antwerp, to receiue money by imposition and loane. This voiage is a cloake to delay our Ambassadors. But

A But in effect hee ment to know the mindes of them of Antwerp, that according to the course of affaires, he might be more milde or sharpe in his answers. And the the sayd Ambassadors discovering his ordinary delaies and dissimulations, in the end tooke their leaue, returning with no other assurance, but if the King began no warre against him, he was not resolu'd to make any. A word serues to a man of Iudgement. What might the King conceiue of this cold entertainment? but that the Emperour sought an oportunity to begin a new warre with aduantage: and if hee had forced them to obedience whom he threatened the frontiers of this realme. To auoide a sodaine surprise, hee giues the gouernment of Languedoc to the duke of Anguien: that of Piedmont to the Prince of Melphie, lately created B Marshal of France, hee sent to fortifie the weake places of Picardy, hee made a fort aboue Maubert-Fontaine, seuen leagues from Veruein, and siue from Mezieres, at the going out of the wood, & for that the frontier of Champagne, lay most open to the Germanes, he fortified Mezieres and Mouzon, built a fort vpon Meuze on this side the riuer within the realm, betwixt Stenay and Dun-le-Chateau, the which he called Villefranche, he fortified the castle of Saint Menchoult, Saint-Desier, Chaumont in Bassigny, Coissy & Ligny: and made Bourg in Bresse able to make head against a mighty army. Thus the King provided for his frontiers and places subiect to the enemies inuasions. But the plague had so diminished the number of souldiars that were in the fort, right against Boullen, as of twenty ensignes not C about eight or nine hundred men escaped this mortality. The souldiars notwithstanding are commended for their fidelity, constancy and patience in the gard thereof. The raine, snow, and other iniuries of the aire, the moistnesse of their lodgings (becing but hoales in the ground, couered with a pentise of straw, and when a whole house-hold was dead, the ruines serued to bury their carcases) had bred these diseases. But the spring time hauing tempered the season, and staid the plague, the Lords of Esse and Riou, being refreshed and supplied with men, returned to their ordinary skirmishes, to the enemies losse. The fort wanted victuals, Senepont Lieutenant to the Marshall of Biez, was appoynted for this execution. Three hundred English horse come to hinder this victualing. He meetes them the day after Easter day nere to the bridge of bricke, beneath mount Saint Stephen: the skirmish begins on D either side: the Lord of Tais and the Conte Reingraue arise either of them, with sixe or seuen score gentlemen: the alarm comes to Boullen, and the English supply their men with seuen hundred horse, and foure hundred Harguebuziers: Senepont charge the horsemen before they had ioyned with their shot: the Reingraue is hurt at the first charge and ouerthrowne, and on the other side the Marshall of Calais, being chiefe of the enterprise is slaine with a hundred or six score English, about two hundred horse on either side, and threescore, and fiftene English prisoners, all in cassaks of veluet garnished with gold and siluer.

plague in the fort before Boullen.

A while after the Marshall of Biez parted from his campe, for the same effect accompanied with fifty men: at armes, the Reingraue with his regiment of foure thousand Lansquenets, and two hundred French shot, hee encountered the Earle of Surrey followed by sixe E thousand English-men, with an intent to take from our men the meanes to refresh the fort with victuals, and necessary munition. Here the combate was long and furious: in the end the English being ouerthrowne, retire to a little fort, where they force them. Seuen or eight hundred of their men are slaine. Surrey saues himselfe by flight, and leaues seuen or eight score prisoners. Boullen was but a Church-yard for the English, and a waiting for their treasure. The King of England considering how obstinate the King was in the recovery of his town, that moreover the Emperour (what league soeuer they had together) had his priuat designs, & regarded nothing but his own interest, he lets the King vnderstand, that he is resolu'd to haue him for his friend, and to end all controuerfies. So the deputies for their maisters meet betwixt Ardres & Guines. For the King came, the Admirall Annebault, and Raymond, F the first president of Rouan: for the English, Dudley Admirall of England (& afterwards duke of Northumberland) & finally, after many consultations, a peace was made with these conditions: That the King within eight daies should pay 800000. crownes, to the King of England, as well for the arrearages of his pension, as for many other expenses made by the sayd King in the fortification of Boullen, and of the country: And in regard of the said summe, the King of England should deliuer vnto the King, Boullen, & all the country belonging vnto it, with the ancients places 1547. or newly edified by him, Mont-Lambert, the Tower of Ordre, Ambleteuil, Blacquenay, and others, with all the artillery, victuals, and munition in the said places.

The death of the duke of Anguieu.

This yeere is famous by the death of Anguieu. In the moneth of February, the snow was very great, and the Court beeing at Roche-guion, some young Noblemen attending the Daulphin, made a challeng, some to defend a house, others to assaile it with snow-bals: but this pastime ended soone, with a pittifull, and fatall spectacle. As the duke came out of this house, a cofer full of linnen, cast out of the window, falls vpon his head, and within few houres, sends him to rest in the graue with his ancestors, leauing a suspition of some great men, being enuious, and iealous of his vertue, reputation, and fauour, which he had gotten with the King, the people, and men of warre, of whom hee was more then any other of his age esteemed, beloued, and respected.

The death of the King of England.

The beginning of this yeere is likewise remarkable, by the decease of Henry the 8. King of England, leauing for his successor his son Edward, 8. yeeres of age. This death bred a great alteration and change, in the health of Francis: they were almost of one age, conformable in complexions. And our King taking this for a presage, or fore-telling, that his turne should soone follow after, grew then more melancholy, and silent then before. He falls sick of a feuer, for auoyding whereof, hauing passed many places fit for the pleasure of hunting, of la Muette, Saint Germain in Lay, Villepreux, Dampierre neere vnto Cheureuse, Limours and Rochefort, he came to lodge at Rambouillet, and as the pleasure he tooke both in hunting, and hauking, staied him there some time, his Feuer increased, and grew to a Quotidian.

The death of Francis the first.

So finding his houre come, he disposed of his conscience, and of his house: hee greatly recommended his subiects and seruants to the Daulphin his successor: and the last day of March, in the yeere 1547. beeing fifty and three yeeres old, he changed the painefull, and continuall toyles of this mortall life, with the eternall rest, which the happie inioy for euer. A Prince wonderfully lamented, both of his subiects, and strangers, whose vertues deserue to be placed among the most famous. Hee was valiant, courteous, bountifull, iudicious, of a great spirit, and an excellent memory. A lover of learning, and men of merit, to whom arts and sciences owe the perfections they haue gotten at this day, hauing by his bringing vp of youth, founded Colledges in Paris, in the Hebrew, Greeke and Latine tongues, assembled from all parts of the world, learned men, and of good life, and by this meanes cleered the darkenesse of Ignorance, wherewith the world had beene so obscured; by the mallice of time, and negligence of former ages. A Prince fauoured with many good, yet crost with as many bad, and sinister fortunes. Happy notwithstanding, that no aduersity could euer make him degenerate from a noble and royall minde, nor from the true beleefe of a good and faithfull Christian. Happy and blessed in his end, to haue pacified all forraigne confusions, which had so long troubled his estates, and his subiects quiet. But without doubt, hee had beene farre more happie, if hee could haue left his realme free from those fatall diuisions, which euen in his raigne had so miserably diuided his subiects, and shall cause hereafter strange combustions: the first consideration whereof, makes my haire to stand vp right, and my heart to tremble at that which is to come.

HENRY the Second, the 59. French King.

Nature, his age, and the good education hee had receiued vnder his father, in the government of the Estate, did countenance him in this succession: the which hee receiued on the same day that he was borne, and hee confirmed it in Saint Germain in Laie, by the restitution of the Constable of Montmorency: by the publication of many goodly ordinances, for the reformation of apparell, ordering of the treasure; providing for the poore, suppression of new erected offices: government of the riuers and forrests: maintenance of Iustice, and releueing of his subiects: but aboue all that necessarie law against blasphemers, as we may see in the Originall. Doublelesse this was a commendable beginning, and worthy the homage hee did owe to the Soueraigne Lord, as an acknowledgement of the fee, whereof he tooke possession, if he had not polluted it with the mournfull spectacle of that bloody and fatall combate, betwixt Jarnac and Chastaignery, Gentlemen of Noble families, hauing taxed one an other with iniurious words, & the Lye past, to the preiudice of one of their honours, the King in steed of reconciling them by the aduice of his Councell, and to haue forced the culpable to doe right to the intercessed; hee granted them the combat, and on the sixteenth day of Iuly they came to the place appointed at Saint Germain in Lay, where in the presence of the King, Princes, Noble-men and all the Court they entred the Liftes. Jarnac who was held the weaker, beeing newly recovered from sicknesse, contemned and disgraced, overthrew the other (who before the combat was held a conquerour) and wounded him in such sort as within few daies after he died; whereat the King was much greeued, and herevpon did forbid all combats. He begun his Reigne by a bloody Tragedy and ended in like manner, whereby we may see, that God doth punish him that thirsteth after an other mans blood, with the losse of his owne.

The restoring of the Constable, disapointed the Cardinall of Tournon, & the Admirall of Annebault, touching the chiefe government of the State, and the Lords of Longueual, Escar, Boncour, Framezels, Antibo, Grignan, the baron of la Garde, the Generall Bayard and 1548. and many others, accused some for theft, some for other disorders in their charges, did some what trouble the Court. It was an old saying: that hee which eates the Kings Goose, will cast vp the feathers a hundred yeeres after: but since they haue turned this saying into a Prouerbe; Hee that steales a hundred thousand crownes from the King, is quit if he restore ten thousand. So some preuailed by this expedient, others escaped rigorous punishments through fauour.

Henry the 2.

An army in Scotland.

In the meane time, the ceremonies of the Kings Coronation were prepared at Rheims, and hauing receiued it the feuen and twenty day of Iuly, by the hands of Charles of Lorraine, Archbishop of Rheims, hee made a voyage into Picardie, and did visit the forts which were made about Boullen: then did he prepare an army to succor Scotland, against whom the English made war, for that the Lords of the country had refused to giue their Princeesse Mary Steward in marriage to young King Edward, hoping by this bond to vnite the two realmes of England and Scotland, to the preiudice of the French, and of the common alliance betwixt France and Scotland. The Lord of Esse was chiefe of the army, Peter Stroffy generall of the Italian bands, & Andelot Colonnell of the French foot, the Reingraue chiefe of the Lanquenets, marching by land against the English forces: and Leon Stroffy Prior of Capoua, by sea spoiled the English of the greatest part of their conquests: but the confirmation of the peace lately concluded betwixt the deceased Kings of France and England ended this warre; and brought backe our aduenturers into France.

Francis at the end of his daies, had well foreseene the leuaine, which should soone breed new combustions with the Emperour. Henry must bee heire to his quarrell, as well as to his crowne, and knowing that the Pope had a fresh and iust cause of indignation for the murder of Peter Lewis duke of Parma and Placentia, his sonne, and for the inuasion of Placentia, by Ferdinand Gonzagua, Lieutenant for the Emperour in Italie: hee sent Charles of Lorraine, lately honoured with a Cardinals-hat (this is hee that shall minister so much matter to talke of him, vnder the successors of Henry) to draw the Pope from the Emperors partie, to the Kings alliance: but death shall frustrate the Pope of his intended reuenge. Commonly men fith best in a troubled streame: and many knowing this new King to bee of a mild spirit, addited to the delights of Court, and little practised in affaires, they kindled a desire in his minde to reuenge the wrongs the Emperour had done to France, whereof they vrged for a testimony the death of Vogelsberg beheaded in Ausbourg, at his returne from the Scottish warres for the Kings seruice. On the other side, the Emperour grew not a little ialous of the progresse the King made into Bourgongne, Bresse, Sauoy and Piedmont, as if hee had carried with him an alarum bell to stirre vp the people to the following warre. And it may be it had then been kindled, but an home-bred mutiny staied it for a time. During the Kings voiage, into Sauoy and Piedmont the extorsions of the tol-gatherers and farmers of Salt, caused the commons of Guienne, Xaintonge, and Angoulmois to rebell. In few weekes forty thousand men goe to field armed with all kind of weapons, the Islanders ioyne with them, and with a common consent fall vpon the tol-gatheres. The people of Galcony doe presently follow this pernicious example. The commons of Bourdeaux rise, & finding La Vergne, Esbonnac, Marquanan & others, (Tribunes fit for their humors) they expell the customers, sack many good houses, vnder colour to seeke for these exactors: the commons search throughout the towne, whence followed many Massacres in diuers places, and many of the Kings officers were slaine, who abusing their charges had bene the cause of this mutiny. The Maior, Iurats and other Magistrates of the Citie of Bourdeaux, and the Court of Parliament, with the Seigneur of Monneins who commaunded there as the Kings Lieutenant, in steed of remedying these tumults in the beginning, temporized to much, namely Monneins, who for that he did not surppresse the insolency of La Vergne one of the heads of these mutins, hee made him dare to raise vp the people by the sound of a bell.

Sedition for the customers.

An other errour of his was, that hee sent forth a number of shotte out of the castle of Ha, thinking to terrifie this intraged multitude. But this increased their popular furie. They forced the Councillors of the Parliament, to laie aside their gownes, to put on Mariners cappes, to carry pikes, and to follow their Ensignes, and the maisters of Saulx bretheren, the one captaine of the towne, the other of castle Trompeté, to be their

A their leaders, to assist at the sacking of many houses, and to see their friends and fellow citizens massacred before their eyes. They spoile the towne-house, a goodly store-house for armes: and to increase their villanies, they murder Monneins most cruelly, beeing come amongst them, thinking with courteous words to pacifie the furie of these mutines. Hauing wrought their wils, and being laden with booty, they disband, some one way, some another: the Parliament fortified with men of honor, and reluming their authority, punish by exemplary iustice La Vergne, one of the chiefe Tribunes of this rebellion, and some other of the most apparent. The King was no lesse ready to reuenge this outrageous and rash rebellion, then the commons were actiue in the execution. The Constable had the commission for Guienne. Francis of Lorraine duke of Aumale (whom we shal afterwards see duke of Guise, so famous vnder Francis the second, and Charles the ninth) that of Xaintonge with foure thousand Lanquenets and many French horse. This man seeking to win the reputation of a mild and mercifull Prince, pacified the country without punishment of what had passed. The other marched after an other manner, for ioyning both armies together, he entered into Bourdeaux, disarmed the people, tooke and burnt all the records, registers, rights and priuiledges of the citizens, and of all the country of Bourdelois: hee caused the Court of Parliament to cease: beates downe their bells, forced feuen-score of the chiefe to goe vnto the Carmes (who had three daies after the mutiny, in the night taken vp his poore disinembred carcase with a gentleman of his called Montelieu) to fetch the body of Monneins, and to conduct it in mournful sort vnto Saint Andrews Church, and by the punishment of the two Saulx, Estonnac (an other Tribune who had seized vpon the castle Trompeté) and many others, hee purged their offence. Talemagne and Galeffie Colonnells of the commons, were afterwards broken vpon the wheele, either of them carrying a crowne of burning iron for a marke of the souerainty, which they had vsurped. The end of this yeere was more comical. Anthony of Bourbon duke of Vendosme married Joane of Albret daughter to Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, and of Marguerite sister to King Francis the first, and the duke of Aumale, the daughter of Hercules of Esté duke of Ferrara and of Renée of France daughter to King Lewis the twelfth. And during these sports in Court, that extraordinary chamber, against them whom they call Lutherans, was erected, who persisting constantly in the profession of their faith, suffered their bodies to bee consumed to ashes. The birth of Lewis the Kings yonger sonne, the third of February, at Saint Germaine in Laye, his baptisme the nineteenth of May, the coronation of Queene Katherine at Saint Denis the tenth of Iune, the stately entry of their Maiesties at Paris the sixth of the same moneth, and the great tourney at the Tournels, made in fauor of the Ladies, continued the sports in Court: which finished, the King sitting in his seat of Iustice the second of Iuly, would giue sentence in his Court of Parliament at Paris, according to the ancient custome of his predecessors. The presence of the Prince giues authority to the Magistrate, and the eye of the King (saith the wise-man) scatters il counsels. At that time the nobility of England were at iarre with the commons. During the which, the King sent Paul Lord of Termes to continue the warre in Scotland begon by Esse, who hauing lately defeated the English before Hedington, and taken the Isle of hofes, resigned his charge to his successor. After much sport at the Queenes coronation, the King caused a generall Procession to bee made in Iuly, where hee assisted with the Queene, the Princes of the blood, Cardinals, and all the Orders and Estates of Paris, and at his returne from the bishops-lodging, where hee had dined, he would see certaine Christians burnt detesting the errors and abuses maintained by the Church of Rome. Among the which there was a Taylor, who some few daies before had made answer of his beliefe before the King and many Courtiers, and spoken boldly to the Duchesse of valentinois, telling her that shee should rest satisfied to haue infected France, and not seeke to pollure so holy and sacred a thing as the true religion, and the truth of the sonne of God with her filthinesse: & that it was to be feared that God for this cause wold send som great plague both vpon the King and realme. But the King being incensed and not amended (being carried away by the alurements of her that did bewitch him) hauing commanded that his Proceffe should be dispatched, he would bee a spectator of this Taylors execution, standing in the Lord of Rochpots lodging in Saint Anthoines street right against the scaffold, whereas the Taylor shewed a wonderfull constancy and patience.

Having discovered the King, hee began to behold him, so constantly, as nothing could diuert him, yea the fire beeing kindled, hee had alwaies his eyes so fixt vpon that object, as the King was forced to retire himselfe, yea hee was so troubled, as hee confest that hee thought this mans shadowe did still follow him, and that for manie nights this spectacle did present it selfe vnto him, wherevpon hee protested that hee would neuer see nor heare any such people: But forgetting his protestation, tenne yeere after he heard things which hee should haue giuen attentiu care vnto, and pretending to see a great personage burnt, whose words did merit credit, he lost both sight and life.

In the moneth of Iune past James of Coucy Lord of Veruein was beheaded at Paris, and Oudard of Biez Marshall of France degraded, after a long imprisonment, the one for that he had inconsiderately committed the gard of Boullen to his sonne-in-law, the other for that hee had so lightly yeelded vp a strong and well fortified place vnto the enemy. There were witnesses and Comissioners found out for the purpose by them that were in credit: so as soone after it appeared that the innocency of these Noblemen had been suppressed by the enuy of Courtiers, which possesse the King, who acknowledged the error hee had committed, but hee could not helpe it, but this processe laie dead with Veruins vntill the yeere of our Lord 1575. that his sonne and heire by an expresse declaration of King Henry the third, caused the memory of his father and grandfather by the mother side to be restored to their former honour and fame, one of the heralds beeing commanded to assist at the funerals of these two Noblemen, the which were solemnly made at Boloine in the yeere 1577.

This yeere was pleaded in the Parliament at Paris the cause of Merindol; since the yeere 1540. the Parliament of Prouence, had for matter of religion condemned seuentene persons of Merindol to be burnt, the village to be razed, and the trees to be cut downe within two hundred paces. The Clergy pursued it: but some gentlemen and others lesse bloody, staied the execution of this decree, and King Francis five monethes after sent a pardon to these Vaudois of Merindol, and other places, vpon condition that within three monethes they should abiure their errors. They appeere in Court, and protest that they haue not maintayned nor published any erroneous thing, offering to yeeld, if by the word of God they can shew them any sounder doctrine: they giue a confession of their faith in writing, with an answer to the reproches wherewith they were taxed, and require to be allowed, or iudicially heard in their defences.

Four yeeres passe away, during the which, being onely threatned with words, they submit. But the President Chassani being dead, John Menier his successor, a violent man became a mortall enemy to those of Cabrieres, and Merindol, amongst whom there dwelt certaine subiects of his of Oppede, whose lands hee possessed, to ioine them to his owne. Through the perswasions of Menier, the Cardinall of Tournon, obtaines letters patents from King Francis, to the Court of Parliament, for the execution of the first sentence, according to the which, Menier terming himselfe Lieutenant of the Lord of Grignan, gouernor of Prouence, accompanied with the Baron of la Garde, and a great troupe of others, in the moneth of Aprill 1545. fired many villages neere vnto Merindol, put many of the Countreymen into the gallies, spoiled, razed, and burnt Merindol beeing vnpeopled, tooke Cabrieres by composition, and against his faith, in cold blood, he cut in peeces five and twenty or thirty men, chosen at his pleasure, rauished wiues, and yong virgins, burnt about forty in a barme, wherof the most part were with child: put aboue eight hundred to the sword, and carried away many prisoners to Marfeilles, Aix and Auignon.

This did too farre exceed a decree giuen against seuentene persons, abusing the Kings authority, with too great violence: who in his latter age, toucht with a remorse of conscience, by reason of this horrible proceeding against his subiects, whom hee had too lightly abandoned to these butchers, greued that hee could not before his death, punish the authors of these murders exemplarily: lying in the bed of death, hee commanded Henry his sonne expressly, not to make his memory hatefull vnto strangers, nor subiect to the wrath of God, in not punishing of this guilt. Euen so, that great King David, amongst other dispositions of his last will: Thou knowest (said hee to him that should sit on the throne after him) what Isab the sonne of Tseruia hath done vnto mee, and what he hath done to the two Commanders of the armies of Israel, Abner the sonne of Ner, and Amasa the sonne of Iether, whom he

A hee hath slaine, hauing shed blood in time of peace: Thou shalt not suffer his white heires to descend with peace into the graue. But Salomon performed his fathers will more religiously. The King granted an euocation of the cause to the Court of Parliament at Paris, where it was solemnly pleaded aboue fifty times in the great Chamber. There was great expectation of seuerer punishments for these horrible murders: but these great mountaines prooued Mole-hilles, and in the end it did euaporate into smoake. Yet one at the least must suffer for many: the chance fell vpon one that was least guilty, named Guerin, an aduocate by profession, who was hanged at Paris. The Cardinall of Tournon, Grignan, and la Garde were in some trouble, but more feared then hurt. Menier escaped, but he died after, being tragically possessed with a furie, and a secret fire which consumed his bowels. The yeere ended with the death of two famous personages: Pope Paul the ninth of Nouember, to whom succeeded Cardinall Iohn Maria Bishop of Mantoua: and the vertuous Princeesse Marguerite of Valois, sister to King Francis deceased, and wife to Henry of Albre King of Nauarre, the fourteenth of December. They say commonly, that for all offences there needs but one satisfaction. Seeing then, that by the punishment of the chiefe authors of the sedition in Guienne, the King had pardoned the commons, he was not so inexorable, but for a small satisfaction they were easily admitted to fauour: so as in October past, they of Bourdeaux had obtained a remission, binding themselves perpetually to his Maiestie: To entertaine at sea for ever (as well they as their descendants) two ships furnished for the warre: to visit the castle Trompet, and du Ha, and to renew the victuals euery yeere. By this meanes, their Parliament was restored in Ianuarie, and all things settled in their former estate. By their example the three estates of Poictou, Xaintonge, Angoulmois, Perigort, Limosin, and la Marche, in the beginning of this yeere, obtained abolition of the custome vpon salt in Guienne, paying foure hundred and fiftie thousand frankes, and five and twenty thousand for the satisfaction of the Kings officers of the said custome. Then sprung there many and sundrie fire-brands of warre.

Gods iudge:
ments vpon
murder.

At the same time three Presidents of Paris, not pleasing to the house of Guise (who were then in credit) were dismissed from their charges. Soone after S. Andre and Minard hauing promised to be good seruants, were restored: Liset was made Abbot of S. Victor, to giue place to one that was not so cunning as himselfe. In this solitarie kind of life, he would be dealing with Diuinity, wherein he was no apt scholler: for of a good practitioner he became an ignorant Sophister, and was scorned, so as he died for griefe. He had shewed himselfe a sworne enemy to them of the religion, thinking to aduance himselfe by his cruell inuentions: but he was ouerthrown in his course, to serue as an example for them that are more sufficient then he, not to attempt against him who surprizeth the most cunning in their deuises, and against whose wisdom humane force is but foolerie and vanitie. And this yeere, for that the coynes were found for the most part clipt, the King commanded by his Edict that all clipt money should be new mynted, whereupon many masters of this art, and counterfeit coyners were punished with death.

E But before we quarrell with the Emperour, the English must yeeld vs Boullen. The fort which the Lord of Chastillon had built in the yeere 1548. annoyed them much, and the recouerie of the forts of Selaque, Blaconnet, and Bonlamberg, and so many men defeated by the surprize of them, gaue the Duke of Somerset and the Earle of Warwike to vnderstand, that there was nothing but blowes to be gotten in maintaining the warres of Boullen: moreouer, the diuisions of England and the war of Scotland, called home their troupes. So as for the summe before specified, payable at two termes, a peace was againe concluded with the English, and Boullen restored to the King, into the which his Maiestie made his entire the 5. of May, and did his homage, whereunto the Kings of France are bound by the institution of Lewis the xi. as we haue else-where obserued. Hereafter those small sparkles, which began to appeare, after the murder of Peter Lewis, sonne to Pope Paul Farnese deceased, slaine by his household seruants, by the perswasion of Andrew Doria, and Ferdinand Gonzagua, with the priuaty and consent of the Emperour, to seaze vpon the city of Placentia, with the more facility, haue kindled so great fires, as we shall see France, Germany, and Italy in combustion. Paul had giuen Parma to Ottanio Farnese sonne to the said Peter Lewis, whereof he had institution of Iulio his successor. This Peter Lewis inclined much to the 1550. the French party. He had giuen ayde to Peter Stroffy, when as he came into the countrie of A Placentia, with some forces for the seruice of the most Christian King, and that which more incensed the Imperials, he was suspected to haue assisted the Count of Fiesque in an enterprize made vpon Genoua for the kings seruice, the yeare 1547. in the which Iacotin Doria was slaine, and Andrew Doria expelled. This caused the death of Peter Lewis Farnese. Octauio his sonne had married the Emperours bastard daughter. But they say that charity begins by it selfe. The Emperour did labour him much: he would gladly ioyn Parma to Placentia, and that by lawfull meanes, letting the Pope to vnderstand, that Parma beeing of the patrimonie of the Church, the which was in his protection, he ought to be preferred before Farnese, seeing that Farnese could not keepe it, but with the men and mony of his Holines. B The Pope beeing of a bale mettall, and fearing the touch, tempted with the Emperours practises, sends to Duke Octauio, that hee could no more furnish the extraordinary charges, wherewith he had promised to assist him: and Farnese finding, that the Emperour laid this plot to dispossesse him of his inheritance, he seekes a strong support in France against his Father-in-lawes practises. The King who had not renounced the ancient pretensions of the house of Orleans, to the Duchy of Milan, declares himselfe (but with the Popes good liking) Protector of the patrimonie of the Church, and of the Farneses. The Emperour is in a rage, who with his violent exclamations so terrifies the Pope, as hee abandons his vassall Octauio.

The Pope on the other side, (nothing well affected to the French) grew bitter against the C King: he commanded him to renounce this protection: and for not obeying, he threatens to curse both him and his realme. Thus Julio the second not able to satisfie his greedy desire with the Keyes of Saint Peter, he vnscathes the sword of S. Paul, kindling by his madraie these deadly diuisions throughout all Christendome, as if the Bishop carried the spirituall sword in his hand, to draw it for vnlawfull things, at the first impression of his fantasie. To crosse the Pope, the King forbids expressly, to carry or send any gold or siluer to Rome, for any dispatches, Bulls, Annats, Dispensations, or any other things, commanding the Metropolitans of the Realme to prouide according to the ancient priuiledges and liberties of the French Church. And for that Gonzagua beleegged Parma, (to giue both the Emperour and the Court of Rome a blow) he commanded Charles of Cossé, Lord of Brissac, and Marshall of France, his Lieutenant generall in Piedmont by the death of the Prince of Melphe, to fortifie and furnish Mirandola. Brissac sends some souldiars: Gonzagua surprizeth them, and puts them secretly to death, and suddenly doth beleaguer Mirandola. Warre is now begunne on all sides, and for light occasions, he that seekes a quarrell, wants no apparent shewes to colour it. Both these Princes expected some worthy occasion: but let vs raise vp our thoughts, and say, That G O D had now powred out all his iudgements against Christendome, beeing full of excesse, and worthy of sharpe punishment.

The King sends new forces into Piedmont, and commands the Marshall to succour Parma and Mirandola. He effects it, and by the taking of Quiers, S. Damian and other places, he forceth Gonzagua to abandon the country of Parmesan, to succour Montferrat, and to defend the estate of Milan. On the other side, Mary Queene of Hongarie, and Gouvernesse of the Low-countries for the Emperour, armed in fauour of her brother both by sea and land, And vnderstanding that for a greater confirmation of loue, the Marshall S. Andre, carried in the kings name the order of France, to young Edward King of England: she caused certaine ships to lye betwixt Calais and Douer, to seaze on him in his passage. But to prevent her policie, the Marshall caused some Flemish ships to be stayed, which lay at anchor in the roade of Deepe, vntill they were assured of his arriual in England. And Mary likewise arrested all the French ships, that were within her government. Thus heart burning grew on all sides, which burst out into open warre: euery one calls home his Ambassadors, and assures the places nearest to the enemy: the King especially of Lorraine, hauing some ialousie of Christinne the Dowager, and neere allyed to the Emperour: who to free her selfe from that imputation, did put her selfe with her Sonne Charles into the Kings protection: who caused him to be brought vp with the Dauphin Francis, and afterwards hee married one of his Maiesties daughters.

Before we proceed to open acts of hostility, the King excused himselfe vnto the Pope by the

A the Lord of Termes, for that which he did in fauour of Octavian Farnese, and by the Abbot of Bellofanne, he protested against the decrees of the Assenby which was held at Trent: the which (considering the Popes and the Emperours spleene against France) he could not hold, to be a lawfull and holy Generall Councell: Not that I pretend (said he) to withdraw my selfe from the obedience of the Church: but onely to auoyd the surpises of such, as vnder color of reformation, seeke to disgrace both my person and realme.

After this protestation the King published an Edict made the yeare before, touching imprecation of benefices, and against the fraudes and abuses of the Court of Rome: and also vpon the ancient Edicts and Decrees against Annates, and the abuse of reservations and exactions inuented by the Popes: forbidding all his subiects to go any more to Rome for B Annates, nor for any other occasion concerning benefices: commanding the Ordinaries to dispose thereof, publishing to all men the wrong which Julio did to him and to Octauio Duke of Parma, who was deuiued of that whereof he had beene sollemnely inuested. The Cardinals and other the Popes creatures in France, fearing that this Edict (vpon the which Charles of Moulin a famous Lawyer did write a learned Commentarie, wherein he discovered many terrible practises of Rome) should shake the Popes authoritie. They did very carefully procure the King to publish very seuered Edicts against them of the Religion, to the end that Julio and the Cardinals at Rome should assure themselves of his friendship, whensoever they would adhere vnto him. These Edicts were followed by cruell executions C in diuers parts of the realme against many of the Religion who were burnt alieue, for that they had constantly maintained the truth of the Gospel, and reiected the Traditions of men established in the place of Gods diuine seruice. Those that were at Trent did write vnto the King to induce him to receiue the decrees of their Councell, and to send the Bishops of his Realme thither: moreouer, to intreat him to be a meanes that the Suiffes should send thither: but the warre beeing now begunne in all places, and the Emperour hauing called the Spaniards which were in Germany to come into Italy to the warre of Parma, the pursuite of them of Trent was suspended.

The warre beeing kindled, the King resolved to assure himselfe towards Lorraine, hauing some distrust of the Duchesse Dowager; whereupon he caused some troupes to march towards the Frontiers, and the Emperour did also man all his places, the one looking vpon the other with diuers desseignes whereof the effects did soone after appeare. Whilest that the King persecuted them of the Religion in France, he treated secretly with the Protestant Princes of Germany, and generally with all the Electors and free Citties of the Empire: who saw their liberties and freedoms in a maner ruined, if they did not oppose some mightie aduersarie against the Emperour, who by maine force might stay the course of his vnmeasurable couetousnesse. The Emperour (contrary to his oath) detained John duke of Saxony, and Philip Landgraue of Hesse in miserable captiuitie. He had vanquished most of the other Princes in warre, and fearing lest the French should in the end demand the right vsurped in old time by the Saxons vpon the heires of Charlemagne, when the Empire was hereditarie: he pretended to transport the Imperiall Crowne into his house for euer; and now he thought to haue a fit opportunity. He had suppressed his enemies in Germany: he had a Pope at his deuotion, and he was armed. The most part of the Cardinals who assisted at the Councell, were either naturall Spaniards, or of the Spanish faction: and by consequence, might easily by a decree of this Councell, giue authority to what he intended. With this desseigne he had caused his sonne Prince Philip to come out of Spaine, (who died King of Spaine in the yeare 1598.) to haue him declared his successor, or at least his associate in the Empire: oppressing the people of Germany by insolent and tyrannicall exactions. The Electors not accustomed to seruitude, and lesse to the slauerie of Spaine, not able with their owne forces to shake off the yoke, which they saw ready to be laid vpon them: they repaire F vnto the King, and shew him the wrongs and outrages done vnto them: that they pretended the ouerthrow of the whole Empire, and the abolishment of the rights and priuiledges of the Electors, Commonalties, and Lords of the same: they beseech him, that in regard of the ancient league betwixt the Empire and the Crowne of France, he would take their iust cause in hand, and maintaine the common liberty of Germany. The King resolves to enter into league with them, according to the which in the beginning of the yeare hee sent the Edict against the abuses of the Court of Rome.

Letters from the King to the Protestant Princes.

Bishop of Baione for his Ambassador vnto the Princes Electors, with letters full of protestations and offers of friendship, and an ample declaration of the wrongs done by the Emperour vnto the Princes and Citties of Germanie: adding, that he was resolved to employ both his person and forces for the defence of the rights and Liberties of all Germanie, without respecting any other recompence then the honour to haue done his dutie, and to haue bound so mightie a Nation vnto him: Giuing moreover assurance by oath of this his affection and intention, taking God vnto witnesse, and swearing by the faith of a Prince, that his desseigne was to free all the Estates of Germanie from the oppression of the Emperour and his ministers. The which he also pretended to do particularly in fauour of his most deare and welbeloued Cousins John Duke of Saxonie, and Philip Landgrau of Hesse detayned in miserable captiuitie by the Emperour, notwithstanding hee had promised and sworne the contrarie. In the end of his Letter hee added these words: Wee promise you also by the Almighty God, before all the Kings, Princes, and Potentates of Christendome, that wee will not suffer with our priuie, any wrong or iniurie to be done to you all in generall, nor to any one in particular, of what estate or condition soeuer he bee: And much lesse will wee (who carrie the Title of most Christian) indure that any harme shall bee done vnto the goods or persons of your most reuerend Prelates, Abbottes, and other Clergie-men, as hath beene wrongfully giuen out by our aduersaries: Nay rather we are resolved to take you into our protection, so as you declare your selues for vs and our Allies, and giue vs sufficient assurance of your willes: Hoping the re-vnion of the Church, the which is respected, by the recouerie of the publike Libertie; for the which (with the helpe of God) wee will employ all our forces. The which wee haue thought good (most Reuerend Prelates, most famous Princes, and other the Estates of the sacred Empire) to let you vnderstand, to the end you may not be ignorant of the true cause of this warre, by the which wee pretend to pursue the Emperour with all violence, and (to our great greefe) cutte him off as a putrified member from the bodie of the Common-wealth: or at the least force and constrain him to cease from oppressing you.

Hereupon they giue him this honourable Title, Defender of the Germanes, protector of the nation, and of the holy Empire. Hee armes thirty thousand men, and desirous to countenance his forces with his owne presence, he appoints Queene Katherine his wife, Regent in France: he makes many goodly Edicts for the gouernement of the state, for the ordering of his men at armes, and for the obseruation of militarie discipline: he reformes the abuses of Commanders, suppresseth the insolencie of souldiers, (a commendable institution in comparison of that which hath beene seene in the raignes of his children) and giues the Rendezuous for his armie at Vitry. He was accompanied with Anthony Duke of Vendosm (whom we shall shortly see King of Navarre, by the decease of Henry of Albret his Father-in-law) John Duke of Anguien, Lewis Prince of Conde, all brethren: Lewis Duke of Montpensier, Charles Prince of Roch-sur-yon, all of the royall family of Bourbon: the Dukes of Neuers, Nemours, Guise, Aumale, Elbeuf: the Lords of Rohan, Rochefaucault, Castillon, E d'Andelot, and others in great numbers, in very good order.

The Constable of Montmorencie was made Generall of the armie (a house which shall hereafter be made a Duchie, and Peere of France) Claude of Lorraine Duke of Aumale, a younger brother of the house of Guise was Generall of the horse, consisting of fifteen hundred men at armes, every one hauing two archers: two thousand light horse, as many argoletiers, besides an infinit number of voluntarie French Nobility, marching vnder the fauour of their Prince, and desirous to make their valour apparent by good and faithfull seruices. Caspar Lord of Chastillon, afterwards Admirall, was Colonnell of the foot, consisting (besides the new and the ordinarie companies, which were twenty ensignes of the old bands of Piedmont, and fiew and thirty Ensignes of Gascons and Prouencals (they note the two companies of the Lord of Duras to be compounded for the most part of Gentlemen and old souldiers, worthy of command) of ten thousand Lanquenets in two Regiments, commanded by the Reingraue and Reichbroc. To these bands the Protestant Princes ioyned a battalion of horse, vnder the command of the Colonnell Charrel. But let vs now see their exploit.

1552.

A The City of Thoul at the first abord, puts it selfe into the Kings protection, but this was not the chiefe point of his desseigne. The Emperour passing into France, had the passage of Metz at his deuotion, and had victuals and other necessaries out of that cuntry. The king now requires the like from them: they offer victuals for money, and consent to admitte his Maiestie into their citie, with the Constable, followed with some Princes and Noblemen: but as for any passage of the army, they excuse themselves, and pretend neutrality. The Constable departs, and protests, that he will haue free passage, free entrie, and free issue at discretion, without any limitation, and partly by promises, partly by threats, he winnes the inhabitants. The citizens had not foreseene this storme, and lesse provided any remedy to auoid it. Thus beeing forced to bid their liberty adue, they agree with the Lord of Bourdillon afterwards Marshall of France: That the Constable accompanied with some Princes and Noblemen, should enter with two companies of foot: the companies were six hundred men strong: they increase them with halfe as many more, all chosen men of account, the which beeing entred, repelled the people, become masters, and draw after them so long a traine, as the Metzins had no meanes to resist.

This was the tenth of Aprill on Palme-Sunday: nine dayes after the King made his entry in armes, beeing followed with all his forces put in bataille: he receiued the oath of the Citizens, and sware solemnely to them in the porch of S. Stephens Church. As hee had done to them of Thoul, which was to defend them against all men, and to maintaine them in their freedoms, rights, priuiledges, and liberties: moreover, to prouide for the fortification of the place, which he pretended to make one of the Bulwarkes of France. He left Gommar brother to the Marshall of Brissac for Gouverneur, and with him the company of the Earle of Nantueil, two hundred light horse, two hundred harguebuziers on horsebacke, and twelue ensignes of foot. Thus the famous citie of Metz was brought vnder the obedience of this crowne: a portion of the ancient patrimonie of the Kings of France, and in former times vsurped by the Emperours.

The Constable would gladly haue vsed the like stratageme to Strasbourg: but hee found more assurance and resolution then at Metz. They put a strong garrison into their citie, and prepared for defence against any that should seeke to make them subiect: so as seeing that neither reproches, threats, nor bitter words, could draw any thing from the Inhabitants, but victuals and necessaries for the campe, the army tooke the way of Haguenau and Wisbourg. Thither came Deputies from the Count Pallarine, the Arch-bishops of Mentz and Treues, and from the Dukes of Cleues and Wittenberg, who were then assembled at Wormes for the good of the Common-wealth. They make petition vnto the King, that he would not spoile the champion cuntry, but take pity of the poore Commons: and seeing that he had protested to make this warre for the libertie of Germanie, that he would stay his army: for if he aduanced, it would be very preiudiciall to the Empire. They also besought him that he would hearken vnto a peace, whereof they had spoken vnto the Emperour, and were in good hope thereof. As touching any particular alliance, they desired him not to presse them, but to haue regard vnto their honors, and to the faith which they ought vnto the Empire. At the same time beeing the eleuenth of May, Duke Maurice Elector of Saxonie sent letters vnto the King, containing al that had beene done at Lintz, where the confederate Princes of Germanie had treated of a peace with king Ferdinand, who negotiated the same for the Emperour, in whose name he promised a speedie resolution to the good and quiet of Germanie. He also desired the King (in case he would be comprehended in the Treatie) to declare with what conditions he meant to compound with the Emperour. Having receiued these letters contrarie to his expectation, and hearing that the Queene of Hongarie had taken Stenay vpon Meuse, and spoiled the cuntry beeing without defence, he resolved vpon his returne: but before his departure he made answer to the Princes Deputies: that he was well satisfied, that the captiue Princes should be soone deliuered, and that Germany should be in quiet: That if at any time he should haue need of his assistance, he would employ all his meanes to succour it.

As touching a peace with the Emperour, he referred himselfe vnto them, hauing by his trauell, charge, and valour freed Germany from those miseries which did oppress it, whereof they must now be carefull, and not basely loose that liberty, which he so honorably had Notwithstanding to entertaine his Confederates, and to haue one alwaies in Germanie, which might aduertise him truly how matters passed betwixt the Confederates and the Imperials, and the better to be informed of the Emperours desseignes, he left Du Fre (the Bishop of Baionne his Ambassadour with duke Maurice, who in an assembly held at Passau, to aduise what was to be done for the restoring of Germany to her beautie and ancient liberalitie, in the presence of the Emperours Ambassador, and of the Electors, and many Princes of the Empire, hee made a long and eloquent speech the third of Iune, propounding the ancient coniunction of Germanie and France. The great affection which the King bare vnto the Empire, beeing very ill gouerned by Spaniards and their adherents: he also held it fit, that the Protestant Princes should make an accord with the Emperour, so as the prisoners might be released, and the auncient alliances of France with the Empire, and the last league made with the Princes ratified for euer: That the Emperour should doe him right for his pretensions: That he desired to satisfie them all, and especially duke Maurice. The Princes answer consisted chiefly of thanks, and declarations, so deliuered, as neither the Emperour nor the King could pretend any cause of dislike. As touching the renewing of the ancient Alliances, they said that a matter of so great weight required a greater assembly. In the meane time they desired, that the amitie so long continued betwixt these two nations might remaine firme, and that the differences which the King had against the Emperour might be pacified: promising therein to employ all their meanes: In the meane time they intreated the King to declare what wrongs he pretended to haue bene done him by the Emperour, to whom they would write, to aduance the busines, to some good peace.

Assembly at Passau.

Answer of the Princes.

In the meane time the King leauing Germany, brought backe his army into France: as he aduanced, the Marshall of Cleues, who led the Queene of Hongaries forces retired, and his troupes dis-banded: which made the Kings Councell resolute to vndertake the conquest of the Duchy of Luxemburg. They first attempted a strong Castle called Reck-de-Mars, the which was presently taken and spoiled: the like was done to Mount Saint-John, Solieure and other places, the which were ruined whilst the Kings and Emperours forces skirmished before Thionuille. The armie hauing passed neere it, they approached to Danuilliers, the which beeing battered, yielded to the Kings discretion, the Captaines were detained prisoners, and the souldiers sent away with white wands. Yuoy beeing battered, yielded in like manner, and the Gouverneur was sent to Paris. All the goods were giuen to the Constable, who distributed the greatest part vnto his Companie, and to that of his eldest sonne, where at the old Bands did mutine, and beguane to dis-band. Mommedy followed Yuoy. During these prises the Marshall of La Marke obtained some troupes of the King, with the which he recovered the Towne and castell of Bouillon, with all the other places depending of that Duchie. After which the Castles of Trelon, Glaion, and others were ruined. To content the old Bands they gaue them the sacke of Cimay, a towne and castell belonging to the Duke of Arscor. The beseegeed retiring into the Castle, and offering to parley: they were forced by the portall and other places, by the furie of the assault, being greedie of spoile. They ran thither with such violence, as a match falling into certaine powder, there were about 120. of the forwardest burnt and slaine. The fury of the war consumed townes and castles to ashes. But forasmuch as the Army began to decrease, some dis-banding being laden with spoiles, but the most part sicke and diseased, in the end of Iuly they put the rest into Garrisons, to see what the Emperour would do, who hauing to do with the Protestant Princes and the King, he resolved to make an accord with the Princes, that he might be assisted with their meanes against the King. The last of Iuly he granted a peace to Germany, that he might make violent wars in France. The King was much discontented with this accord: notwithstanding he sent backe the hostages to duke Maurice, who also released his, which were the Earls of Nantueil and of Lamets. After this accord with the Germans, the Emperour preuailed so, as the Princes and townes granted by little and little to furnish him with men, mony, and artillery, to chase the King out of Metz, Thoul, and Verdun, Imperiall Townes. Thereupon hee leaueth an armie of 50000. foote, and 20000. horse with much artillerie. Whilst he prepares, Albert Marquis of Brandeburg, who had in the Kings name made cruel wars against some towns and Bishops of Germany now seeks vnder-hand to be reconciled vnto the Emperour as well as the rest, but he will insinuate himselfe by some notable against Metz.

A notable seruice: beeing followed by 2000. horse, and 8000. foote, and drawing after him some artillerie, he approached the frontiers of Luxembourge and Lorraine, where for a long time he entertained the King with hope to carrie armes for him, during the which hee did wonderfully spoile the champion country. In the end the Marquis retired himself from the French army, and hauing cutt off the victuals from them of Metz, he went and carried arms for the Emperour. Winter approaching many thought the Emperour would not hazard so mightie an army, to encounter (without any profit) the cold, frosts, and discommodities of the season. But the hope he had to take Metz in the which there were many Princes, Noblemen, and Gentlemen, made him reiect all other apprehensions, so as his forces beganne to aduance towards Lorraine, and comes to Sarbruch seuene leagues from whence he sends the Dukes of Alua his Lieutenant Generall, and the Marquis of Marignan with foureteene thousand foote, foure thousand horse, and fixe field peeces to view the cittie, and to choose a conuenient place to lodge his army, attending his comming with the rest of his forces. The Duke of Guise Lieutenant generall for the King, sends forth some troupes to skirmish, where he looeth Marigni a Gentleman of Picardie, two Captaines and fure souldiers: and the enemy, about an hundred and fiftie men. But the Marquis of Brandebourg reuengeth this disgrace vpon the Duke of Aumale, and by a second stratageme, hee giues the King an assured testimonie of his defection, and to the Emperour, the effects of the seruice which he had vowed vnto him. The Duke costed the Marquis his retreat, and cuts the heauiest of his troupes in peeces, when as the Marquis (turning head) ouerthrowes a great troupe of seruants mustred together to make a shew: and chargeth a squadron of light horse: who making but a weake resistance, leaue the place. So all fall vpon the men at armes, who were ill furnished to withstand the shooke of the Reistres pistoles. The Duke seeing his men at armes broken, and seeking to saue themselves, rallies a small troupe, and returns to the charge. The multitude inuiron him, and doth oppresse his best men: some are wounded, and others taken: two hundred Gentlemen, by their death, and the taking of many others, made the Marquis valour famous. The Duke beeing ouerthrowne, remained as a pawne of an assured victorie, and shall not bee deliuered vntill the King hath payed fiftie thousand Crownes for him. This chanced in the end of October: but we shall see this losse recompensed with a happy successe against the Emperours attempts.

Metz beseg-

Emperour.

The Duke of Aumale defeated.

The Earle of Reux entred Picardy at the same time, with the desolation thereof, and the burning of Noyon, Nesle, Chauny, Roye, Folembray and about eight hundred Villages: a testimony of the Emperours spleene. Then hauing beseegeed Hesdin, and filled vpp the trench with the ruines of a wall which they had vnder-myned: the towne was very lightly yielded by the Lord of Raffe, who was in danger to haue bene made a publike spectacle vpon a scaffold, if the Constables fauour had not protected him. The reason was, for that hee had not endured any force, nor made any resistance, and had a little before sent the King word, that there was no feare of the Castle.

This second losse made them to apprehend a third. The Emperour incamped before Metz: and the King desirous to vnderstand in what estate the beseegeed were, as the Duke of Guise, John and Lewis of Bourbon (the one was Duke of Anguien, the last was Prince of Conde) breethren to the Duke of Vendosme, Charles of Bourbon, Prince of Roch-sur-yon, Francis and René of Lorraine, (the first Grand Prior of France, the last Marquis of Elbeuf) breethren to the Duke of Guise: the Lords of Rochefoucault, and Randan breethren: Peter Strossy, la Brosse, Briou, Gonnor, Parroy, with an infinit number of others, who had voluntarily thrust themselves within the wals, to eternize the memorie of so generous a preservation of their new conquest against the Imperiall forces: they all with one consent and resolution, free the king of this suspence, and the effects second their promises. They toyle the enemy with continuall sallies both of horse and foot: they come vp to the cannon, ouerthrow their tents, force their quarters, put the whole campe in alarm, & performe more then hath bene heard of in any former siege. The place did well deserue it, and their vertue was the more admirable, for that the time was so vnseasonable both for the one and the other, beeing in the cold of winter: But the constancie of the beseegeed, and the obstinacie of the besiegers, encountered the rigour of raine, snow, cold, and ice. The 26. of Nouember they batter the wall with fortie Canons, without any intermission, but to coole them: and the beseegeed, 1552. both Princes Noblemen, and souldiers carry earth indifferently to rampar vppe the breach, making the Imperials admire their diligence and valor. The King resting assured, leaues the Duke of Neuers to command his army in Lorraine, and gaue commiſſion to the Lord of Chastillon, then Admirall of France (Annebaule beeing lately dead at la Fere, to go into Picardy, as Lieutenant to the Duke of Vendosme.

The Duke of Neuers employes all his cares to cut off the Emperours victuals: and the Admirals approach chafeth the Earle of Reux from Hedin, leauing his sonne with a strong garrison in the castle. Having spent foure thousand and threescore Cannon shot, he makes a breach the 16. of December, but yet not reasonable: notwithstanding the beſeeged being amazed, yeeld it, to haue their liues and goods ſaued; And the Duke of Neuers did still molest the Emperours army, and at one time cut off a great conuoy of all sorts of victualles and munition by Monsieur de Mouy, without the losse of any one Frenchman: wherein hee got great honour, hauing aduanced himselfe farre, and retired discretely from among many of the enemies troupes, leauing not any one ingaged behind him. This blow troubled the Emperour: the iniuries of the ayre molested his men before Metz: extreme hunger made them weak, the continuall fallies of the beſeeged diminished them, his treasure grew short, his reputation decayed, his mynes were blowne vp, and all his attempts were made fruitlesse: to conclude, all went against the haire. So the Emperour giuing charge to the Duke of Alua, to order the retreat, he left the Empire deſeeged of the Country of Metz, and the Crowne of France assured of this new conquest, by the Conſtables industrie, and happily preferred by the valour of the beſeeged.

But there followed rough encounters. Hedin and Therouenne had till now bene the instruments of warre. It is better (saith the Prouerbe) to stumble once, then to stagger alwaies. The Emperour to be reuenged for some part of his losses, sends the Lord of Binécourt with a mighty army to beſeege Therouenne. The Lord of Eſſé and Francis of Montmorency defended it. The place is furiously battered, the beſeeged sustaine a most violent assault of three charges, and many die on either side. The chiefe among the French, were the Lords of Eſſé, of Vienna, of Beaudisne, of Rochepoſay, of Blandy, Captaine Ferrieres, with many Gentlemen and souldiers. They vndermine, they myne, and with the ruines of the wall fill vp the trenches, which caused the beſeeged to demand a composition. But whileſt they are buſie in parle, (an error which often chancing should make a Commander wiſe) the Germanes and Bourguignons enter at diuers places, and kill all they encounter. The Spaniards louing money at that time more then bloud, ſaued many. The Signeur of Ouarti, to ſaue the life of Montmorency his Generall, was fore wounded, whereof he died ſoone after. And the Emperour cauſing the towne to be razed and ſpoiled, ſhall ſaue many ſoules which should be loſt in the defence and winning thereof.

Hedin affayled, battered, and vndermined more then a Foxes burrow, had like ſucceſſe vnder Emanuel Philibert, sonne to the duke of Sauoy, and Lieutenant Generall for the Emperour, his vnclé by the mothers ſide. The Duke of Bouillon, and Horatio Farnese newly married to Diana the Emperours baſtard-daughter, had taken the gard thereof, and had prepared great ſtore of wild-fire at the breach to defend the assault. A Priest, either through malice or negligence ſets it on fire, and conſumes many ſouldiers ready for the defence. The Imperials on the other ſide, blow vp their mynes, and bury a great number of men in the ruines thereof: they enter pel-mel, and ſo become maſters of the place. Farnese, the Vicont of Martigues, the Seneshall of Caſtres, with many other Gentlemen, were ſlaine there. The Duke of Bouillon with many others, had a long and hard imprifonment.

Let vs take our reuenge. The French army aſſembled about Amiens and Piquigny: the Prince of Conde led the light-horſe, who in the middeſt of Auguſt incountred with ſome troupes, led by the duke of Arſcot: hee charged them, defeated them, and followed them about a league: he ſlue ſeuén or eight hundred men, took about 5. hundred priſoners, and amongſt the reſt, the Duke himſelfe with ſeuén enſignes. The Kings armie conſiſted of about ſeuén thouſand horſemen, ſiue and twentie thouſand foote, with an hundred peeces of artillerie, great and ſmall, deſiring nothing more, then to make his valour admirable, by the iſſue of ſome happie battaile. Beeing and abiding in the enemies Countrey, the Conſtable went to Bapaulme two Leagues from Marie-mont, a place well fortified, and alſo strong 1553. A strong by nature, with 5000. French horſe, and as many foote: In the which Hautſimont (a knight much eſteemed among the Burgonians) was Gouverneur, hauing twelue companies of foote, and three or foure hundred horſe, who at their firſt approach ſpared not his Cannon, and entertained them with a hote skirmiſh, the which continued foure houres: during the which the Admirall with a ſmall troupe viewed the Towne, and found it pregnable, the Rampar beeing made of a crumbling ſand, but the difficultie was to haue water, whereof they could find no laſting ſprings, which made them change their reſolution for the ſeige. At their departure they burnt all villages and places belonging to the enemy euen to the gates of Bapaulme. The Imperiall armie coaſted them in their retreat, keeping ſtill a riuer betwixt them. The King finding that the enemy ſought nothing but to temporize, vntill that winter came on, whereby his army might be weakened by cold and diſeaſes, and then to fight with him vpon aduantage. The King reſolued with his Councell to draw him to battaile if it were poſſible, or to take the firſt place hee ſhould attempt, and to ruine the whole countrey in view of the Emperour, and ſo to returne in triumph, as hauing braued him in his own dominions. He therfore means to ſound Cambray, both for that the taking thereof would be an example to other great townes, as alſo thinking the Imperiall army would rather hazard a battell then loſſe ſuch a place, where the inhabitants would willingly ſhake off the yoke, which not long before had bin laid vpon them, yet being a neutrall towne. The French were incamped two litle leagues from Cambray: by the breake of day the king cauſed his army to be put in battel, and ſent an Herald to ſummon the towne, letting them vnderſtand, that he was not come to oppreſſe them, but to reſtore them to their ancient Liberties, whereof they were deſeeged by the Emperour: if they were deſirous to ſhake off that bondage, they could haue no better meanes then by his coming, beeing there in perſon ready to fight for their Liberties: but if they did otherwiſe, they would be the cauſe of their owne ruines, in looſing the priuiledge of Neuter-townes, which affect neither quarrell, and whereby they had liberty to traffick in both their countries. Beſides, their country ſhould be freed from the miſeries of warre, and from all manner of exactions and ſpoiles. But they demanded 48. houres reſpite of the King, to aduſe thereon, and to yeeld him an answer: whereupon the King cauſed his army to retire a league backe, making a Proclamation, vpon corporall puniſhment, that no man ſhould take any thing within the territory of Cambray without paying for the ſame. In the meane time the Emperour is aduerted of this ſummons, beeing then at Bruſels, who ſent them diuers inſtructions. Among others, that they depended of the Empire, and that he was Emperour to protect them, not the French king, who ſought nothing but their ruine: ſo hauing ſet before their eyes the example of Metz, he promiſed if they were beſeeged to ſuccor them by all meanes whatſoever: and then he gaue order to the Prince of Piedmont (who was gone with his army towards Valenciennes) to yeeld them what ſuccors they ſhould demand, appointing the Earles of Borſu and Brabançon for gouernors. The time limited being expired, the King ſent to know their reſolution: who answered, that if it pleaſed his Maieſty they would remaine his humble neighbors and friends, offering to furniſh the army with victuals, but it was not in their power to diſpoſe any further of themſelues, the Emperour hauing put a great gariſon into their towne. Vpon this answer the towne was adiudged for enemy, and the ſame day beeing the 8. of September, the Conſtable with two Regiments of men at armes, and three or foure hundred light horſe, beeing followed with the Admirall with ten enſignes on foote, went to view the towne, where the cannon played on them from all parts, and the ſoldiers ſallied forth gallantly to skirmiſh, the which the French continued ſix daies together, making a ſhew as if they would beſeege the towne: but the weather growing very rainy, they diſlodged to the caſtle of Cambreſy, from whence they marcht within 2. leagues of Valenciennes, whereas the Imperiall army was lodged in a fort which they had made about a Culuerin ſhot from Valenciennes vpon the riuer of Eſcau. And on the 17. of September the French hauing left their baggage in their lodging with a good guard, the reſt of the army aduanced to ſeeke out the Imperials, & to preſent them battel. The Auant-currers going before, found many of their horſemen in battel, vpon a litle hil ready to fight: and hard by they took one on horſeback, in habit of a merchant, as a ſpie, who gaue intelligence, that the Imperiall foreward had paſſed the riuer to come to fight with them, ſo beeing brought vnto the Conſtable, 1552. and sent by him vnto the King, he was the cause that the army aduanced with all the speed A that might be, and was put in battaile: in the meane time the skirmish grew hote, many of the Imperiall army sallied forth, which did greatly annoy the forlorne hopes. During this skirmish the Imperiall army was put in battaile within their fort. The Kings army beeing likewise in battaile, and the skirmish growing still hote on either side, the Imperiall horsemen stood still vpon a little hill aboue three howers, as it seemes. expecting some aduantage: which the Constable foreseeing, he commanded the light horse-men to charge them, which they did with such resolution as they forced them to retire vnto their trenches, which done the French army seeing they could not draw the Imperials out of their fort, retired backe againe vnto their lodging from whence they came, and from thence it marched within two leagues of Saint Quentins, where it was dissolved the 20. of September, which B done the King sent the Marshall of S. Andrew to spoile the Countie of S. Pol: then in the end of October, he puts part of his forces into garrison, the rest hee dismisseth and sendeth away. Now our armes are laied aside vntill the next spring.

At the Spring the King diuided his forces into three armies. The first was commanded by the Prince of La Roche-sur-yon in Vermandois, beeing compounded of tenne thousand foote, three hundred men at armes, and fiftie or sixe hundred Argoletiers. The Constable had the charge of the second towards Crecy, containing fiftie and twentie Ensignes of French, as many Suisses, two Regiments of Lansquenets, two thousand horse, some of them light horse, and some Argoletiers, with some English and Scottish horsemen. The C third (led by the Duke of Neuers) had twentie Ensignes of English and Scots, two Regiments of Lansquenets, three hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and shotte on horsebacke, with two hundred Reisters, pistoliars: and all three breathed nothing but reuenge, and desire to requite those confusions in Picardie.

New exploits

The Prince enters into Arthois: he spoyle, burnes, and defeats two Cornets of horse, he killeth two hundred vpon the place, and sends their colours to the King. The Constable takes Mariembourg, fortifies Rocroy, ruines the forts of Trelon, Glaion, Simay, and others built within two yeares. The Duke batters and takes the Castels of Orcimont and Beaurin by composition, ruines and burnes a great number of villages: then hauing (by the taking of some strong places seated vpon the Meuz) opened the passage of the riuier, hee enters D Liege and takes Agimont and Bouuines by assault, putting almost all the Inhabitants to death, either by the sword or by the hand of iustice, for that they presumed to stand against an army Royall, and for their outrageous speeches: and to increase their punishment hee burnt the town: he assured himself of Casteltiery & Valuin being abandoned he took and spoiled Dinan, but he preferred the female sexe from the violence of the Germanes, being fled into a Church. Emanuel Philibert Duke of Sauoy, by the death of his father Charles lately deceased, assembled his army with an intent (said he) to fight with the French, if they aduanced. We must trie this braue resolution.

The King passeth the riuier of Sambre the 25. of Iuly, beeing followed by the Duke of Neuers: he enters the country of Hainalt, spoiling, burning, and making all desolate, seeking to draw the enemy to fight. Some troupes charge euen vnto the suburbs of Ninelle, the first towne of Brabant, and for a note of their passage, they fire the sayd suburbs and villages thereabouts, so as many pleasant dwellings were consumed vnto ashes. The Duke of Sauoy flies the lists: and the army marching towards Bains, (one of the chiefe townes of Hainalt) left nothing behind it but teares, sighes, desolation, fire, smoke, and ashes: and to conclude, a mournfull scaffold whereon two great Princes played a horrible Tragedie, being cruelly incensed one against another. The castles and pleasant dwellings of the Gentlemen of the country, yea Bains it selfe and Mary-mont that stately house, and others belonging to Mary Queene of Hongary, sister to the Emperour, Tragny that goodly and proud castle, Reux, Bauets, with an infinit number of others, were (in reuenge of that goodly place of Folembray reduced to that estate, as they might well say, Here was Bains, here was Mary-mont, here was Tragny, Reux, and Bauets.

In the end the French (hauing spoiled the whole countrey) drew the Prince of Piedmont to fight: the two armies incounter about the midst of August neere vnto Renty, where there was a sharpe incounter: the Imperial for-ward chargeth the duke of Guise his troupes, but

A but to their confusion: he defeats them with the helpe of those succours that came speedily vnto him, he kils eight or nine hundred men, and strikes such a terror into the rest of the Imperiall army, as they retire hastily into their campe, as hauing no more desire to fight. So the winter approaching, and want of forrage troubling the men at armes, the King dismissed the Suisses and his Nobility: then leauing the Duke of Vendosme Generall of the rest of the army, hee tooke from the enemy all meanes to endamage the Realme, but by sacking and burning of the country about Hesdin. The thirteenth day of March Pope Inbas the third died, Marcel Cereuin borne in Tuscane succeeded him: but soone after his election, death buried both his name and memorie. John Peter Caraffe a Neapolitan, called Cardinal Thestin, the chiefe author of the Iesuits sect, held the Romane sea, and called himselfe Paule B the 4. We shall this yeare quench the fires of the yeare past, but it shall kindle new combustions, both on this side and beyond the Alpes. So as no affection to the publike good, but the only indisposition of the aire, hath made vs till now surcease our armes.

Philip sonne to the Emperour Charles had the yeare past married with Mary Queene of England, by the decease of Edward the 6. and whilest that England did flame on all sides, by reason of the burning fires against such as had shaken off the yoke of the Romish obedience, they did solicit our two warriours to pacifie their mutuall hatred by some firme and durable peace. Cardinall Poole an Englishman was employed therein, but without effect: for the soe was not yet ripe. The courses of the Imperials made the French to attempt vpon castle Cambresis, the which was taken by scalado, and faire warres made vnto the Spaniards, and to victuall Mariembourg at diuers times, by Bourdillon Lieutenant to the Duke of Neuers, while on the other side Francis of Cleues Duke of Neuers, with the Admirall of Chastillon, Gouvernor in the absence of the duke of Vendosme (who was gone to take possession of his new estates, fallen to him in right of his wife, by the death of Henry of Albret, and shall hereafter be King of Nauarre, and Soueraigne of Bearne) gaue order for the defence of the frontier.

But behold one of the trickes of our ordinarie confidence. Fiftene hundred of the Arriaban, and foure hundred foote with some garrisons of Picardie, returned home laden with spoile, without soutes (saith the Originall) without order, without feare of the enemy, and without courage. Hansmont Gouverneur of Bapaulme, beeing more vigilant, incounters them betwixt a wood, a village, and a riuier: chargeth them, and in a moment takes from them both their boote and their liues at his discretion. The Hannuyers and Arresians made a leaue, that they had taken the Nobles of France without weight. The Imperials seeing Mariembourg victuallled, opposed a Fort called Guiers whence forraging at the neighbour-country, they did starue Mariembourg. Twenty thousand foote, some ensignes of the old Spanish bands, and fiftie or sixe thousand Reisters, vnder the command of Count Barlemont, camped about this fort, to hinder another victualling, conducted by the duke of Neuers, the Admirall Sanjac, Bourdillon, and others, with eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and some eight thousand foot.

E The 26. of Iuly, the French horse charge the Reisters, and driue them into their fort: then seeing the Imperials loth to make any farther aduerture, the time beeing very rainie and vnseasonable, want of forrage, cold, hunger, and many other discomforts caused them to found a retreat, and to leaue the third victualling of Mariembourg, to Sanjac and Bourdillon: after the which the rigour of the season, and the iniuries of the aire, forced both parties to liue in rest. The King hauing then gotten from John of Brosse duke of Estampes the rights which he pretended to the Duchie of Brittanie in right of the house of Blois, he gaue him in exchange the Earldome of Ponthieure. Whilest they remaine quiet vpon the frontier, let vs visit them beyond the mountains. The Marshall of Brissach had the winter past, seized vpon Yureé and Bielle: in the Spring he had fortified S. Iaco, taken Crepacuore, surprized (by the industry of Captaine Saluoison Gouverneur of Verrue) Caza, the storehouse of victuall and munition, prepared by the Imperials for the recouerie of Piedmont, ruined Poman, Saint Saluador, and other small places not to be held, and vnusually fortified in any short time. About the end of Iuly, the Duke of Alua, successour to Gonzaga in the gouernement of Lombardie, went to field with twentie thousand foote, foure thousand horse, and fortie Cannons, who at the first besieged Saint Iaco: but hee found good resistance, Biraque and Vimerca commanding in the place, forced him to retire, and to fortifie at the bridge of Sture, hoping to vanquish those by famine, who had repulsed his attempts by force. The Marshall being fortified from the King, with foure thousand horse, and foureteene thousand foot, led by the Duke of Anguien, Prince of Conde, the Dukes of Aumale and Nemours, the Vidame of Chartres, Aubigni, Gannoy, Antador, d'Ysè, la Chastre and Lude, with a great number of voluntarie Gentlemen, besieged Vulpian, defeated the succors which the Duke of Alua sent, tooke the high and the low towne by force, and the castle by composition. Montcaluo both towne and castle (after the dismantling of Vulpian) followed the Conquerors fortune: the French made these conquests in September and October, some dayes after the Dukes troupes had by meanes of an Ambush layed neere vnto Incise (where some French were slaine and others taken) a small reuenge for their losses at Vulpian and Montcaluo: the remainder of the yeare was more quiet. But before we proceed, let vs speake something of the warres of Siena, which beginning long before, were ended this yeare.

The insupportable behaviour of Don Diego of Mendosa, Gouvernor of Siena for the Emperour, had driuen the Citizens to put themselves into the Kings protection, and to bring into their city foure thousand men, vnder the command of the Earle of Petillano, who being entred, force the Spaniards, kill some, and expell the rest by composition. These men chased from Siena, seaze vpon Orbitello and fortifie it. After the seaze of Metz, the Emperour sent Don Garfe of Toledo Viceroy of Naples, with fiftene hundred horse, and twelue thousand foote, to spoyle the Countrie of Siena: and the King to crosse him, sends the Lord of Termes with twelue thousand foot, besides the Inhabitants of the country, all hauiug vowed to roote out the gouernment of the Spaniards. Termes being entred, he provided for the fortification of the city, and assured himselfe of Montselice, Montelle, and Montalcin against the threatens of the Viceroy, and of Ascanius de la Corne, attending the arriual of Peter Stroffy who came with the title of Lieutenant Generall for the King, with a good troupe of men at armes.

Stroffy being arriued, he makes new leuies in Italy. Cosmo Duke of Florence giues intelligence to the Pope and Emperour, and all ioyne together to send home the French, giuing the charge of their common army to James de Medeis Marquis of Marignan. The Marquis besiegeth Siena, and at his first approach had almost surpris'd it by night, the fortifications being not yet finished. The Sienois withstand him, giue him the repulse, and kill many of his men. He then incampes before the towne, spoyles the country, and had alreadie reduced them to want, while that Stroffy was busied to provide for the other places within the estate of Siena. Stroffy comes into the towne, and goes presently to field againe with sixe hundred men; he surpriseth Ralph Baillon and Ascanius de la Corne, who had an enterprise vpon Chiusti: he defeats their troupes, kills Baillon, and sends Ascanius prisoner to the king.

The King releued him with new supplies in Tuscane, and likewise in the Ile of Corfica, where the Lord of Termes had taken from the Genouois (partisans to the Emperour) the Townes of Saint Florent, and Saint Boniface a port of the sea. These last succours consisted of siue thousand Suisses and Galscons, with some light horse. And whilest they take breath in Siena, Stroffy makes a second salley, with siue hundred good horse, and sixe thousand choice foote, takes Montcalin and Montcarlo from the Duke of Florence, and by this stratageme he forceth the Marquis to leaue Sienna, for to succour the Florentin: then seeing the Marquis fortified with new troupes, he returns with his men to Siena. Moreouer, Leo brother to Peter Stroffy ranne along the coast of Tuscane, and spoiled the ports belonging to the Duke of Florence. But as he approached too neere to Scarlin, to discouer the place, he was slaine with a shot. Stroffy to reuenge this death, comes to continue the seaze, attending the succors which the Lord of Montluc brought. Montluc being arriued, Stroffy makes an army compounded of 600. Italians, two thousand Galscons, two thousand Suisses, two thousand siue hundred Lansquenets, and about a thousand horse, with which troupes hee resolved to fight with the enemy, if he presented himselfe: hauiug left the guard of Siena to Montluc, he went to batter Ciuitelle in the territorie of Florence.

The Marquis goes to succour it, and at his arriual chargeth Stroffy, who makes head against him, and both the one & the other bath the field with a great effusion of blood. Stroffy leaues

A leaues Ciuitelle, to set vpon Foian, a strong and a rich place: he batters it, and the first day takes it by assault, cutting Charles Vrsin in peeces with all those that kept it, spoiles it, and abandons all to fire and sword. But see a troublesome Catastrophe. The Marquis approacheth better furnished with artillery, and Stroffy marcheth towards Montpulcian, fauouring the retreat of his men, with many and rough skirmishes, then the Italians, beeing the chiefe strength of his army, slip from him, and leaue him much inferior to the Marquis: who following with speed, ouertooke him betwixt Martian, Lucignan and Foyan, and giues him bataille. Stroffy entertaines it, and with a bloody fight giues testimony of his valour. But Bighet an Italian, being ensigne Colonnell of the army, turns his backe cowardly: and the French sauuing their liues after him by the nimbleness of their legges, leaue the horse, the Galscons and the Suisses to endure the charge, who had rather die with their armes in their hands, then turne their backs. Bighet and the Earle of Alte were afterwards beheaded, the first as beeing the principall cause of this defeat: the other for that hee had cowardly yeelded Lucignan, a place impregnable. They reckon two thousand siue hundred slaine (some say foure thousand) besides a great number wounded to the death, and siue or fixe hundred prisoners. Stroffy saued himselfe in Montalcin, and the Marquis recouered Foyan, Martian, Lucignan and some other places, which euen then began to force the Sienois to obey the Conquerours command, who camped before their towne with all his forces. Montluc comforts them, and confirms their resolutions: but the coming of Stroffy with two ensignes of foot, and two companies of men at armes, saued in this shipwrecke, reuiued them more: the which hee did hazard in fauour of the besieged vpon a report of the death of Montluc. Montluc foreseeing, that bread would sooner faile the besieged, then courage, had already set an order for euery mans diet. The Marquis repulsed by the losse of six hundred men, at a scalado giuen in the night to the Cittadell, and the fort of Camollia: and finding that by skirmishes, batteries, assaults, intelligences, nor other stratagems, hee should neuer be maister of Siena: hee resolves vpon the longer, but the more easie expedient: so as the watches, the toyles, the diseases, and worst of ail, famine and dispaire of succor, forced Montluc the twenty one of Aprill this yeere, to saue the rest of his men by an honorable composition, which is read at large, in the history of the warres of Italy. Siena fell afterwards into the hands of the duke of Florence, and the Marquis, for that he had prolonged the warre of Siena, contrary to the Emperours liking, and wasted a mighty army before it, died in disgrace, in the end of the same yeere.

Now the Emperour (whose humour wee haue sufficiently learned by the discourse of the History) shrinking vnder the burthen of the affaires of this world, wearied with the toyles of warre, toucht with some remorse for the blood spilt, in those long and mournfull warres of Christendome, beeing perswaded, that his discord with our King, had made the Turke to preuaile much in diuers parts of Europe, his coming of late in fauour of the French, to the Isle of Corse, to assist them at the siege of Caluis, and Saint Boniface: to aide them to conquer the Islands; then in their retreat to spoyle the coast of Tuscane, to besiege Plombin, and the Isle of Elbe, of the territorie of Florence: to afflict the estates of Naples, Sicilia and Calabria, with infinite miseries, and beeing laden with great spoiles, to carrie away without controule, and to sell infinite numbers of Christian soules at Constantinople and other places.

These considerations caused him to call Philip his sonne from England to Bruxelles, where by autentike letters, of the siue and twentieth day of October, hee resigned all his Realmes vnto him: commanding all his estates and subiects, to acknowledge him as their true and lawfull King, aduising him particularly, amongst other exhortations, to make a peace, and entertaine loue with the French King, vniting their common forces, rather for the defence, then oppression of Christendome. King Philip following his fathers aduice, and beeing sollicit by Mary Queene of England his wife, was inclined to a peace: for the effecting whereof, after many voyages, a truce was concluded for siue yeeres. The Earle of Lalaine came to Blois to see the King sweare the truce, and the Admirall of Chastillon went to Bruxelles to the Emperour and King Philip, but this truce was as soone broken as made. During the continuance of this truce, one called Villegagnon a Knight of Malta armed certaine shippes and made a voiage to America, promising to doe wonders

If this enterprife had incountr'd a discreet commander, there had bene a port open for the execution of great matters, but the gouernor of the world had otherwise disposed.

Duke of Guise comes into Piedmont.

Valencia taken.

Paul the fourth was enemy to the Spaniards: and the Colonnas suspecting him to bee of the French faction (as in trueth the house of Caraffes had of old time fauoured the title of our Kings, to the realme of Naples) sought to assure their estates and persons. To his end they held some secret assemblies within Rome, in the houses of Marc Anthony Colonne, and the Cardinall of Saint Fiore, enemies to the house of France. The Pope to crosse them, imprisons this Cardinall in the castle of Saint Angelo, with Camillo Colonne, Iulian Cesarin, B and the Abbot of Bresque: hee summons Marc Anthony, and plants gards and sentinels throughout all the city. The Colonnas and their adherents, flie to the Castilian. Hee commands the duke of Alua to succour them. The duke marcheth with that designe, and takes from the Pope about Rome Anagnio, Pilastine, Segne, Tiouli, and by the siege and taking of Ostia, cuts off the victuals from Rome, and the Colonnas fortifying themselues about Rome, kept the Pope mew'd vp within compasse of his wals.

The Pope appeales to the King for aide, and sends him by his nephew the Cardinall Caraffe, a triumphant hat with a statelie sword. Our two Kings did not greatly loue: their ancient hatred and discontents were yet fresh, and their house-hold flatterers (to whom common confusions did serue as a ladder to aduance their estates and to enrich their houses, whereas peace sends the most of them home to liue priuately) were glad that Rome kindled the coales of new quarrels betwixt their maisters. So the French (meaning to crosse the Castilian, in fauour of the Pope) sent Strossy (Marshall of France in the place of the Lord of Sedan, lately deceased after his returne from prison out of the Low-countries) to oppose against the Spaniards, attending the succours led by the duke of Guise. The duke of Guise arriued at Turin, with about fifteene thousand foote, eight hundred men at armes, and twelue hundred light-horse, being assured of supplies as soone as the warres should beginne: hauing ioyned his forces with those of the Marshall of Brissac, he marcheth directly to Valencia, making this his colour, that the garrison had shot at the French going to succour the Pope: and for that it was secretly giuen out that the French had taken Paui, hee D amazeth Spoluerin, who kept the towne with two thousand men: summons him to yeeld, threatening him to put all to fire and sword, if he enter by force. Thus Spoluerin being terrified, departs with bagge and baggage, and loofeth his head at Paui for a reward of his base cowardise.

The duke of Guise beeing come to Thurin in January 1557. the cheefe towne in Piedmont, the Spaniards fortified Milan, and refest the garrisons of all places of importance in Italy. The duke of Florence armed, and lodged troupes vpon the frontiers of Ferrara, manning Florence and other townes of his obedience, especially towards Bologna. The duke of Alua fortified the townes in the Realme of Naples, and along the sea-coast in Calabria. So as all Italy was in alarum, and stood vpon their gards. On the other side Strossy, Montlus, and others which were in Rome, issue forth with fixe hundred horse and fife thousand foot, recouer Ostia by composition, and expell the Spaniards from Velitres, Tusculum, Marin, Grotteferrate, Palefan, Saint Angelo, Saint Paul, Vico, Valerio and other small places in the territories of Rome. The duke of Aluaes retreat had opened the way to Rome for the duke of Guise, presuming vpon the conuention lately made betwixt the King, the Pope and the duke of Ferrara: whereby the Pope should furnish twenty thousand foote, a thousand horse, and the charge of the army: the King the like number of foote, and two thousand horse: the duke fixe thousand foote, two hundred men at armes, fixe hundred light-horse, and twenty peeces of battery. But the Popes haue commonly aduanced their affaires at their costs that haue beleueed them, and then haue abandoned them very lightly that haue E assisted them at their need. The duke of Guise comming to Bologna, findes no men in field, neither were the Popes cofers open, and it may bee, if they had not toucht this string, the expedition had bene more succesfull.

In the meane time the French army decreased for want of pay, the Spaniards increased, and the Ferrarois in steed of assisting, craued aide of the duke of Guise his sonne-in-law. What

A What could our men doe, but studie of their returne into France? but the Pope had not yet firmly seled his affaires: and if he had long remained a lone betwixt two stooles, without doubt the Spaniard would haue ouer-ruled him. And therefore, to stay the duke of Guise, hee sweares, Not to treat any accord without the Kings consent, and that for assurance thereof he would send his sonne the duke of Palliane for hostage into France. But it was rather to attend the successe of the affaires of Picardy, where they prepared a Theater to play a bloody Tragedy, then with any intent to discharge his oth. The Admirall hauing, by the taking and spoile of Lens in Artois, begun the warre in Picardie, the prince of Piedmont accompanied with Ernest and Henry dukes of Brunswike, the duke of Arscot (newly come out of prison) the Earles of Mansfield, Aiguemont, Meigue and Barlement, leading fortie thousand foote, and fifteene thousand horse: ten thousand English foot and fifteene hundred horse, came soone after that to his succour. The prince of Piedmont, hauing newly proclaimed war against the King, came & threatned Guise, but in effect it was to besiege Saint Quentin being vnfurnished of men.

The Admirall resolued to enter it, and parted from Pierrepont the second of August, with foure companies of men at armes and three of light-horse. Being at Han, he was forced (by reason of the hast of his voyage) to content himselfe with two companies of foote-men: the third part whereof entred with him into Saint Quentin, the rest remained behind and were forced to retire, for that the towne was in a manner all inuested. The Constable C bein aduertized what past within the towne, hee sent the Prince of Condé generall of the light-horse, the Marshall of Saint Andrew with foure hundred men at armes, and the Lord of Andelot with ten companies on foote, to put themselues into Han, aswell to anyoie the enemy, as to refresh Saint Quentin if they could: Andelot offered to enter with two hundred men, whilst that a generall alarum should be giuen vnto the enemy, but the enterprife being discovered by some prisoners, hee could not effect it, but with a small number.

In the meane time the Spanish army was fortified with ten thousand English foote and about fifteene hundred horse. The Constable desirous to saue them that were within Saint Quentin, caused his army to passe the riuier beneath La Fere, and on the tenth day of August being Saint Lawrence day marched towards Saint Quentin, where they arriued about nine of the clocke in the morning, and put themselues in battaile, at the suburbs off Isle, which the Spaniards had won, whom they chased away. In the meane time the artillery plaied vpon the prince of Piedmonts campe, and caused great disorder, during the which the Constable put what succours he could into the towne. The Spanish army resolued suddenly to ioyne with the Constable, and to force him to fight, wherevpon the prince of Piedmont and the Earle of Egmont ioyned. The Constable making his retreat, without any intent to fight, hee ioyned with the prience of Conde, who made a stand, with the light-horse-men nere vnto a Wind-mill, and they two together without losse, ioyned with the body of the army. The enemy followed them close with eight great battalions of horse: the Earle of Egmont (who that daie did great seruice vnto his maister) was the first E which charged the French on the one side with two thousand horse: Ernest, and Henry, dukes of Brunswic, seconded by the Earle of Horne, with two thousand Reistres and one thousand men at armes fell vpon the other side: The Earle of Mansfield with other Commanders, forced the midst with such violence, as the French were ouerthrowne: for though the partie were very vnequall, yet they did fight, whereas the Constable was wounded and taken prisoner, with the dukes of Montpensier, and Longueville, the prince of Mantoua, the Marshall of Saint Andrew, with many other Noble-men, and Gentlemen of marke. The chiefe of them that were slaine, were John of Bourbon duke of Anguien, the Vicount of Turenne (the Constables sonne-in-law) the elder brother of Roche-du-Maine, the Lords of Chandenier, Pontdormy, with very many others, and in a manner all the foote captaines, who seeing the horse-men put themselues into a square battalio, but they were presently broken; part of them were cut in peeces, and the rest taken prisoners. This bloody battaile lasted foure or fife houres, the victors pursued them within a league of Lafern, and it hath bene since held strange how so great a number escaped, seeing their amazement. The prince of Condé, the duke of Neuers, the Earle of Sancerre, and the Lords of Bourdillon, Grammont, Creuescœur, Piennes, Descars and others escaped. Montmorancy the Constables eldest defeat, where they had lost a number of men, whereof writers speake diuersly, some say foue thousand, others report eight thousand, slaine vpon the place. The King retired from Compiene to Paris, assured his capitall city, and drew from them a Subsidy of 30000. pounds starting to supply his vrgent affaires: whilst that King Philip receiuing the ensignes taken from the French, and seeing the prisoners led before his lodging as it were in triumph, hee contented himselfe with his victory, not entring any farther into France, the which many townes did apprehend.

Saint Quentin taken by assault.

As for the besieged in Saint Quentin, King Philip comming to the campe, the battery was furious, and the besieged could not bee releued, but with three hundred men, whereof two third parts were slaine seeking to enter. Their towers and defences were beaten B downe with the Canon, and the Spaniards were become Maisters of the ditch, on the seuenth day of August, the besieged (who were not aboue eight hundred men) distributed into eleuen breaches) endured a generall assault, and could not bee forced: But the towne was taken, by a Tower which no man garded. The French souldiers were in a manner all slaine. The Admirall, his brother (who escaped soone after) Jarnac, Saint Remy, Humes with many other gentlemen of marke were taken prisoners: The sonne of the Lord of Fayette, with the captaine Saluvert, Ogier, Vicques, La Barre, Esfang and Gourdes were slaine.

The Pope reconciles him-
selfe to the Spaniards.

After the taking of Saint Quentin, the Earle of Aremberg with twelue hundred horse and three Regiments of Lanquenets, besieged Castelet, and made a furious battery. The C Barron of Solignac commanded there, seeing himselfe destitute of suckers that were promised, that the place was not to bee defended against an assault, hauing not three hundred men, and those not very resolute, he yeelded vp the place without fighting, for the which he was carried captiue to Paris, and had lost his life if he had not escaped out of prison, for that he had promised (as they said) not to leaue the place without an assault. After which the Spaniards taking Han, Chauny and al other places, that might annoy them in Picardy, made their victory absolute. Thus the Spanish forces, had a happy season: and the Pope resol-ued to leane to the stronger. These losses make him easily forget the speedy succors hee had found in France: so as at the first approach of the duke of Alua, hee sends him a blanke, by the Cardinall Caraffe, and renouncing in September following the league made with the D King, he made frustrate all his desseignes against Italy. Doubtlesse the counsell of the Constable, the Admirall and many others, aduising to maintaine the truce, was farre more expedient, then this light and painefull enterprise in fauour of a Pope, who was content to haue imbarcked vs in a new Labirinth of confusions, whereof we shall not be freed, without a mournfull and exemplary spectacle. To teach princes: that an accord confirmed by a re-ciprocall oath, ought to be holy and inuiolable. So this reconciliation was made famous by a strange wonder. The same day, and the day after this peace was concluded, almost a third part of the buildings of Rome, and a great number of Christians perished, by a sodaine and violent inundation of Tiber.

A great inundation at Rome.

The King beeing at Paris during these tempests, as hee went to heare masse a yong man E named Caboche, borne at Meaux, who had long followed the Court and serued the Secretaries of State, by reason of his faire writing, whether that hee were distract of his wits, or thrust on for some other consideration, hee came and presented himselfe before the King, with a naked sword in his hand, and cried out aloud, Stay King, God hath commanded mee to kill thee. Wherevpon the Suisses of the Kings gard apprehended him presently, whom the King caused to bee deliuered into the hands of Iustice to determine of his offence: where-vpon the Court of parliament caused Caboche to be hanged for this attempt.

There was some likelihood, that Philip after his victory at Saint Quentin would haue entered further into the realme with his army: but vnderstanding that the King expected a supply of foureteene thousand Suisses, and prepared his campe at Laon, he was content to F fortifie his last conquests: and so gaue the King meanes to stay the troupes, which the dukes of Guise and Aumale brought out off Italy to chase the Baron of Polleuille from Bourg in Bresse, the which hee besieged in the duke of Sauois name, with twelue hundred horse, and twelue thousand foote. The duke of Guise being come with his army out of Italy to the King beeing at Saint Germaine in Lay, hee was by reason of the Constables imprison-

A imprisonment declared his Lieutenant generall. Should the King then suffer the courage of these forces newly arrived to quaille, with idleness, when as he might profitably employ them? The English had held Calais from vs, two hundred and ten yeeres: the Constables imprisonment had hindered the execution of a desseigne which he and the Admirall his Ne-pew had vpon this towne, by the meanes of Senarpont Gouvernour of Boullen. But now they winne that by force, which they could neuer get by policy or indoltry. His Maiesty declares the duke of Guise his Lieutenant Generall, in all his countries: he leaues two armies, the one hee giues to the duke of Guise: the other, to the duke of Neuers. The first aduanceth vnder colour to hinder the victualing of Saint Quentin. The other turning towards Luxembourg, drawes the Spaniards and Wallons to the defence thereof: then A suddenly hee sends his forces to the duke of Guise, who marcheth with all speed against Calais.
In this army, among many others, were the Princes of Conde and Roche-sur-yon, the duke of Aumale and the Marquis of Elbeuf brethren, the Marshall Stroffsy, Montmorency, eldest sonne to the Constable, the Lords of Andelot, Termes, Grandmont, Creuecoeur, Pien-nes, Randan, Allegre, Sansac, Tauanes, Senarpont, Esfree maister of the Ordinance, and Gourdan, who lost a legge in this action.

1555.

The French army appeared the first day of Ianuary, and at the first arriual takes the fort of Nieulay: and the next day, that of Risban. Thus the way to the towne being opened, and the besieged suddenly surprisid, without hope of speedy succours, first the castle, and then the towne returned to the obedience of this crowne, as gladly, as wee haue seene her C ancient Burgeses bid their poore and desolate country mournfully farewell, in the yeere 1347. The county of Oye, and all the forts the English held there, returned likewise to the subiection of their first and lawfull Lord. Guines, and other places dismantled, spare the cost which should be consumed in the defence thereof. The same month the King called a generall Parliament at Paris, where he had a grant of three millions of gold for the warre, and then he went to visit Calais, and gaue the gouernment to Mon: de Termes. On the other side, the duke of Neuers did take for the King, the castle of Herbemont: the forts of Imoigne, Chigny, Rossignol and Villeneuve. Thus their sorrow was turned into ioy, their hearts panting yet with that bloody battaile of Saint Laurence. The Court was partaker of D this ioy, celebrating the 28. day of Aprill, in the midst of these prosperities, the marriage of Francis Daulphin of Viennois, with Mary Steward Queene of Scotland, daughter to James the fifth, and Mary of Lorraine, daughter of Claude duke of Guise, and widow before to the duke of Longueuille.

The Daul-phin married to Mary queene of Scotland.

During these happy victories, and coniunctions of alliances: the Dutchesse Dowager of Lorraine, laboured to increafe these solemne and publike ioyes, by the conclusion of a peace betwixt the two Kings. The Cardinall brother to the duke of Guise, met with her at Peronne to that intent: but this parle without effect, hastened the execution of an enterprise vpon Thecouille, the which being battered from the fifth, to the 21. day of Iune with fue and thirty Canons, and the mines ready to play, receiued an honourable composition.
E The proiect of this prize is giuen to the duke of Neuers, the glory of the execution, to the duke of Guise: and the duke of Nemours, the Marshall of Stroffsy (who was slaine there, with a shot vnder his left pap, the duke of Guise leaning on his shoulder, as they caused a platforme to be vndermined) the Lords of Montluc, Vielleuille, and Bourdillon, had the honor to haue giuen good testimonies of their valours in this prize. Chigny taken afterwards from the Wallons, was fortified: Arlon, Villemont, and Rossignol, burnt and made vnprofitable for the warre.

The English in the meane time, spoiled the coasts of Normandy and Picardy: and the King to stop their courses, prepares two small armies, one at la Fere vnder the duke of Au-male: the other at Calais, vnder the Marshall of Termes, who succeeded Stroffsy. The Marshall attempts Berghes (they feared not the French there, and the townes which the Spaniards held vpon that coast were ill furnished) he takes it, sacks it, and by that meanes opens the way to Dunkerk. Dunkerke beeing taken and spoiled in foure daies, enriched both the souldiers, and boies of the army.

But the Flemings force them to make restitution: the Marshall camped before Graue-line: and the Cont Aiguemont Lieutenant for the King of Spaine, in the Low-countries, hauing

1558. hauing spendly assembled out off the neighbour garrisons, and of other forces, about sixteene thousand foote, a thousand or twelue hundred Reistres and two thousand horse, cuts off his way vpon the riuier of A, which comes from Saint Omer, and forceth him to fight. At the first charge, the French army ouerthrowes some squadrons of horse: but at the second shock, the Marshall is hurt and taken, with Villebon, Senarpont, Moruilliers and Chau-ne, a great number of captaines and souldiers are slaine vpon the place, and all the troupes so discomfited, as of all the companies of men at armes, of three cornets of light-horse Scottishmen, foureteene ensignes of French foote, and eightene of Lansquenets, few escaped death or imprisonment: a wound which reuiued the scarre of Saint Laurence, and did frustrate the duke of Guise his enterprise vpon Luxembourg: but it was partly recompensed by the Lord of Kerfimon, vpon fixe or seuen thousand English and Flemings which landed at the hauen of Conquet, spoyling, and burning the weakest parts of the coast of Britan. This was in the end of Iuly. The duke of Guise sayling of Luxembourg, came to lodge at Pierrepont in Tirasche, and there fortified with seuen cornets of Reistres, brought by William, younger sonne to Iohn Frederick Elektor of Saxony, and a new regiment of Lansquenets, led by Jacob of Ausbourg, made the French army as strong, as the yeere before. About all others, were most apparant the companies of the duke of Guise, Lieutenant generall, of the dukes of Montpensier, Neuers, Aumale, Bouillon, Nemours, Saxony, Lunembourg, of the Prince of Roche-sur-yon, of the Prince of Salerne, of the Count Charny, the Marshall Saint Andre, the Marquis of Elbeuf, and of the Lords of Roche-foucault, Randam, Curton, Montmorency (the Constables eldest sonne) Eschenets, Roche-du-Maine, Jenlu, La Vauguion, Bourdillon, Tauanes and Beauuais. The light-horse of the Earles of Eu and Roissy, of the Lords of Valette, Bueil, Laigny, Rottigotty, Lombay and others, whereof the duke of Nemours was generall, and so great a number of Germaines, Swisses, and Frenchmen, as this flourishing army (lodging neere to Amiens, along the riuier of Somme) preuailed much for the treaty of peace, which followed soone after.

Philip had his army likewise vpon the riuier of Anthy, both intrenched and fortified with artillery, as if they meant to continue there, and in time to tire one another. Some moneths passe without any other exploit then in-roades and light-skirmishes. In the end, the eternal God of armes, who from his heauenly throne beheld the feate of these two mighty armies, changed the bitterneffe of former warre into a pleasing peace, confirmed by alliances the yeare following. The Abbey of Cercamp vpon the confines of Arthois and Picardy, gaue the first entry. And as the Constable (being freed from prison) the Marshall of Saint Andrew, the Cardinall of Lorraine, Moruilliers bishop of Orleance, and Aubspine Secretary of State, assembled for the King, treated with the duke of Alua, the Prince of Orange, Regomes de Silues, cup-bearer to King Philip, Granduelle bishop of Arras, and Vilge, of Zuichem, president of the counsell of State for the Low-countries: behold the death of Charles the fifth Emperour, chancing in September, and that of Mary Queene of England, in the midst of Nouember, changed both the place and the time of this conclusion.

Castile-Cambresis had the honour to finish it at the second conference, the which was confirmed by the marriages, of Philip with Elizabeth, eldest daughter to King Henry: of Phillibert Emanuel duke of Sauoy, with Marguerite the Kings onely sister: and of Charles duke of Lorraine, with Claude a younger daughter of France. The King yeilded to the Castilian all that hee had taken from him, as well on this side, as beyond the mountaines. To the Sauoyard, he restored Bresse, Sauoy and Piedmont: to the Genouois, the Isle of Corse, and about foure hundred places more conquered, during these fatal and pernicious warres, which had made so many Prouinces desolate, ruined so many castles, villages and townes, drunke so much Christian blood, and slaine so many millions of men of all qualities, reteining nothing but the territories of Boullen and Calais. Thus the winde doth fodenly drinke vp, all the toile, all the trauels, all the sweat of many ages. And the Lord faith vnto man: Thou foote, this night will I take thy soule from thee, and who shall haue the things which thou hast prepared? And, All men are vaine, doubtlesse man labours for a shadow, he troubleth himselfe for nothing.

The King being at peace with his foraine enemies, with whom euery man thought their should be eternal alliances, he was counceled to continu his seuer proceedings against his

A subjects of the religion, the which had increased much during the troubles, for the redressing whereof there needed no violent but spirituall remedies, many ill aduised counsellors to this prince (who of himselfe was of a mild and temperat disposition) made him conceiue a wonderfull hatred against them of the said religion, filling his eares with vnworthy reports. The Lord of Andelot was the first that smarted, being sent prisoner to Melun for his religion. This caused many discontents and ieaiousies amongst great houses, which was the cause of great mischief after the death of Henry.

The prisons were full of such as they called Lutherans, and euen then many noble families were toucht with that cause. Moreover, many officers of the Parliament, wished a milder proceeding against those prisoners. This diuersity caused an assembly, which they called B Mercuriale, to heare the opinion of presidents and counsellors vpon this controuersie, the which the King was required to countenance with his presence. Anne du Bourg vsed a great liberty of speech: some others did second his opinion. This freedome transported the King into choller: hee commands the Constable to put them in prison, and vowes to see them burnt within few daies, if they persist. But oh prince! The yeeres of thy account are come, and thou entrest into a path from the which thou shalt no more returne. The Constable deli- uers them to the Count Montgomery, captaine of his Maiesties gardes, who leads Bourg to the Bastille, and the rest to diuerse other prisons. Let vs not iudge hereby, but admire how soe- uer, the iudgements of God: in that wee shall see these three personages, euery one in his

C ranke, die an extraordinary and tragicall death.

In the meane time the Courtiers made all the inuentions that might bee for sports and delights, to solemnize the marriage of the Kings daughters and sister, the which in outward apparence seemed to bring a great happinesse to France: But the sighes of prisoners for matter of religion, the horrible punishments and executions of other, the earnest praiers of infinite families threatened, who found by experience that this peace was concluded betwixt the French and the Spaniard, to make an irreconcilable warre against them, were the windes which drew from aboue these wonderfull alterations, which the wise prouidence of God did let them see soone after. Elizabeth of France, hauing beene conducted by the King her father, to our Ladies Church at Paris, was there married with great state and triumph, by the duke of Alua, who had procuracion from the King of Spaine his master, the ceremony was done by the Cardinall of Bourbon, where there assisted many Princes, Noble-men, Cardinals, and Prelates, from all parts of the realme, with an infinite number of the Kings officers and household seruants, there also assisted the duke of Sauoy, the prince of Orange, the Earle of Egmont, and a great number of other noble men of the Low-countries: after all their sumptuous banquets, sportes, masks and daunsing, followed the last act which changed all these pleasing Comedies and sports, into a bloody and mournfull tragedie, whereof the King was the lamentable prologue, for hauing published a solemne running at the Tilte, the King (contrary to the aduise of many who besought him to leaue that exercise, to others who would giue him content) would needs be one of the Chal- lengers, being seconded by the dukes of Guise, and Ferrara: but the second day of this Tour- ny, after that hee had runne well, being intreated by the Queene to retire, wherein the duke of Sauoy laboured also, he sent her word by the Marshall of Montmorency that hee would runne but once, and that for her sake, hee sent a Lance to the Earle of Montgomery. The Earle excuseth himselfe to runne against his Maiesty: the day before hee could not hit any one, and it may be now hee feared a second shame. But hauing a second charge from the King to enter the Lists, hee runnes, and breakes his Lance vpon the Kings cuirasse, and with a splinter thereof (his beauer being some-what open) strikes him so deepe into the eye, as the tenth of Iuly his soule left his body, in his house of Tournelles, the foure and fortieth yeere of his age.

F The day before his death hee would haue the marriage of the duke of Sauoy and of the Lady Marguerite his sister celebrated in his Chamber, and that whatsoeuer had beene accorded vnto the duke by the Treaty of peace should bee fully performed: His heart was interred in the Celestines Church in the dukes of Orleance Chapell. His royall obsequy was celebrated one the thirteenth day of August, and his body was laied at Saint Dennis in the common Tombe of the French Kings: during this princes raigne, there were two

King Henry.

1559. great sins crept into France, Atheism and Magick, wherunto was ioyned the corruption of A all good learning: for the knowledge thereof being brought in by King Francis the first, was in many curious and malicious spirits an occasion of all wickednesse, especially in that multitude of French Poets, who by their impure rimes, full of blasphemies, ouerthrew a number of foules.

He had by Katherine de Medici his wife, five sonnes and five daughters. Francis his successor, of the age of sixteene or seuentene yeares, Lewis Duke of Orleans, who lived few moneths: Charles-Maximilian, Edward-Alexander, afterwards named Henry the third, and Hercules afterwards called Francis. Elizabeth married to Philip King of Spaine, Claude to Charles Duke of Lorraine, Marguerite to Henry of Bourbon, then King of Navarre, Jane and Victoria twins, who died soone after their birth. He was a religious Prince, goodly, of a mild disposition, peaceable, affable, not greatly subiect to passions, generous, louing his seruants and men of merit: but voluptuous, and not able to discouer in due time the ambition and couetousnesse of such as possessing him, made sale of lawes, iustice, offices, and spirituall livings, emptied the subiects purses, and nourished the warres which wee haue before obserued, namely, since the breach of the truce: finding such sweetnesse, profit, and honor, in the managing of the treasure, and commanding of the Kings armies in the voyage of Italy, and especially in this last Lieutenancie in Picardie, as hereafter we shall see a young Prince raigne like a shadow, and they being ceazed of the gouernement, both of his person and of his Realme, shall dispossesse the chiefe Officers of the Crowne, keepe back the princes of the blood, the true and lawfull Gouernors of the State, the King being in his minority: and to plot the meanes to raise their race to the Royall throne.

Francis the second, the sixtith French King.

This

His raigne is short, but very memorable. Wee see a Theater, whereon is acted a horrible tragedie, a King young of yeeres, and of iudgement, governed by his mother, and his wiues vncles, and a new forme to neglect both the publike and priuate interest. The Courtiers stand at a gaze, and for the most part stoupe to the stronger. The Clergie shield themselves vnder those that kindle these fires in France. The Nobility wearied with former toyles, doe not yet wipe off the dust and sweat from their armes.

The people diuided for matter of religion, and oppressed with the burthen of former warres, desires to breath. The Constable holds his place: yet is hee not so surely seated, but they will displace him. There are two factions in Court: the Constable holdeth the plyable. The Queene-mother ioynes with the last. The King of Navarre might crosse and pensioners about him. The princes of the blood, the Constable, the Marshals, the Admirall, and many other Noblemen, prepared for the funerals of the deceased King, when as Queenes to the Louvre, begin a strange alteration; a true patterne of the inconstancy of this world. The Duchesse of Valentinois had quietly gouerned the deceased King, and by her practises, had caused Francis Oliver, a man of a singular reputation, and Chancellor of France, to be dismissed. At the first entry, she is spoiled of her precious Jewels, which witnessed the Kings loue vnto her, to adorne the Queene that raigned: and by her disgrace, leaves the place to Catherine, to rule hereafter without companion.

Two factions in Court.

Alterations in Court.

The Duchesse of Valentinois is disgraced.

The Queene-mother (who hated her extremely) was glad to see her thus disgraced, for that she would not loose the fauour of the house of Guise, who although they had beene aduanced by the Duchesse, yet seeing her to bee a weake support, they abandoned her and ioyned with the other, who assisted them no lesse then the first. They tooke the scales from cardinall Bertrand, and sent him to Rome: and from Auançon the superintendence of the treasure, yet he remained still in court, for that it was not yet necessary to force him to seeke a new party.

The Marshall of Saint Andrew aduanced by the fauours of the deceased King, and made far by the confiscations of them of the religion, and by borrowing, which hee neuer paid againe, hauing made offer of all that hee had vnto them of Guise, hee is receiued into their band, and Oliuer restored to his Chancelourship.

The Constable seeing the King had made a declaration, that his meaning was they should adresse themselves for all matters concerning the Estate of the crowne and of his house, vnto his two Vncles, the duke of Guise and the Cardinall of Lorraine: And by consequence his mortall enemy seated in his place, and executing that, which belonged to his Office of Constable and Lord Steward of France, yea in the presence of Spaniards and strangers, who before had so much respected him, and within fewe daies after the death of Henrie, hee goes to the new King, and deliueis vp the Signet (which his deceased Maister had committed vnto him) who tould him that the charge of the Treasure and of the affaires of State was giuen vnto the Cardinall, and the commandement of all that concerned the warre vnto the duke: telling him withall that hee would retaine him still of his counsell, and that hee should bee welcome when hee came to Court. He thanked the King for giuing him leaue to retire himselfe, beseeching him to excuse him for not comming to counsell, for two reasons: The one for that hee could not serue them whom hee had alwaies commanded: The other, that being held an old dotard his counsell was not necessary. Then offering his life and goods vnto the King, hee went to visit the Queene-mother, who intreated him roughly, reproching him that hee had tould the deceased King, in iesting wife, that he had not any child like him but his base daughter, who was married to the Marshall of Montmorency. Shee added withall that for the loue of the deceased, she would forget her priuate Iniury: And that without this respect shee had meanes to cut off his head. In the end shee perswaded him A not wholly to abandon the Court, but to come some-time. He maintained that he was fallly accused with that speech of the Kings children, intreating Her to remember the seruices which hee had done to her, and to the realme, and not beleue the reports of his enemies, who should not doe him so much harme, as they pretended. So hauing taken his leaue, and conducted his maister to his graue, he retired to his house.

The two brethren to play their parts absolutely without controule, send the Prince of Conde into Flanders, vnder colour to confirme the peace, and him of Roche-sur-yon, to carry the Order of France to the king of Spaine: then at his returne they depute him with the Cardinal of Bourbon, to conduct Elizabeth to Philip her husband. In the meane-time, the B Guisians call the Cardinall of Tournon from Rome: a man fit for their humors, an inueterat enemy to the Constable and to them of the religion. They displace part of the ancient officers of the Kings house, and place new at their deuotion: they furnish prouinces, and frontier townes with gouernours of their owne choise: they obtaine a declaration from the King sitting in parliament, whereby he made it knowne, that touching all affaires which concerned the estate of his crowne and house, his pleasure was, they should hereafter re- C paire to his two vncles. The first Edicts were against the carrying of pistols and Hargue- buzes, and then against long clokes, and great hofe. It was a common saying that the Car- dinall (as fearefull a man as euer was) hauing vnderstood from a Magitian at Rome, that C through enuy, and when he was in his greatest dignity, his enemies should cause him to bee flaine with a peece, had procured these defences, beeing wonderfully disquieted, euen then when as all yeelded vnto him, they doe and vndoe, place and displace, in Parliament and priuy counsell, like to a King of absolute power. And the Queene mother challenge the gift of money growing of the confirmation of offices and priuiledges of townes and com- monalties, the which by right cannot be exacted, but when the realme falls into a collateral line. Now are they settled in this vsurped gouernment: they haue officers at their pleasure. But there is yet a moate in their eye. Those of the religion, who then were called Reformed (let vs hereafter call them protestants) for their common cause (with the protestants of Ger- many) multiplied infinitely. Some princes, and many Noblemen did countenance them, and were ready to take their protection. To weaken them, nay rather to ruine them quite: D the Kings letters patentes are granted, the 14. of Iuly, with a Commission to certaine lud- ges, for the triall of Anne du Bourg, and foure of his companions prisoners. It was to be fea- red, their proceeding against these fiue counsellors, it would preiudice the whole party. They beseech the Queene by their letters (who had made shew to incline to their doctrine, when as she was barren) to vse her authority in the restraint of these rigorous pursutes. She passeth her word to the prince of Condé and Admirall, so as they wil liue secretly and with- out any scandale.

Shee had bene importuned by letters, from one named Villemadon who knew much of her secrets, and put her in minde of her affection to Pietie, at such time as shee was barren, exhorted her not to reiect the princes of the bloud, from the managing of the affaires of E State, to aduance them of Guise, and to make them petty Kings. These letters were written the fixe and twentieth day of August and wrought this effect, that the Queene seemed to be inclined for some daies, to ease them of the religion.

In the meane time they of Guise to make their gouernment more pleasing vnto the peo- ple, and not to loose any thing, published in the Kings name letters of reuocation of all alienations made, as well for life as for yeeres in recompence of any seruices, except sales whereof the money had bene imploied for the Kings great and vrgent affaires, the por- tions of the daughters of France, and the dowry of the deceased Queene Elenor, which the Infanta of Portugall did inioy, the rest to bee reunited to the Kings demaies and ordinarie receites. This reuocation was a fore blowe to some Princes and great per- F nages, who were disappointed of the fruites of their seruice and of the deceased Kings bountie. On the other side the fauorites of the house of Guise obtained other letters of exemption, and so they stript some, whilst that others remained in possession, or got for no new purchase.

The Constable seeing Henries death approach, had sent to sollicite the King of Nauarre to A to come with all speed to Court, and to seize vpon the Gouernment before any other. This Prince was not desirous to manage the affaires, & was somewhat ialous of the Constable, which made him to sit still, giuing them of Guise time to seize vpon his place. Some Princes and Noblemen hauing prest him, hee gaue eare, and imparted this businesse to his foure chiefe counsellors, which were Jarnac, the bishop of Maude president of his counsell, Descars his Chamberlaine, and Bouchart his Chancellour who were of opinion that hee should goe presently to Court.

They of Guise are aduertized hereof, who promise wonders to Maude, and Descars, if they can frustrate this resolution, who did worse: for suffering their master to goe to horse- backe, beeing farre aduanced, they beginne to put water in his wine, and forge ineuitable B dangers, he stood to strictly vpon his ranke: that hee must proceed mildly in this businesse, and entertaine all men politikely. Being come to Poictiers where as many princes and no- ble men met him, he shewed much resolution and gaue good hope to the ministers of the Churches assembled, especially at Paris, Orleans and Towers; intreating them to beare a little in that which concerns the open profession of religion: Being come to Court, which was at Saint Germain in Laye, what entertainment doe they giue to this first prince of the bloud of France? his harbingers find no lodging for him within the castle. It shall cost mee my life, and ten thousand more with me (said the duke of Guise to his harbinger) before he take C from me the place and lodging, which the King hath giuen me nere vnto his person. No man goes to meet him: those of Guise looke that hee should goe to salute them: and which is worse, the next day he hath no place in counsell. After some daies, the King saies vnto him, that his vncles hauing the charge of affaires, hee desired them that would haue his fauor, to obey them in all things. So hauing obtained confirmation of his offices and pensions, hee approved by his silence the vsurpation of the house of Guise, who lead the King to Rheims, where hee was triumphantly annointed the eighteenth of September, by the Cardinall of Lorraine, Archbishop of that place. Soone after the coronation, the Queene mother gets a resignation from the Constable, of the office of Lord Steward, in fauor of the duke of Guise, and in recompence, made his sonne Marshall of France. The Admirall foreseeing that they would dispossesse him of the gouernment of Picardie: he first gaue the King to vnderstand, D that it belonged to the prince of Condé, for that his predecessors had long enioyed it. His resignation was willingly accepted, but not the condition. It was better to purchase a good seruant and partisan, which was the Marshal of Brissac. Thus the princes and chiefe officers of the crowne were disgraced, but those that were least passionat amongst the people, were not mure. They had a good share in the priuate discontent of these great personages, fore- seeing the disorders that might ensue, and require a Parliament, as the soueraigne cure for such diseases, whereby the Queene-mother might be excluded from the regency, and those of Guise put from the Kings person. To please the King, they perswade him, that they sought to bridle him and to make him a ward; that hee should hold them enemies to his authority, and guilty of high treason that talke of a Parliament. The King of Spaine cross- E feth them, and by letters written to the King his brother-in-law (the which were read in counsell in the presence of the King of Nauarre) hee declares himselfe (saith he for the good affection hee did beare) Tutor and Protector of him, his realme and his affaires, against those that would change the gouernment of the estate; as if the King were not capable of the gouernment. Pleasant people, which reiect so much the word of lawfull Tutelage, and yet they v- surpe it against the lawes and orders of the realme, holding it onely by tyranie. This other affront sent the King of Nauarre home into Bearne whence he came.

They continued their pursutes against the counsellour du Bourg, which moued them of the religion at Paris to send a supplication to the Queene-mother exhorting her to her duty, and denouncing the vengeance of God, and the danger of future troubles, by rea- F son of these great Rigours: But shee gaue them no pleasant answer; Besides du Bourg, towards the end of this yeere, there were many imprisoned at Paris for Religion, and their houses sackt, as in a towne taken by assault: There were witnesses suborned to depose that in a certaine assemblie made one Thursday before Easter day, in an Aduocates house, at the place Maubert, a great number of Lutherans, Men, Wo- men and Maydens, after the Preaching, hauing receiued the Communion, and eaten a false witnesses against them or their religion.

Pigge, instead of the pascall-lambe, the candles beeing put out, they went and lay together. A The Cardinall moued the whole Court with these informations: but the Queene mother hauing vpon this occasion spoken against some of her maides that were of the religion, they wrought so as the two chiefe witnesses were heard in her presence, beeing two yong boies, who had maintained that then and at many other times, they had carnally knowne the daughters of this Aduocate, they then began to wauer, and covertly to deny it. Notwithstanding the accusation and suite continued: and for that in the apprehension of prisoners there was some resistance made in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, they sent vnto all their houses to take away their armes, yea their kniues, the which was brought vnto the Hostell of Guise. The Aduocate thus slanderously charged, did constitute himselfe prisoner, with his wife and daughters, where the maidens were found Virgins, and yet the false witnesses, nor their suborners were not punished, notwithstanding their complaints, and they by vertue of an Edi&t, which set all prisoners at liberty for matter of religion, were in a manner forced to goe out of prison. B

All this did but increase the hatred both of great and small against the Guisians. Many treaties are published, written and printed, and all tend to prouoe, that it belongs to the Estates, to provide gouernours for Kings in their minorities: that these two brethren are incapable of the gouernment, being both strangers: the one a priest, the other presuming to say in the life of the deceased King, that the Realme belonged to the house of Lorraine, as issued from Charlemagne, from whom Hugh Capet had vsurped it. A proposition which they haue presumed to publish in these latter times: but so often confuted, as it needs no further discourse. They had made open pretensions to some members of the crowne, as to the County of Provence and the Duchy of Aniou: they propounded the lamentable effects of their ambition, in the breach of the truce and the last voyage into Italy, the cause of the losse of the battaile of Saint Laurence, and the danger of the whole Realme, to prevent the which they were forced to yeeld vp all the conquests which Francis the first, and Henry had made. They did not forget their exactions, the managing of the treasor, and the Kings great debts. The King beganne to grow, and euen now he complained, that they kept him from hearing of his subiects complaints, but he was so sickly as there was no hope of long life. To get sure footing in the gouernment of estate, they resolute to purchase many seruants in the Courts of Parliament, to winne the affections of Courtiers and men of warre, and by a burning zeale, to the rooting out of Protestants, to purchase the loue of the Clergy and people. C

executed.Minard a President slaine.

They publish sundry Edi&ts against them, they promise great recompences to them that discouer their assemblies: many townes fill their prisons: they imploy aire, fire and water to ruine them, and yet it seemes that the more they kill the more they increase. The eight and twenty of December, Anthony Minard president of the Parliament at Paris, was slaine with a pistoll in the Euening, coming from the palace to his house, and yet it could neuer bee knowne whence it came, no more then the death of Iulian Ferme, agent for the house of Guise, slaine neere vnto Chambourg, where the Kings was, and stript of certaine instructions of importance, against the life of some great personage. Some were imprisoned and in great danger for Minard: Amongst others Steward a Scottisshman (who although hee were allied to the Queene reigning) was cruelly tortured, yet could they draw nothing from him, that might prejudice himselfe or any other. About this time the Electour Pallatine, hauing sent his Ambassadors to the King, to demande du Bourg, whose seruice hee would vse at Heidelberg, but the Cardinall, being incensed for the death of Minard, wrote vnto the Parliament, that they should execute the sentence giuen against Anne du Bourg, who (persisting in the confession of his faith vpon the points of religion in controuersie) was on the twentieth of Decemb<sup>r</sup> hanged at the Greue, and his body then burnt to ashes. The counsellors. La Porte, Foix, Faux and Fumée imprisoned for the same causes, F escaped with some sharpe admonitions.

Many could not beare this oppression. The princes were kept backe: the greatest of the realme out of credit, threatened, and secretly pursued to the death: the conuocation of the Estates refused: the Parliaments corrupted, the Iudges for the most part at the Guisians deuotion: and the publike Treasore, Offices and Benefices giuen to whom they

A they pleaded. Their violent gouernment, and against the lawes and orders of the Realme, purchased wonderfull hatred against the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinall of Lorraine, and caused many which could no longer indure these oppressions, to consult vpon some iust defence, to the end they might restore the ancient and lawfull gouernment of the Realme. They demanded aduise, touching lawe and conscience, of many learned Lawyers and Divines, who resolu'd that they might lawfully oppose themselves against the gouernment which the house of Guise had vsurped, and at need take armes to repulse their violence, so as the Princes who in that case are borne Magistrates, or some one of them would vnder- take it, being required thereunto by the Estates of the Realme, or by the founder part of them. They which first thought of this act of consequence, had feuerall considerations. B Some moued with a true zeale to serue God, the King, and Realme, thought they could not do a worke of greater pietie, then to abolish Tyrannie, and to restore the State; and withall to find some meanes to ease them of the religion.

Vsurgions of the house of Guise incense the French.

There were others desirous of change: & some were thrust on with hatred, for the wrongs which the house of Guise had done to them, their kinsmen and friends: to conclude, all had one desseigne to suppress this vnlawfull gouernment. But for that in this generall, lawfull, and commendable desseigne, there were priuate considerations which were wonderfull defective, it is no wonder if there were confusion in the pursuite, and that the euent was so farall vnto the vndertakers: namely, for those which did mixe their priuate passions with the consideration of the publike. As for the rest, who had no other end but to free France from the yoke of strangers, although that most of them be dead, in the pursuite aswell then as since vnder the reignes of the two succeeding Kings: yet are they departed this world with this singular content, to haue courageously sacrificed their liues for their countie libery. In these consultations it was held necessarie, to ceaze vpon the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinall his brother, beeing aduowed by some one of the chiefe members of the State, and then to require an assembly of the three Estates, to the end they might yeeld an accompt of their gouernment, and to provide for the King and Realme. Some haue rashly thought and written, that all this proceeding (which afterwatd was called The tumult of Amboise) was an enterprize of rash seditious men, enemies to God and the State, thrust on by despair and furie: in like manner there were others which ill-affected to the house and memorie of the Prince of Conde, (who was prest to vndertake this charge) haue presumed to charge him, that he was thrust on by priuate passions in these intelligences, and that hee sought to end a quarrell against the house of Guise by this meanes, and afterwards to cause greater troubles. But the truth of his intent is well knowne to some yet liuing, and future ages will reiect their testimonies and writings as full of passion, and repugnant to truth: and will aduow that the Prince did herein shew himselfe a true Frenchman, and well-affected to the King and Realme. The Prince of Conde then beeing instantly required to accept of this charge, he examines the consequence of the fact, and hauing imparted it to some persons, louing the good of the Realme, hee giues commission to informe secretly of the crimes, E wherewith the house of Guise was charged, to provide for the same, as conscience and the common good should require. They find by informations, and certaine personages well qualified, beeing priue to their seeret desseignes, did witnesse, that their intention was, (the King beeing vnable, by the iudgement of the Physicians, to liue long, nor to haue any issue) first to roote out all Lutherans in France, then to murder all the Princes of the blood, and to seaze vpon the Realme. Moreouer, they were charged with many thefts, robberies, and extortions, and by consequence, were in many things found guiltie of high treason. The difficultie was how to seaze vpon these two persons. Godfrey of Barri, Lord of Renaudie, a Baron of Perigord, accepts the managing of this action, and the Prince promiseth to assist him with his authoritie. So as nothing be said or done against God, the King, his brethren, the F Princes, nor the Estate: protesting to oppose himselfe first against any one that should attempt the contrarie. All that were in the action, bind themselves to the same oath, yea to aduertise the King, if any thing were pretended against his Maie<sup>tie</sup>: they appoint the tenth of March, hoping to find the Court still at Blois. Fiue hundred French Gentlemen with other troupes vnder the command of the Baron of Castelnau, should accompany Renaudie, followed by a thousand others, besides their troupes on foote. But it is almost impossible to 1559. to keepe secret an enterprife imparted to so many diuers humors, but some one will discouer it. Renaudie lodged at Paris in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, in an Aduocates house, called Auenelles, a Protestant by profession, who hauing discovered somewhat of this enterprife, vnder colour to employ himselfe for the aduantage thereof, he learned all that passed. But hoping of some notable recompence, he suddenly went and discovered it to Almand, Master of Requests, a fauorite to the Cardinal, and to Miles Secretarie to the Duke of Guise. And Lignieres one of the Captaines of the enterprife, did afterwards bewray the names of the Commanders, the Rendezuous for their troupes, with other circumstances, to the Queene-mother, to saue (said he) the honour and life of the Prince of Condé, whom they accused of high treason.

To assure their persons, they transport the King to Amboise, they send letters from the King, and his mother, to call the Admirall and his breethren to Court, they dispatch many letters-Patents to Bayliffes, and Seneschall, against all such as should be found carrying of armes vpon the way to Amboise. The Admirall being arriued makes great complaints to the Queene mother, in presence of the Chancellor, of the extreame violences and pursuits made against the Protestants: and the Chancellor hauing freely propounded the Admirals aduice in council, there followed an Edict for the abolishing of that was past for matters of religion. But this pardon excluded all Ministers, and such as should be found to haue conspired against the King, his mother, his wife, or the Princeesse, his chiefe Officers, or the Estate, and all other culpable of like crimes.

Notwithstanding this Edict, Renaudie proceeds, and the Prince goes to Court to present these informations to the King against the house of Guise, when as they should bee seized on. The execution was put off to the sixteenth, by reason of the change of the place. In the meane time the Guisians had assembled men from all parts, so as the troupes arriuing one after one to the appointed places, were presently surprized. The Baron of Castelnau, and the chiefe of the faction, are at the Castle of Noisay: the Guisians aduertised thereof, perswade the King, that there are rebels assembled to murder him: The King sends the Duke of Nemours with a troupe, who at the first surprizeth Captaine Mazeres and Ranney, walking without the Castle, and then hauing set strong guards about it, he carried thence two to Amboise, returning after dinner with fure or sixe hundred horse. The Baron had sent to Renaudie, that he would come speedily to vngage him, being loth to abandon the place, where there was armes, powder, and munition: but seeing himselfe inuested, and the Duke returned, he entred into parle, vpon the instance that was made vnto him: and hauing related at large the causes of this enterprife, the Duke intreated him often to lay downe arms, and to go and speake with the King, binding himselfe by the faith of a Prince, that not any harme should be done vnto him, nor to any of his companions, but should all bee set at libertie. The Baron relying vpon the word of a Prince, obeyed, with the rest that were with him: but being come to Amboise, they spake not with any man but with Commissioners, that were sent for their triall by them of Guise.

Renaudie caused his troupes to aduance couertly through the woods: but they had walked vp the gate, by the which they should enter, and the horsemen sent by the Guisians compassing them in, many were led away, and presently hanged, and afterwards drawne to the fiuer. And as he laboured to rally his dispersed troupe, the Lord of Pardillon encounters him in the forest of Chasteau-regnard, and passing by, dischargeth his pistoll, the which not taking fire, Renaudie had his sword first drawne, and as he was about to kill him, one of Pardillons seruants ouerthrew him with a harguebuze-shot: beeing slaine, his bodie was straight way carried and hanged on the bridge at Amboise, with this inscription: Renaudie, call'd du Forest, chiefe of the rebels. Among other prisoners was La Bigne who had serued Renaudie as a Secretarie and was found seized of a paper in cipher: to saue his life he deciphered this paper, the which contained nothing else but what had bene concluded by all the associates, and their expresse protestation not to attempt any thing against the Kings Maiestie: nor against the Princes of his blood, or the estate of the Realme: And the articles tended to no other end, but to take the gouernement of the Realme from them of Guise, and to cause the ancient orders of France to be obserued by a lawfull assembly of the Estates. Hee was also found seized of an Admonition vnto the King from them of the religion, whereas the Bigne Secretarie to Renaudie.

A Cardinals vniust proceedings against the Parlement of Paris, and against Du Bourg among other things were discovered. At the first they of Guise would not haue had one prisoner escaped: but afterwards considering that the multitude would make them more odious, they let the souldiers goe, to euery of which they gaue eightene pence to beare their charges.

Captaine La Motte, Coqueuille, and some others did not yet faint, but gaue a hot alarme to the Courtiers at Amboise, and without some error in the intelligence, which caused them to retire without losse of any one horse man, the enterprize (yea after the death of Renaudie) had bene executed. But this did but incense the furie of them of Guise, who caused all the footmen they could get at this time to be hanged. It was then very dangerous for any man whatsoeuer, to be found alone about Amboise, the least harme that could happen vnto him, was to be stripped into his shirt, and then did the souldiers of the Kings Guard commit strange thefts and extortions. Those of Guise being assured of their enemies, and their troupe disperfed, they giue commandement to the Prince of Condé, in the Kings name, not to depart without leaue. They begin to cut off heads, to hang and to drown their prisoners, tyed to long poles, fixe, eight, tenne, twelue, and fiftene in a companie: and although there were herein more question of estate then religion, yet they giue out, that the Lutherans would maintaine themselves by the sword, and as such men, they caused many to be executed, who by their examinations, and impertinent answers touching matters of conscience, did witnesse that they were not yet seasoned with any other doctrine, then that of their Fathers.

C This alarme had put the young King in feare: but more the impresson of his Vncles perswading him that they sought his person: And what haue I done, said he often? what haue I done? that my subiects should attempt thus against me? I will heare their complaints, and do them right. And sometimes to those of Guise: I know not what it is, but I vnderstand, it is you only that they seeke: I would gladly you would absent your selues for a time, to see if they would attempt against you or me. Amongst all the prisoners, foure are especially noted, Castelnau, Villemon-gis, Champagnac, and le Picard, for that with an admirable constancie and resolution, they had blamed the Chancellor, who against his conscience, had signed the sentence of their deaths: which so terrified him, as he suddenly fell sicke of greefe and melancholy, and soone after left this world, murmuring, sighing, and sorrowing for the Councillor du Bourg, and crying out some houres before his death, the Cardinal of Lorraine comming to visit him, O Cardinal! thou hast damned vs all. Michell Hospital, then Chancellor to the Duchesse of Sauoy, was called from Nice, and substituted in his place.

The Prince of Conde was at Amboise during these horrible combustions, who carried himselfe like a man without feare, and that had an innocent soule. They of Guise incensed the King against him, and suborned men to obserue his words and actions, whereof the Cardinall held a register, especially of some words which the Prince vsed, being much gregued, to see some prisoners (looking out at a window of the Castle) executed: which were, that the King was ill counselled, to put Noblemen and Gentlemen to death, which were honest men, and so well borne, considering the great seruice they had done vnto the deceased King and Realme: That beeing thus deprived of them, it was to be feared that strangers during these great troubles, would make some enterprife: and that if they were supported by any Prince, they would easily make a prey of the Realme. Soone after they caused de Vaux, Gentleman of his horse to be apprehended, and the King sent for the Prince into his chamber, to tell him that he had vnderstood by informations, that he was charged to bee the chiefe of the conspiracy, adding withall some threats. The Prince in his answer besought the King to assemble all the Princes, Knights of the Order, and priuy Councill which were then at Amboise, to the end that he might heare his answer in that honorable assembly. The company was presently called into the Kings presence, whereas the Prince recited the kings speech, and what had followed: adding, that the Kings person excepted, with his brethren and the Queenes, they which had reported vnto the King that he was the head and conductor of certaine seditious men, who (they said) had conspired against the King and State, had falsly and traitorously lyed. That to prooue his innocencie, he would (for this regard onely) quite abandon his ranke and dignitie of Prince of the blood, and make them confesse with his sword or lance, that they were villaines, and that they themselves sought the ruine

But no man presenting himselfe, he besought the King to hold him for an honest man, and not to give care to such slanderers and abusers, but reiect them as enemies to his person, and to the publike quiet. Having spoken this he went out of the Councell, to leaue them to their consultation. But the Cardinall making a certaine signe, the King brake off the assembly, without demanding their aduice, whereas there might haue been somewhat concluded to the prejudice of the house of Guise.

The Queene-mother was much troubled during these broyles, yet leaning still to the stronger (according to the world) she sent the Admirall into Normandy, to learne the cause of these troubles, intreating him earnestly to aduertise her without dissembling, promising to requite him, and to hold his aduertisements secret. He performed his commission speedily and exactly, and soone after without feare of any, sent a Gentleman vnto the Queene, signifying that they of Guise were the true cause of the troubles happened within the Realme, by reason of their violent and vnlawfull gouernement. He gaue proofes thereof, adding that the faithfull seruants of the Crowne, held it for certaine, that these calamities would not cease, so long as strangers gouerned the King and State. Whereupon he exhorted her to take the affaires in hand, and to giue some rest to them of the religion, causing the Edicts made to that end to be obserued. These aduertisements produced letters to all the Parlements and other Iudges, to release all prisoners detained for matter of religion, the execution whereof notwithstanding was somewhat long and difficult. There was another thing which helped it forward: some prisoners at Blois and Tours, for the enterprise of Amboise, hauing found meanes to escape out of prison, wrote a iesting letter vnto the Cardinall, yet full of threats, that they would come and see him with the rest that he held not, and that they were resolved to spoile him. This man being timorous, grew more calme whereoffollowed the enlargement of many prisoners throughout the Realme. Finally, they of Guise seeing themselves assaulted from diuers parts by writings, (which were as it were) the fore-runners of a new charge, the last of March they caused the Kings letters to be dispatched to all Parlements, and other inferior Iudges, and to all forraigne Princes, intimating, that all they of the enterprise of Amboise, especially the heades, were accused of high treason, wherein they of the religion and the Ministers were disgraced with all manner of reproches: and withall they promised to make goodly reformations both of the State and Church. An ample answer was made vnto these letters, and directed to the Parlements, the which painted out them of Guise in all their colours, and required that in a lawfull assembly of the Estates they should yeeld an account of their gouernement. The Parlement of Paris sent this answer vnto the Cardinall by an vsher. But that of Roane thinking to doe more, the Deputies which were sent to the King, were forced to retire with all speed, and did not any thing.

Letters to the
uare.

The ninth of April there were letters written in the Kings name, of the same tenor: moreouer he was intreated to cease vpon certaine men which were about him, being accused to be of the enterprise of Amboise. There was also a relation of the charge imposed vpon the Prince of Conde, and how he had iustified himselfe. The Prince on the other side sent a Secretarie of his vnto his brother, to aduertise what had past, to aske his aduice, and to vnderstand his mind. This was discovered to them of Guise, who wrote a letter to the Prince, full of excuses, to the end they might lull him asleepe, the which hee sent also vnto his brother, who made answer in general tearmes, for that he would not be discovered. The Protestants during these combustions, which concerned both the State and religion, increased in multitude, and in many places they could not containe nor content themselves with secret assemblies. An vndiscreet zeale transported them of Valence, Montlimart and Romans, to exercise their religion in ordinarie Churches at noone-day. The Lord of Clairmont, Lieutenant for the Duke of Guise in Dauphiné, was of too mild an humor: and Maugiron more violent. The Duke giues him commission to suppress them, and to vse his authoritie in the Parla-

Parliament of Grenoble. Maugiron enters Valence with sixteene companies of the old bands of Piedmont, and some other troupes of men at armes: hee makes the streetes flow with blood, sacks the houses, and intreats the inhabitants as in a towne which is taken by assault. Montlimart also followed the like fortune. 1560. Cause of the troubles.

Moreover, the president Truchon, and some Councillors of Grenoble, imprison 60. of the chiefe of Romancé: they hang 2. whip 1. and then send him to the gallies: & at Valence, they beheaded two ministers, and hang three of the chiefe men in the towne, the rest escaped, some by abjuring, some by whipping, some by banishment, and some by a fine. At the same time Paulon of Richiend Lord of Mouuans, one of the chiefe of the enterprise of Amboise, hauing failed to surprize Aix, ouer-ran Prouence with two thousand men armed at their owne charge, & a great number of gentlemen, and other voluntaries. But their armes were no otherwise imploied but to conuert the Images, reliques & ornaments of the Church into gold and silver, the which with some respect to warlike discipline, and more commendably then in the following age, they left in the magistrats hands of the place. This was to summon the neighbour Prouinces to like reuolts: but the Earle of Tande hauing stayed the fury of this flying army, they sheath their swords, and vnheath their pens, only by supplications, to the Kings Maiesty, and to his mother, protesting of their sincerity; they discovered the ground of their griefes against the Guisians, and propounded remedies to auoide ciuill warres. Their admonitions contained three chiefe heads: That order might be taken for the government of the realme, offering the King a Councell, according to the ancient constitutions of France. That to pacifie contumacies touching religion, a free and holy Councell should be held. That those of the religion in the meane time might quietly, and with liberty of their consciences live in their houses, following that which is contained in the confession of their Churches. The two brethren seeing themselves directly charged by the Protestants, thunder out against them: they write to the King of Spaine, and to the Catholike princes: that the Lutherans and Caluinists are the onely authors of the troubles of France, and of the tumult of Amboise. And to the Protestants; that such as were executed in diuers parts of the realme, are onely certaine Sacramentaries, enemies to the confession of Ausbourg. A bare shift and weake remedy to quench the fire which beganne to consume a part of the world. Hereupon Philip aduiseeth them, to bring the inquisition of Spaine into France. The priuy Councell yeelds to it, and the parliaments allow thereof: but the Chancellor Hospital was too wise a politician: hee would not see France disguised after the Spanish manner. Katherine was much troubled, not knowing how to faile amidst so many stormes. The conuocation of the Estates might eclipse her authority, the restoring of the princes of France, incompatible with a Florentin humour: the restitution of the Constable, whom she hated to the death, accusing him to haue sayd to King Henry, That no one of his Children, did resemble him, but his bastard, whom his Sonne Montmorency had married. These things did wonderfully afflict her. Yet would shee gouerne and rule, foreseeing that she could not better maintaine her greatnesse, then by the discord of the two houses of Bourbon and Lorraine.

The protestants petition to the King.

She relies vpon the last, and arming them with her authority, she puts the King her sonne, and her selfe into the protection of the duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine. This makes them swell both in heart and speech: but there must be a meanes found to pacifie this quarrell which concerned the estate, that vnder the cloake of religion (a goodly and ordinary pretext for great personages) the people might forget the vnlawfull vsurpation wherewith they were charged: They protest therefore to imploy all their meanes, and their friends to suppress those that sought any alteration in religion: hoping that when they had cut this sinew from the princes of the blood, they should be more easily reuenged, both of them and of the Constables faction.

As for them of the religion, some gentlemen which made open profession, although they had no part in the enterprise of Amboise, were accused, & sent for, to come & iustifie themselves before the King. They seeing that their ruine was intended, assemble together, and conclude some to goe to the prince, to encourage him, & others throughout all the Churches, to let them vnderstand that their ruine approached, if they did not provide for their fasties. It had bin propounded in councell, to seize vpon the prince of Conde, & to draw him in question for his life: the Cardinall was wholly of this opinion, but the duke of Guise did oppose, and

A Some at the first were amazed to see these two heads in one hood thus disagree: but finding afterwards that they omitted no means to take the Prince, they saw that this contrariety was but counterfeit, to draw a consent from the whole Councell, to the end they might fortifie themselves against all euents. This irresolution was auaylable to the Prince, who with great dexteritie escaped their snares, and got into Bearn to the King of Nauarre his brother. They who were accustomed (as they say) to make bread of stones, and to turgie all things to their owne aduantage, began to assure the King and Queene, that without doubt the Princes retreat did argue that he was guiltie: whereupon new Commissions were giuen forth to leaue men, to make warre in Gasconie, whether the Marshall of Saint Andrew (vnder colour to go visit his breethren) was sent to discouer, which made these two Princes to stand vpon their guard. of Guise.

They had yet another taske in hand, to see if the Constable were engaged in the Princes counsels, whom they thought they had already entrapt. To this end they procured the Queene-mother to send secretly for Lewis Regnier, Seigneur of La Planch, one of the Marshall of Montmorencies Councell, who being brought into her cabinet, (the Cardinall being hidden behind the hangings) she prest him to declare what he thought of the causes and remedies of the present troubles, whereof he made an ample discourse, shewing, that they of Guise being strangers, should not haue the gouernment of the State, vnlesse they gaue them naturall French-men, for a counterpeaze and bridle. Hee also answered at large C to the accusation made against the Prince of Conde, shewing, that it was a meere abuse, to thinke that the enterprize of Amboise was attempted against the Kings person, or to trouble the State. He then deciphered the beginning of the house of Guise, and carried himselfe so politickly in all his answers, as he escaped from the Court, and there was no hold to be taken of the Constable nor of his house.

They of the religion put themselues vnder the protection of the princes.

They of the religion apprehending by the aduice of many of the Nobilitie, that their ruine approached, if they did not prouide speedily for their affaires, after they had recommended themselves humbly vnto God, they resolved to cast themselves into the armes of the Princes of the blood, as fathers, tutors and defenders of the innocencie of the poore afflicted, being called by the lawes of the countrie to those charges, during the minority of D Kings. For this effect certaine speciall men were deputed, to go to the King of Nauarre, and Prince of Conde being at Nerac, to whom they presented (with all their means) an ample declaration of the wrongs done by the house of Guise to the King and Realme, beseeching the said Princes, to take some lawfull course to deliuer the King, and to maintaine the State. Being hereby much confirmed in their resolution, to acquit themselves of their duties for the releefe of France, they begun to set hand to worke. Among other Agents the Prince of Conde, sent a Basque called Sagne, to many Noble-men, to intreate them not to faile him at need. He receiued answer from the Constable, and the Vidam of Chartres, and came to Court where he deliuered some letters. Attending his dispatch, hee bewrayed his charge vnto one Captaine Bomual, who hauing discovered him to them of Guise, pursued E him and brought him backe prisoner to Fontainebleau, where the Vidames letters being read, whereby he promised the Prince, to maintaine his iust quarrell against all men, except the King, his breethren, and the Queenes, whom they sent to apprehend him at Paris, and committed him to the Bastile, where he continued with great rigours vntill his death. They found no great matter against the Constable, or at the least they made no shew of it, fearing to haue too many yrons in the fire at once. Sagne payed for his prating, and they drew from him all that he knew and more too. His confession vpon the racke made them of Guise to hasten their desseignes: who prouided for the frontiers of Lorraine, and caused the old bands to come out of Piedmont and Daulphiné, to march downe the riuer of Loyre, writing to F all them of their faction.

Proposition to call a general assembly.

The Queene-mother who feared much to be supplanted in her authoritie: by the aduice of the Chancelor and Admirall (whom she seemed to heare willingly) resolved to propound vnto the Councell, that it was necessarie the King should call an assembly of all the Princes, Noblemen, Knights of the Order and men of authoritie of his Realme, to prouide some means to pacifie the troubles which they did hold to grow especially by reason of the persecution

A persecution for religion. They of Guise were wel pleased with this resolution, thinking they had found a snare to entrappe the King of Nauarre and his brother: and hoping also (for that most of them which should be of this assembly were of their faction) there should bee nothing concluded to their prejudice: and finally, that this expedient should breake off the conuocation of the Estates, and settle their affaires. They begun to write letters in the kings name, intreating them all to make their apparence at Fontainebleau the 15. of August, to that effect. They of Guise did also write their letters full of good hopes and promises. The King did write particularly to the King of Nauarre, intreating him to assist, with his brother, and those Noble-men that were about him. But vnder-hand they of Guise by the means of some secret seruants, stayed the King of Nauarres iourney, contrarie to the aduice of the B Constable, and many Noble-men, who sayed, that there was then good means offered to expell them of Guise, and to restore the lawfull gouernement of the Realme.

The Constable better resolved, thinking the Princes would assist, arriues with eight hundred horse, and by this troupe makes the Lorraines to shew him a good countenance. At the opening of the Assembly, the Admirall presents a petition to the King for the Protestants, who required to haue Temples granted them, and free exercise of Religion, throughout the whole Realme. Thereupon Charles of Marillac, Arch-bishoppe of Vienna, shewed with so great libertie of speech, the necessitie to assemble a nationall Councell, to remedie these controuersies growne for Religion: and a Parliament to order the gouernement of C France, as hee suruiued but few dayes after his Oration. The Admirall touched the cause of Religion and State more vehemently, taxing by inuectiues such, as giuing the King guards vpon guards, entertained him in distrust of his subiects, and his subiects in hatred of their owne King.

As they had made shew to like of this assembly, so they seemed to allow of a Parliament. They apoynt it first at Meaux, and afterward at Orleans the tenth of December, and the Synode for the Clergie at Paris the twentieth of Ianuarie following, to determine of what should be expedient to be treated of in a generall Councell, whereof they gaue them hope. But as they had vnder-hand with-drawne the Princes from coming to this Assembly, so must they make them vnwilling to bee present at the Parliament. To this intent those of D Guise, in the Kings name, command the companies of ordinarie souldiers to be readie the twentieth of September: they lodge them in such sort as those whom they suspected, had them in front, in flanke and behind them, and spies likewise to discouer them: and they giue charge to the Commanders, to cut all them in peeces they shold find marching to ioyne with the Princes. If their forces were not sufficient to diuert the Prince of Condé, whome they knew to bee more actiue, and to endure lesse: they do also procure Letters from the King, to the King of Nauarre, whereby he doth charge the Prince to haue attempted against the estate of France, and to haue sought to seaze vpon some of the good townes of the Realme. He desires him therefore to send him his brother with a good and sure guard: if not, he himselfe will fetch him well accompanied.

E The answer made by the King of Nauarre and his brother, incountring the Lorraines with their owne armes, holding them guiltie of the same crimes wherewith they charged them, made them to change their note. They send a second commandement, whereby the King giues his word to the Princes to come in safetie, he promiseth to heare all mens admonitions and iustifications willingly: to receiue them according to their estates and dignities: not to disturbe any Prince in his religion, whereof he now made open profession: and that they should returne when they pleased, free from iniurie or violence.

In the beginning the King of Nauarre shewed much courage: but hearing that the affaires of Lionois and Daulphiné, had not succeeded so well as they expected, he beganne to grow cold, and yet the Deputies of the Prouinces, did offer to send their troupes for F his preservation, before the men at armes of France should seaze vpon the passages: or if that were not held expedient, they promised to rise in all parts to fortifie him, at the assembly of the estates. Hee had about him a Chancelour called Amaury Bouchart, who was Master of Requests to the King. This man in the beginning had solicited him much, to giue care to the admonitions and complaints which were made vnto him from diuers parts of the Realme, but hearing that the enterprize made vpon Lyons, by young Matigny had had not benee successfull, he wrote secretly vnto the King, beseeching him to call the Prince of Conde away from the King of Nauarre his brother, for that hee did daily importune him to attempt many things against his Maiesties Ministers, and to trouble the realme at the instigation of Lutherans, and Preachers come from Geneua, whereunto hee added, that as yet his master had not giuen eare vnto them: but it was to bee feared that by long importunitie hee might be wonne: whereof hee would not faile to aduertise the King, being his naturall subiect and most humble seruant, and one of his ministers of Iustice. Hee did also write vnto the Cardinall, promising to tell him one day many things of great consequence, which might not be written. Finally, hee promised to giue him meanes to arraigne the Princes, and the greatest Noble-men of the Realme. Some thought that Iarnac B who had quite forsaken the Princes, with Saincte-foy his brother (before Lieutenant of the Prince of Condes company of men at arms) had practised Bouchart to write thus much.

And to draw the King of Nauarre his brother on, the Cardinall of Bourbon, (a Prince not well able to discouer the cunning practises of the enemies of his house) is expressly sent vnto them. They march, and are no sooner come to Limoges, but seven or eight hundred Gentlemen well appointed, do visit them. The Deputies of Prouinces offer them sixe thousand foot, Gascons and Poiteuins: foure thousand horse and soote out of Languedoc: as many or more out of Normandie, and the other Prouinces promise to rise on all sides, to fortifie them at his assembly of States: so as it will please the King of Nauarre to declare himselfe Protector of the King and Realme, against them of Guise. But the Cardinall of C Armagnac, Efcars, Iarnac, and some other Councillors of the same mold, had seruants to their master, propounded so many dangers, so many inconueniencies vpon their coming to Court with force, (and why should they not resist their enemies force) as he sent backe al his companie, and countermanded such as came, promising notwithstanding to employ himselfe courageously in the Parliament for the good of all France. Having therupon made them great Declarations, and intreated him that at least the Prince of Conde might remain behind, to hold their enemies in suspence, but they answered their innocency should suffice, and that it was no easie matter to put Princes of the blood to death: which if they did they wold take it in good part: that God had many other means to deliuer France, & not to make them the occasion of the ruine of so many good men, which desired to ioy with them. The D Noble-men, and Gentlemen which did accompany the Princes, being ready to retire, protested that being thus abandoned of their heads, they hoped that God would raise them vpon others, to free them from the oppression of tyrants: these words were spoken in the presence of some secret seruants, who aduertised them of Guise. In the meane time hearing that the Princes were vpon the way, they sent the L. of Monpesat, one of their confident seruants, to forbid the Princes in the Kings name, that coming to the Court, they should not enter into any walled towne belonging to the King, vpon paine of rebellion, and to bee held guilty of high treason. They were now compass in by their enemies forces, led vnder the command of the Marshall of Termes. The Cardinall of Armagnac, Descars, and such other bad seruants, made the K. of Nauarre beleue, that this verball defence of Monpesat, was but a brauado of E them of Guise, the which the King and his mother would disauow. The Princes hauing past Chastelleraut, they were more certain of the future danger, and perswaded to keep the high waies for feare of ambushes which were laid to kil them. They had also means offered them to recover Angiers, and then Normandy, where they shold want nothing: yet they continued constant in their first resolution, marching by small iournies, and it seemed that one of the brethren was a Prouost to lead the other prisoner. They aduertise the King, that the Lutherans of Orleans practised to subuert his estate, as they had of late attempted at Lyons. To assure the selues of the town, & to punish some which were noted in the book of death, whose confiscation was good, the Guisens first send Spierre, Lieutenant to the Prince of Roch-sur-yon, gouernor of Orleans, to disarme the people, & to fill the houses suspected with men of F war: they cal together the Nobility and men at armes of France: then they conduct the king thither, to make his entry with the Queene the 17. of October. The Princes armed by their innocency, arriue on Al-Saints Eue, and passe from the Portereau to the Kings lodging vpon the Estappe, betwixt two ranks of armed men. The Cardinall of Bourbon, and the Prince of Roch-sur-yon receiue them. Not a Courtier nor a Bourgeois meetes them: and for A for their first affront, when as they sought to enter on horse-back according to the vsuall custome, they were answered with a brauado: The great gates do not open. The King attended them, hauing done their duties to his Maiestie, and no man aduancing to bid them welcom. I am (said he to the Prince of Conde) aduertised from diuers places, that you haue made many enterprises against me and the Estate of my Realme, and therefore I haue sent for you, to know the truth from your owne mouth.

Lewis iustifies himselfe so plainly, and doth charge his enemies so directly, as the King himselfe could not impute these accusations, but to the wilfulnesse of his Vncles against his owne blood. But he was possessed by them, and suffered himselfe to be easily abused. So hee commands Chauigny, captain of his Guard (sent by them of Guise) to seaze vpon the prince. B Chauigny shuts him vp in a house hard by, before the which they make a fort of Bricke, flanked with canoniers, and furnished with field-peeces to defend the approaches. The King of Nauarre desired to haue the keeping of his brother, and that he would answer for him life for life, the which was refused, and withall they tooke his Guard from him, and set watches ouer him continually. The Laie of Roy his mother-in-law, was likewise carried from Anici, a house of hers in Picardie, prisoner to S. Germaine in Lay, by Renouart and Carrouges. Jerome Groslos Bayliffe of Orleans, (vnder color that his father had bene Chancellor to the deceased King of Nauarre, and he an affectionate seruant to the Princes, accused also to bee the protector of the Lutherans in Orleans) was likewise imprisoned two dayes after the princes arriual. C La Haye Councillor in the court of Parlement at Paris, who did solicit the Princes affaires, was also in trouble. Amanry Bouchart, Master of Requests vnto the King, and Chancellor to the Nauarrois, was sent prisoner to Melun, with others brought from Lyons, to haue proofes against the Prince, whose triall they did hasten with all speed. But they meant no harme to Bouchart, he had already retired himselfe, and blabbed by his letters to the Cardinall of Lorraine, to the preiudice of his master.

Neither the informations taken at Lyons by the Marshall S. André, nor the prisoners at Melun, were sufficient to make the Prince a spectacle vpon a scaffold. They send for the president of Thou, Bartholomeu Fay, and James Fiole, Councillors of the Parlement at Paris, to examine the Prince vpon the point of high treason: and if this peece of batterie were not D of force, then to touch him vpon the point of religion, and to condemne him for heresie: the Prince propounds diuers causes of recusation, and appeals from them to the King. The priue Council reiects his appeale, and decrees, that vpon paine of high treason, the Prince shold answer before these Commissioners: he answers, purgeth himselfe clearly of all crime, & aduowes his religion freely. By this confession, iudgement was giuen against him, and hee condemned to die: a day appointed the tenth of December, to countenance the beginning E of the Parliament. They only note the Earle of Sancerre, the Chancellor, and the Councillor Mortier, which did not pollute their soules with the approbation of this vniust sentence. This sentence shold in the end cause the ruine of all that were accused or suspected, as well for matter of State, as religion. And for the execution of this desseigne, the forces of the Realme diuided into foure, marched already into diuers Prouinces vnder the command of the duke of Aumale, and the Marshals of S. André, of Brissac, and of Termes. And with the same furie the King of Nauarre shold be confined into the Castle of Loches: the Constable and his children to the great tower at Bourges: the Admirall and some principals, into one at Orleans, the which was afterwards called the Admirale, neare to that of S. Aignan. But behold, there are two more violent and more brutish Councillors, Brissac and Saint André, they hold opinion, that to auoid all trouble, in giuing the King of Nauarre any gards they shold put him to death. They seeke to poyson him at a banquet: then they resolute to kill him coming from the King: but neither succeeding, they perswade the King to stab him and to spill his owne blood, the which God would not permit: for the King hauing a dagger F vnder his gowne, and growing into bitter termes against the King of Nauarre, he answered so discreetly in the presence of them of Guise, as he escaped. There was another desseigne to kill him going a hunting. The Constable had not yet fallen into their snares, yet they had sent out commissions to seaze vpon the Lord of Danuille his second sonne. As for the Admirall and his two brethren, (namely, the Admirall and D'Andelos their Declaration) to be of the Religion, was sufficient to condemne them, for the effectual accomplishing whereof, 1560. whereof, the King commanded a generall assembly of his order, to be held (all excuses set A apart) vpon Christmas day following. During the which there was a confession of the faith set downe by the Doctōrs of Sorbonne, which no man that had any feeling of religion would haue signed. The day beeing come, this confession should be presented by the King himselfe, who should signe it first, requiring euery one to doe the like, with an oath to obserue all the Articles inuolubly, and to oppose themselues against al them that should contradict them without any exception: And whosouer should refuse, he should bee presently degraded from his Order, and from all his Estates, dignities, and honors, and should bee burnt the next day. The like should be done among the Cardinals by a generall assembly B the same day, to entrappe the Cardinall of Chastillon. After which all the Princes and Noble-men of the Realme should signe this confession, and then all the Gentlemen and Officers of the Kings house. The Chancellor had commandement to do the like to all the masters of Requests, Secretaries, and other Officers following the Court. The Queen-mother undertook to cause all her Ladies and waiting-women to signe it. After which they should send to all the Parliaments, and other iurisdiccions to require the like confession of faith, and if any one did refuse, to be burnt without any other proceeding. The 10. of December approched and the Deputies for the Estates arrive by degrees. They presently forbid them in the Kings name, vpon paine of death, not to moue any thing concerning religion, his Maiesty hauing referred this controuersie to the Councell: which the Pope (being then Pius the 4. successor to Theatin lately deceased) appointed to begin at Trent, at Easter following. These of Languedoc amongst the rest, came furnished with ample instructions, both for the State and religion: but they found means to stop their mouths, seizing both on their persons & instructions. The 9. day of the moneth, they giue commandement to the K. of Nauarre, to be ready to go to hors-backe: their meaning was to carry him to Loches, whilest they should present the prince his brother vpon a mournfull scaffold, to the people of Orleans. But O God! we haue heard with our eares, and our Fathers haue declared, the worke which thou hast done in their time, and in the old time before them. Behold the King is taken during Evening with a great fainting, continued with a paine in his head at the left eare, accompanied with a feuer. The Guisens notwithstanding, sent forth many commissions to leuie men, and command the Marshall of Termes to ioyne with the Spaniard, who tooke the way of Bayonne to spoile the country of Berne, and then to assaile all those whom he should find to haue fauored the King of Nauarre, and the enterprise of Amboise.

A miraculous deliuerie.

It may be they would haue sold their liues dearely. Seuen or eight hundred Gentlemen go speedily to horse, followed with fise or sixe thousand foot, resolute, when the Marshall should passe Limoges, to hem him in betwixt two riuers. He hath some intelligence thereof, and retires to Poitiers. This desseign being made frustrate, the Kings sicknesse increasing, those of Guise meane to proceed with violence, and to murder the King of Nauarre. God raised vp the Cardinall of Tournon (who thinking to do a greater act) preuents it. He aduise to attend the Constables comming, with his children and Nephewes, to the end (said he) that killing one, we saue not the rest, who afterwards may do more harme then the Princes. E The despaire of the Kings health, made them of Guise to set a good countenance on a bad cause. And the Queen-mother seeking to hold her authoritie by supporting them of Guise, calls the King of Nauarre into her closet: as he was entring, a Ladie of the Court said to him in his eare: My Lord, deny the Queene-mother nothing that she shall demand, else you are dead. So he signed what she desired: A grant of the right which he might pretend to the government of the King and regencie of the Realme, and his reconciliation with them of Guise. Vpon this grant, she promiseth to make him the Kings Lieutenant in France, both for peace and warre, and nothing should passe but by his aduice, and of the other Princes, who should be respected according to the degree they held in France.

In the meane time death presseth the King: and those of the house of Guise shut vpe in F their lodging, and hauing possession of three or foure-score thousand frankes which remained yet of the treasor, came not forth in two daies, vntill they were assured of the King of Nauarre, who hauing embraced one another, all quarrels seemed to be layed vnder foote. In the end this Catarre with a feuer brought the King to his graue, the fourteenth of December, hauing giuen no time, by reason of his yong age and the shortnesse of his raigne, to

The death of Francis the 2.

A to discover any thing in him, but onely some shewes of courtesie, continency and modesty: vertues which his Vncles had easily corrupted by the tast of cruelty, which began to take an impression in his soule, as they did in his successors: little lamented for his person, but of such as possessing him in his nonage, grounded the greatnesse of their vsurped estates vpon his life, to ouerthrow the fundamentall lawes of the Realme, whatsoeuer some wretched writers doe babble, whose soules haue beene as vendible, as the Guisens armes were then new in our France. This death gaue life to the prince of Condé, opened the prisons for such as had beene committed for his cause, reuiued an infinit number, whom the princes condemnation had drawne into danger, countermanded the troupes of Spaine, which advanced towards Bearn, disapointed Montluc of the Earldome of Armagnac: the which he had deuoured in hope, by the promises of the house of Guise, and brought many of their most secret seruants to the King of Nauarres deuotion.

CHARLES the ninth, the 61. French King.

Now we fall from a feuer into a frensie. We shall see vnder an other pupill King, ofeleuen yeers of age, raigning in the wrath of God, the heauens to powre vpon this Realme, all the curses, diuinely promised against a nation, whose iniquities he will punish in his displeasure. A raigne cursed in the city, and cursed in the field, cursed in the beginning and cursed in the ending. Mortality, sword and famine haue followed it euen vnto the end.

The heauens about are of brasse, and the earth vnder it of iron: the carcases are a prey to the birds of the aire and to the beasts of the field, and no man troubles them. They suffer nothing but wrongs and robberies, and no man releues them. Men marry wiues but others sleepe with them. They sow and plant, but the nations whom they haue not knowne, deuoure the fruit. To conclude, there is nothing but cursing, terror, and desolation.

The 23. of December the parliament began, and that which the Queene-mother most desired, the confirmation of her Regency, allowed by the Chancellor, and afterwards by those that were the speakers. John Quintin of Autun a doctōr of the Canon-law at Paris,

A Parliament held at Orleans.

1560. for the Clergie: the Lord of Rochfort, Dammosseil of Commercy, for the Nobilitie. Angelo A then Aduocate of the Parliament at Bourdeaux, and afterwards Councillor there for the people. The Chancellor propounded many articles touching the meanes to pacifie the troubles, and the remedies for that which concerned the estate and religion, and to discharge the Kings debts. Quintin would haue the Ministers of the Church enforced to discharge their duties, not altering any thing in the reformation thereof, the which cannot erre: not to suffer any other then the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish religion. Against such as demanded Temples, and against the deliuerer of their petition (meaning the Admirall) (said hee) they should declare him an hereticke, and proceed according to the Canon and ciuill constitutions, for the prohibiting of such bookes as were not allowed by the Doctors of Sorbonne, and for the rooting out of Lutherans and Caluinists. Rochfort did speake against the iurisdictions vsurped by the Clergie, against the disorders growne among the Nobles, against the wrong done to the true Nobilitie, against the confiscations growne by confiscations for matter of religion, against seditions, of the meanes to order the Clergie, and to containe them in their vocation: for the releefe of the people, especially in matters of Iustice, the which should be reduced to a certaine number of Officers. Ange insisted much vpon the ignorance, couetousnesse, and dissolution of the Clergie, whence proceeded the greatest part of these present scandals.

Quintin excuseth himselfe to the Admirall.

The next day, vpon the Admirals complaint to the Queene-mother, Quintin excused himselfe vpon the instructions which were given him in writing, and in his second speech he did moderate his plea to the Admirals content. The Estates continued their conferences, and made the beginning of this yeare famous, by some prouision for matters of religion, whereby it was forbidden vpon paine of death, not to reproch religion one to another, and commandement given to all Iudges and Officers, to set at libertie all such as had beene imprisoned for the said religion. Many other good and necessarie lawes were published, but with more confusion then profit. And in truth a number of lawes ill obserued, peruert Iustice, and giues the people occasion not to regard them. But when they come seriously to handle the discharge of the Kings debts, and that the Nauarrois submits himselfe to restitution. If it be found that he hath receiued any extraordinary gifts: those of Guise and others, which could not make the like offer, found meanes to frustrate this proposition, by the referring of the Estates to Pontoise, hoping hereafter to find some deuise to preuent their yeelding vp of any accompt. And in truth all these assemblies vanished away like smoke, without any other resolution, then to lay the paiement of the kings debts vpon the Clergie. The King of Nauarre, the other Princes of the blood, and the Constable, seeing themselves held to no end in Court, and that for matters of State, they had but the leauings of them of Guise, it made them trusse vp their baggage to retire, with an intent to crosse the regencie of the Queene-mother, and the Guisens authoritie. To frustrate this desseigne, she makes a new accord with the Nauarrois, she doth associat him in the gouernement of the realme, and concludes with him, that leauing the title of Regent, he should be called Lieutenant generall to his Maiestie, in all his countries and dominions. But this was but a gouernement in paper: these strong factions of two parties, shall briefly assaile one another, causing great wounds within this realme, from whence we haue seene the blood flow euen to these latter dayes. Soone after the Prince of Conde being called to Court, he came from La Fere in Picardie to Fontainebleau, and the day after his arriual being the 13. of March he came into the Councell, where the King in the presence of them all declared, that hee had done him right for his innocencie, suffering him to pursue a second declaration to the same effect, in the Court of Parlement at Paris, whether the Prince went within few dayes.

This treatie did preiudice them of Guise, and in the end, peace must needs send them from Court, to liue at home like priuate men. They had in their conceits, the argument of a new Tragedy, the which wee shall shortly see played vpon this Theater. The Protestants multiplied, and the King of Nauarre supported them openly. The prince of Conde (who pursued the sentence of his iustification in the parliament) and the Admirall, had preaching in their chambers. This string is strained too high. They publish generally, that these preachings will be the ouerthrow of the ancient religion within this realme: and particularly among the duke of Guises partisans. That vnder colour of rendring accounts, and of extraordinary gifts, 1560. A gifts, they would displace them, hauing managed the most important affaires of the realme, for the space of tortie yeares. The Constable holding for a Maxime, That the change of religion brings an alteration in the State, begins to applaud them: The Duke of Montpensier, and the Prince of Roch-sur yon, Princes of the blood of Bourbon, vpon this nice point of new religion, ioyne willingly with them. The people conforme themselves commonly after the patterne of great men. Great personages frowne one of another, so do the people: one beares the name of Hugonot impatiently: an other cannot indure that of papist in truth turbulent and factions names. From hence sprong diuerse mutinies, at Beauvais, Amiens, Pontoise, and else-where, where the weaker was forced to yeeld to the stronger.

B These new broyles caused an Edict to bee made at Fontainebleau (where the Court remained; attending the renewing of the estates intermitted) prohibiting these mutual reproches of papist and Huguenot: to search no man in his house, not to retaine any one in prison for his religion. From thence the King made his voiage to Reims, and was solemnly crowned by the Cardinall of Lorraine. The parliament at Paris (not able to digest this last Edict) informes the King, that diuersity of religion was incompatible in an estate: reiects this pretended liberty of conscience, and beseecheth his Maieity to force his subiects to make open profession of the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish religion, vpon such paines as should bee aduised on in councell. Now blowes a contrary wind, the which assembles (in the parliament at Paris) all the princes, noblemen, and others of the priuy councell, with all the Chambers, to the end they might freely, and with all purity of conscience deliberate, aduise and conclude vpon a matter so much importing the good and quiet of the Realme. This assembly brought forth the Edict, which they called of Iuly, an edict confirming the decrees of former Kings, commanding his subiects vpon paine of death, to liue hereafter in peace, without iniuries, without reproaches for any respect of religion, and beleefe. But see the fire-brand of ciuill warres, which now wee handle. All religion, faith or doctrine, other then that of the Church of Rome, was banished the realme: assemblies of Protestants forbidden, and they condemned to seeke their abroad elsewhere.

C Some-what to temper this bitternesse, they lymit their exile, by the determination of a D generall councell, or to the next assembly of the Prelats of the Realme, at Poissy. And at the same instant the sentence of the prince of Condes innocency was pronounced in parliament, by the president Baillet, sitting in their scarlet gownes, the doores open, and all the chambers assembled, the King of Nauarre being present, with the duke of Montpensier, the prince of Roche-sur-yon: the dukes of Guise, Neuers and Montmorency, the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine, Guise, Chastillon and other noblemen: his remedy referued against whom it should appertaine, as the reputation and quality of his person and dignity should require. The King calling the princes and noblemen to Saint Germaine in Laye, he caused the prince of Conde, and the duke of Guise to embrace each other, promising to continue good friends. The Estates remitted to Pontoise, hauing produced no other effect E but a new approbation of the Regency for the Queene-mother (in whose fauour the Admirall laboured to the Estates, relying vpon the great assurances shee had giuen him, to procure much good for them of his party. And the King of Nauarre, by reason of the refusals which the Deputies made to passe this article, declared vnto them by mouth, that hee had renounced his right, and some meanes to open the cofers of the Clergy for the payment of the Kings debts: they began to proceed to the conference of Poissy. For the Catholikes came, the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine, Armagnac, Guise, Chastillon and Tournon, assisted by a great number Prelats and Doctors of Diuinity, and Canon law. The Pope doubting least they should make some conclusions preiudiciall to his authority, sent the Cardinall of the Ferrara his Legat into France, to oppose himselfe against any alteration in religion, and to haue the cause referred to the councell of Trente, the which hee had published.

Theodore Beza, Peter Martir a Florentin, Augustin Marlorat, Francis of Saint Paul, Raimond, John Virel, and others to the number of twelue ministers, and two and twenty Deputies of the Protestant Churches, offer a petition vnto the King, at his first entry, beseeching him, that the Prelats might examine the confession of their faith, whereof they had had confe-conference, since the moneth of Iune, to impugne it if they thought good at their first assembly, and vpon their obiections, to heare the defences of the said Churches, by the mouthes of their Deputies. That the King should be president in this conference with his Councell, and that the Clergie, (for that they are parties) should not take vpon them the authoritie of Iudges. That all controuersies might be determined by the Word of God. That two Secretaries chosen on either side, might examine the disputations that were daily written, and that they should not be received but signed by either partie.

Before they entred into open conference, the Cardinall of Lorraine would treat priuately with Beza before the Queen-mother: and having heard him especially vpon the Lords supper. I am greatly contented (said he) with that I vnderstand: and hope assuredly that the issue of this Conference will be happie, proceeding with mildnesse and reason. It beganne the 9. of September. The King did briefly touch the causes of this assembly, causing his Chancelour to deliuer them more at large. The Cardinall of Tournon in the behalfe of the Prelates, demands the Chancelors proposition in writing, and leysure to consider thereof: the which is refused. Beza with his companions brought in by the Duke of Guise, appointed to that charge with the Lord of la Ferté Vlleau capitaine of the Guard, makes an ample collection of all the articles of the Christian doctrine, expounds those which are in controuersie, toucheth by the way the discipline of the Church, protests, that both he, his companions, and all those that aduow them, desire nothing but the reformation of the church: that they will liue and die in the Kings protection; detest those that seek to sequester themselves, and pray to God for the prosperitie of his Maiestie, of his mother, his Councell and his Estate: then he presents vnto the King the confession of the Protestant churches, and desires the conference may be made concerning it. The King hauing receiued it by the said capitaine of his Guard, deliuered it vnto the Prelates. The point vpon the Reall presence in the Sacrament had troubled them. They conclude, that the Cardinall of Lorraine assisted by Claude Espereus, and some other Doctors, not by way of disputation, but not to faile of a reply, should answer to two points only, of the Church, and the Lords Supper. And the 16. of the said moneth he makes his oration, and discourseth at large of these two points, and then he intreats the King to continue constant in the religion of his Predecessors, and to summon the Ministers to subscribe to that which he had deliuered, before they passed to the other Articles: otherwise to deny them audience, and to send them out of the realme, which could allow but of one faith, one law, and one King.

The foure and twentieth day Beza made answer to the Cardinall, disputed with the Doctors Espereus and Saintes, and the 26. day, hee treated with him againe touching the Lords Supper: the other Ministers replied likewise to some obiections of other Doctors of Sorbonne, and finally all was contented into priuat conferences, without any resolution or conclusion that might end these troubles. The Prelats sent backe their Doctors in October, and referre all reformation to the Councell at Trent, whether the Cardinall of Lorraine and Doctor Saintes went: of whom we will speake a word by the way, seeing it suites with the matter. We find by a fragment originall, drawne out of the writings of a Chanoin of Reims, and published in the year 1598. by the meanes of Perrequin Maior of Langres: That the Kings Ambassadors at the Councell of Trent were (amongst other instructions, signed Charles, Katherine, Alexander, which was Henry the third, Anthony and vnderneath it, Charles of Bourbon, Francis of Lorraine, Montmorency, M. Hospital, S. André and Francis of Montmorency) charged to demand, "To haue the ceremonies corrected and all other things whereby the people might be abused, vnder a shew of pietie. That the cuppe might be restored in all Communions, within his Realme and all his dominions. That all administrations of Sacraments to the Laity, might be done in the French tongue. That in the parish churches, and not collegiall, cathedrall, or monacall, the vse of the Profine should be instituted according to the first & holy institution: that during the high Masse in parish churches, the word of God should be read & interpreted at the houre accustomed, with the catechizing of youth, to the end that all might be instructed, of that which they should beleue, & how they should liue according to God, & that in stead of the Profine, publik praiers should be made in the French tongue: that without changing any thing of the seruice of the church, in the Lat. tongue some hours should be appointed, as wel at Masse, as at Euen-song, whereby it might

A might be lawfull to sing psalmes in the open Church, perused first and corrected by the Bishops & ordinary superiours, and approued by famous vniuersities or prouincial councels. And also to complaine of the vitchast life of Clergy men, which breed so many disorders and corruptions among the people. These articles concluded, had without doubt made the way to reduce many realmes and prouinces to the Vnion of the Church, appeased the troubles of this realme, satisfied many troubled-consciencs, and preuented a greater schisme. But hatred and humane passions makes vs yet to attend a stroake from heauen to draw vs ioynly into the fold of one vniuersal bishop. Thus the conference at Poissy hauing not yeelded that remedy, which was expected, for the common mischief, now diuers factions grow in France. The Protestants, which before had by many petitions required Temples for the exercise of their religion, they now take them by force in many places, and without further attending the approbation of their demands, they assemble at diuers times. The Catholikes mutine, especially at Paris, and pursue them with stones, swords, staues and fire, in their returne from Cerysay (a garden without the Temple-gate) and in the suburbs of Saint Marceau: they ring the alarum bell at Saint Medard, they wound, kill, take and hang many. Gabaston amongst others, Knight of the watch, to appease the people, lost his head. To make some Edict for the pacesing of these broiles, the Queene-mother assembles the chiefe of the parliament, with the princes of the blood, Noblemen, Councillors of the priuy Councell, Maisters of Requests and other men of authority, and to giue some contentment to those that with vehemency required places and Temples for their assemblies with liberty.

The chiefe Catholikes, especially those of Guise, disallow of this course, they accuse the Queenes facility, and murmure openly against the King of Nauarre, the prince of Condé, the Admiral and his bretheren. These crosse them with an enterprize, made to carry the duke of Orleance (the Kings younger brother) into Lorraine, so as they retire from Court: the duke of Nemours, who had plaied the principall part in this tragedy, saues himselfe, and returns not before the ciuill warres haue fired all France. This new change, seemes to draw the Regent to the protestants party, she desires to know their forces, and their means. They giue her a list of two thousand an hundred and fifty protestant churches, the deputies whereof offered their goods and persons to the King to withstand the forces of them of Guise, who called the Spaniard into France.

The Guisians absence made easie the grant of that famous Edict, which beares vnto this day the name of Ianuary: the which disanulling that of Iuly, gaue liberty to the protestants the seuenteenth of the sayd moneth, to assemble without the townes, and provided that all men might liue in peace one with an other. But alas! in stead of peace it shall breed horrible confusions. The difficulty was in the execution. The parliaments publish it as slowly as may be, and that of Dijon, neuer. Those of Guise and the Constable ioyned with them, and diuered them by their authority. But they had an other string to their bow, which preuailed according to their desires. They imploy the Ambassador of Spaine, the Cardinall of Tournon, Esears, and some other house-hold flatterers to the King of Nauarre, to perswade him, that carrying himselfe a Neuter, and causing the prince his sonne to goe once to the Masse, the King of Spaine would giue him the realme of Sardenia, in recompence of that of Nauarre. The Pope likewise confirms him in this hope. This was properly to conceiue a mountaine and to bring forth a mouse, and to take from him all means to recouer his realme of Nauarre, when he should attempt it. So as being drawne by those Spanish and Lorraine practises, hee estrangeth himselfe by little and little from the protestants, solicits the Queene his wife to returne into the bosome of the Romish Church, and so to instruct her children. Vpon her refusall, there growes a breach betwixt them, and hee falls in loue with one of the Queene-mothers maides. In the meane time, she entertained the prince of Condé and the Admiral, whom shee knew to be yet strong within the realme, maintained the protestants in their peaceable exercise, and for the end commanded euery gouernor to retire to his gouernment. She would haue sent the prince of Condé into Guenne (whose presence without doubt had stayed that horrible and cruel shedding of blood) whereby Montluc vpon his refusall opened the veines of a body wonderfully afflicted. But so passeth the world, euery one would gouerne the King in his turne, and the Regent by little and 1562. and little did vndermine the foundation of the Edict, to ouerthrow the whole body. Moreouer those of Guise were desirous to returne to their places, neither had they retired but to get better footing. They are now strong inough, hauing drawne the King of Nauarre from the protestant part. They march towards Paris, and passing from Iainuille to Vassy, they dispersed about twelue hundred persons, which were assembled for their exercise: murder two and forty, wound many to the death, lead away prisoners, and sacke the towne.

The massacre at Vassy.

This was the first fire-band of the ciuill wars which were now a breeding. This act puts the protestants in alarum, & makes them to leaue the trowel and the hammer, which they imployed in many places, to build their Temples, euery one skowres his harnesse, euery one provides him armes and horses. Their Churches and Nobility complaine, and demand iustice of the King. The Regent giues them good words: and the King of Nauarre rebukes them, and chargeth them to bee the first motiues of this trouble. They haue (saith he) cast stones against my brother the duke Guise, he could not retaine the fury of his followers. And who sooner shall touch the end of my brothers finger, shall touch my whole body. The arrivall of the duke of Guise, the Constable, the Marshall of Brissac, Montmorency. Termes, and afterwards of the King of Nauarre to Paris, drawes the prince of Condé and the three brethren of Coligny likewise thither. But the stronger carries it. They were too weake to incounter the counceils which were held daily at the Constables house. To vnderstand what forces the prince had within the city, they make a proclamation. That all men, of what quality soeuer, should depart within foure and twenty houres. So the prince retires to Meaux, and calls together such as might by their armes force his enemies to some agreement. The Queene-mother (seeing the Guisians fortified within Paris, and seized vpon the Kings person, whom they caused to come from Fontainebleau to Paris) writes vnto the prince, and recommends vnto him, both the mother, and the children.

Orleanse taken by the protestants.

The princes intention was to come to Court, when as newes is brought him, that they possesse the King, and bring him to Paris. He therefore leaues Meaux to goe and seize vpon Orleanse, and at the same instant either faction assures it selfe by diuerse surprises of places, exposed to their wils, the Constable causeth the houses of Ierusalem vpon Saint Iames his ditch, and of Pepincourt without Saint Anthones gate, to bee beaten downe, where the protestants did assemble for their exercise, and in all other places, the people transported with the like humour, vse extreame violence. The protestants grow bitter, and in all places where they had might, reuenge themselves on the Churches, images, priests, and religious houses. To conclude euery towne thus diuided, prepares a wretched Theater, to act a mournful and bloody Tragedy. Yet euery one iustifies his cause. Without the realme the prince produceth the Regents letters in an open assembly of the princes of Germany. Within the realme, he exhorts them of his party to prouide men and money, and by an association made with the Noblemen, and gentlemen of his party, he promisseth to imploy himselfe, for the deliury of the King, and Queene, and for the maintenance of the Edicts, and the Estate of the realme.

On the other side, the King declares by his letters patentes: that both he, his mother, and his brethren, are at liberty, forbids all his subiects to arme vnder that pretext: commands them that are armed to surcease, and to retire home to their houses: and by an other Edict he commands the execution of the Edict of Ianuary, but within the city of Paris and suburbs thereof. But to quite abolish it, he calls the Nobility the eight and twenty day of Aprill, and declares by proclamation, the prince and his adherents to be seditious and bad Christians, and that the prince made prouision of forraigne forces to disturbe the quiet of France. It is an example of dangerous consequence, when a people armes vnder colour to set their prince at liberty, for often times in stead of liberty, they make him captiue. The Queene-mother did easily arme that party which she ment to imploy: but great men, who commonly maintaine their authority by armes, doe more willingly take them, then lay them downe. She cannot now cause them to surcease, whom she had armed for this deliuerance: the confusion is too great, their courages are too much incensed, and their hearts puffed vp with many hopes: they must come to blowes, their fingers itched on either side. In the meane-time the heads being gone, and perswaded to preferre the publike before all priuate respects, they offer in shew, to lay downe their armes, and to retire home to their houses,

A houses, so as their aduersaries will submit themselves to the like. But to conclude, the companies of men at armes being for the most part arrived at Paris, with part of the old bands, the King of Nauarre, the duke of Guise, the Constable, and the Marshall of Saint André (the Protestants called the three last Triumvirs, and in truth they were but three heads in one hood) hauing by an Edict banished the Calvinists out of Paris, take the way of Chasteaudun with twelue thousand foot, and three thousand horse. The prince was as strong, and euen then would haue ioyned with them: D'Andelot and Boucari about all others urged it, but the Regent abused them with friuolous hopes of an accord, whilst the Kings army grew stronger, both with French and forraigne forces.

B Hauing thus lost the opportunity of a battaile, the prince maintaines his army about two moneths, with a commenable discipline, without blaspheming, whoring, robbing, or theft. In the end they loose all patience. Baugency taken by assault, opens the gates to disorders: for this first heate soone past with the French growes cold, money for their pay growes short, and the nobility could not frame themselves to this strict discipline of warre, which the Admiral did practise, being a great enemy to robbing. In many Prouinces, matters went indifferently betwixt the Catholikes, and Protestants: and to giue two strokes with one stone, to stay the dissipation of this army, and to releue them that might in the end fall, the prince sent the Earle of Rochefoucault, with some troupes into Poitou: Xaintonge and Angoulmois: Soubize to Lions: Tuoy brother to Genlis, to Bourges: Montgomery into Normandy: D'Andelot, to hasten the succours of Germany, and Briquemaunt into England. These troupes from the month of Aprill, vntill the midst of August, did possesse Orleanse, Baugency, Vendosme, Blois, Tours, Poitiers, Mans, Angers, Bourges, Angoulême, Rouan, Chalon vpon Soan, Mafcon, Lion and the most part of Dauphiné, with many others, not without effusion of blood, spoyleing of Churches, and such insolencies, as the warre doth cause in a country of conquest.

Orleanse and Bourges held by the prince, did much helpe their affaires, but Bourges might be easily surprised before it were fortified. The King then (whom the Commanders had drawne into the army) marcheth thither, and the composition which Tuoy made with his Maiesty, put him for a time in disgrace with the prince. This arme cut off (as the Guisians said) from the Huguenots, invited the Kings army to the siege of Orleanse, where the prince and the Admiral were. But the resolution of these two Commanders, and the feare to receiue shame and losse, made them passe on to Rouen, where Montgomery commanded with seuen or eight hundred souldiers of the old bands, and two companies of English. The end of September, was the beginning of this siege: a famous siege, by the hurting of the King of Nauarre in the shoulder, as hee suruaied the weakest part of the city: whereof he died the seuentene day of Nouember, three weekes after it was taken by assault, and spoiled. Montgomery saued himselfe in a gally, but many of the chiefe passed through the executioners hands. On the other side, Lewis of Bourbon, duke of Montpensier, reduced to the Kings obedience, the townes of Angers, Mans and Tours: the Marshall Saint André E tooke Poitiers from the Lord of Saint Gemme; and Henry of Montmorency, Lord of Damuile, incountred the protestants forces in Languedoc, whilst the Earles of Tende and Suze, by the defeat of Mombrun, tooke Cisteron for the King, and Montluc with Bury gouernours of Guienne, put to rout the troupes of Gascons which Duras led to the Earle of Rochefoucault, besieging Saint Iean d'Angeli. The ouerthrow of Duras brought the Earle with 300. gentlemen, & the remainder of the defeated army, on this side Loyre, to ioine the prince with the Reistres whom d'Andelot brought. This supply made the prince resolute to go to Paris, & by anoying it, to encrease the feare wherwith they were possessed. He marcheth, forceth Pluuiers, takes Estampes, and besiegeth Corbeil: but finding it better furnished with men then he expected, he approacheth to Paris, makes a great skirmish, and beats backe F the troups that were come out off their trenches. So he camped at Gentilly, Arcueil, Montrouge, and other neighbour villages, the Queene-mother busies him 7. or 8. daies with diuers parles, during the which foure and twenty Ensignes of Gascons, and Spaniards arriving, were lodged within the suburbs of Saint Iames. The prince then seeing his enemies forces to encrease, resolues to fight with them, before they were all vnited, so as all hope of peace being conuerted into smoake, hee riseth the tenth of December, takes the way to drame.

Dreames are lies, as wee commonly say: yet haue wee often tried those which present themselves in the morning (the spirit hauing taken sufficient rest) to bring certaine aduertisements of that which is to come. The night before the eue of the battaile, the prince dreames that hee had giuen three battailes one after another, obtained the victory, overthrowne his three principall enemies, and finally himselfe wounded to the death, hauing layed one vpon another, and he about them all, yeelding in that sort, his soule to God. And to say the truth, haue we not scene this vision verified by the death of the Marshall of Saint André, which is at hand: by that of the duke of Guise before Orleance the yeere following: and by that of the Constable at the battaile of Saint Denis, and of the prince himselfe in that of Bassac.

The battaile
of Dreux.

In the Kings army, they numbred two thousand horse, and nineteene thousand foot. In that of the prince, foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foot. They ioyned the nineteenth of December, and without any skirmishes, chargèd with all their forces. The princes Suisse loose feuentene captaines, with three parts of their troupes, which were about three thousand, and endure three charges before they could be broken. On the other side, the taking of the Constable, the death of the Marshall Saint André, the defeat of their troupes, caused a generall confusion in the Kings army, if the duke of Guise, charging the white cassaks, and the Reisters with fury (whose pistols had made a great slaughter of his men) had not forced through the princes horse, who straying too much from the battaile, fell prisoner into the hands of the Lord of Danuille, the which made the victory doubtful, seeming before to incline to his side. The conflict continued from ten of the clocke in the morning, vntill night, with many charges, there were feuen thousand men slaine vpon the place, on both sides, many hurt, and in a manner, all died, and a great number of prisoners. The King lost (besides his Suisse) the most part of his horse, and a great number of foote. There were slaine of men of marke, the duke of Nevers, killed by one of his household servants, either by hazard, or of purpose, the Lords of Montbrun (the Constables sonne) d'Annebault, Guiry, la Brosse and his sonne: there were hurt, the duke of Aumale, brother to the duke of Guise, Rochefort and Beauvais. A usun a Nobleman of Gascony, whom feare made flie to Paris, and there hee died of grieue. The Prince lost about two thousand two hundred foote, and a hundred and fifty horse, French and Reisters.

Both Generals taken.

This battaile is famous, by the taking of two Generals, the one in the beginning, the other in the end of the battaile, so as the field was left by both parties: but after the retreat, it was viewed, and taken againe by the Duke of Guise, and the next day, as it were, recovered by the Admirall, who presented himselfe in battaile. So the prince had the aduantage ouer the dead, and the honour to haue made his retreat with order: but the duke had the aduantage of the victory, for that he lodged vpon the place of battaile, spoiled the dead, and won the princes artillery, who (a strange matter considering their hatred) supped, and lay all night with the duke of Guise. Doubtlesse, it was a curtesie in the one, and a resolution in the other. By the taking of the two Commanders, the duke of Guise was declared the Kings Lieutenant Generall in the army, and the Admirall tooke the command for the protestants. Either had sundry desseignes. The duke to recouer the places held from the King: the Admirall to preferre Orleance with more facility, by the conquest of some places about it: and then to finish his voiage into Normandy, whether the treasor of England called him. So hauing taken Selles in Berry, Saint Aignan, Montrichard, and Sully vpon Loire, he deliuered the gard of Orleance to his brother d'Andelot, with foureteene ensignes of French and Lansquenets, foure of the inhabitants of the towne, and a great number of the Nobility vnder the conduct of Duras, Bouchanues, Buffy, Saint Cyr, Auaret and other voluntaries: F and tooke the way to Normandy, thinking by this meanes to diuide the enemies forces, who had Orleance for the chiefe object of their armes. The first day of February, hee campt before it, and the next day he winnes the Portereau, with the slaughter of foure hundred good French souldiars, being abandoned by the Lansquenets, who cowardly left the place they had in charge.

The

A The 18. of this month, hee was ready to giue an assault: and making his reckoning to winne the towne, hee writes to the Queene-mother, that within 24. houres hee would send her newes of the taking thereof, and would make the day very memorable, sparing neither sexe nor age: that after he had shroued there, he would extinguish the remembrance of the towne. But man knoweth not his destiny, nor what shall happen vnto him. The same day as he returned towards night, vpon a little moile, from the campe to the castle of Cortey, his ordinary lodging, John Polaron, Seigneur of Mercy, a gentleman of Angoulmois mounted vpon a Spanish horse, by his owne proper and priuate motion, shoots him into the shoulidar with a pistoll charged with three bullets, and saues himselfe by flight: but hauing wandered all night, he was taken the next day: soone after, hee was pinchd with hot irons, and so drawne in peeces with horses at Paris. The duke of Guise died the 24. of the said month, and was interred at Paris, with pompe like vnto a King. Henry his sonne being yong of age, was preferred to the place of great Chamberlaine, and Lord Steward of France.

The duke of Guise slaine.

The Admirall in the meane time, runnes ouer Normandy without opposition, and followed by foure thousand horse; he coopt vp them into their forts, who had had free scope, since the taking of Rouen: namely the Marquis of Elbeuf, and Renouart a new Knight of the order, molested by the protestants of Caen, tooke some, and slue others. The money, artillery, powder, with fise companies of English, and two of French, which he newly received, came very fitly to reduce the towne, and the strong castle thereof, to his deuotion, C Monty conquered Honfleur: and the Lord of Colombieres, Bayeux: and by this prize, hee so amazed the garrison of Saint Lo, as they left the place. The Admirall sent Montgomery thither, who was receiued into Auranches without contradiction. Viré being taken by assault, endured the ordinary rigour of the warre. The Earle went on with his forces, euen as the packet of peace arriued, the which called the Admirall to Orleance. So the 14. of March, he marcheth thitherward: the 18. he entreth into Bernay by force, and causeth some priests to bee hanged being found in armes perswading the people to resist in a paltry dog-hole. Two daies after the Vicont of Dreux takes Aigle, and puts all to the sword that hee finds armed. Falaise compounds: Argenton redeemes it selfe for ten thousand francs. Mortagne a great village in Perche (seduced by some indiscreet priests) makes D resistance. They force it, and the most malicious pay for their folly with the price of their liues. The monkes of Saint Calais had receiued garrison, and ill intreated some of the household seruants of the Lord of Coignee: but now hee takes a sharpe reuenge, and Ceruoys surprizing the castle of Mezieres nere vnto Dreux, makes the garrison for euer after vnable to beare armes. So the Admirall re-enters into Orleance the three and twentieth day of March.

At the beginning of the siege of Orleance, the King, his mother, the priuy Councell, and certaine deputies of the Court of parliament at Paris, were come to Chartres, to arraigne (said they) the prince of Condé. The duke of Guise had by this meanes giuen two stroakes with one stone: for the losse of the prince of Condes head, had strooke off the E Constables. But Damuille hauing the honour to haue taken the Prince in battaile, had likewise the honour to preferre his life, by the dispersing of this assembly. Now that the Queene-mother stands no more in feare of the duke of Guises authority, shee reuiues the treaty of peace begun before his death. For the effecting whereof she holds an assembly in the life of Oxen, where the prince and the Constable assist being yet prisoners. The Constable protests at the beginning, that he will not suffer any peace made with the conditions of the Edict of Ianuary. The Prince craues leaue to confer with his councell in Orleance. His councell giues him to vnderstand, that neither the Queene, nor hee, can derogate from the Edict so solemnly made, confirmed, and sworne, at the instance of the Estates, and so notable an assembly of all the parliaments of the realme.

F But the prince was grieved to see himselfe garded by a company of horse, and three ensignes of foote, and many Gentlemen had not of long time seene their families. Moreouer, they gaue the prince to vnderstand, that the articles of the Edict of Ianuary were not altered, but onely to content the Catholikes: that armes being laide aside, they should by little and little obtaine free liberty. So the articles of peace drawn in forme of an Edict, were concluded the twelfth of March, and all confirmed in the Kings councell at Amboise, the the nineteenth following, verified in parliament the twenty seven, and the same day proclaimed throughout the towne by the sound of Trumpet. The executions qualified with the name of Iustice, the robberies, generall and priuate massacres, committed on the persons of the protestants at Paris, Senlis, Amiens, Abbeville, Meaux, Chaalons, Troyes, Bar vpon Seine, Espernay, Sens, Auxerre, Neuers, Corbigny, Aurillac, Moulins, Issoudun, Mans, Vendosme, Angers, Craon, Blois, Mer, Tours, Bourgueil, and places thereabout, Poitiers: Rouen, Valongnes, Vire, Saint Lo, Bourdeaux, Agen, and generally in al parts of the realm, are read at large in the Originals, and would augment this volume beyond the iust proportion. Time and leisure may hereafter giue all this discourse specified more particularly. Let vs onely obserue the most memorable exploits chanced during these first troubles, from the moneth of Aprill, in the yeere 1562. vnto the publication of the peace.

Particulare troubles at Meaux.

The protestants of Meaux exceeding the Catholikes in number, had vntill the end of Iune, continued the exercise of their religion, without any disturbance: then transported with an indiscreet zeale, and ill-advised presumption, grounded vpon their numbers, they flie to the Churches, beate downe Images, and make the priests retire. This insolency made the Court of parliament at Paris to censure them, and to abandon them to any that could spoile or kill them, without any forme of processe. Therevpon Liboux brother to Montluc, comes to Meaux, and with the consent of the protestants, restores the exercise of the Catholike religion, and then giues commandement to the inhabitants, to bring their armes into the towne-house. Some obey, others to the number of foure hundred, march to ioyne with the prince Portian: they charge them, and kill them all but forty, which recouer Orleance with much adoe, leauing their wiues to the mercy of the stronger, whereof many were forced to goe to the masse with blowes, many marriages solemnized a new, many children (but without order) baptized againe. The 13. of February 1563. some fugitiues tried to recouer the place, but this caused a totall ruine of their companions, who remained within the towne, they were massacred, drowned, and hanged, their wiues and children rauished, their goods spoiled, and their houses made inhabitable.

At Chaalons.

At Bar.

At Chaalons, des Bordes Lieutenant to the duke of Neuers, gouernor of Champagne, slue many men and women, imprisoned handicrafts-men, spoiled their houses, caused marriages to be re-solemnized, & children to be re-baptized. Those of Bar vpon Seine became the stronger, but rashly in a place easie to be forced. Some Canons planted onely against the castle, scattered all within it like vnto partridges. So the besiegers entring, finding few men to execute their reuenge on, they fall vpon the women, maidens and children, open some of their stomakes, pull out their hearts, and with a fury vnworthy doubleesse of one created after the same Image and likeneffe) teare them with their teeth. Ralet a yong aduocate, son to the Kings proctor, was (a prodigious thing) hanged by his fathers procurement. In the moneth of Ianuary following, some fifty horse of the garrison of Antrain, surprized the towne at the breake of day: and at the first tied this Ralet to the top of his house, then with their pistols caused him to expiate the death of his sonne. The other murderers were murdered, and their spoile spoiled by other spoilers. So the Lord requires the bloud of man by the hand of man himselfe.

Sainte Estienne

At Sens.

At Neuers.

At Corbigny.

Saint Estienne being returned from Orleance, with two of his brethren and some others to refresh himselfe, in a house of his neere vnto Reims, was beset, besieged and battered with the Canon, by a troupe of fiftene or sixteene hundred men, who going forth vpon their word to speake with the duke of Neuers, who (they sayd) asked for him, was murdered there by his owne cousin germaine the baron of Cerny, and his two brethren with sixteene others stable.

A hundred persons of all qualities were miserably slaine at Sens, their bodies cast naked into Seine, their houses spoiled, and (as if it had beene no sufficient reuenge) their vignes were pulled vp. The eleuend of May 1562. the Catholikes of Neuers called in many gentlemen of the country, seized vpon the gates, and three daies after fell vpon the protestants. Fayette arriues, ransackes their houses, re-baptizeth the children, expels whom hee pleased, and so laden with boory, worth fifty thousand crownes, hee retires to his house in Auvergne. Noisat Marshall of the company of Fayette, intreated them of Corbigny in the like sort. Capitaine Blany surprized the towne few daies after, and restored the Protestants to the

A the publike exercise of their religion. Capitaine Blasse surprising the towne of Antrain, staied the Catholikes from committing the like excesse, as they had done at Auxerre. Stephen Blondel a priest, and an other called the Dangerous were hanged and shot. Issertieux (called in by the protestants of la Charité to take the charge of the towne) was set vpon by Cheuenan, Achon, and other troupes, and finally (being besieged by Fayette) hee yielded vp the towne vpon an honest composition for his party. This was the tenth of Iune, but the Grand Prior entring, hee pulled the capitulation (being signed) out of Issertieux hand, and afterwards la Fayette abandons these poore protestants, to spoile and ransome, like to them of Neuers. The third of March following, the capitaines du Bois, Bloisset and Blany, re-enter by escaladoc. Leauing it afterwards in gard to du Boisc, who defended it with three-score and seven souldiars, and some inhabitants, against an army of foure thousand foote and horse; slue about foure score of them, and forced them to raise the siege.

Those of Chastillon vpon Loire, standing amidst many difficulties, and in the end spoiled of all their commodities, fortified their little towne, and the fifth of Ianuary endure an assault against the Lord of Erié, kill seven or eight of his men, and hurt many others, the men defending themselves with stones, and the women powring boyling water vpon the assailants. In the end, Montenud gouernour of Berry besieged it, battered it, and tooke it by force, killed men and women, young and old, spoiled the towne, euen to the hingels of C doores, glasse and barres of windowes.

Gyen maintaines it selfe long, the protestants were the stronger, but the insolency of captaines and soldiars, whom the prince of Condé sent thether from Orleance to refresh themselves one after an other, forced many of the inhabitants to retire to Orleance. So the towne remainyng at the deuotion of the Kings army, who camped before it, was subiect to the violence of the stronger, where the Italians, amongst other insolencies, cut a yong childe beeing aliue in two peeces, and with a horrible fury eate his liuer. Montargis was the Sanctuary of many protestant families, vnder the countenance of René of France daughter to King Lewis the twelfth, and Duchesse dowager of Ferrara. The duke of Guise her sonne-in-law sends Malicorne thether with foure companies of men at armes, but the prey he sought was safe within the castle: his fury fell vpon an old man met by chance, who was slaine and cast into the riuier. Malicorne threatens the Duchesse to bring the Canon to force her to yeeld the castle and the protestants that were in it. But the generous resolution of this Duchesse, and the death of the duke of Guise, staied the execution of his threats.

Bersons, according to the Commission hee had from the duke of Guise to seize vpon the forts of high Auvergne, enters into Aurillac, murders eight men, spoiles the towne and that of Argentat, with some castles, rauisheth wiues and maidens, making his account to roote out all the protestants in the country, if the Edict of pacification had not forced him to surcease. Montare comes to Moulins with like Commission, hee expelled out of the towne whom hee doubted, then giuing liberty to his troupes, they spoiled the houses and E farmes thereabouts: he caused six men to be hanged, and slue others to be drowned, returning from Orleance with 3. marchants of Daulphiné, suffring the hangman to execute them without any forme of processe, whom the multitude deliuered vnto him to be put to death. Thirtene yong men of Issoudun were beaten down in the water the 8. of May at S. Laisine, a village two leagues from the town, and the 9. of Iuly following, Sarzas seized vpon Issoudun, armed the Catholike inhabitants, drew malefactors out of prison, & filled it with protestants, who for the most part died, beeing smothered vnder the ruines of a tower, of sixteen that escaped, ten saued themselves at Bourges. Vntil the Edict of peace, hee spoiled both the towne and country, ransomming some, deliuering others to the hangman, which had not means to redeeme themselves: he rauished wiues and maidens: and to conclude, exposed these poore creatures to al the insolencies of soldiars. The 3. of April 1562. those of Mans became masters of the towne. But violence neuer continued long, and soldiars led by a Commander of small credit and little authority, did neuer see their armes prosper.

These men are no sooner armed, but they imploy themselves to the beating downe of Images, lacking of Churches: and from the towne they run to the villages nere. The commons assemble, kill such as they meete, and reskue the boory. In the end an apple of discord diuides 1562. diuides them of the towne and the castle: the insolencies of the captaines and souldiers 2. A maze the protestants: the duke of Montpensier prepares to assaile them, and of three captaines which command within the towne, two haue intelligence with him. This being discouered, the towne being also ill furnished, La Mothe Tibergeau drawes forth tumultuously eight hundred men carrying armes, leading them through many difficulties into Alanson, who then tooke sundry parties: some not practised in armes remained there: others put themselues into the troupes of the Conte Montgomery, others of the duke of Bouillon, and the other two captaines submitted to those to whom they had giuen their words. Thus the Catholikes haue their turne, they were driuen out of the towne, and now they re-enter, and full of spleene they spoile the protestants houses, both within the towne and abroad, B eight leagues compasse: and without respect of kindred, kill, spoile and ransome men, women and children. Some women of good account, some simple people, seruants and chamber-maides retired to their farmes, or to their friends in the coutry, remaine at the deuotion of five hundred Harguebuziers, leauied for the gard of the town and country thereabouts, who forbear no kind of reuenge and rigour. The prisons are filled, they forbid by any meanes to sollicite for them: the accused are not admitted to except against any wit-nesse, and for the last act of this Tragedy, about two hundred persons of all qualities and sexes, purge by their mournful deaths the insolencies of these first furies. The absent were executed in picture, their goods confiscate that were dead carrying armes: their children degraded from all Offices, and declared incapable to succeed. In villages nere and far- C ther of, about sixscore persons yeelded their throats to the reuenging swords of them, to whom the change of armes had now giuen the aduantage. One captaine Champagne, to glut the pikerils in a poole, which he had, doth gorge them with about fifty persons: Blais-Jarden his Lieutenant fills two trenches nere vnto his house, with fifty or three score carcasses.

La Ferté-Bernard, Sablé, Maine, Loire-Castle, Memers, Belesme and Martigne, had the fields there about white with the bones of such as were slaine, whose flesh was deuoured with birds At Vendosme the Images ouerthrowne at Vendosme, the altars beaten downe; yea the monuments of the house of Vendosme, too insolently broken, might not these stirre vp some reuenge? You beat downe (say the Catholikes) the Images and destroy the relics of the dead: but we will beate downe as many lying Images as shall fall into our hands. The Monkes of Saint D Calais second them, & of many protestants which held their Abbay, they massacre five and twenty, or thirty. Some troupes which kept the fields, kil the first that passe, stone them and cast them into wels. The Lord of Congnee ioyning with some gentlemen, comes to charge them, kils the murtherers, and (except a few which fled betimes) puts them all to the sword: then he dischargeth the rest of his fury vpon the priests and monkes, and causeth two of the most insolent to be hanged in their Church, yea where the alarum had rung to assaile the protestants.

Cruelties committed in Maine.

At Vendosme

At Angers.

Those of Angers become the stronger, yet without any offence to their fellow-citizens, and make an agreement within themselves: To liue peaceably one with an other, vnder the Kings obedience, with obseruation of the Edict of January. This modesty continued from the 5. E of Aprill to the 22. Then they loose all patience, ouerthrowing the Images and re-likes of Saint Samson. The Catholikes rest patient, but they could well choose the time of their aduantage. It chanced that the Prince of Condé, required a supply of men and money from the protestants of Angers. Many Gentlemen and souldiers march, and by this meanes make their party weake. Puygaillard, a Galcon captaine, sent by the duke of Mont-pensier, enters the castle the fifth of May, and the next day wins a part of the towne: then to lull the protestants a sleepe, and to haue them in the end at his deuotion, he grants them free liberty of religion. But two daies after, vnder colour of disarming them, they enter their houses. A receiuer of subsidies and some others barre vp their gates. They found the alarum, their houses are spoiled, and the prisons filled with men and women: and after F the eleuenth of the said month vnto the end of yeere, about foure-score men were executed after diuers manners. Many women of all qualities, were put into sacks, drawne through the dirt, and their bodies cast into the riuer, and their daughters rauished: some making strong resistance were stabbed with their daggers. And the duke of Montpensier, hauing published the Edict of the parliament of Paris, To pursue all them that should bee any way suspected

A (suspected of the Protestant religion, many Gentlemen and others about Angers during thele furies lost both life and goods. 1562.

At Blois they were maisters both of the towne and castle, but being too weake to incoun- At Blois. ter the forces of the duke of Guise, all the men of warre retired to Orleans. Those which remained in the towne, paid for their companions: for besides them that were beaten downe in the streetes at the duke of Guises entry, many tyed to the stakes, were cast into the riuer, wiues and maides were rauished, houses spoyled, and as it often chanceth in these in-ciuill tumults, many Catholikes were slaine in these confusions, as liberty giues euery man meanes to reuenge his priuate quarrels. They complaine to the duke. There is no remedy (saith he) we haue too much people in France. I will deale so, as victuals shall be good cheape. As B if the disposition of seasons, were in thy power oh duke! or if the earth should desire to bee watered with mans blood, to become fertill.

The towne of Mer was spoyled ten daies together. Beaupas a minister of the Church At Mer. hanged, some men slaine, some women beeing rauished died, some of them in the hands of them that rauished them, others of griefe soone after. The foresayd decree was published euery Sunday in places depending on the parliament. It was a meanes to arme theeues, vagabonds, villaines, leud and idle persons: it made the plough-man to leaue the plough, and the crafts-man to shut vp his shop: to conclude, it did change the multitude into Tygers, and Lyons, and feshed them against their owne countymen. A troupe of these rascalls C fall vpon Ligneul, hang some men, pull out a ministers eyes, and then burne him. Another company runs vpon the marches of Comeri, l'Isle-bouchart, Loches, Azé they burnt, and neighbour places, beating downe, and murthuring men, women and children.

Those of Tours were seized of the towne, but hauing spared the Images no more then At Tours. the rest, the duke of Montpensier comes in Iuly, and summons them to yeeld. They had no meanes to keepe the towne, nor the prince of Condé to succour them. So they make three Ensignes of foote, and two cornets of horse, and ioyned with them of Chinon, and Chastelleraud, making a troupe of a thousand men of warre. This was but a fire of straw: seuen or eight companies of men at armes, and some cornets of light horse of the Earle of Villars, charge and ouerthrow them, kil some, and carry others prisoners to Chastelleraud: some re-couer Poitiers, others which had yeelded themselues at the first in this defeat, being sent D back to Tours with passports, fell out of Scilla into Caribdis. The multitude receiues them disarmed, and beates them downe. About three hundred recouer the gates of Tours with running, hoping to finde a Sanctuary at their houses. But the people arme, and murther most of these amazed men, cast their bodies into Loire, massacre their companions remaining within the towne, sacke their lodgings, and in this furious liberty, die the riuer with the blood of their fellow-citizens, men, women and children. Chauigny armes, and by his presence doth countenance this popular insolvency. Bourgeau President of Tours, no Protestant, but onely suspected to fauour their party, had redeemed his life out of the hands of Clerusaux, Lieutenant to Chauigny, for three hundred crownes, and a basin of siluer, but E in the end, beeing murthered with stauces and swords, hanged by the secte, his head in the water vnto the brest, they open his belly, teare out his bowels, and cast them into the riuer, and placing his heart vpon the top of a Lance, they carry it through the towne, crying: Behold the President of the Huguenots heart. The duke Montpensier arriues, and by gibbets, wheelles, and other tortures, plaies the last act of this inciuill Tragedy. The Protestants of Poitiers, being maisters of the towne, did not forget to beate downe Images.

A horrible cruelty.

The Earle of Villars, and the Marshal Saint André besiege them. Saint Gemme command- Poitiers. ing there for the prince of Condé, sustaines a furious assault, making the assailants to determine of a retreat, when as Pineau captaine of the castle, practised by the assailants, giues them a signe to returne: hee shoots against them that were at the gate, & forced them to F leaue the defence. The gate being thus won, they come to fight for the market places. The Protestants began now to yeeld to the victors force, when as Mangot a captaine of Lodun breaking the locks of Saint Cyprians gate, makes a way for the citizens & soldiars to saue themselues, leauing the towne and country about subiect to al the insolencies incident to a country of conquest. Corneillis a Scottish captaine, escapes from Poitiers with his troupe, & to suppress the peasants fury, greedy of blood and spoile, he laies an Ambush, and then he

1562. he cunningly ioynes with them, and by this stratagem, takes from them all desire to assemble together againe for the like effect. The vnrestrained liberty of armes, made the strongest of all sides to seize vpon their townes, thinking delays to breed danger. But alas, how many pittifull catastrophes grew by these inciull and fatall tumults? Rouen was not the last to make triall thereof.

The fifteenth of April 1562. the protestants seize vpon the towne, enter the Churches tumultuously, beat downe and ruine reliques, images and altars, in about fifty parishes, abbeis and religious houses: the exercise of the Catholike religion surceased, and the court of parliament retired to Louviers. During these broiles, the duke of Aumale comes, as the Kings Lieutenant generall. Villebon bailiffe of Rouen, seizeth vpon Pont de Larche: the baron of Clere, on Candebee: and so block vp Rouen both aboue and beneath the riuier: the Magistrate ceaseth to administer iustice, the marchant his trafficke, and the handicrafts-man shuts vp his shop: heavy fore-tellings of a horrible confusion to come. Many difficulties did now presse them of Rouen, when as Moruelliers comming from the prince of Condé, and slipping cunningly by water into the towne, prouides for the souldiars disorders, and for the gard of Saint Katherine's fort, prolonging the hope of the besieged. The duke of Aumale assailes the fort, and tires them with daily skirmishes, but most fatall for himselfe: hee looseth at the first charge an 100. men, and the besieged Saint Agnan and Languetot braue captaines, at the second a great number of men, and two Ensignes carried into the towne. The eleuenth of Iuly, the Duke giues a generall assault, and so furious, as three ensignes of the enemies planted vpon the rampart, did so inflame the courage of the besieged, as they ouerthrow both ensignes and men, pursued them to their campe, and forced them to dislodge the night following, in confusion, with losse of their victuals, munition and baggage, to go and reuenge the dishonor lately receiued at Rouen, by the taking of Ponteau de Mer & Honfleur. Moruelliers content to haue preferred Rouen, at this time, retires to his house, and leaues the charge to the Earle of Montgomery, called by them of Rouen out of base Normandy. About the end of September the King, the Queene, and the King of Nauarre come to the army, consisting of sixteene thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides Reistres and Lansquenets: siue daies are spent in skirmishes, but with most aduantage to the besieged. The sixth day, most part of the soldiars goe to refresh themselves within the town. A captaine named Lewis, who had intelligence with the enemy, giues them aduice. They run hotly to the assault (during these skirmishes, they had made a breach in the wall with siue or six hundred canon shot) they kill many good souldiars, many pioners, eight and twenty women, and take the place: but with the losse of Lewis his life, slaine by one of his souldiars, as he did helpe the assailants to mount. A worthy reward for so notable a treachery. Three hundred Burgeses did run to the defence: but the fury of the assault, carried some to their graue, and others to prison, and made the way easie for the taking of the Bulwarke of Martinville, and the fort of Montgomery. The thirteenth of October a hot assault was ginen against the towne, from the morning vntil night, and many men on both sides slaine. The next day, about eleuen of the clocke, they renew the assault, and plant three ensignes vpon the rampart of Saint Hilary. Montgomery repells them, and driues them back beyond the trench, killing of his enemies about eight hundred men, and loosing of his party, foure or five hundred men, women, and children.

The first siege of Rouen.

The second siege.

The fort taken.

The King of Nauarre slaine.

Rouen taken.

The next day was fatall to the King of Nauarre. If I may (said he to a Nobleman) escape from this siege, I will neuer carry armes more for this quarrell. A certaine fore-telling of the mischief that followes vs, doth commonly touch our hearts. Hauing visited the trenches, and dined nere vnto the wall without the battery, he was shot in the shoulder as hee made water: the bullet beeing drawne out too late by the Surgions, and his wound inflamed by his voluptuousnesse, accompanied with a feuer, he gaue his soule to God, the seuenteenth day of Nouember following, as we haue said before. In the meane-time, the battery continues, many thousands of shot beat downe diuers towers, many mines play without effect. The fourth assault, was more auailable, the 26. of October. Thereby the assailants win the breach at the port Saint Hilary, they enter in troupe, and kil al they encounter, force houses, rauish wiues and maidens, and commit all acts ordinary in the like accidents, Montgomery vnable to withstand this last violence, saues himselfe in a galley with such as could get in, the

A the rest remaining in prey were spoyled, slaine, drowned and made prisoners. The Parliament returns three dayes after the taking of the towne, and at their first sitting, the President of Mandreuil lost his head: Sequence and Berthenouille Councillors, and Marloras a Minitter were hanged, and the next day siue Captaines, and diuers Burgeses of the towne. Morcour, enuie and hatred amidst these popular furies brought in question the Seigneur of Anthor, chiefe President, and Boisroger the Kings Aduocate, beeing Catholikes, but enemies to sedition and wise politicians. In ciuill tumults, the vulgar doth commonly take for essentiall markes of Religion, the insolencies and excesse; which fury and the sufferance of the magistrate doth suggest.

Diepe serued for a retreat to many Protestant families, but the ouerthrow of some B troupes which Briquemaunt sent to Montgomery for a supply, and the taking of Rouen terrified the most part of the inhabitants, who beeing pressed by Aumale and Villebon, were content to yeeld, and to cease the exercise of their religion. Ricarville and Bacqueville had the government, the former of the Castle, the other of the towne. But how many Captaines by indiscretion haue lost both liues and places? Ricarville going out of the castle to see his horses, is slaine, and suddenly the castle is seized on by Catenille and Captaine Gascon, who going from thence into the towne takes Bacqueville, and restore the exercise of the Protestants religion vnder the government of La Curee.

Montgomery labored with all his power to maintaine the Protestants in base Normandy, but he had the Duke of Estampes and Matignon to incounter him. In May, he had taken Vire, beaten downe the Images, and carried away the reliques. The last of Iuly, the Catholikes awaked at this first rumor, surprize the Protestants comming from the preaching, reuenge their losses by the death of some, and hurting of others. About the end of August La Motte, Tibergeau, Auaines and Deschamps, sent by Montgomery with sixe-score horse, surprize the towne, and spoyle both it and the country. The 4. of September the Duke of Estampes comes with eleuen cornets of horse, they force the towne, kill Auaines, take the castle, stab two hundred men that were fled into it, rauish and kill women and children. Tibergeau, and many others ransomed their liues: so as generally there was nothing but taking and re-taking of townes, with most cruell and inciull stratagemes.

D The Vidam of Chartres, and Beauuoir la Noelle his brother-in-law, hauing assured themselves of New-hauen, the Vidam going into England, treated with the Queen to succor the Protestants: and for assurance of her men and money, deliuered the said place into her hands, with protestation, as well by him, as by the Queene, no way to preiudice the Kings soueraine authoritie, nor the estate of the Realme. And she shall shortly yeeld it without any difficulty. According to the treatie, there arriues sixe thousand English in Normandy, vnder the Earle of Warwicke, and are dispersed in Rouen, Diepe, and New-hauen. After the taking of Rouen, the Reingraue brought his Reistres before New-hauen: but his violence preuailed as little, as fifty thousand Crownes did, with a collar of the Order, and a company of men at armes intertained, which the Queen-mother promised to Beauuoir, to corrupt him to yeeld vp the towne. Brittainie continued vnder the moderate gouernement of the Duke of Estampes, both for that the Queene-mother liued in suspence, and entertained both parties, as also for that the factions of Normandy had drawn away the worst-affected. Those of Guienne, Languedoc, and other places made warre against the Images and Altars, ministring occasion to shed the blood of liuely Images at Grenade, Castelnau darry and Cahors, where about sixe-score Protestants assembled to heare the preaching, were slaine. On the other side, Bury and Montluc (scourges to the Protestants) reuenged the beating downe of Images throughout all Guienne, with infinite murders, and lamentable spoiles, Duras hauing abandoned the protection thereof, vpon a commandement which he had receiued from the Prince of Condé, to bring him forces to Orleance, which succeeded fill for him, as we shall see.

Bury and Montluc did run vp and downe the country to crosse the Protestants desseigns: and those of Bourdeaux (hauing too slackly proceeded in an enterprise made against the towne and castles) caused the Parliament to search their houses, and to put them to death, who had not in time retired themselves vnder Duras Ensignes. Montluc incensed especially against them of Agen, tryed all his wits, to bring them vnder his power and command. He had againſt him the Lord of Memy, Generall of the warre for the Proteſtants in Guienne, and the neighbor-countrie, a ſickly man, and not greatly practiſed in ſuch affaires: for if he had made benefit of the great forces, which he had at his command, and would haue beleued Arpaion and Marchaſtell, he might in ſhew haue cut Montluc in peeces, being much weaker of men, who knowing the carriage of his aduerſarie, wearied him with dayly courſes and alarmes, to the contempt of the Proteſtants, which fell into his hands, as hee himſelfe doth vant in his Commentaries, a true portrait and table where wee may reade at large the horrible deſolations chanced in thoſe countries during the firſt troubles. In the end thoſe of Agen ſeeing their towne vnable to reſiſt the Cannon, make a troupe of about fixe hundred men, and retire for the moſt part, to the caſtle of Penne committed by Duras to captaine Lionran. The next day, the common people of Agen troupe together, ſpoyle and kill all they meete: Bury and Montluc flie thither, they execute many priſoners, and ſuch as were abſent they hang in picture. Duras not able to diuert this heauie accident, takes the way of Quercy, wins Lauſette by force, kills fixe hundred threeſcore and ſeuene men, amongſt the which, nineſcore and fourteene Priests were found ſlaine, without any reſpect of their Order, through this deteſtable warlike inſolencie. For a counter-change, Montluc comes to beſegee the caſtle of Penne, forceth the place after the death of Lionran, puts man woman and child to the ſword, and (continuing the courſe of his proſperitie) takes and ſackes Caſtel-laloux, Marmande, S. Macaire, Bazas, Toneins, Port S. Mary, Villeneufue of Agenois, the caſtle of Duras, and Montſegur, leauing bloudy trophies of an vnciuill and pitifull victorie.

Leſtoure.

Leſtoure the chiefe towne of Armagnac, was at the Prince of Condes deuotion. Bugole a captaine of Bearne and a Catholike commanded there: who by the taking of Sauuetat of Gaure, of Larromien, and of Tarraube, had aſſured the Proteſtants of his conſtant affection to their party. Montluc ſends captaine Peirot his ſonne to ſuppreſſe Bugole. Peirot treats with Bugole, and reapes the fruites which follow by his parle. Captaine Mefmes led two hundred ſouldiers to fortiſie Leſtoure: Bugole cauſeth them to ſtay vpon the way, vnder colour to ſend them a gard to make their paſſage eaſie. And to this intent he ſpeedily ſends to field three hundred men at armes, and fixe and fortie Argoleters, and himſelfe leads other troups of foote to Tarraube, that by the weakening of Leſtoure, Peirot might haue meanes with his men at armes to ſtoppe the returne of the troups of Tarraube to Leſtoure, and by the ſame ſtratageme cuts off the paſſage for captaine Mefme, leauing him in prey at Roquebrune a poore village, from whence he paſſed through his enemies, being foure or fixe to one, and retired into Bearn. Moreouer, although Tarraube were vnſupplied of meale and water, yet he kept his foot-men therein, that being beſeaged, they might more eaſily bee at Peirot's mercy, as it afterwards fell out. And to fill vp the meaſure of his trecheries, ſoone after the yeelding vp of Tarraube, he with a brother of his followed Peirot's enſignes, and againſt his plighte faith, he beheld him to cut in peeces 231. priſoners at Tarraube, hang ſome, and ranſome many. Montluc aduerted hereof, aſſembles the commons with fix companies of foot, beſegeth Leſtoure, makes a breach, giues an aſſault in foure places. Briemont giues him the repulſe, hauing not with him about an 100. ſouldiers, a weak number, the which induced him in the end (together with the Queene of Nauarres intreatie, to whome the towne belonged) to depart by compoſition.

Now we muſt perſorme our promiſe touching the exploits of Duras in Guienne: with the firſt forces he had gathered together, he tried to aſſure Bourdeaux: but hauing failed of his deſſeigne, he choſe the countrie betwixt the riuer of Garonne and Dordonne, to reuiſe his troups. S. Macaire gaue him bullets as he paſſed in ſtead of victuals, and killes ſome of his men. He is offended therewith, aſſaults the towne, forceth it, and takes his reuenge of the former outrage. Burie and Montluc purſue him, (they knew well that hauing ſlaine him all Guienne vnſupplied of a commander, would be at their diſcretion:) they ouertooke him neere to Rozan, and charge him at their aduantage, being abandoned by the moſt part of his company, which were vn-warlike, and not capable of diſcipline. This firſt checke was ſufficient to abandon all: yet the cauſe whereof he had taken the defence, did ſummon him once more to trie the hazard of armes. He gathers together what he can, aſſembles new forces, takes the way of Agenois and of Quercy, helps them of Agen, reuengeth his iniuries ries vpon Lauſette, as we haue heard, marcheth towards S. Antonin, and there fortiſies himſelfe with two companies of foot, led by Marchaſtel. His meaning was to go into Languedoc, and to ioine with the Lord of Crufol: but the Earle of Rochfoucault inuites him to the ſuccour of Orleans, and for a guard, ſends him Bordet, a valiant gentleman of Xaintonge, with ſixtie horſe, two hundred Argoletiers, and two Enſignes of foot. Theſe troups conſiſting of about fixe thouſand men, horſe and foot, march to Montauban, there they receiue men, munition, and artillery, and ſo turne to Xaintonge: in the way they force the caſtle of Marcues, take the Biſhop of Cahors, there threaten to hang him, as the author of a maſſacre made of the Proteſtants within his Dioceſſe: fixe or ſix ſouldiers made ſatisfaction for this offence by their deaths.

Bordet had a ſpleene againſt them of Sarlat: they had in this paſſage ſlaine two of his gentlemen. So at his perſwaſion Duras incampes before it the firſt of October. Bury and Montluc flie to ſuccour it with a great number of horſe, and ſome eight thouſand foote. Duras raiſeth the ſeige, and to lodge at eaſe, diuides his men into Heudreux, Ver, and other places neere: the rainie-wether gaue them likewise ſome impreſſion and confidence of the enemies temporizing. But they were vigilant, and ſearing leſſe the iniurie of the ayre then Duras, they came thundring vpon him. Without doubt when two armies are neere together, the firſt that makes his retreat, giues the other an aduantage. Duras who ſuppoſed they had bene but the enemies ſcouts, determined to retire ſoftly, and to lodge his men in ſafety: when as Bury and Montluc ſeeing him retire, charge him behind, and finding very ſmall reſiſtance, kill fixe or ſixe hundred of his ſouldiers, charge home to the artillerie and baggage, kill fiftene hundred ſeruants, and hang ſome priſoners, eſpecially Miniſters that followed the troups. But the bootie qualifying the victors heate, gaue leſſure to the firſt that fled, to ſet wings to their ſeete, and by a ſodaine flight to prolong their liues for ſome dayes: for the moſt part of them which eſcaped, were taken againe, and led to Agen, and there hanged on a gybbet ſet vp expreſſly, which they called the Conſiſtorie.

A great error.

The battell of Ver, and the ſecond deſeate of Duras.

Battailes are variable, and he is no merchant that wins alwaies, ſaith the Prouerbe. Duras gathers together ſome remainders of this ſhipwracke, and aduerted that Lamoignon a Captaine ſent by Sanſac to ouerthrow him quite, did attend him at Emborn, with fixe hundred men, he marcheth directly againſt his enemy, ſurprizeth him at the breake of day, cuts in peeces both the Captaine and his ſouldiers, reſeruing three onely to carrie newes vnto Sanſac, and by this ſoule ſlaughter, reuengeth the diſgrace which he had lately receiued: then moſt of his troups being gone, ſome to Rochel, ſome elſe-where, and hauing no man of command remaining, but his eldeſt ſonne, Bordet, Puch, and his brother, with about fortie Carbines, and eighreen hundred ſoldiers half diſ-armed (his horſemen being gone before, and ioyned with Rochfoucault) he recouered Orleance and there died, vpon the conclusion of the peace. Through the abſence of Duras, the Proteſtants eſtate in Guyenne was very lamentable, their bodies and goods left to the diſcretion of their enemies. Piles a gentleman of Gaſconie, hearing of the outrages which Bury and Montluc committed without controule, parts from Orleance (he came with the troups which Grandmont brought out of Gaſconie) and ſurmouting a world of difficulties, in the end he recouers his houſe neere vnto Bergerac, and notwithstanding the garriſon which the Duke of Montpenſier had left there, he opens the priſons, and ſets all them at libertie that were committed for matter of religion, and then retires to his houſe.

Exploits of Piles, and

This new and bold attempt puts the countrie into armes: all riſe againſt Piles, who forced to yeeld to violence, withdraws himſelfe, being followed by fiftene horſe, and fiftene Harguebuziers on foote: at Montagnac he ſurprizeth a Cornet of fixeſcore light horſe, commanded by Montcaſſin, he kills their Leader, with fourteene others, and puts the reſt to route, and by meanes of the horſe which he recouered there, of good ſouldiers hee made profitable men at armes. Piles had left la Riviere about Bergerac, a young gentleman, who (wedding the praſtiſe of armes to the ſtudie of the Lawes, from which he was newly returned) became as ſoone a braue Captaine, as a reſolute ſouldier: for his firſt ſtratageme, hauing ſuddenly trouped together ſome twentie ſouldiers, and a good number of peſants with ſtaues, he ſurprizeth Sainte Foy vpon Dordonne by ſcalado, cuts the corps de gard in peeces, that was ſet in the market place, and commanding in the ſtreets many and ſundry things,

1562. things, as if he had been followed by seven or eight hundred men, hee slue Rexas one of A 8c. Montluc Captaine, his Lieutenant, his Prouost with foure-score of his souldiers, and be-
63. came absolute master of the place. Bury and Montluc chafing at this disgrace, receiued by an appentise in warre, lodge many troupes betwixt Bergerac and Saincte Foy. But la Rini- ere hauing forced through the troupe of Captaine Sale, and a Squadron of horse, made his retreate, passed the riuer of Dordonne in safetie, and went with his troupe to ioyne with Captaine Piles. Vpon the way, behold a band of souldiers encounter him beeing farre from his men, and as he inquired newes of Piles, they ouerthrow, hurt and take him. But passing ouer a bridge he casts himselfe into the water, recouers the contrarie banke, and so saues himselfe at Hymet, a towne of Aginois, whereas Piles prepared for the surprize of Muci- Ban, the which Montluc thinking to take from him about the end of January 1563, by means of the Seneshall of Perigord, he left the vndertaker confounded in his desseigne, and his troupes put to flight. This successe giues courage to Piles: he attempts against Bergerac, and at the second charge enters it the 12. of March, putting three corps de gard to the sword, and all such as could not in time recouer the castle. The next day a tower beeing vndermined, hauing smothered them that were within it, the castle vnurnished of munition, yeelds at the victors discretion, who puts them all to the sword. A cruell and more then inciuill warrel What worse vsage could we expect of strangers and barbarous people, whose inhu-manitie we willingly abhorre: and do we not tremble at the effusion of our Counti-mens bloud? In the countries of Angoulmois and Coignac, the Seigneur of Martron, by many murthers, ranfomings, and robberies, rauishing of wiues and maidens, and other oppressions which the war doth vsually bring forth, reuenged the excesse the Protestants had committed, in beating downe the images at Angoulesme.

In Xaintonge, Count Rochefoucault maintained their affaires, but the taking of Poitiers before described, and the defeat of Duras, caused the Protestants to be spoiled at Xaintes by Captaine Mogeret, and the exercise of their religion to be abolished at Rochel, and the neighbour lands, by the Duke of Montpensier. But alas, all these disorders and bloudie confusions do not counteruaile the horrible furies of Tholoufa, and other places of the Parla- ment of Languedoc. Tholoufa is one of the greatest and best peopled cities of the Realm, and at that time the Protestants numbred aboute five and twenty thousand persons of their Religion, of all qualities, ages, and sexes. After the publication of the Edict of January, matters passed with great moderation vntill Aprill. A little sparkle doth soone kinde a fire of sedition: and a small cause thrusts the seditious into furie, especially if the Magistrate (ordained rather to restrain the bloudie-minded) doth countenance their insolencies. The buriall of a dead bodie was the Prologue to a horrible Tragedie, whereof the first act was played in the suburbs of S. Mich-l, S. Streuen, and S. Saluador: and so passed the wals, and put all the cittie into a mournfull confusion. The Parlament did winke at it, but the Capitols beeing more modest, employed their authoritie to quench these first flames, which must needs put all their state in combustion: foure of the most seditious beeing hanged, and two whipt, did make some satisfaction for the bloud and death of such as were wounded, slaine, and cast into wels. This pursuite makes the people mad. The Protestants, to warrant their liues, and to saue themselves by some good Capitulation, seaze on a gate, and vpon the town-house.
The Parlament stormes, calls in the Nobilitie, assembles the commons, giues authority to their furious armies, and by a generall proclamation, both within the citie and abroad, commands them to arme, and to fall vpon the Huguenots, with warrant from the Pope, the King, and the Court of Parlament. Then they kill, they fill the prisons, they massacre many.
When they find no holes to hold them, the riuer is heaped vp with carcases: they cast them aliue out of the windowes, and if they labour to recouer the bankes, they beate them downe with stones and stauces.

The Protestants shut vp in the towne-house, and hauing no other hope but to despaire of health, they resolute to sell their liues dearely. They had Canon, and with the thunder thereof do amaze their enemies, they make many sallies with great effusion of bloud on either side. They treat an accord with them: they demand an assurance of their liues & goods, with the obseruation of the Edict. It is reiected: and so this vnciuill and fatal combat, continues many daies. In the end, the 16. of May, they graunt them, To retire in safety, leaving their

A their armes in the towne house. They go forth towards night. But oh confusion! it is the best expedient to disarme an enemy with dispensation of conscience, with whom they will keepe no faith. At their going forth, they imprison such as they can lay hand on, the rest escape by the gate which they held: some recouer Montauban, or other places of their par-tie, others are subiect to the mercie of the peasants and souldiers lying in the fields. So as about three thousand five hundred persons (saith the Originall) lost their liues in this mu-tine.

The Catholikes are now absolute masters of the cittie: they beate downe the Protestants Temple, and foure dayes together they kill, imprison, and spoyle. These broyles and popular tumults haue oftentimes confounded the authours themselves, and the spoile of rich B houses is a very dangerous and attractiue bayte. The Parlament knowes it well, and begins now to feare, lest the insolencie of such, to whom they had giuen libertie, should fall vpon themselves. They therefore leuie a summe of money to content the companies, and to void the towne of them. So Montluc and Terrides march against Montauban, Fontgraneux against Beziers, Mirepoix the younger against Limoux. The Court hauing the gouerne-ment without controule, displace two and twenty Councillors that were least partiall, and most suspected with some chiefe men: condemne prisoners, and from the end of May vnto Februarie following, they execute, by diuers manners, foure hundred persons.

This massacre of Toulouse, that of Gaillac in Albigeois against eight-score persons, and C the approach of Bury and Montluc had so amazed the Inhabitants of Montauban, as they abandon the towne: but the taking of Agen, and the troubled estate of Bordeaux (as wee haue heard) called away both of them for this time. In the meane time, Arpajan and Mar- chastell putting two thousand men into Montauban, had put new courage into them, when as newes comes, that Montluc and Terrides came to beseege them with a thousand horse, and five thousand foote: the which made the Captaine take a new resolution to go to Or- leans: the people are amazed, feare driues many out in confusion, the drum sounds, they issue forth tumultuously, forsake the towne and abandon the gates. But which was the better expedient, either to die in defence of their houses and families, or to fall into the hands of the enemy, from whom they might expect no mercy? The most part beeing surprized D in the fields, were forced to yeeld their throates to their swords that pursued them, others brought to Toulouse ended their liues vpon sundry gybbets: the Captaine and some few others recouered the towne. The 24. of May, Montluc's armie arriues, but beeing content with some skirmishes, and to haue wasted the corne, he retired to make a greater leape. He retournes in September following, with nine companies of men at armes, a great number of voluntarie gentlemen, five and twenty ensignes of foot, foure companies of Argoletiets and three of Spaniards, which made twelue hundred men, and thirteene peeces of artillery.
The partie was stronger on either side then at the first, for Duras and Marchestel were entered, vnder hope to leade both the companies and Canon to Orleans. So as Montluc hauing lost some sixe hundred men in diuers skirmishes, and refused to fight with Duras, who E offered him bataille, he retired the second time.

Then Duras and Marchestel leading away the troupes, vnurnished the towne of two great Canons, and two field peeces, the which were afterwards lost in the battell of Ver- montluc aduertised of the estate of Montauban by Fontgrane, one of the Captaine of the towne, hastens thither, offers a scalado, and giues the alarme in three parts. Two hundred recouer the first courtin, beeing followed by the two ensignes of Bazourdan. Laboria born in the towne and a Captaine there, beates them backe, and with the slaughter of two hundred of their men, forceth them to leaue their attempt to winne it by force. The thirteenth of October, they batter it with nine peeces of artillery, and continuing vntill the 22. of the moneth, he beates downe a peece of the wall. Bazourdan will needes discouer the breach: F but beeing shot in about the left pappe, he could not returne with any newes. The next day they giue a furious assault: the more courageously the assailants presse them, the more resolutely the assailed defend themselves, men, women, and children, euery one in his place.
Oftentimes they obtaine that vnder the Foxes skinne, which the Lion cannot effect. Laboria might do much to draw the Inhabitants to composition. Terrides promisseth him the gouernement of the towne, vnder the Kings authoritie, and three companies entertained. He accepts

Three seegs of Montauban

1562. accepts this offer. But his new proceeding brings him presently into suspect, so as having A 8c. no more credit, and the Citizens resolute not to giue care to any Capitulation with men, 63. who having (say they) no faith, cannot keepe it with any men. Laboris followed by his Sergeant, retires himselfe to Terrides campe: from that time vnto the 15. of Aprill, being the day of the publication of the peace, the seege passed in assaults, sallies, and skirmishes, wherein the beseegers lost about two thousand men, with a great number of Captains and worthie gentlemen without any profit.

Carcaſſonne, Castelnau-darry, Reuel and Limoux were partakers of these disorders. The Protestants of Carcaſſonne had their exercise in the suburbs. The 16. of March 1562 the Ca-tholikes having taken view of foure or fūe thousand men, giue an alarm to the Protestants assembled in the suburbs: they made them to leaue the place at the sound of their Canon, B drums and trumpets: they pursue them, kill, hurt, hang, and ranſome them. Castelnau- darry was subiect to the like fortune, about fiftie persons were murdered with the like furie and popular tumult. Those of Reuel hearing of the confusion at Tolouſa, ſaued themſelues at Caſtres, and else where, leauing their families and goods to the mercy of the eues and robbers. Some being apprehended by vertue of a Commiſſion granted by the Palament, were led to Tolouſa, and condemned, ſome to the gallies, others were ſiged, and ſome baniſhed. At Limoux they had an aduantage ouer the Catholikes: but Pamiers being entred with ſenue companies, and eight hundred Bandoiliers, Spaniards for the most part, C and the Marſhall of Mirepoix being ſent by the Parlement, the town was subiect to the ſame of the ſtronger, and ſuffered the ordinarie inſolencies of Conquerors, ſpoiles, murders and rapes. He that ſees his neighbors houſe on fire, ſhould looke to his owne. So the Protestants of Beziers aduertised of the murder of Paſſy, draw ſome ſouldiers vnto them, and ruine the images in all the Churches. Beaudiné chiefe of the Protestants troupes aſſiſted them, and by the taking of Magalas and Eſpignan, ſtrong places which did much annoy Beziers, aſſured the towne to their partie. Joyeuze followed by 5000. men, and 12. peeces of artillerie, croſſed their attempts, and hauing at the ſecond aſſault forced Lezignan, and taking Mon- tagnac by compoſition, he took the way to Pezenas. Beaudiné comes againſt him, and might eaſily haue defeated him, but fūe hundred Crownes, which the maſter of his campe had receiued of Joyeuze, with promiſe of a thousand more, made him looſe about fix ſcore D ſouldiers, and by the rout of his companies opened the gates of Pezenas to Joyeuze. Beziers was readie to receiue a law from him: but the ſacke and murder of their neighbours, and the feare of the like vſage, made them to ſhut their gates againſt him, and to go to field, to force and burne Lignan, with the deſeat of two companies that kept it: and then to ſurprize Seruian, to force the garrifon of Caſouls, ſcale Villeneuve, neere vnto Beziers, and ſo to preſerue themſelues vntill the publication of the peace.

Beaucaire feared the like vſage to Limoux: they therefore obtaine two companies from Niſines. S. Veran a Beauuoisin, with Servus and Bouillargues led them; they aſſured the town and caſtle, ruine images and altars, and then retire, leauing a companie for the ſafetie of their companions. To incounter them, the Catholikes by twi-light bring in a great num- E ber of ſouldiers attired like peſants, and in the night open the gates to fiftene or ſixtene hundred men, who coming from Taraſcon, ſeparated onely by the Rhone, made their coming famous by bloud and ſpoile. The Protestants recouer the caſtle, and ſpeedily call backe Servus and Bouillargues, who returned to Niſines. They turne head: Servus enters into the Caſtle, and ſo deſcending into the towne, ſurprizeth his enemies, kills a great number and pardons ſuch as laying downe their armes craue mercy. Bouillargues coming from the reſcue of the bootie which they carried away, and wearie with killing them that fled, he like-wiſe enters into the towne, and puts all to the ſword that he incounters. Thus Beaucaire remained in the Protestants hands, vntill the Ediſt of peace.

The like feare troubled them of Montpellier. The proceedings at Tolouſa and other F places amazed them: they fortifie themſelues, raze the ſuburbs, in a manner as great as the towne, beate downe thirty Churches, and by theſe ruines, make themſelues able to ſuſtaine a ſeege which threatened them. The enemy diſcharged his choller vpon certaine ſhot lodging in an old towne ill flanked, a league from the towne, who hauing yeilded to haue their liues ſaued, were notwithstanding ſlaine as they came forth. The like chance fell vpon the Cap-

A Capitaine, and twentie ſouldiers that were in Maguelone, and deſeruedly, according to the diuine Juſtice, hauing trecherouſly fold the caſtle. At that time the Lords of Suze and Sommerie, the chiefe of the Catholikes army in Languedoc, had paſſed the Rosne, with about 3000. foot, foure hundred Maſters, and three Cannons, with an intent to beſeege S.
Giles, a ſmall towne vpon the Rhone. Beaudiné vpon this aduice, parts from Montpellier, he ſpeedily aſſembles ſixe hundred horſe, and eight hundred foot, vnder the command of Bouillargues, Albenas, and Grille: he is aduertised by ſome priſoners, of a diſorder in the enemies campe: he marcheth towards them, and chargeth preſently. Suze and Sommerie turn their backs, their Capitaines and ſouldiers are amazed, and run away: Bouillargues follows them that flie: not one makes reſiſtance. Grille falls out likewiſe, and both ioynly do kil, what B by the ſword, and water, 2000. men, and win all their baggage, being richly furniſhed, as to a certaine victorie, with two Cannons, (the Culuerin being ſunke in the riuer of Rhone) 22. enſignes, and the Colonels guidon. This victory makes them proud, and Grille contem-ning the aduice which was giuen him, ſuffered himſelfe within a few dayes after to be ſurprized, and taken at Arenasſes, to looſe an hundred or ſixe ſcore ſouldiers, his troupes to be put to flight towards Lunel, Mauguel, and Sommieres, and had it not bene for the ar-riall of Beaudiné, who freed him, he had remained a trophé to his enemy.

In the meane time, Joyeuze (ſeeing the plague to waſt his men daily) retires from the Campe before Montpellier: it was rather to free the inhabitants from iealouſie. Hee had C practiſed certaine intelligences within the towne, but the juſtice of God brought two of the chiefe Merchants to be a ſpectacle vpon a ſcaffold for other crimes: who hauing confeſſed the treaſon, euen as the ſword hung ouer their heads, ended *Joyeuze*s practiſes with their liues. His attempts vpon Agde were as fruitleſſe, and much more preiudiciall vnto him: for being repulſed by Sanglas from a ſcalado, and two ſundry aſſaults, Bouillargues cut off two hundred and ſeuenty of his men in his retreat, hauing diuided them into three bands. He drew three hundred Catholikes lodged within Aramon, into an ambuſcado, ſlue the moſt part of them, and ſoone after ſeized on S. Laurent in the Comtat, he chaſed fūe and thirty Italian Lanciers, three ſcore Argoletiers, and a company of foote. But the courſe of his proſperitie was ſomewhat ſtayed by the death of Rays, guidon of his companie, and D of Captain Aiſſe, who kept the tower of Carboniere ſeated in the mariſhes of Aiguemortes, and did wonderfully moleſt the ſaid towne, it being ſurprized in an ambuſcado, and they ſlain the 12. of November. The death of theſe men was recompenced with the ſlaugh-ter of foure ſcore, ſurprized and ſlaine by them of Montpellier, within Bourg, a ſmal towne vpon Rhone, beſides a great number, that were drowned, ſeeking to ſaue themſelues by the ſaid riuer. This happy ſucceſſe inuities them to new attempts. A company of the enemies lodged in Agnane, and ſpoyled the country about. Rapin Gouvernor of Montpellier, being followed by fūe hundred ſhot, and Gremians troupe of horſe, awaked them in the night, about Chriſtmas, ſurprized ſome aſleepe, others in their ſhirts, ſlue the greateſt number, and brought the reſt priſoners to Montpellier. The yeare ended with the taking of S. Paul and E Damiette, ſeparated by the riuer of Agout, beſeeged, battered, and within three dayes taken from the Protestants by Peirot ſonne to Montluc, with great ſlaughter. A Gaſcon Ca-pitaine hauing ſlaine a Prielt of purpoſe or otherwiſe, made them beleeue it was the Miniſter: within few daies after he went to Caſtres, where the Protestants had ſtill the better during theſe inciuill troubles. Let vs briefly looke into the Prouinces of Viualetz, Rouergue, Giuaudan and the Countie of Foix. In Aprill the Protestants of Nonnay become maſters of the towne, beginning preſently to beat downe images: they opened and publiſhly burnt the relike which they call of Holy vertues. Doubtleſſe, if man could iudge by the preſent what would after chauce, hee would reſtraine his paſſions. For the interchange of worldly things ſuffers moſt offences, at length to find a reuenge. The towne was vnturniſhed of F armes, and Sarras their Gouvernor (threatned with a ſeege) goes forth the 22. of October: the next morning he comes at the breake of day to S. Eſtienne in Foreſt (the aboun-dance of armes and harnieſſe, that is forged there, makes the towne famous) ſets fire to the gates, and takes and packes vp ſuch armes as hee needed. But O man! remember that thou ſhalt bee meaſured with the ſame meaſure wherewith thou haſt meaſured thy neighbour, and whileſt thou doeſt loyter, and linger behind with thy ſouldiers to ſearch houſes, 1562. for the goodliest armes, and the fairest women, thou giuest thine enemy leysure to prepare A &c. thee a portion full of bitterness. Saint Chamont sent by the Duke of Nemours (who then 63. made warre in Lionnois) encounters him, chargeth and takes him prisoner, hurts, and kills The first tak- about six-score men of his troupe: and from that time those of Nonnay lay open to many ing of Non- outrages. He gathers the commons together, beseegeth the towne, wanting both men, nay. armes, and a Commander: he enters, sheds as much blood as he pleaseth, spoiles it, fires it, and burnes two and twenty houses: then vpon a bruit of the Baron of Adretz approach with stronger and greater forces, hee dislodgeth without Trumpet, and seemes rather to fly then retire.

The second
taking.

About the end of the yeare, S. Martin, by the commandement of the Lord of Cruf- B sol, and the Cardinall of Chastillon, then Gouvernors of Guienne and Daulphiné, vnder the Prince of Condes authoritie, came to Nonnay, repaired the ruines, and provided for the defence thereof, leauing Captaine Prost, le Mas, and Mongrois there. S. Chamont flies thither with foure thousand men, but vnfit to force places well furnished, hee treates with the citizens, offers an honest composition, as well for themselves, as for their strangers.
They accept it, the strangers depart, and the same night S. Chamont causeth or suffereth his men to enter, who forgetting no kind of inhumanitie, murder some, others they cast from an high tower, some they burne in their houses, many they make to leape out at the windowes, beate them downe vpon the pavement, stab them in the streets, sell prisoners C by the Drum, and for want of buyers, they murder them in the place, and burne the houses for want of present money to redeeme them: there were six-score by this means burnt to ashes. And to fill vp the measure of this horrible confusion, wiues and maides were bar-barously rauished, corne and other things which could not be carried, was scattered about: the heads of wine-vessels beaten out, the walles for the most part beaten downe to the ground, the towers dis-mantled, and the gates carried away. Bonlieu a small towne neere vnto Nonnay, did accompany it in this lamentable desolation.

In Rouergue, Valsergues one of Montluc's Lieutenants, and Captaine of the garrison of Villefranche, hauing wonderfully oppressed the Protestants of that place, and the Nobili-tie of Rouergue, those of Villeneuve, Perrouffe, Froissac, Saignac, la Guepie, Espailon, S. Afrique, those of Bresseul, Compeyre, Millau, S. Felix, Cornus, and of Pont Camates, D resolved to defend themselves, and by their constant resolution, had made frustrate their enemies attempts, if two of their Captaines had not by their ouerthrow shaken their affaires. About thirty men led by Peigre, going out of Millau to refresh Compeyre, beseege by Vesin and others, were cut in peeces, their leader led to Toloufa, was at the instance of the Cardinall of Armagnac quartered aliue. And Saignac hauing failed in an enterprise he had vpon Villefranche, was inuested in the castle of Granes, where for want of water, he was forced to accept his life to bee saued, and theirs that followed him, being about a hundred souldiers: notwithstanding, all but six or seuen were put to the sword.

These tempests fell likewise vpon Giuaudan, those of Ceuennes entering into Quesac, burnt the Image of our Lady, and made a booty of two hundred and foure-score Markes of E silver, of the reliques and ornaments of the Church being molten. But this prosperity was like a fire of straw, wherein they often confound themselves in their ouerweening. Afterwards they campe before Mendes, and in the end of Iuly, they enter by composition, but they suffer one Copier to change his profession of a Minister to a captaine, to order the Treasure, and to dispose of matters of warre: who vnder this rash presumption, sends about six-score men to another enterprise, vnder the conduct of a Hosiier of Alby called La Cro- ix, as very a novice in matters of warre, as his pretended Colonel. Treillans the younger, sends part of his men, who surpriseth them in the field, and out of order, and kills the most part: and he with the rest of his troupe, rides directly to Mendes: he enters without any difficulty, carries away the Gouvernour, spoiles what he pleaseth, and leaues the rest F to the discretion of other bands, who laying hold vpon Copier, make him yeeld an account of his vsurped government: notwithstanding some troupes of his party rescued him within fewe dayes after, and brought him backe safe and sound with his companions. The Prouince of Giuaudan enioyed then some rest, when as the Barons of Goise and Saint Vidal, Treillans and others came to molest it. They make a troupe of two thousand men

A men in the beginning of October, to ioyne with Joyeuse at the seege of Montpellier: but the defeat of their men at Saint Giles, made them to change their desigine, and to attempt Floras. Eight men onely commanded by Boissy a valiant souldier of Montpellier, kept it.
The besiegers vse both batterrie, scalado, assault, mines, and parle, and get nothing but blowes. In the end a report flying of the coming of Beaudiné to succor the besieged, they raise their campe with confusion and disorder.

Marshall, a Castle belonging to the Seigneur of Peyre a Protestant, had another issue.
Coffart Gouvernour of Recoles, beseege it in the beginning of Februarie, and hauing taken it by treason, he kept his faith with the souldiers like vnto Granes, which then was used as a Prouerbe in the mouthes of Protestants. Peyre afterwards incountred Coffart, slue three-B score and ten of his men, and recovered his house. These confusions continued still euen after the publication of peace: for the Baron of la Fare hauing tryed by all meanes (saith the Originall) to haue a maide of excellent beauty at his pleasure, beseege Florac the fifth of Aprill. But Beaudiné making halt to succour it, preferred both the virgins chastitie, and the Citizens blood. The Lord of Pailles, Seneshall for the King of Nauarre in the Countie of Foix, sed the Protestants with words. The desolation of Toloufa made him to chaunge his copie. So the wolfe (according to the Fable) hauing sent away the dogs, doth then breake into the fold, and deuoures the sheepe at his pleasure. He aduise such as he feared among the Protestants (seeing they had bene charged with the beating downe of Images and Al-C tars) to retire themselves: else he should be forced to imprison them. This terrour chafeth many. Pailles entering into the towne, puts some in prison, and so terrifies others, as they were glad to leaue the towne. Of the prisoners, two were beheaded, two burnt, six hanged, six and twenty condemned to death, ten to the gallies, and the goods of them that were fled abandoned in prey to the souldiers: the other townes of the Countie terrified with his stra-tageme, accepted such conditions as Pailles would prescribe them.

Onely Pamiers resisted. The towne belonged to the Queene of Nauarre, and the number of the Protestants was great. Man hath man meanes to preferue himselfe from humane forces, but what harbour, what shelter can protect him from the wrath of heauen?
Men make warre one against another, and two parties seeke one anothers destruction: but D God with the same arme strikes both the one and the other, and it falls vpon whome hee pleaseth. The Catholikes of Pamiers seeke all meanes to oppress the Protestants, and the Protestants to crosse the practises of their enemies, when as a common scourge assures them both. The plague comes into the towne, and in few weekes takes away three thousand Citizens. But (a strange thing) of all this great number they did not account about fiftie Protestants: so as sub-isting in the midst of this mortalitie, and by this meanes protected from the iniuries of their enemies abroad, they succour their neighbors of Castres, kill the Vicont of Seres and his brother, with the greatest part of three hundred men which hee commanded, and so disperse the rest, as the way was open for them to recouer their houses: where discouering a practise made by some begging Friars, to bring in Pailles and others, E they made such a spoyle in their Couents, as neuer after were they more scene or heard of.
This bloudie stratageme amazed the Priests and Chanons. They saue themselves in the towne of Foix, where they spoyle their houses and the Bishops. As one mischiefe followes another, the peace beeing concluded, in the beginning of May, a furious haile continuing by fits for the space of 3. weekes about Foix, cuts the corne and all greene things, so as there was no hope of fruit. The commons mutine, accuse the Clergy, beeing fled, to be the mo-tiues of this tempest, and were readie to fall vpon them. They auoid this popular furie and retire to Maugency.

Let vs change our Climate, and turne into Gaule Lionnoyse. The last of Aprill the Protestants were ceazed of Lions at two of the clocke after mid-night, without any slaughter F but of two men. The Lord of Sault had the first government. Amongst many of the Princes faction which posted thither, the Baron of Adretz (a valiant man, but proud and cruell) soa-zed on the government. The Prince sent afterwards Poucenat and Changy: the first to command the horse, the last the foot. Here vpon the Baron of S. Vidal and other Auernacs advanced, with 3. or foure thousand men, to wast the countrey of Lionnois, whilest the Duke of Nemours assembled an army of Bourguignons, Auernacs, and Forefins for the seege 1562. of Lions. Poncnat with five hundred men goes to discover them, chargeth them at the first A &c. approach, makes such a slaughter, as by their route he overthrowes their desseigne, and pur-63. suing his victorie, neere vnto Feurs in Forest, hee encounters with some troupes of horse, which made against him: he chargeth them, puts them to flight, and presently forceth the towne of Feurs, where most of them that fled had saved themselves.

Des Adretz arriues, who hauing resisted the forces of Sommerme, Suze, Carres, Maugiron, and others, brought some places vnder his subiection, and amongst others Montbrison the chief of the Prouince. But there he blemished the reputation which he had gotten in Daul-phiné, and by his cruelty did violate the lawes of humanity, and made himselfe odious, the which plunged him in many miseries, as we shall see hereafter. One after-noon he tooke a delight to see many prisoners leape out of the high tower of Montbrison, amongst the B which there were some gentlemen of account. Soubize comes to Lions, being sent by the Prince of Condé, with the title of Lieutenant and Gouernor: and did so politickly handle the violent disposition of Adretz, as he perswaded him to returne into Daulphiné, where he did goodly exploits. But this decay of his authoritie did presently discontent the Baron: who on this first spleene layed the leuaine of a speedie reuolt.

On the other side, Tauannes approached with five thousand French, and three thousand Italians, led by the Earle of Anguelole, not with any intent to force the Towne, but to hinder the haruelt and the vintage. These Italians had many goates, so as in detestation of this C horrible medley, the peasants cast all their goates among the Carion where they passed. The Duke of Nemours arriues, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant generall, and for the first fruites of his armes, he receiues Vienna vpon Rhone by composition, for the fauour of the Catholikes: he kils few, and spoiles much. The taking of this towne shortened their victuals at Lions. Soubize, to haue meanes to keepe the field, calls back Adretz and the Prouençals.
 He brings foure or five thousand foot, and foure hundred horse. The Duke conceiuing an assured hope of victorie by the weaknesse of their horse, incounters them, puts them twice in route neere to Beaurepaire, but with small losse: and if the conduct and resolution of A- dretz, with the aduantage of the place had not fauoured him, he had then receiued a mate.
 Hauing speedily rallied his troupes, he incampes within two leagues off Vienna, holding D the Duke of Nemours occupied with continuall skirmishes, whilst that Soubize gathered in victuals from all parts. Herupon a pacquet comming from Orleanse to Soubize, fals into the hands of the Marshall of Brissac. Amongst other letters one from the Admirall contained: That he must endure the violence of the Baron of Adretz as much as he could, lest of an insolent man he should make him mad. This was a fit expedient to put the Baron into fu-ric. Brissac hauing presently sent S. Sernin to Nemours and Adretz, causeth them to enter into strange practises one with another. Soubize (who was alwaies vigilant both at home and abroad,) and had (as the Historie commends him) spent largely vpon spies, discovers presently their secret intelligences, causeth the Baron to be apprehended, and by the commandement of Crussol and the Cardinall of Chastillon sends him vnder sure guard to Nis-mes, whereas nothing but the benefit of a peace, which presently followed, preserved him E from the danger of death. Norwithstanding the Duke making his profit of the Barons practises, drawes neere to Lions, and by sundry skirmishes cuts off their victuals. But hee that vndertakes too much, speeds but ill. At one instant hee attempts both Romance and Valence. The whole bodie of his army was necessary for this desseigne: and whilst that hee seeks to deuoure all at once, he loseth all. He tries all his wits, and employes all his deuises to vanquish Lions, and vpon hope to be assisted by them of the towne that were of his faction, he attempts it by scalado in diuers parts, but all in vaine. He is ill serued both within and without, and so rudely entertained by Soubize, as he must now put on another personage.
 He helps himselfe with the newes of the battaile of Dreux, and proclaimes this victorie.
 But now he finds out a new practise, whereby he hopes to attaine his desire. F

Mark Herlin, Receiuer of the Impost at Lions had bene taken in skirmish in the moneth of Februarie 1563. To giue two strokes with one stone, to saue his life or his ranfome, and to mocke the Duke, he giues him to vnderstand, That he had meanes to do the King a notable seruice: that they had accustomed to employ him in the guard of the towne, and to trust him with many matters of weight: that if he will grant him libertie, hee will watch some

The siege of Lions.

The Baron of Adretz reuolts

A some conuenient time, to giue him entrance at Saint Insts gate, whereby he should bring in a sufficient number of men to make himselfe Lord of the towne. We easily belecue that which is plausible to our desires. The Duke accepts this offer: he frees Herlin, but as if hee had escaped of himselfe. Herlin comes to Lions: imparts it to Soubize, then returnes to Ne- mours, and appoints him the 7. of March following.

The eue before this pretended execution, Soubize plants his artillerie in the night, to scour the streets, lodgeth three or foure thousand shot in the bulwarkes, wals and houses of approach, and appoints Poncnat with his troupe of horte to follow them. The day being come Nemours approcheth: they giue him a signe from a small tower. Three thousand foot enter into the suburbs of Saint Insts; and from thence aduance vnto the gate, Herlin B goes to meet them and brings them in. But being entred by the wicket, he suddenly shuts it. The artillery playes, and two or three hundred muskets and all the other shot discharge vpon them: Blacons, Poyet, Andefroy, and Entragues pursue them with sixe hundred choise harguebuziers, who defeat them quite: and if the horsemen had made speed, scarce any one had carried newes of this stratageme to his companions. Foure hundred were slaine in the suburbs, many without, and a greater number ended their liues flying to the campe at Vienna and other places. This disgrace did so trouble the Duke, as he continued two moneths sicke in his bed, and in the meane time a peace was concluded.

The first ciuill tumult in Daulphiné, was at Romans. La Mothe-Gondrin, Lieutenant to the Duke of Guise in that Prouince, would haue beaten downe a house, whereas the Protestants had heard some Sermons. The Protestants troupe suddenly together: and if he had not retired himselfe, they had put him in danger of his life. The second happened at Valence but fatal to the author: the five and twentieth of Aprill was the day of the election of new Consuls and of Councillors at Valence. La Mothe meaning his pistoll should giue the first voice, and then to haue such named as he pleased, he sends some horse out of the towne, either to preuent that none should come to crosse his desseignes, or to cut such in peeces as should seeke to escape: he causeth the gates to be shut, enuirones the place of the assembly with armed men: he enters it with a fauchion in one hand, and his pistoll in the other, the which he discharge vpon a Secretarie of his whom he finds there. The Protestants doubting that Gondrin would begin, with them: a number of them retired into a house, and resolve to defend their liues.

But as they came to force them, they slip out at a backe doore, and recouer Saint Felix gate, where discovering Gondrins horse scouring the plaines, they couer themselves within the gate. These horsemen incounting no man, fall vpon some Country-men, that came to Valence, and kill some of them, whose bodies are brought to the towne vpon ladders: for with out-rage the people require iustice. The next day being Son day, the Protestants stirr not: they feared least by reason of others of their partie which came from all parts at the report of the former dayes worke, some new tumult should arise. Gondrin commends them, and with sweet words perswades them to go out of the towne for the exercise of their religion: that in doing so, they shall shew themselves obedient to the Edict. When they are abroad, they discover, or at the least imagine, that they seeke to surprize them: some runne to the gate, others enter the towne, and feaze vpon the other gates. Monday morning, the whole party armes, they beseege Gondrins house and fire it, who being retired into the next, he was slaine with sixe or seauen of his household seruants: his house sackt, and to appear the multitude, they hang his carcasse at a window towards the street. These are the effects which the insolencies of an armed multitude brings forth.

They proceed yet farther: the report of images beaten downe in many other Prouinces, transports them to the like insolencies: they chiose the Baron of Adretz, chiefe by prouision in Daulphiné, attending a confirmation, or some other certaine nomination by the Prince of Condé. The Baron (to make the entrance of his authority famous) sends boldly to the Parliament of Grenoble: that they should thrust out of the towne, the second president, the Attorney generall, the Aduocate of the towne, the fourth Consull, and some others, whom he termed seditious, and therefore he threatned to hang them. These men, without either commandement or compulsion, were glad by a voluntarie exile to auoid the Barons threats.

The Protestants thus freed, feaze vpon the gates of Grenoble the first of May, enter into

A stratageme
against the Duke of Nemours.

Daulphiné.

1562. the Friars, ouerthrow altars and images, plant the exercise of their religion: and for the A & suretie of the towne, bring in a company of foot sent by Adretz, who to encounter Mau-
 63. giron (that teamed himselfe the Kings Lieutenant generall in Daulphiné) came in the end to Grenoble with a troupe of horse and foote. Their first warre was against Images and re-likes, afterwards they cease vpon the castles of Bussiere and Mirebell, and burnt the great house of the Carthusians, three leagues from Grenoble. Whilest these sayle in full seas with a prosperous wind, behold others suffer a most pitifull ship-wracke. The massacre of Vassy, the Italian troupes of Fabrizio Serbellone, a Bolonois in Auignon, and those of Prouence ioyned with Fabrizio, terrified the Protestants of Auranges neere vnto Auignon, who to crosse the intelligences, which they said these troupes had in Auranges, protect them-B selves with sixe-hundred men. Moreouer, Fabrizio writes to Sommeriue: That seeing he hath an army readie, he should performe a great worke, to bring it speedily before Auranges, whither there resorted daily a great multitude of Huguenots. If they were not suppressed at their first beginning, not only Auignon should be annoyed, but also all Prouence receiue great harme. So Sommeriue and Suze march against Auranches, and at the first find a good meanes to ruine the towne. Parpaille President in the Parliament of Auranges, had bene taken at Bourg vpon Rhone returning from Lions, where he had bene to make prouision of armes, for whose rescue the troupes of Auranges, beeing of their neighbors townes runne to Bourg. Sommeriue and Suze fortified with many companies of Daulphiné and Auignon, beseege Auranges beeing without souldiers, they batter, make a breach, force it, and forget C no kind of cruelty that the Victors furie doth vsually inuent. All are put to sword without distinction of age, sexe, or qualitie: and by a newkind of death practised since in ciuill wars, they cast some downe vpon the souldiers halberds, they burne others, tyed to their hookes in Chimneys, they hang men, women, and children at their windowes, they shoote some with their harguebuzes, murder others in their mothers armes: and to finish this desolation, they sacke and burne the towne, castle, palace and Bishops house: fixe weekes after,
Parpaille at the instance of the Vicel-gat of Auignon lost his head.

Siege and destruction of Auranches.

But alas! this was (as they say) but to anger a hornet. The Baron of Adretz studies of nothing but reuenge. He runs, he cries out, he stormes, and full of indignation and threats beates Pierrelate, and forceth it in few houres; puts all that he finds armed to the sword, en-D ters in furie into the castle garded by three hundred souldiers of the troupes of Suze, some he kills, others he casts downe, not one escapes: with the like furie he takes the towne of Bourg. Pont S. Esprit brings him their keyes. He forceth Boulene a fronter of the Contat, puts the company of Captaine Barcelasse to the sword, and threatened Auignon: when as newes came that Maurigon was entred by intelligence into Grenoble, where he spoiles, kills, and drownes. He posts thither, assures himselfe of Romans by the way, reduceth S. Mar- celin to his deuotion, and puts three hundred of Maugirons men to the sword. Maugiron fearing the furie of this man, retires into Sauoy, and from thence into Bourgongne to Ta- uannes, leading with him all those of his faction: and the 26. of Iune Adretz re-enters into Gtenoble, settles things in their former estate, and then hee marcheth into Forest, as wee E haue seene.

Behold strange alterations: Suze and Fabrizio beheld the Barons actions beeing in safety: his passage into Forest, drawes them now to field. Mombrun makes head against them, and by the taking of Mornas, doth partly reuenge the spoiles of Auranges. Suze will haue his reuenge, and comes to beseege Boulene: but finding nothing but blowes to be gotten, hee goes and spoyle Vaureas, in the County of Venaissin: and thinking to enlarge his limits, he meetes with the Baron, who with a furie (without viewing or giuing him leysure to a-range his troupes) doth charge him, defeats him, cuts in peeces the most part of his foote, kills him, with many Gentlemen, and wins his artillerie: but he shall not keepe it long. Then extending his victorie, he vnder-takes the defence of Cisteron, threatened by Sommeriue, F forceth S. Laurent des Arbres, and Roquemaure a strong place: takes and burnes the castle of Pont Sorgues, kills all Fabrizio's Souldiers that kept it, and the next day surprizeth Fa- brizio himselfe, and chafeth him euē vnto the gates of Auignon.

As he continues his course along the riuier of Durance, and finds nothing to stay the violence of his victories, newes comes of the Prouençals arrivall at Gauillon. Hee wades through

A through the riuier the first of September, chargeth them at the first, kills the most part, and puts the rest to flight: But in steed of going directly to Cisteron, whether he had sent Mom- brun with five hundred men, and the Canon taken from Suze, (he had some pleene against Mauvans, captaine of Cisteron) he takes the longer way by the plaines: whereof followed the ouerthrow of Mombrun, the losse of his artillerie, and the taking of Cisteron, as wee shall see.

Adretz had left the counsellor Ponat for his Lieutenant at Grenoble: a man more capable of law then fit for armes. Herevpon Vinay takes an occasion to attempt against the towne. Saint Mauris and La Coche receiue him so roughly, as the death of three-score of B his best Spaniards and Italians, at the first skirmish, makes him to leaue Grenoble, to goe burne the peasants houses in the vale of Pragela. In the end, the course of the barons pro-sperities is stayed by the taking of Vienne, and of the castle of Pipet, and by the two seuerall ouerthrowes he had at Beau-repaire, whereof followed this change of sides, and the losse of the reputation and credit which he had gotten among his followers, as wee haue heard.
 These losses caused the siege of Grenoble, whereof Ponat (being called away by Adretz) had left the defence to La Coche. Sixe thousand men campe before it. But a goodly deseigne, and easie to be effected is often made frustrate by the discord of the Commanders.
 Many heads are the cause that Grenoble holds firme. They assaile it, but slowly: their victuals now growing short, after three weekes siege, pressed La Coche to capitulate, when as C captaine Furmeier, hauing assembled sixe or seuen hundred foote, and foure-score horse, passeth the riuier of Isere, surmounteth the straight of the Mountaine, forceth them that kept it, and aduanceth vnto the riuier of Drac nere to Grenoble. Meaning to ferry ouer, he sees the passage garded by three or foure hundred horse, with a great number of foote, and discouers an other troupe in ambush within the next wood, to charge him behind. He retires, and with a counterfet feare, makes shew to turne backe: the enemy pursues him, he turnes head against them, wades through the riuier of Drac, chargeth the first hee meetes, breakes them, and by the resolution of his passage, in the face of so many enemies, he amazeth all the troupe, scattereth and chafeth them with great slaughter: and this vnexpected arriuall, strikes such a terrour in the campe, as euery one abandons the trenches: euery man D flies, and staies not vntill they haue recovered the marches of Sauoy. Crusol had recoured Serignon and Auranges in bafe Daulphiné. La Coche surprised the Tower of Lemps, in the beginning of the yeere 1563. whilest those of Grenoble victualled their place, and prepared to indure a second siege. About the end of February, there comes against them eight thousand men, foote, and horse: two great Canons, and three field peeces: La Coche had to make head against them, besides the citizens, sixe hundred good souldiers, nine braue captaines, and some vpluntarie gentlemen, who hauing repulsed the assailants at the first as-fault, preferred, with the points of their swords, both the sacke of their city, and the bloud of their citizens.

The first siege of Grenoble.

Let vs passe into Prouence. The Earle of Tande was Gouverneur, and of his two sonnes: E Sommeriue (issued of the first wife) was Lieutenant for the King in his fathers absence. Ci- piere, being then very yong, borne of the second wife, and the Lord of Cordelet of the house of Salusses, sonne-in-law to the sayd Earle, were (as many others did vaunt in those daies) multitudes which did defend the protestants troupe. Sommeriue, a violent man and too blou-dy, did sodenly incense all Prouence against them: and being armed with force, hee made his gouernment famous by a horrible and generall execution of men dismembred, hanged, burned, cut in peeces being aliue, drawne through the streetes, cast downe head-long, stabbed, starued, and such like miseries. The Earle his father, abhorring this generall defolation, and not able by his authority to diuert his sonne from this wicked proceeding, gathers together what force he can: giues the command of the horse to Cipiere, and of the F foote to Cardet, who by their armes kept all the townes beyond the riuier of Durance (except Pertuis) vnder their command.

Prouence war betwixt the father and the sonne.

On the other side, Sommeriue, after the executions of Auranges before described, hauing taken muster of fifty ensignes of foote, and some cornets of horse, dies furiously to the siege of Cisteron, beeing full of many protestant families, that were retired thither, and manned with eleuen companies vnder the Lord of Beauieu, nephew to the Earle of Tande, and three

1562. three hundred men commanded by Farmen. The eleventh of Iuly, Sommerue giues three A 82. assaults, continued from three of the clocke in the after-noon vntill night. Most of the 63. month was spent in skirmishes: the prisoners on either side finding no mercy, nor grace of the souldiars. In the end, Sommerue (fearing some new checke by the hands of Adrez, who had lately wonne the battaile of Vourdas) hee went and intrenched himselfe three leagues from Cisteron. Cardet approacheth, but he cannot by any deuice draw his brother-in-law out of his trenches. So the Earle of Tande, distrest for victuals, raiseth his campe, puts some of his troups into Cisteron, and sends the rest to Adrez.

The second
 siege.

Mombrun defeated.

Sommerue doubles his courage and force, and the feuen and twenty of August, followed by a hundred and two enfeignes of foote, and many horse, besiegeth Cisteron a new, on B by three parts, and vpon an intelligence which was giuen him, that Mombrun approached to succour the besieged (as we haue before specified) Suze marcheth against him, chargeth Mombrun, kils about a hundred and fity of his men, puts the other in route, and winnes two peeces of Canon, which he had lately lost. This victory was to Sommerue a foretelling of good successe. The 14. of September hee ouerthrowes a hundred and forty paces of the wall: he planted two small peeces, to batter the friars. Three and thirty enfeignes of foot, supported by a troupe of horse, goe to the assault, and continue it with a wonderfull furie vntill feuen of the clocke at night: that powder sayling them on either side, they fall to stones, swords, and handy-blowes: the greater number preuailing, the besieged abandon the breach, retiring themselves with great losse, and des Adrez returned into Daulphiné. C Scnas, Moumans, and other Capaines, seeing themselves vnfurnished of munition, without hope of succors, charged with a multitude of men, not trained vp in warlike affaires, together with the enemies obstinate resolution, they pferre the safetie of their liues and persons before the place: and in the night recouer the streights, and deserts of the mountaine, and so come safe to Grenoble, from thence they were conducted to Lions, and there liued vntill the Edict of pacification. Sommerue at the breake of day, sends some troups after them: but the difficultie of the waies, and feare to loose their part of the spoyle, stayed the pourfuit. So the victors enter into this abandoned towne, and put to the sword about foure hundred women and children, without distinction of age or religion.

Sommerue is now master of Prouence, leauing in all places pittifull signes of a blou- D die victorie, whereof the originall notes (as principall instruments) Carrez, Mentin, Flas- fans, thrust forward especially by Bagaris, Chesne, Saint Marguerite, and others of the most seditious of the Court of Parliament of Aix, who with all impunitie gaue libertie to all thefts, spoyles, and murthers: so as after the Edict of pacification, the Kings priue Councell gaue Commission to the President of Morfan, and some Councillors of the Court of Parliament at Paris, to suppress such disorders: who by an exemplarie punishment of many, caused the following warres to bee managed with farre more moderation. But the quality of some, and the credit of others, saued many heads which were prepared to vomit vp, in open view, the blood which their hands had too prodigally spilt.

Bourgogne Dyion.

As for the Duchie of Bourgogne, Tauannes Lieutenant for the King in the duke of Aunais absence, loued siluer better then the blood of the protestants, and the parliament of Dijon hauing by vertue of letters obtained the first of March 1562. forbidden the exercise of their religion, Tauannes disarmes them, puts the chiefe in prison, forceth some to depart with threats, others he expels violently. The Maior and Sheriffs proceed farther: they thrust forth wiues, maidens, and children, commanding the peasants by proclamation the seuenth of Iuly, to set vpon the rebels and not to receiue, lodge, nor feed them that are expelled the townes: (a rigour which humanity neuer vsed to the most barbarous) they condemne them, as guilty of high treason that had carried armes, or assisted them with aide or counsell: and they giue liberty to kill them all with impunity, that should hereafter assemble in any other places, but in their ordinary Churches. This liberty caused many thefts and spoyles, at Aulsonne, Autun, and Beaune: yet the people are commended to haue contained themselves within the bounds of modestie. Chaalon vpon Saone, Mascon and refuge.
Mombrun command at Chaalon with fife hundred Harguebuziers: but being sodainely bele-

A beleagard by Tauannes, and finding not the towne furnished or defensible, by a dangerous, 1562.
 and (as the Originall saith) a detestable example, hee left it in prey to Tauannes, and retired 82. to Mascon.

Tauannes goes thither with all speed, and presents himselfe at the gates, hoping by kind 63. offers to perfwade the people to receiue him, but he findes no admittance. So he gathers The full siege together all his forces, and the third of Iune besiegeth the towne. His army consisted of Mascon. the most part of Bourguignons of the county, carrying openly red scarfes. The besieged countenance themselves with this pretext, and make their profit thereof, to auoide this present storme that threatned them. They giue the King to vnderstand; that it was not reasonable, they being his naturall subiects, and desiring to liue in peace, vnder the obedience of to the crowne, who is suspected of them for many other great reasons. This admonition preuailed some-what: for Tauannes straight-waies retired by the Kings commandement, but it was to prepare for a second siege.

Those of Lions sent Entragues to defend the siege. Tauannes makes his trenches, winnes The second the suburbs of Saint Laurence, and the fourth of Iuly, beates downe the defences, makes a siege. breach, and viewes it, but to their cost whom he sent. So (as if some important businesse had called him into Bourgogne) he raiseth his campe, and making his account that the besieged would follow him, he laies a strong ambush: but Entragues had no men to loose.
 C Mascon freed from this second siege, behold Belleuille is assailed. Saint Poinct with other gentlemen of Daulphiné came from the spoyling of some boates laden with the value of forty thousand frankes in reliques of gold and siluer, which two Sheriffes of Mascon had sent of their owne authority to Lions, to be conuerted to their priuate vses. So the robbers are often robbed. This booty puts them in hope of an other. The 28. of Iuly, hee comes with two hundred horse, six or feuen hundred souldiars, and the common people thereabouts, to beleagar this little towne: but the night before, two companies parting from Mas-con, were entred into it, by whom the assailants being repulst with losse, turned their reuenge vpon their neighbours cartails. The retreat of Saint Poinct, made Entragues seeke to extend the limits of his iurisdiction. He besiegeth the castle of Pierrecloux, forceth Mombrun D de, and fife and twenty souldiars which he commanded there, to yeeld at discretion: and causeth them to be lead prisoners to Mascon: but this was to feed the Fox, who in the end shall eate his pullaine.

During these broyles, Poncenat comes to Mascon, with Suiffes and French, drawes forth the chiefe forces, besiegeth Tournon, and becomes maister thereof. But what can the fury of inciuill armes forbear? Clugny forced with the same rage, sees that exquisite and famous Library defaced: a most precious treasure, which made that Abbay to bee greatly esteemed amongst others of France. Tauannes, aduertised that Mascon was vnfurnished, and that Entragues, to please Poncenat, followed his enfeignes, parts from Chaalons with foure E corners of horse, and eight hundred foote, being assured of a practise which he had within the towne, whilst that his enemies, transported with their priuate affections, employed their forces else-where. The seuenteenth of August, many waines drawne with Oxen, enter by his meanes that kept the keies of one gate, beeing of the intelligence: they passe the first and the second gate: at the third, the first carter ouerthrowes his waime willingly, and by this policy staies the rest. Twenty men coucht vpon their bellies behind a wall in a garden nere adioyning, to the gate, runne thether: they kill some, bring in their men, overthrow a Court of gard, and become maisters of the towne: the souldiars of Pierrecloux are freed from prison, and cut off heads, armes and legges of the protestants: they cast many into the river, spoile their houses, and ranfome the wealthiest. Thus Bourgogne returns to the Catholikes deuotion, and Saint Poinct had the gouernment of Mascon, a violent and F bloody man, who often-times glutted his eies, after his meate, with the mournfull spectacle of such as he caused to be cast into the riuer.

These confusions did pittifully afflict all the Prouinces of this realme: when on the other side, the heads of both parties, being prisoners, did sollicit the conclusion of peace. The Admirall, by ample letters to the Queene, purged himselfe of the accusation laid against him, touching the death of the duke of Guise: whereof Peltrot himselfe, in the midst of his most

1563. most sensible torments at his execution, freed him. And the Queene-mother (leaving this A thorne in the Admirals foote, that she might raigne among these combustions of the houses of Guise and Chastillon) did cunningly giue two stroakes with one stone: for she made the prince of Condé beleue, that the restraints propounded vpon the Edict of January, tended only to content the Catholikes in some sort, and to open the way for the protestants to haue greater liberty. She pleased the young duke of Guise with the execution of Poltro, and his aduancement to his fathers offices: and the Constable, by the moderation of the Edict: for he had protested neuer to yeeld to the Edict of January. So the iudicious reader may see, by the course of the history, which party did first breake it. But that which did most import Catherine in disarming her enemies, she entertained a discord betwixt two mighty families, whereby she maintained her authority.

The chiefe Articles of the peace.

In the end, a peace concluded the thirteenth of March, gaue liberty of religion to Noblemen, hauing all manner of Iustice for them, their families and subiects. To other Gentlemen that had inferiour iurisdiction, for them and their families, with permission of the Lords of whom they held. In all Bailiwikes and iurisdiccions depending on the parliaments a place appointed for their assemblies, at the election of the Prouince: besides all other places where the exercise had bene since the seventh of March. The Vicountie of Paris onesly excepted. Every one restored to his former possession of goods, honours and offices. A generall abolition of all things past for matter of armes. All offences (except robbing) pardoned, and a defence to iniury one another, either for warre or religion. This treatie did please and displease many. It reioyced such as made an account, that this sweet and pleasant name of peace should make an end of all their calamities, and restore euery man to his former estate. It greeued such, as (of three mighty enemies, seeing two preuented by death, and the third a prisoner) thought that the gouernment of the State was lawfully fallen to the prince of Condé, who by consequence did derogate from his authority, subscribing to so weak and easie conditions of peace, fore-seeing also, that the secret oppositions of the parliaments, and the violences of the most mutinous (who being armed slue daily some of their men with all impunity) would in few yeeres giue cause of new confusions.

Newhaun courted.

So by this peace, the Germaines were sent home. Elizabeth Queene of England held Newhaun, wherof the Prince had put her in possession, as a pawne and security for the money, wherewith she had assisted his party. To make a breach betwixt her, and the protestants, the English must bee chased away by them that had called them in. The King goes thither in person: they likewise vrge the prince to goe with most of his party, and desire them to make the point. The place is strong, both by nature and art: but the fresh-water being cut off, and the plague hauing wasted about three thousand men, the Earle of Warwike entred into Capitulation the 28. of Iuly, and the next day yeelded the place to the King. One of the chiefe motives, that induced the prince to yeeld so easily to these conditions of peace, was the Lieutenantcy Generall, which he expected by the King of Navarres death, and the Queene-mothers goodly promises. But to confirme her Regencie, she puts the prince from all his hopes. She causeth the King to be declared of full age, being yet but foureene yeeres old: carries his Maiesty to the parliament at Rouan, makes him protest, That hee will not hereafter endure the disobedience that hath bene used against him since the beginning these troubles: that his pleasure was to haue the Edict of pacification duly obserued, threatening such as should oppose or make any leagues. And afterwards, by an admonition made in writing, by the parliament of Paris, touching the Edict of his maiorty, confirming that of pacification, the Queene-mother causeth her sonne to name her officer and president of his affaires: and for an answer to the Court, according to the instructions of his mother: I doe not meane (said hee) you should deale in any other thing, but with the administration of good and speedy iustice to my subiects. Vnderstand hereafter, that you are not confirmed in your offices by me, to bee my tutors, nor Protectors of my realme, nor Gouernours of my city of Paris, as hitherto you haue perswaded your selues.

The King being returned to Paris, the duke of Guises widow, his children, and kinsfolke, came solemnly, and demanded iustice, of the murder committed on the person of the deceased, taxing the Admirall, as the chiefe author thereof. But it was not yet time to suffer these

A these two houses to encounter. That of Guise might receiue as much, or more losse then the other, and Catherine pretended, to make her profit of the first. To auoide this brunt, she causeth the King, to command them to surecase this quarrel, and appoints them another time to aduise thereon. In the meane time, she honours them with the chiefe charges, and giues them all access and countenance nere his person. The rest of the yeere was spent in the confirmation of many Edicts, touching Ecclesiastical and ciuill causes, and then was the iurisdiction of Iudges and Consuls among the marchants erected, and the notaries of consignment established.

A generall Council as Trent.

As these things passed in France, the prelates assembled at the counsell of Trent: provided for the support and maintenance of the Catholike religion, namely in this estate. The Cardinal of Lorraine (a man greatly practised in the affaires of the realme) doth all hee can to root out the protestants. To that end, they find this expedient, that the Kings of France, and Spaine should make a strict league, and he of Spaine should giue the French such forces as were requisite for the execution thereof, and in the meane time, they should seeke all meanes to abolish the Edict which allowed the exercise of the pretended reformed religion: that this treaty made for the preseruauion of the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish religion, should be called, The holy League. The Cardinal promisseth to imploy all his indeuours and meanes to this effect, and assures the assembly of the willignesse, and good affection of the Queene-mother, and the Lords of the Councell. The chiefe of this league were the Pope, the Kings of France, and Spaine, the princes of Italy, the common-weale of Venice, and the duke of Sauoy. Of the Emperour, and the house of Austria they speake diuersly.

So from the beginning of February, they labour to produce some effects. Their Ambassadors come to Fontainbleau, demanded the obseruation of the decrees of the council throughout all France, wherof the reading should bee the 25. day of March at Nancy, in the presence of the Ambassadors of all Catholike princes, assembled to make a generall League against those estates that were false from the obedience of the Romish Church. They require also, that in fauour of the Clergy, the King should cause the alienation of Ecclesiastical goods to cease, as against the law of God, and preiudiciall to his Maiesty and the Realme. That the Edict of pacification should be disannulled, and heretikes rooted out, namely such as had bene partakers of the duke of Guises murder. Behold new fire-brands to cast this monarchy into the flames of a second ciuill warre. But the fires of the first did yet smooke. And things not being so soone prepared to enter into new home-bred combustions, the King answeres: That hee hath granted the Edict, to free the Realme from strangers: and that he hopes henceforth to maintaine his subiects in peace, according to the institution of the Church.

The Edict of peace ill obserued.

In the meane time, such as were worst affected to the publike peace, attempted many things contrary to the Edict. The Commissioners sent for the obseruation thereof, had small credit in many places. The Estates of some prouinces said plainly, that they could no more endure two religions, then two sunnes: the execution thereof had small or no effect, in places where it was proclaimed: the Magistrates delaied to appoint the protestants places for their exercises, and by their slacknesse caused many to seeke their dwelling elswhere, to liue in quiet and safety. The complaints and discontents which sounded in the Kings eares from all parts, gaue Catherine (vnder colour to lead the King in progresse through the Prouinces of his Realme, and by his presence to end many controuersies, which euen then seemed to threaten him with some eminent confusions) a goodly pretext of conference with the King of Spaine.

The voyage of Bayonne.

Charles begins his voyage by Champagne, and through Bourgongne comes to Lions, forbidding the protestants the exercise of their religion following the Court, yea euen in the townes that were assigned them for their assemblies, whilst his Maiesty should bee resident there. The protestants were here in great numbers, and might well fortifie themselves againe at need. To take from them all meanes, they build a Cittadell, and the King stirs not before it be in defence. By the example hereof many other townes receiued the like restraint, whilst on the other side, they dismantled Orleance, Montauban, and some others. The Edict of peace is greatly impugned by another made at Roussillon. The King

1564

King forbids all Iustices to allow the exercise of the pretended reformed religion, but in places specified by the Edict. For the first time, he banished such ministers as had exercised their charge, in places not comprehended in the Edict: and for the second time, punished them with death. He commanded all priests, religious men, and Nuns that were married, to make separation, and returne to their couents: if not, to depart the realme, forbidding the protestants all their Sinods, as making Monopoles vnder that pretext, and stirring vp the greatest part of the Realme to rebellion.

Murder of Circuent.

From words they fall to deeds. Those of Creuan in Bourgogne murder many assembled for their exercise, with all impunity. And the Kings absence from those places where they were accustomed to see him, caused many seditions, and mutinies: amongst the which B La Curée, Gouvernour of Vendosme, a protestant by profession, was murdered, by the command of Chauigni, Lieutenant to the duke of Montpensier, as he sought to suppress some, who vnder fauour of the troubles, had purposedly murdered many men, women and children, in the country of Maine, and places thereabouts.

O. Tours.

As this infolency increased, a Licentious rage transporting them of Tours, to fall vpon the protestants of their towne, comming from their exercise, they murder some, hurt others, and with the same rage, bringing their weapons bloody into the towne, they kill, drowne, and spoyle, without distinction of age, sexe, or quality. The Marshall of Villeuile was sent to suppress this mischief, before it spread farther. He was ready to carry himselfe therein according to the tenure of his charge: but Chauigni opposing by open force, caused all this premeditated punishment to turne into smoake, as if the examination thereof should discontent both great and small, and make things tend to new troubles. In the end, at the importunate sute of the protestants, who complained of these horrible infolencies, and that they were forced in all places to furnish holy bread at the parish masses, to hang tapistry before their lodging on Corpus Christi day, to contribute to brotherhoods, and such other things: and at their instant sute, not to bee forced in their consciences against the conditions of the Edict, the King staying in Daulphiné, commands all gouernours of Prouinces by his letters, to entertaine and to cause the Edict of pacification to bee duely obserued, and to haue a care that no mutinies should grow within their gouernments.

Proces against the Iesuits.

This voyage of Bayonne is famous, by that notable sute of those which with a presumptuous and partiall title, termed themselves of the Society of Iesus, decided in the Court of parliament, Stephen Pasquier pleading against them, for the Vniuersity of Paris: a vehement and most graue Aduocate of so rare a cause, and maister Peter Verris for their company: their pleadings are read, and their beginnings, and first entry into France, their advancement, and all that concerns their sex, is so learnedly expressed in an Epistle of the fourth booke of the sayd Pasquier, and in his pleading, as it is needlesse to insert them.

This new yeere bred new troubles at Paris, and was likely to haue stretched farre. The Cardinall of Lorraine comming from the councill of Trente, accompanied with his Nephew, and a number of men with Hargubuzes, contrary to the Edict, and followed at hand, E by the duke of Aumale his brother, went to Paris. The conclusions of the councill, and this carrying of armes, did much disquiet the protestants. It is giuen out, that their meaning is to offer them violence: they flie to the Marshall of Montmorency as gouernour of the Isle of France, a wife man, and louing the publike peace. He intreats the Cardinall not to enter in this manner. This request neglected, he resolues to vse his authority. The Cardinall growes obstinate, and offers to enter with all his force. But the Marshall (as the Kings Lieutenant) opposeth himselfe, being followed by the prince of Portien, and about forty gentlemen of account. The Cardinall growes amazed, saues himselfe with his nephew in the next houses: and after some daies of stay at Paris, he goes into Champaigne to attend the Kings returne from Bayonne. Hererfter there is nothing but associations, leagues, and conferences. They must be reuenged of this affront. But they finde too strong a party: for the two houses of Montmorency and Chastillon (most straightly allied by consanguinity) doe likewise vnire their wils in this defence. The Marshall assisted by his cousin, contains the Parisiens in peace, and makes the parliament and the Kings councill to approue this act. The Queene-mother (feare least this mutiny should hinder the

A the effects of the voyage of Bayonne, and by that meanes the fulfilling of her desires would bee made frustrate) makes the King to command by his letters-patents, such as were not yet entred into Paris, not to approach any neerer, and to such as were there, to depart vntill that his Maiesty had ended this quarrell, after his returne out of Gascony.

Now the Court was full of complaints. The protestants accused the Catholikes of violence and breach of the Edict. To content them, the Queene assigns them deputies at Tolouza: but they returne without any other satisfaction, but a discouery that they meant no good vnto them. There it was concluded, that all princes and others, of what quality soeuer, (whereof many were very farre engaged by their promise in a certaine league made in B France without the Kings priuety) should renounce all confederations, both within and without the realme, and should bind themselves by oth to the King onely vpon paine of rebellion. This was the aduice of Montluc. But the difficultie was to drawe the articles, for to make a soueraigne Prince to enter into association and company with his subiects. Was it not by a pernicious consequence to blemish his royall authority, and ouerthrow that which should serue as a fundamentall law, for the quiet of the realme and the obseruation of the Edict?

league.

In the end, the King hauing visited all Aquitaine, he arriues at Bayonne in Iune, and thither comes his sister Elizabeth, wife to King Philip of Spaine, to meeete with him, accompanied with the duke of Alua and others, to the end (said she) that the matter should bee lesse suspected, and that their league might take sure hold. But the most cleare-sighted did attribute it to ambition, least the Spaniard should seeme to vse any submission. How soeuer it were, the holy league was confirmed betwixt the two Kings, by Elizabeth means: For the establishing of the ancient religion, and extirpation of the new. And for that this Doctrine did extreemly afflict France, the Spaniard did promise the French such aide and succours as he could, and the French to the Spaniard (for that he did see his estate of the Low-countries to hatch a great confusion, which the following ages did bring forth) the like assistance: according to his power: but both doe promise ioyntly; to maintaine by all means the dignitie of the Catholike religion, to cut off (as much as in them lay) all lets, and speedily to seeke all occasions profitable for this designe, beginning first with the heads.

This businesse was not so secretly managed, but the Prince of Condé, the Admirall, and other Noblemen of that party had intelligence. They stand vpon their gards, aduertise their men, and for this time preuent surprises. The end of the yeere brought the King home, much satisfied with the ioyfull entertainment his subiects had made him, plunging himselfe, with his young brethren, in masks and delights, whilest the Queene his Mother, with her Councillors, gouerned France at their pleasure, and laid plots, which shall soone breed as dangerous stormes as the former. Whilest our Christian princes study by their enter-view and league, to kindle horrible combustions in their estates, they E giue the Turkish army the better meanes to land in the Isle of Malta, to besiege and take the fort of Saint Elme, lately built by the pryor of Capoua, and by this victory to make the siege of Malta more easie. Let vs obserue three notable things, before wee conclude the yeere. The first was that braue attempt of Peirot, the eldest sonne of Montluc, who weary to liue idle, rigged out some shippes, with a good number of Gentlemen, Souldiars and Mariniers, to make a voyage into Affrica: hee tooke and sackt the Isle of Madera, but with the losse of his life, leauing his troupe excluded from all returne into France, by the pursute the King of Portugall made, demanding satisfaction of the outrages done to his subiects. The Earle of Sanzay was sent to pacifie him: and euen then was treated (but without any effect,) the marriage of Marguerite, Sister to Charles, F with the sayd King. The second was the death of Ferdinand the Emperour and King of Hongarie, deceased in September, leauing his Sonne Maximilian for his successor. The third was that of Pius the fourth, in whose place was chosen to the pontificall chaire, Michele Gifelco a Iacobin, Cardinall of Alexandria, and tooke vpon him the name of Pius the fifth.

The first fruites of this yeere were very commendable, and if they had giuen hope of 1565. of the like proceeding, the haruest had beene very happy: but such as trust not but vpon A good cautions, take not all kinds of money for payment, growing very suspicions, by reason of the conclusions taken in this voiage. To make it more glorious and lesse suspect, the King calls an assemblie at Moulins, of the greatest peronages of his Realme, as well for the government of Iustice, as for other causes concerning the good and quiet of the State, whereof followed that great volume of statutes, of the which they rightly say: That they were as iust and holie, as ill obserued. Those of the houses of Guise and Chastillon were called. The quarrell of Paris inuited the Marshall of Montmorency, and the Admirall hauing purged himselfe by oth of the crime whereof they pretended him to be principall motive (the King had already pronounced him innocent by his letters parrents) the King, the Queene-mother, the duke of Aniou, brother to the King, the Cardinals of Bourbon, B the Lorraine and Guise, the Constable, the Marshalls of Bourdillon and Vielle-ville, the bishops of Valence, Orlence and Limoges; Thou and Segnier first and second presidents of Paris, Dafis the first of Tolousa, Lageberston of Bourdeaux, Truchon of Grenoble, le Feurs of Dijon, Fourneau the second president of Prouence, and many other Noblemen assembled to that effect: besides the aboue-named Statutes, made the reconciliation betwixt the two houses, whereof followed imbracings, protestations and promises not to attempt any thing whatsoeuer one against another. But the issue will verifie the saying: that there is no trust in a reconciled enemy.

A Parliament
at Moulins.

In the meane time the resolutions of Bayonne appeared manifestly, the moderations C they made of the Edict, the insolencies they committed in many places with all impunity, the threats they gaue the protestants amazed them on all sides. The Prince and Admirall were vigilant, obseruing the countenances of their enemies. The reparations of Spaine against the Low-countries, made them to foresee that this enterprise would in like sort pre-iudice their partisans in France. The prince of Roche-sur-Yon had before his death discouered many particulars: they complained, that aboue three thousand persons had perished of violent deaths, since the Edict, without any Iustice, and their complaints had no other fatisfaction, but goodly words and gracious letters. To conclude, the winds (said they) which did blow at Bayonne, must needs cause a strange tempest.

Causes of the protestants
discontents.

So the causes of their discontent some were manifest, others secret, and consisted in the D disfianteling of some townes, to take from them the meanes, in the building of Cittadells in some places of their exercise: in the ordinary murdering of their men, in the mas-sacring of men of account without punishment, in the ordinary threats: That shortlie they should not lift their heads so high: but especially in the leauie of sixe thousand Suisses made vnder a fained pretence, to gard the frontier against the comming of Don Fernand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua (who marched against the protestants of the Low-country with a mightie army) whom notwithstanding they caused to enter farre into the Realme, and by some letters intercepted, beeing sent from Rome and Spaine, they had discouered many practises made for their ruine. And the intelligences they had from one in Court well affected (yet secretly) to their party, that it was decreed in a secret Coun- E cell to seize vpon the prince and admirall, to put the one to death, and keepe the other prisoner, at the same instant to bring two thousand Suisses into Paris, two thousand into Orlence, and the rest into Poitiers: and then by the abolishing of the last Edict, to establish one quite contrary. All these considerations made the chiefe heads resolute to stand vpon their defence, and to obserue foure things in this new taking of armes. To seize on few townes but of importance. To bring a gallant army to field. To cut the Suisses in pec-ces, by whose fauour the Catholikes should bee alwaies maisters of the field: and to chase the Cardinal of Lorraine from Court if they might, as the chiefe fire-brand of the consuli-ons which would consume the whole estate. Man purposeth, and God disposeth: and of many resolutions few haue their desired end. The pleasure of God often disappointeth the F designes of them which are most practised in knowledge, valor, discours and wisdom: and some enterprises little or not at all premeditated, doe often fall out very successfully. For the execution of the first point, diuers considerations had made them to name three townes, Lions, Tolousa and Troyes.

But a great desaigne, imparted after the French manner to many meane persons, and vncapa-

A vncapable of such actions, turne them easily into smoake. Not one of them that vndertooke the charge could effect it. For the second, the protestants being first armed, were in the beginning masters of the field, but within sixe weekes the Catholikes forced the prince and the admirall to flie to the Germans, which the duke John Casimer brought them, as we shall see. Their proiect against the Suisses was likewise discouered, and the forces which should haue met at an appointed day, failed in their expedition. The fourth succeeded, but it imported least of all: but this separation was but in shew, and not in authority, nor credit.

The King is much incensed against them. He was at Meaux, and prepared to solemnize the feast of Saint Michel, according to the custome of the French Kings. The prince ap-procheth with five hundred horse, and by this attempt forceth the King to retire with some amazement to Paris, in the midst of six thousand Suisses, and a good number of horse, the which had beene in danger, if a hundred and fifty horse comming out of Picardy, and the Harguebuziers on horse backe which attended the prince, had arriued betwixt Paris and Meaux, at the day appointed. At the same time the protestants parry arme on all sides: and this generall taking of armes vlooked for, with that bold enterprise vpon the Suisses, and the taking of Orlence, Soissons, Auxerre and some other places, had wonderfully amazed the Catholikes. But that which augmented this alarum, the prince being too weake, loath to ingage himselfe in this Forrest of halberds, pikes and shot, went to lodge with his troupes in Saint Denis, where some others arriuing, in few daies made vp the number of two thou-C sand horse, and foure thousand shot.

The retreat of Meaux.

The King assembles his troupes, and had already ten thousand men. But this sodaine ap-proch to Paris might perswade them, that the prince expected speedy and great forces, and that he had good intelligences in Court and at Paris. Paris was the chiefe obiect of his armes. The Parisiens were not accustomed to fast: taking their victuals from them, he hoped of two things to effect the one, either to force them to fight, or to draw his enemies to a more assured pacification then the first. To this end he sends d'Anaclos with five hundred horse, towards Poissy and Pontoise, to seize vpon the passages of Seine beneath Paris: and other troupes to seize vpon such places as were about the towne. Some companies were sent to ioyne with the forces that came out of Guienne, who shold come to Orlence, being D lately surprisid by la Nuec. He and the Admirall with about eight hundred horse, and twelue hundred harguebuziers keepe Saint Denis, and intrench Saint Owin and Auberville, to coure Paris on that side.

The beginning of the second troubles.

But how could so many excellent captaines undertake so painefull and vnlkely a deseigne? May an Ante assaile an Elephant? How many mighty armies haue in former times lost their labours, thinking to effect such an enterprise? To remaine idle, had impayred their reputation. They were sodenly drawne into it, and they must for their honours sake attempt that which occasion seemed to present vnto them. Their men being fresh and full of resolution, made difficult things easie. One thing only staied the course of their successe.
Such places as the prince hoped to surprisid vpon Marne and Seine (whether if he should be E forced to abandon Saint Denis, he meant to retire himselfe and attend his Germans) there were two onely seized on, Laigny and Montereau. On the other side, the Constable, Lieutenant generall for the King in this army, resolu'd (hauing increased his troupes) to force the enemy to fight. The great aduantages he had, inuited him vnto it. He had fiftene or sixteene thousand foot, and two thousand Lances: he was furnished with artillery: he had a commodious place for a battaile, and fit to lodge his troupes and canon. The Parisiens were prest by famine, and were much greued to see such tenants in their farmes. And many cried already against the Constable, as a great temporiser, and as firme a partizan to his Nephewes, as to the King his master.

They were to blame: for he was no sooner aduertised of the errour the prince had committed in dissembling the body of his army, as we haue heard, but hee presently imbraceth the occasion, sends seuen or eight hundred launces, followed with some shot for their retreat, to discouer the certainty of the protestants forces: and the next day, the 10. of No-uember, he goes to field, with all his army, and giues him battaile. The Constables footmen, for the most, did little good, and the princes very much. The horse-men on either side shewed great resolution and courage. In the end the protestants are forced from the place, and

and followed aboute halfe a quarter of a league, and it may bee, but for the Constables hurt A (whereof he died within few daies after) they had bene chased more hotly: but the night fauored their retreat, and parted the battails. To conclude, the Catholikes were masters of the field, and had the spoile of the dead: and by consequence the honour of the bataille, the which shalbe blemished the next day with a great disgrace.

This aduantage seemed to inuite the Catholikes to perfect their victory the next day: but the losse of the Constable kept them within their walles. The prince attended a second charge, not thinking his enemies would haue taken it for a repulse: he therefore sends speedily for d'Andelot, who comes to Saint Denis at mid-night, sory to haue lost his part of the banker. Hauing rested a while, the Commanders conclude, to make an attempt to abate B some of their aduersaries glory, gotten the day before. They bring their small army to field, present themselves before the suburbs of Paris: stand there some houres in bataille and burnt a village and many wind-mills, to vrge them. But no man comes forth. They bury their dead, dresse their hurt men. The captaines view their cornets and companies, and will hazard no more. What should the prince then doe, being incamped before Paris with a few men? The losse of one man did import him more then a hundred of his enemies: and to stay there, were his ruine. He dislodgeth, marcheth to Montereau, and there augments his army with the forces that came to him from Orleance and Estampes.

The Princes retreat.

The death of this incomparable old man (but fatte more happy in his age, if he had shed his blood against the stranger, enemies to this crowne, the which hee had so freely employed, during all the course of his life, and not against his country-men, yea against his owne blood) gaue the command of the royall army to Henry duke of Aniou the Kings brother, a prince of sixteene yeeres of age, vpon whose head wee shall see the crowne after his brothers decease. Hee fought the opportunity to fight: his elder captaines prest him forward, taking the princes retreat for a kinde of flight, and grounding their aduantage vpon the great forces newly arriued of twelue hundred horse and two thousand foote led by the Cont Aremberg, one of the famous captaines of the Low-countries. Moreouer if the protestants did ioyne with their Reistres, the warre was like to continue long, or else to make the chance of a bataille doubtfull. But they dissuaded him weighing the importance of their generall, and the constant resolution of the contrary party: who (sayd they) had then no other counsellor but despaire, and no other wealth or riches, but their armes and horses.

To withstand the leauy of the protestants Reistres, the duke of Aumale was sent into Lorraine, to receiue the forces which were brought to the King, by duke John William of Saxony, the Marquis of Bade and other Commanders; and yong Lansac, into Germany, to diuert those of duke John Casimir which were leuiued in the princes fauor. The prince had ioyned with the troupes of Guienne and Poictou, consisting of eight cornets of horse, and three regiments of foote, vnder six and twenty ensignes: and aduancing towards Lorraine, he forceth Bray and Nogent vpon Seine to open their gates, and to giue him passage, and seizeth on Esparnay vpon Marne, where he assembles the body of his army.

A speech of peace,

The truce
broken.

Experience teacheth vs now, that all policies and deuises are allowed in warre. To coole the heat of such as fie to the aide of strangers, to stay them, and (it may be) to surprise them. Vnder this pretext, they begin to speake of a peace, in the which the chiefe of their party are imploied: and the better to conferre (said they) of the points propounded, they agree vpon two suspensions of armes, either being of three daies. But whilest the prince thought to enioy the benefit thereof, hee had almost fallen into a pitfall. The duke of Aniou approched, and the prince remained neere vnto Chaalons, in a bad lodging far from his troupes, and had it not bene for the route of the captaines, Blois, Blosset and Clerg, defeated by the Earle of Brissac during the truce, the prince himselfe had bene in apparent danger.

Misfortune is good for some thing. This furie of Brissac teacheth the prince not to trust his enemy, but vpon good assurance. And notwithstanding the iniuries of the ayre and the difficulties of the waies, leauing the duke twenty great leagues behinde, hee makes him to loose all desire to follow him, and goes on into Lorraine, to learne some newes of his Reistres, the which hee receiued at Pont a Mousson. From hence duke John Casimir, the brother of Frederic Cont Palatin of Rhine, Elector of the sacred Empire, being chiefe of

A of this army, protests by writing vnto the King before he enters into France, That he comes not for any profit of his owne, or priuate respect: but only to assist those who afflicted for the same religion, had required his helpe. That if it please his Maiesty to assure them liberty of conscience, and free exercise of their religion, he is ready to retire himselfe. 1568.

Herevpon they renew the treatie of peace pretended the yeere before. The Queene-mother comes to Bois-de Vincennes, accompanied with the Cardmalls of Bourbon, Lorraine and Guise. For the prince there came the Cardinal of Chastillon. Hee lets her vnderstand: that to settle a peace in France, the King must receiue all his subiects into grace, impart his fauors and the offices of the realme indifferently vnto them, and giue them conuenient liberty of their religion. Catherine answers, that such matches are not to be allowed: that the prince and those of his party should before all things countermand their Reistres, lay down armes, and come and yeeld the King a reason of the enterprise of Meaux. The Cardinall replies, that they onely defend themselves, that they oppose these succours to all sorts of strangers called in by the Catholikes, and cannot send them backe, but they must presently subiect their throats to their enemies swords: that they are aedy to disarme when they shall see the Realme freed from Suißes, Flemings, Italians and Germans, which were come to spoile them, and matters restored to their former estate. As for the enterprise of Meaux, their intention was onely to beseech the King (from whose preface the violence of their enemies depriued them of all acceffe, but by force) to reuoke that cruel sentence, which some determined to execute against all their party, being ready to prooue by armes against all those that would maintaine the contrary, that they had neuer any other will against their Soueraigne, but as his most faithfull and obedient subiects.

The treaty of peace renewed,
but in vaine.

During this negotiation, the duke of Aniou sought for the commodity which he had lost to fight with the Pince, and the prince receiued his strangers with a wonderfull contentment to the whole army, fearing least the heauinesse of the Germans should make them attend long in Lorraine. They expected a hundred thousand crownes at their entry, but they which had so sodainly drawne them to horse-backe, must haue leisure to make money. At least they make a vertue of necessity. And what might not two Commanders, (whereof the one by his naturall pleasantness, and the other by his grauity, tempered the excessive choller of some, and the exceeding suspition of others) obtaine of their men, amongst whom they had so great credit. The prince by their example summs on both great and small: the Ministers in their sermons moue men, and the captaines prepare theirouldiers. Every one contributes, some for zeale, some for loue, some for feare, and some for shame of reproch. They gather, what in money, plate, chaynes, gold and lewels, some foure-score-thousand frankes, and by this voluntary liberality, satisfie the first and greatest hungar of their Reistres. Being ioyned, the generall opinion was to make warre about Paris: an apparent meanes to haue a peace. Orleance was their nurse, neither could they from any place else recouer artillery, munition, and money, so commodiously. They therefore take the waie to Beaussé, and for their first beginning, they defeat some E troupes of Italians and French, that came to charge them in the rebe-reward vpon their passage of the riuer of Seine. They force Trancy, and passe over the riuers of Yone, Loing, and La Cure: they draw diuers commodities from all the small townes opposite to their passage, alwaies assailing and alwaies assailed, and still with the losse of the one party or the other. Whilst this company (hauiing the mighty army of the duke of Aniou opposite vnto them) marched into Beaussé, they fall to armes in other parts in fauour of their party. Astier, Sipierre, and others in Languedoc, Prouence, Dauphinaé & Gascony make diuers assemblies, seize vpon Nismes, Montpellier & many other places. Pouçenat and Verbelain leauy troupes in Bourbonnois and Auvergne, whereas the forces of Guyenne which marched towards the duke of Aniou, incounters them, breakes them, and for that time make their attempts fruitlesse. Moreouer the duke of Neuers, with an army of 14 thousand French, Suißes, and Italians, besieged Mafcon, battered it, and tooke it by composition, but being incountred by foure score horse, and some foote, issued out of Antrain, vnder the commands of captaines Beauvais and Bourgois, as he aduanced with a hundred horse, to visite the Duchesse his wife, hee was shot in the knee with a Harguebuze, which made him lame all the remainder of his life. Montluc Pons, the bishop of Tullés, and many other Catholikes in

V v v 3

Guyenne,

1568. Guienne, being followed with foure thousand foote, and seuen hundred horse, surpris and A kill about foure hundred men, spoile the Isle of Ré, attempt to besiege Rochel: but too long delays makes their desaigne fruitlesse.

In the meane-time, the Vicontes of Bourniguet, Montclar, Paulin, Gourdon, Mouuans, Rapi pin and other protestants, aduanced with seuen or eight thousand men, of the bands of Gascony, Prouence, Daulphiné and Languedoc. Saint Heran Gouverneur of Auvergne, Saint Chamont, Gordes, Vrsé, the bishop of Puy, Hautefeuille, Bresieux and others, assemble a troupe to stop their passage, and runne as to a certaine victory, forbidding expressly all the neighbour townes, Not to receiue any one that flies, what livery so euer he beares. The which shall cost them full deare. The Viconts charge these horsemen, kill a great number, and of the chiefe vpon the place: put the rest in route, and makes them seeke their safety by B flight. But the peasants armed with the former prohibition, know no man, neither doe they spare any man, but make of their countrimen as great a slaughter as the victor did, and by this indiscreet stratagem, open the way for the Viconts to recouer Orleance. Being arrived, they stay the inroads which Martinenghe, Richelieu and others made, euen to the gates of Orleance: they take Baugency, attempt Blois, and take it by composition. The Gascons doe not easily forget their hands, and the soldiars of Richelieu, who were retired thether, could not free themselves from the sword.

Chartres besieged.

Here vpon the princes army comes into Beausse. Chartres is one of the chiefe store-houses of corne for Paris, and being taken, would much auaille the protestants. Liquieres C was made gouernour for the King there, with two and twenty companies, fortified vpon feare of a siege, which a regiment of foote. The prince besiegeth and batters it, but to small purpose: fise canons, and foure small culuerins preuailed little against so many men of warre, being intrenched with great aduantage. They found out a place of small strength, where a breach gaue hope of victory: but the Lord of Valeté, a great capitaine, comes to succour the besieged, with eightene cornets of horse. The Admirall is aduertised: and not to faile of his prey, he made choise of three thousand five hundred horse, marched towards them, chargeth Valette, ouerthrowes part of his troupes, carries away foure cornets, and puts the rest to flight. The duke of Aniou incamped beiond Seine, and loth to hazard a battel, left Chartres in apparent danger. But Catherine knew how (for so shee D did vially vaunt) with three sheetes of paper, to effect more then her warriors with their armes.

A good peace was no lesse necessary then wisht for. The protestants did generally beleue, that the Catholikes would disarme with them, and the Nobility were particularly moued with a great desire to see their houses (it is a desire whereof we can hardly stay the effects, in them that are voluntaries) Many whole cornets had already taken the way of Xaintonge and Poytou, they wold not lose the season of their Vines: many other pretend, the sacking of their houses, where their preface was necessary: the footmen of some countries lying farthest off, slipt away daily, their pursues were empty, and no man payed. It was in March, when as armies are accustomed to goe to field, and their French forces decrea- E sing visibily, had driuen them in short time to stand vpon their defence: their enemies were whole and strong. To diuide their strangers into townes, were to dismember themselves. These considerations and others, made the heads of the protestants to accept of a second Edict of pacification, concluded in Loniumieau, saying: That those of the pretended reformed religion, should purely and simply enjoy the first Edict, and that it should be executed according to the senour, notwithstanding all restrictions, modifications, interpretations, and declarations made since the day of the date thereof, vntill the publication of this second declaration made the three and twentieth day of March.

A second peace.

This counterfeit peace carried John Casimir with all his forces home into Germany: the Prince, and the Admirall, with all those of his party, retire euery man to his home. But F diuers breaches of this Edict, did sodenly open the gate to the third ciuill wars: and whilest that euery one imputes the cause of this sodaine reprisall of armes to his enemy, the effects fall both vpon good and bad. The Catholikes ground their discontents, for that many townes refused the restraint made by this last Edict. Sancerre, Montauban, and other townes of Quercy, Viurets, Daulphiné, Languedoc, and else-where, would not absolutely submit

A submit themselves to his Maiesties good pleasure. Rochel refused to receiue the garrison sent by Jarnac their auncient Gouvernor: they continued their fortifications before begun, neither did they restore the Catholikes to their offices, goods, nor religion: they armed out ships to keepe the seas, without the Kings allowance. They refused the ayde and subuention, which his Maiestie required for the affaires of his realme. Many Capitaines (without the Kings Commission) led souldiers to the Prince of Orange, against the Duke of Alba, to draw afterwards (said they) the Protestants of Flanders into France, and ioyntly to oppress the Catholike religion.

The Protestants on the other side complained, That in stead of enioying the Edict and libertie of their consciences, they gaue them declarations vnder the Kings authoritie, to B hinder the exercise of their religion: That hauing dismissed their men, both strangers and French, with the least oppression of the people that might be; and deliuered into the Kings hands the townes and strong places which they held: yet they receiued the Suisses, they entertained many companies of Italians, they did distribute their horse and foote into such Townes as did most import the Protestants, Tours, Orleans, Amiens, and others, to the end (said they) to take them like Partridges in a net, being retired to their houses. That they sued in the Court of Rome for leaue to sell the temporall lands of the French Clergie, to the value of an hundred and fiftie thousand Frankes by yeare, the money to bee employed to the rooting out of their party. That this counterfeit peace ruined more of their men, then C the rigours of warre. That they garded townes, bridges, and passages of riuers. These grudgings were openly published, when as another occasion makes them both to speake boldly, and to take armes. In a manner all the Duke of Anious horse staid about Paris, with fise or fixe thousand foot, vnder colour to fortifie the guards of the King, the Queene-mother, his breethren, and the capitall cittie: and Tamannes sent towards Bourgongne with many companies, made them suspect that it was to beset and surprize the Prince at Noyers, a little and weake towne of his owne, and the Admirall at Tanlay, a castle belonging to his brother d'Andelot. Some acquainted with his practise giue them aduice: they complaine to the King of the iniustice is done them, beseeching his Maiestie to quench the fires kindled in his realme by the factions of the Guisens, and to free themselves they take Rochel for their D Sanctuarie.

This braue prey being thus escaped, Katherine and the faction send forth Commissions, and appoynt the rendezuous for the troupes in Guyenne and Poitou. The Duke of Aniou prepares: and for a reuenge of Meaux, he chafeth away the Protestants. The queene of Nauarre, accompanied with three Regiments of foot, and eight Cornets of light-horse, (notwithstanding the endeaours of Escaus and Montluc) retires to Rochel with the Prince her sonne, (who succeeded afterwards to this Crowne) and the Princesse her daughter. The Cardinall of Chastillon is forced to leaue Beauuoisin, and to saue himselfe in a small Barke in England. The Nobility of Poitou arme with the first, and repaire to Rochel. The Earle of Rochefoucault was armed some dayes before. D'Andelot marched with a E thousand good horse, and two thousand shot, gathered together in the confines of Maine and Brittain.

The Duke of Martigues, Gouvernor of Brittain, going with three hundred Lances, and fise hundred braue shot to Saumur, to the duke of Montpensier, he is aduertised that many of the enemies troupes are lodged in his way. He sends to discouer them; and finding them lodged at large, after the French manner, passeth brauely through them, with the losse but of twenty men, and with the gaine of an ensigne, and the slaughter of aboue foure-score of his enemies: and recouers Saumur, whilest that D'Andelot, la Noue, and other Commanders ioynd with the Prince. If the Dukes of Aniou, Montpensier and Martigues, who assembled men from all parts to oppose a mightie armie against the Protestants, had in time F fore-seene, that those which dislodged in so great hast, went to seeke their fortunes as farre off, and had sought to crosse their desseignes, the Prince and all his part had in all shewes bene coopt vp in Rochel. But behold, of poore vagebonds, in two moneths they become masters of Niort, Fontenay, Saint Maixent, Xaintes, S. Iean d'Angely, Pons, Cognac, Blay, Angoulesme, and are strong enough for the continuance of a long warre. While the Dukes arme, the King beginnes the warre against the Protestants by the Pen. Hee declares by

The complaints of the Protestants.

The Protestants arme.

1568. by his proclamation, that the Edict of Ianuarie had bene but prouisionall, vntill he were A of full age: that now he forbids all exercife of the pretended reformed religion, in all the territories of his obedience: forsaits both the bodies and goods of them, that shall breake it: commands all Ministers vpon great penalties, to depart the Realme within fifteen daies.
And by another, he fufpends all Officers making profession thereof, from their Offices and charges, commanding them to refigne them into his hands within fifteene dayes.

The Protestants make their profit of these Edicts, and fend them into Germany, England, and to the Suiffes of their religion, to prouoe, That they are not pursued as Rebels affecting the Crowne, (crimes by the which their enemies would make them odious.) And in truth these Edicts were spurres to hasten the League, which the Duke of Deuxponts shal bring the next ycare, and for the heads of Daulphine, Prouence, and Languedoc, to go and B oppose the forces of the said Prouinces against the Kings armie, which was readie to fall vpon the Prince. To this end, Acier, Mouuans, Pierre Gourde and others, draw forth sixteen or feventeene thousand shot, but few horse: seeming with this multitude of men to haue vn-peopled all that climate. But as they did fortifie the Princes affaires on the one side, they did weaken them on the other: for after their departure, the Catholikes seized vpon many places, the which they might well haue held, lodging halfe their forces in them, then marching in troupe close and speedily, they might haue arriued safe, where their presence was most profitable and necessarie.

Mouuans and Pierre Gourde defeated and slaine.

But the presumption of equalitie, doth commonly ingender a pernicious ieaousie C among great men: and the opinion one conceiues of his forces, and of his owne valour, with an obstinacie not to yeeld vnto another, is a dangerous plague in an armie. Mouuans, and Pierre Gourde, finding themselves annoyed by straight lodging, as they had done till they came neere to Perigueux, they meane to lye more at large at Mensignac, not discouering that the Duke of Montpensier approached, who at his arriuall puts in route two regiments, and kills a thousand souldiars at their Colonels feet: who selling their liues dearly, so tyre the Dukes troupes, as they could not charge Acier: yet they were amazed by the feardull report of such as were escaped, who made the Dukes forces exceeding great, beyond all truth, who retiring to Chastelleraud, made the way open for Aciers troupes, which remained of this shipwracke, to fortifie the Protestants armie, and to make it able, not onely to D endure the shooke, but to attempt some thing against the Catholikes. The Prince did muster in his armie aboute eighteen thousand Harguebuziers, and three thousand good horse.
The Duke had ten thousand foot, beside Suiffes, and foure thousand lances: the Souldiars of both armies were well experienced in warre.

He that takes not the French in their first heat, they are easily broken: the chiefe sinewes of warre failing, might greatly coole this new vigour: and Winter approaching, withdraw the greatest part of them. The Prince therefore seekes to fight: the number and courage of his men inuites him. He comes within two leagues of Chastelleraud, and by his approach annoies the Duke of Aniou: the Duke moued with the like desire, and grieued to see so many men at the Princes deuotion, knowing also that the forces of Germany would bee E ready to march in their fauour in the Spring, seekes to diuide his enemies power, and to o-uercome them by peece-meale. Our first motions are sodain, but they do not alwaies bring forth effects premeditated. To come to a battaile, was properly to cut away the sinewes of the Realme, and by their mutuall weakening, to inuite the foraine enemy to the inuasion of this estate. The soueraigne Commander of battels, did shew at this time a signe of his accustomed fauour to this Crowne, taking from both the Generals the sharpnesse of their iudgements, and making them to loofe in one day a notable occasion for either of them to preuaile against his enemy, as we shall heare.

The Prince had intelligence, that the Duke camped in a place of aduantage, vnder the fauour of a meadow, intrenched on diuers parts: so not able to draw his enemie to fight, he F dislodgeth, and goes towards Lusignan. The Duke takes the same course, and one not acquainted with the others desseignes, the Marshals of both Campes meete in a manner at one instant at Pamprou, five leagues from Poitiers, a great village furnished with victuals, and in a very good countrie. They chase and re-chase one another, but loth to dispute this Renduouez with more hazard, they both leaue it (yet with an honourable retreat) of either side.

A side) to put themselves in battaile, a quarter of a league from the place. The Admirall and a Andelot his brother, supported their men with five Corners of horse, set in order vpon a small hill, to keepe the Catholikes from viewing the valley, and to giue them some apprehension of greater forces lodged there. The Prince was a league from thence, and aduanced with great speed: On the Dukes part there appeared seuen or eight hundred Launces, commanded by the Duke of Martignies. Beeing approached within Cannon shot, the Ad-mirall causeth a Capitaine of Argoletiers to aduance alongst a hedge, who more valiant then discreet, fals presently to skirmish, and their Corner marcheth to second them. Mar- tiignes thinks that they meane to fight, and sends forth three or foure squadrons of Lanciers: the Admirall and his brother grieued they had not preuented the indiscretion of their B Capitaine, who ingaged them to fight vnadvisedly, and contrarie to their charge, calls back these skirmishers, and with an assured countenance couers the weaknesse of their troupes.
Martignes taking a troupe of seruants for a battalion of Harguebuziers which appeared behind a village, staies his Lanciers, and for want of footmen, loseth the oportunitie to fight.
In the meane time the ensignes of foot, and troupes of horse arriue from all parts: the night approching, gaue them leysure onely to skirmish with the Duke of Anions foreward. The Dukes Foreward was too weake to endure the shooke: the Commanders diuise a policie, whereby they perswade the enemy, through fauor of the night, that all their forces were present: their drums sound after the Suiffes manner, they double their guards, make great fires, cast many matches amongst the bushes, keepe their men close without any skirmish, C lest some prisoner should discouer the truth, and after they had refreshed themselves, they dislodge without any noise, some marching to Iasenuil, where the Duke lodged with the battaile, the rest to the village of Sanzy. So holding one another in suspence, they loofe the oportunitie of a great aduantage, the first in the Duke, the second in the Prince. Mans counsell without God preuailes nothing, and, The actions of great men, are in his power, as those of the meaneest. So saith the Oracle. For the next day many things chanced more by hazard then by counsell. This retreat giues them courage to fight: to this end the Admirall followes them at the heeles, and the Prince marcheth after. There were two wayes, one led to Sanzey, the other to Iasenuil. At the breake of day there riseth a great mist, which cau-D seth the Prince to stray: after he had marched two leagues, he finds himselfe in the front of the Dukes army. Necessitie giues him resolution: he puts his harguebuziers before, which were aboute twelue thousand, and forced to make some shew of fight: salutes the Duke with his Cannon, skirmishes with diuers volleys of shot, sends to learne newes of his foreward, and wils the Admirall to make hast.

A policie
stratageme.

He had already turned head vpon the noise of the Cannon; but the Sunne setting at his arriual, preuenting a generall fight, caused all to passe in sharpe skirmishes, with losse on either side: and after a dayes breathing either part retired, the Duke to Poitiers, the Prince to Mirebeau. Few daies after, they both returne to their first resolution to fight. The Duke goes to field and recouers Mirebeau. But he doth not obserue the composition, and giues E a Andelot cause for a reuenge, to cut in peeces the garrison he finds in S. Florent, an Abbey neere vnto Saumur. The Prince held Loudun. It was in the Dukes way, and enioying it, he held a fertile countrie from his enemies, which might feed his armie a moneth together:
and there was no reason the Prince shold hazard his forces for the keeping of a weak place.
The Duke approacheth: the next day he hath newes that the Prince puts his army in battaile alongst the suburbs: he likewise arangerh his: the Cannon playes on both sides, and passeth through their squadrons doing some harme. Aboute forty thousand men almost all French beheld one another in the midst of a champion field, without any aduantage, and with an equall courage and countenance, attend but the signe of battaile. But the outward cold did quench much of this inward heate: the frosts were great, continuall mists, and the waies F so slipperie, as no man could hold his footing. It was dangerous for the first that charged, the slipperie waies stayed their horses, and the maine ditches (made to diuide the lands) ser-ued them as trenches. So as either of them beeing loth to hazard any thing stand firme, beholding one another, expecting when the most rash should begin the charge. Such as goe to the skirmish, either breake or put some member out of ioynt: their falles hurt more then the shot. Three daies passe in this sort, the fourth the Duke retires to warme his troupes benumbed

1568. benumbed with cold, and for the most part lodged in the open ayre (of twenty years there A had not bene felt so sharpe a winter) in his retreat three companies were cut off in a village, one of Suisses, and two of French, and the sicknesse falling amongst the Souldiers, diminished both the armies of eight thousand men. This fruitlesse abode caused a generall murmure, and both Nobilitie and souldiers on either party did threaten; if they were not lodged in safe and well-fortified places, they would provide for themselves, not able to endure the extreame frosts and cold without any effects. The two Commanders agree. The Duke goes to winter beyond the riuer of Loire about Saumur, and the Prince at Thouars, Monfrucil-Bellay, and places thereabouts, either hauing some secret practise against his enemy, but with small effect. This retreat gaue the Prince leysure to deuise means for the maintenance of the warre. The goods of the Clergie of Poitou were engaged, and sold to them that durst buy them: the Rochelois contribute fourescore thousand frankes, and the Queene of England sent an hundred thousand Angels, fixe Cannons, powder and shot, for the which she was paid in Salt, Vwooll, and Bell-metall, for the most part at the Catholikes cost. The Abbey of Saint Michel alone, amongst all the other places of base Poitou, bridled the Protestants. They beseege it, batter it, and take it at the third assault, and cut foure or five hundred men in peeces which defended it. Martinengues, Entragues and la Chastre Gouvernors of Guyen, Orleans, and Bourges, beseege Sancerre, giue many assaults, lose many men, and finally tyred with many fallies, leaue this small towne in quiet, to be hereafter a mirror of singular patience, in the preseruatiou of their liues and families. But those of Sancerre, seeking to enlarge themselves, and to build a fort vpon Loire, suffer themselves to be surprized, lose both fort and some fiftie men, and are inforced to thrust themselves within their walles.

s. Michell be-lieged.

During the sharpnesse of winter, and this small surceasing of armes, the Vicounts of Bourniquet, Montclar, Paulin, Gourdon, and others, with seven thousand shot, and some horse, made warre, especially against them of Tolouza. Montauban was their chiefe retreat, and experience had lately taught them: That it were better to defend this Prouince and their countrie-men, against Montluc and their enemies, then transporting their armes into a strange country, to leaue them againe in prey. Piles was commanded to perswade them to ioyne with the Prince. At their refusall, he armes twelue hundred shot, and two hundred horse, takes Bergerac and Sainte Foy: passeth into Perigord, burning all the Villages: and to purge the death of Monuans and Pierre Gourde, he kills all that were suspected of their ouerthrow: and so he marcheth towards the prince.

The prince had now taken breath, and hearing that the Duke marched towards Angoulême, fortified with three thousand foote, and some horse, which the Earle of Tende brought him, and two thousand Reistres led by the Reingraue and Balsompierre, he retires along the riuer of Charante, to view the Dukes countenance, and to fortifie the places of his obedience: but with the preiudice of his army. The Duke comes likewise to Chasteau-neuf, a towne vpon the riuer of Charante, and at the first takes a castle by composition, which was kept by a Scottishman. The Admirall likewise arriues, followed with seven or eight hundred horse, and as many harguebuziers: and to hinder the Dukes passage, he lodgeth two regiments of foote neere vnto the bridge, seconded by the horse: charging them to vex the enemies guards with continuall alarmes, to make them thinke, that all the princes vant-gard was lodged there, and then he retires to Bassac with the rest of the vant-gard.

But this commandement wrought no effect. They had forgotten the manner of camping, euery one would lodge, liue, and forrage at his ease: so as the most part going to quarter else-where, and leauing the passage vnfurnished of men, make the possession easie for the Duke. The Duke, through the care of the Lord of Biron, repaires the bridge: makes another of boates, and in the night passeth the riuer of Charente. At the breake of day, fifty horse being in guard, a quarter of a League off, discover the enemies troupes that passed and aduertise the Admirall: (the prince being a League beyond at Iarnac) the Admirall sends for his men disperied in their lodgings, to come vnto him, and to make their retreat together, and in the meane time he attended them at Bassac.

In a great action all delays are dangerous. He spends three houres to attend them, and might easily haue retired, if his troupes had bene ioyned. Hee had nine cornets of horse, and

A and some ensignes of foot. Montgomerie, Acier, and Puissault were Colonels, whome hee was loth to loose. Beeing all ioyned with him (except Acier, who could not arriue in time with his fixe thousand shot) he finds all the Dukes armie past, making shew by their skirmishes, that that day, being the 13. of March, should not passe without a battell. The Prince was aduanced halfe a league in his retreat, but he was too well bred, to see his friends engaged, and to fight in his absence. He turnes head towards the Admirall, with those few horse he could sodainly draw out of his battell: for he camped not, but his army was disperied into quarters. The Admirall making his retreat, incounters a small riuer, which could not be passed, but in two or three places. Then the Duke sends forth the flower of al his horse, being seven or eight hundred, who at the first ouerthrow foure Cornets, take la Noue and la Loue fighting, vanquish Puissault, charge d'Andelot, but with the death of Monfalez, and fifteene or sixteene others of account.

The battell
of Bassac.

In the end the Prince and the Admirall see themselves in a manner engaged betwixt all the Dukes forces and the riuer of Charente: they go to the charge, first the Admirall and then the Prince, and at the first make them turne their backs that were before them: and now they indured a second charge, more fierce and of longer continuance. But sodainly all the army falls vpon them, their horsemen are in route, the Princes horse slaine, and he ouerthrowne vnder him, abandoned by his troupes, and prisoner to the Lord of Argence, to whom he had yielded, but he was shot in the head with a pistoll by Montesquieu a Gascon, C and Captaine of the Princes guards. A lesson for great men, and a maxime of warre: That a Generall should not fight, but being forced, for that in the losse of his person consistes the ruine of his army. This Prince hath left this memorie of him, to haue yielded to no man of his age, neither in courage nor courtesie, eloquent in speech, liberall, affable to all the world, and a most excellent Commander in warre. The Protestants lost in this battell neere foure hundred men, most horsemen, and few foot-men of account, la Tour a Poiteuin a sea Captaine, young Chasteliers, Portaut, Chandenier, Mesanchere, Brandaniere, the eldest of the Bessons, the yonger of Tabarriere, Barrete, la Moissray, and a great number of other gentlemen of diuers Prouinces, many wounded, and many prisoners: the amazement and disorder being so great, as they could not flie fast enough. Of Catholikes there died about two hundred, amongst the which were Monfalez, the Barons of Ingrand, and Prunay of the house of Billy, the Earles of Mirandole, of Morete, Moncanure, Linieres, and some other of marke.

Conde slaine.

Many Protestants would haue gathered together again, but they pursued them too nere, and the Reistres arriuing in the pursute, so halted them that fled, as night surprized them in the midst of their flight. The Admirall and d'Andelot not able to pacifie the amazement, nor repaire the disorder, tooke their way towards Saint Jean d'Angely, and gaue the Rendezuous for them that escaped at Xaintes, whither the young Princes of Nauarre and Condé were retired. The bodie of the army was entred into Cognac. The foot-men with their Commanders, Acier, Beaudin, Blasoms, Cheilar, Mirabell, and many others, and of E the horse, Montgomery, Chaumont and others. To dislodge them from Cognac, the victorious Duke sends to beseege it: but his attempts against Cognac, his intelligences within S. Jean d'Angely, and his fruitlesse threatnes that he vsed against Angoulême, stayed the course of his victorie.

In the meane time the Protestants gather together the peeces of this shipwrack: the Admirall led the Princes to Tonay-Charente, he tooke view of the horse: Henry Prince of Nauarre was declared Generall, and Henry Prince of Conde an assistant, foure thousand masters tooke the oath, d'Andelot gathers the footmen together, provided for money, and stayed the enemies courses, when as a burning feuer tooke him out of this world the 27. day of May in Xaintes, leauing for euer a surname purchased by him of a Knight without feare. F Acier did succeed him in his charge, Beauuais la Noue had his company of men at armes, but the Admirall the care and gouernement of the whole army, with the managing of the chiefe affaires which concerned the Protestants estate. The Dukes army did ouer-runne Xaintonge, Angoulmois, and Limosin, vnder the conduct of the Earle Brissac, Colonnell of the Infanterie of France. Hauing recouered Aubeterre, and some other places from the Protestants, he attempts Mucidan, being vigorously battered and valiantly defended. In the

the end it is burnt to ashes, the castle endures some assaults, the most worthy men of the Regiments of Brissac, Montluc, and Escaus loose their liues there, and finally Brissac himselve approaching to view the breach and the defences, is shot into the head and slaine vpon the counterscarpe, leauing a wonderfull grieffe to them that knew him, beeing now but fwe or fixe and twenty yeares old, and might in time haue prooued one of the valiantest and greatest Captaines of his age. Yet necessity forced the beleeged to a composition, to depart with bagge and baggage. But the impatience to haue lost their Colonells, and so many braue souldiers, made most of them to be slaine, issuing out of their walles. Piles recompenced this losse by the taking of the Isle of Medoc betwixt Bourdeaux and Rochell, the spoile whereof enriched all his troupe. Then VVolfgang Count Palatine of Rhine, and Duke of Deuxponts, brought vnto the princes about fixe thousand Reistres, and fwe thousand Lansquenets. Ciuill warres alwaies make the way open to a neighbour stranger, the which he durst not attempt without the support of one partie. The difficultie was to ioyne with the princes beeing farre off: and without a French conuoy it could hardly be done: but see what chanceth vnlooked for.

Mony, Jenlis, Mornuilliers, Esquieres, Estrenay and others, had in the beginning of this third ciuill warre, assembled fwe or fixe hundred horse, and two thousand harguebuziers, whom the difficulty to passe into Guienne had transported into Brabant to the prince of Auranges; Count Lodowike his brother, and Count Vobrad of Mansfield, who hauing for a time entertained the warre with a variable successe against the Spaniard, passed the Meuze and offered bataille to the duke of Alua: but he fought onely to consume them for want of victuals, whereof they were so scantied, as necessitie casting them backe into France, they came to Vitry, and so stricke vp into Germany, and by their arriual gaue VVolfgang the helpe he desired. We must now begin anew. The duke of Aniou Reaues Guienne, and takes the way of Berry, to keepe the duke of Deuxponts from ioyning with the princes: but it had beene better to haue preuented his entry into the Realme. To this end, the King commits two armies, the one to the duke of Aumale, the other to the duke of Nemours (neither of them beeing fortunate in warre) both strong in foemen, but weaker in horse then the Germaine. They aduance vnto Sauerne: coast the Germaine Duke, who crost through Bourgongne, presse him on the flanks, and behind with sundry skirmishes, and oftentimes incounter goodly and fauourable occasions, which they let slippe for want of iudgement, and good correspondencie, the true bond of the brauest exploits that may be practised in warre. But was it not a want of iudgement in these two great Commanders, fortified with twelve hundred horse and foure thousand foote sent by the Pope, to leaue la Charité vn-furnished of men, knowing well that the Protestants could not passe the riuier of Loire, without getting by force or surprizing some of the passages thereon? VVolfgang attempts la Charité, presseth it, terrifies it, and takes it, before that any succors can come, and thereby shortens his way about three-score Leagues, where he must haue passed at the head of Loire, and frees himselfe from a passage full of wood and mountaines, where as the horie-men would haue beene but an incumbrance.

The Admirall could by no meanes fauour these succors (for he had the duke of Anious army in front) and holding it as a matter impossible for the Reistres to get a passage vpon the riuier of Loire, he attended hourelly newes of their rout. But aduertised of the successe: Beheld (said he) a good signe: let vs make it absolute by our diligence and resolution. So the Princes aduance towards the marches of Limosin, to keepe the Dukes army occupied, whilst that their Reistres marching through the Country, performed the funerals of the duke of Deuxponts, who being lately deceased of an ague, left the command of the army to the Earle of Mansfield, and in the end of Iune both the Protestant armies ioyned, the which vnited together made about fwe and twenty thousand fighting men: and in the Kings, they numbred about thirtie thousand. The country of Limosin is vnfruitfull, and the sterility of F the soyle forced the troupes to lye disperfed, the which might easily cause some surprize: but the Admirall desired rather to preuent, then be preuented. The dukes army camped at Rocheabeille. To surprize him, they march, resolute to giue him bataille, and are in view of the enemy before he hath taken any alarme of them.

Three hundred harguebuziers of Colonel Stroffes kept the principall approach to this lodging,

Rocheabeille.

A lodging beeing strong both by situation and nature: and happy were they to be lodged in a place of defence. At the first brunt Stroffs releues them with fwe hundred others, who the space of an houre held good against foure thousand of the Princes shot, while the Dukes army was put in battell. This passage being vn-casie to force, the Admirall sends forth foure Corners of horse which renew the charge: they breake vp certaine palizado's which couered Stroffs's regiments, kill two and twenty Captaines, and fwe or fixe hundred men vpon the place: take their Colonnell (without whose resistance the Princes foreward had passed euen vnto the Cannon without any let) put the rest to flight, and nothing but the raine that fell hindred the successe of a great victorie, the which was continued the next day by a skirmish against two hundred Italians, and some horse-men of the Duke of Nemours B whereof Mony slue some, tooke others, and chased the rest, being mounted vpon horses of aduantage fit for such a retreat.

After this incounter, the Duke sent to refresh his troupes vntill the beginning of October, in the garrisons neere to Guyenne: giuing the Princes by this meanes leysure to ceaze vpon many places, both by force and composition: Tuiers, S. Sulpice, Brantonne, Ceauteau l'uefque, La Chapelle, Confolant, Chabannes, S. Genais and others. Whilst the Duke rested, the Earle of Lude, Gouverneur of Poitou, promised wonders, but more in words then in effects. He had fwe thousand foot, and some cornets of horse, whereof he had foure ouerthrowne by La Noue neare vnto Niort: the Princes absence encouraged him to be- C seege Niort: where Pnuizant entred in despight of the assailants: he sustained three assaults and some scaldos, forcing Lude after the losse of fwe hundred men, to raise the sege. In the meane time the Princes approached neare to Poitou, and at the first had taken Chaste-leraud by composition the 12. of Iuly, and the 21. following, Lueignan, Courré, Sanfay, Viuonne, and other small places about Poitiers, to cut off victuals from the towne. At the same time, the subiects of the Queene of Nauarre, had their part in the Cake. Terride Go- uernor of Quercy, had accepted the Commission, to summon the said Queene, and the Prince her sonne, to leaue the party of the pretended reformed religion: if not to invade the Countries of Bearn, Foix, and Nauarre. So accompanied with Nigrepelise, Sainte Columbe, and others, he had easily reduced all to the Kings obedience, and held Nauarin be- D seeged, the only strong place that remained to the Queene.

The Princes send the Earle of Montgomery to incounter him, who with a small armie of fwe hundred horse, and foure thousand foote, forced Terride to raise the siege, and to retire himselfe into Orthez. His men were disperfed, and to preuent him from gathering them together, the Earle pursues him, besiegeth him, giues an assault, and forceth the Towne, makes a great slaughter: and to beate Terride with his owne armes, hee suddenly plants the Canon he found in the towne against the Castle. Terride vanquished with these terrible stratagemes, yeelds vpon composition, to depart with their liues and goods: Sainte Columbe, the Baron of Pordiac, Gohas, Tauas, and some others of the Queenes subiects, were excepted in the Capitulation, and as guilty of treason (hauing seized vpon her pla- E ces, and stirred her subiects to rebellion) were put to death. This resolute repulse of Terride and the execution of the aboue-named, did sodainly reduce all the other places to the Queenes obedience, and the Earle hauing manned the townes of his new conquests, came to Nerac, made warre awhile with the neighbour garrisons, and so came to the Princes army. Let vs see the progresse of their armes. La Charité gaue the Protestants meanes to annoy the Prouinces on this side Loire, and taking this place from them, then the Duke of Aumale should recouer many commodities to refresh his army. To this end hee appoints Sanjac, who was yet a nouice in Commissions of such importance. Yet hee gathers toge- ther out of the garrisons of Orleans, Bourges, Chartres, Neuers, Gian and other townes, about seuen thousand foot, and fwe or fixe hundred horse, besiegeth La Charité, being yet F but weakly fortified, changeth and rechangeth his battery, ouerthrowes a great part of the wall, and sends to the assault, the which was so resolutely defended, that of an hundred of the assailants scarce fwe returne to the campe: and vpon a false bruite, that the Princes came to succor it, the beseeagers display their ensignes, and without any farther inquiry, recouer their Garrisons, after a months siege, and the losse of about a hundred men. Within few daies after, Blosset, Boys, and others dis-banded from the campe to visit their families, X x x fortifie fortifie the towne, spoile the countrey, and by the taking of Douzy, Pouilly, Antrain, Saint Leonard, and other small townes, they made the way open to Berry, Niuernois, and the neighbour countries. The siege of Poitiers was lesse fatall, and of as small successe for the Protestants. The Admirall held opinion to force S. Maxent, then Saumur, and to fortifie it speedily, to haue a passage vpon the riuer of Loire neere vnto them, and to transport the warre towards Paris in the time of haruest. Poitiers was then very well furnished: the dukes of Guise and of Maine had put themselves into it: many Captaines and companies both of horse and foot shewed a great resolution for the defence thereof, vnder the ensignes of the two young brethren: these great and spacious townes being commonly the sepulchre of armies: yet all these reasons were of no force. The Nobilitie thereabouts preferring profit before honour, vrged the contrarie: That Poitiers was indeed strong of men, but weake of defence, and to be forced: that this place taken, would be the conquest of all Poictou, a rich Prouince, the which would disappoint the Duke of Aniou of an assured retreat. But the hope of spoile was an enticing bayte to draw them vnto it: for the more men are within it (said the Nobility) the greater shall our booty be. Yet the respect of their priuate profits made them forget the constant resolution of such as had vndertaken to guard it, the great meanes they had to defend themselves, and their small prouision of artillerie, munition, pioneers, and other things necessarie for the siege.

In the end plurality of voices carries it. The Princes loose some weekes before Poitiers. The towne is commanded by hils, which annoyed them: but their slow batterie giues them time to fortifie the breach, and force the assaillants to make new attempts else-where, and with the like successe. Hunger oppressed the Cittizens, hauing lost many Captaines, with a great number of souldiers: and the plague afflicted the Princes campe: those within find a good meanes for their libertie: and the Princes an honest cause to dislodge. The Duke of Aniou vnderstanding the extremitie of the beseged, and that the Protestants army began to dissolue, propounds two things to the Commanders, either to free Poitiers, or to suffer a place of that importance to be lost, in the which were many of their confident friends. He beseged Chasteleraud, and makes a breach: the French will haue the point: the Italians contend for it. In the end, the chance of the dice giues it them. They come brauely to the assault: the French disdain to follow them, and they within defend the breach. They overthrow the most resolute with a furious volley of shot, and force the rest to retire in confusion, leauing fife ensignes vpon the breach, aboue two hundred and fiftie slaine, and a great number wounded, whereof many died. This was the 7. of September. They prepared for a second attempt, when as the Princes taking this second assault for a lawfull occasion, raise their siege, wherewith they were no lesse troubled to depart with their honour, then the beseged were prest with extreame necessitie. The Duke hauing no complete army, and seeing his desseigne succeed, dislodgeth all night, retires to Celle in Touraine, passeth Vienne and Creuse, lodgeth his troupes and artillerie in a place of aduantage, gathers together all his disperfed bands: and now the way is prepared for a second battaile, and a notable victorie.

The Princes beeing aduertised of this sodaine retreat, take it for a kind of flight: march all night after them, passe the riuers, put themselves in battaile, to force the Duke or to make him to retire to Tours, where the King then remained. Both the armies are in battaile: but betwixt them is a small riuer, which makes the countrey moorish and very vnfit for a generall fight, so as they could not ioyne their battailes, and had no meanes to bring the Cannon without hazard to loose it. The Duke who was lodged in Celle, a village well entrenched, flanked and gabioned, couered on the one side by a riuer, and on the other with a wood, could not by any skirmishes be drawne to fight, vntil he had vnited all his forces. The Princes for want of victuals repasse Creuse and Vienne, and lodge at Faye la Vineuse, and from thence (the countrey beeing spoiled, and ill to lodge in) passe to Montcontour, a lodging of aduantage, both for the situation and commoditie of victuals. The Duke pursues him, and by his speede deceiued the enemies. His fore-ward led by Biron meetes them vnlooked for at Saint Cere, chargeth Mouy, who made the retreat with 300. horse, and 200. harguebuziers, kils about fifty men at armes, and almost all of his foot-men, so amazeth the Princes army, as they all begin to wauer, and had not a freight beene, where onely 20. men for accident.

A men might march in front, the whole army had then beene in route. The Admirall makes halt to repaire this disorder, and by his presence renues their danted courages. They charge and re-charge twice or thrice at this passage, and not able to bee forced, the two armies campe within shot of musket, leauing it betwixt both. The Duke had eight or nine thousand horse, seuentene or eightene thousand foot, French, Suisses, and Italians, and fiftene peeces of artillerie. The Princes had fixe thousand horse, French and Reistres, tenne thousand harguebuziers French and Lansquenets, and eleuen peeces of Cannon. As these armies beheld one another, two Gentlemen following the Dukes campe, present themselves to the first they meete of the Protestant partie. Aduertise the Admirall (said they) that he forbear to fight, for the succors newly arrived haue greatly fortified our armie: let him temporize a month onely: it is the time the Nobility hath giuen vnto the Duke, with protestation to seru him for that time, but not afterwards, then shall he be forced to a peece to your aduantage. Of two Councels those which hasten to their owne ruine doe commonly follow the worst. They aduertise the Admirall hereof, he apprehends it, and desires to follow it, so do the most modest, and that at nine of the clocke at night they should take the way to Eruaux, putting the riuer, that runs there, betwixt the two armies. Others of a more boyling humor, inferre: That these nightly retreats terrifie them that make them, preiudice their reputations, augments the enemies courage, and that they must do it only at the point of day. Moreover, this might be a practise to amaze their troupes, and that coming from C suspected persons, accustomed to deceiue, it was also suspect, and to be reiected.

This diuersitie of opinions troubled the Admirall, but see what afflicted him more neerely. The Reistres did mutine for want of pay, the Lansquenets refused to march: three or foure French regiments of the most remote countries, had already asked leaue to depart, many Gentlemen were retired to their houses, and the Duke approached. The Admirall then beseecheth the Princes that were at Parthenay to come to the army, that by their presence they might containe them in obedience. They bring an hundred and fifty good horse. But whilst the Admirall labors to pacifie the mutinie of the Germains, two houres are spent, so as the troupes cannot recouer a place of aduantage neere vnto Eruaux, where they could hardly haue charged them.

D These broyles appeald, the army takes the way to Eruaux the third of October, and discovers the Dukes which aduanced. They cause the Princes to retire, beeing yet too young (but vnder color to conduct them with more assurance, many retire with them) and arrange themselves in a valley, beeing couered from the Cannon. And vpon the approach of the Dukes fore-ward (consisting of nineteene cornets of Reistres in two squadrons marching directly against the Admirall) the Admirall sends to Count Lodowike who led the battell, to send him three cornets. The Earle obeyes, but he leades them himselfe: who hath no sooner left his place, but he remains engaged in the skirmish, the which continued three quarters of an houre: the Admirall was hurt in the face, and his horse-men beeing overthrowne, leaue the field. The battell makes a great resistance, but vnfurnished of a head, it is forced to yeeld to the greater number: part of the footmen are cut in peeces, and part disperfed here and there, the artillerie lost, and the ensignes carried away: all flie, euery man saues himselfe. Count Lodowike retires with three thousand horse in one company, turning head still against them that pursued, and recouers Parthenay, the refuge of the remainders of this ship-wracke. Foure thousand Lansquenets died in this battell, 1500. French souldiers, about three hundred men at armes, many horses, seruants, and lackeys of men of mark, Puigreffier, Biron brother to him that led the fore-ward, and S. Bonel, Cornet of the Admirals company. La Noue was prisoner againe with Arer and others: the Reistres baggage was spoiled, that of the French being more aduanced towards Niort and Parthenay, was saued. The Duke lost few foot, but fife or fixe hundred horse, and twice as many hurt. where of the most part died, as the eldest Reingraue, the Marquis of Bade, Clermont of Daulphiné, and few others of quality.

Seldome do we reape the fruits of an absolute victorie. The Protestants foot-men were disperfed: and their horsemen (for the most part Reistres) were discontent for want of pay, and losse of their baggage. A hot pursuite had in shew produced one of these 2. effects, either their defeat, or their retreat into Germany: two monthes pay had drawn them vnto it.

Notable error

1569. To leaue the remainder of these forces at the Commanders deuotion, was to giue the Admirall meanes (beeing a wife Commander in warre) to gather together the remnant of this shipwracke, to repaire his broken vessell, and in the Spring to go to field with new troupes, to spoile diuers Prouinces, and in the end to bring the warre to the gates of Paris. Moreouer, these daunted spirits would be soone reuiued by the presence of their Princes, whereas vpon this fresh defeat they might shut them into some place whereby the warre should be soone ended.

Victories after the battell.

Thus discoured the most indiciuous: but others finding the recouerie of those places easie in this amazement, which the Princes held in Poitou, Xaintonge, and Angoulmois, the Duke followes their resolution, and for the first fruites of his conquest marcheth to Parthenay: but there he finds nothing but the naist, the place empirie, and the gates open. The Princes vpon the first bruite had recouered Niort, and so to Saint Jean d'Angely. The Baron of Mirebeau kept Lusignan, a place sufficient to winne much reputation, yea for a Capitaine of no great valour: yet the parles of young Lausac preuailed more with the Baron, then fise thousand Cannon shot which the Dukes of Martigues and Aumale spent against Piles, as we shall hereafter see. Niort being summoned, began to wauer, and Momy who had the guard of it (beeing gone foorth against some scouts that were approched to the gates, and traiterously shot with a pistoll by Maurenel a Gentleman of Brie, who had newly put himselfe vnder his Cornet, and shall within few yeares make himselfe famous by an act equall to the first in trecherie, and detestable villany) retiring himselfe by the aduice of the Princes to Rochell, where soone after he died of his wound, the towne being abandoned returned into the Dukes power without any difficultie. Puissant also leauing Fontenay, the garrisons of Chasteleraud, Chauigny, Rocheposé, the Castle of Angle, Pruilly, Cleruant, and other small places, dislodged together, and vnder the conduct of Briquemault came to make head in Sancerre and la Charité, being set vpon in their way, by the Commons of Berry and la Chastre Gouvernor of the countrie.

Mombrun, Mirabel, Verbelay, and some fixe or seuen hundred horse of Daulphiné, Viuzet, Auvergne, and Languedoc recouer their houses, vnder colour to prouide for some places of importance in their marches, and to make the way easie, which the Princes pretended to follow, for to winter in Limagne of Auvergne, if they had not altered their designe. We shall see shortly what course they tooke after their defeat. Nismes returns into the Protestants power. An aduenturous souldier, did with a secret file, in sundrie nights, file asunder a grate of yron, which stopt vp a hoale at the foot of the towne wall, by the which did flow a fountaine for the benefit of the inhabitants. The passage being made, Saint Cosme, Chaissey, Mingelle, and other Captaines enter, they cut in peeces a corps de gard towards the Carnes gate, force another neere to that of the Crown, open the gates, bring in their men that remained without the towne; and become masters thereof, to the prejudice of S. Andre being Gouvernor, who hauing no leysure to slip into the castell, brake his necke leaping ouer the wall, and his Lieutenant his thigh. Astoul Capitaine of the castell kept it almost three moneths against the towne: in the end being vnurnished of men, E some lost by sundrie accidents, some dead or languishing of sicknesse, and a good number oppressed vnder a myne, he yielded to depart with bagge and baggage.

On the other side, Sanfac by vertue of a Commission granted him from the Duke, to take from the Protestants whatsoeuer they held on that side Loire, had taken Douzi a place abandoned, then Noiers by composition, the which was ill obserued: most part of the souldiers were led to Troyes in Champagne, and aboue three-score passing through the streets were abandoned to the peoples rage. But Vezelay is seated too high vpon the top of a steep mountaine, hauing but one approach. Tarot and some other Gentlemen Protestants his neighbours had lately seized thereon, and Bloisset, Sarasin, Besançon, and Ribompierre Captaines defended it. Sanfac makes his approches with three companies: but at the first the Captaines cut off two companies, kill the Captaines and fortie souldiers, the third being scattered in the vine-yards retire in the night. Hee returnes with greater forces, makes his battery, opens 2. breaches, giues an assault and scalado, but in vaine: he loofeth aboue 300. men: and the besegged lost Sarasin with some 30. souldiers: Sanfac doth change and re-change his batterrie, he tries another assault, and (as at the first) he is shamefully repulsed with losse, but seeged: it was shamefull for Sanfac.

A but not discouraged. Some of his confident friends within the towne giue him aduice, that most of the Gentlemen are gone to field: he returnes with new artillerie, (his owne being broken or crackt) new munition, and new forces. Twelue Cannons begin a long and furious battery, takes away the defences, inlarge the first breaches, and makes the rampars euen with the ground. They giue a Generall assault, but the sege of La Charité, made the assaillants attempts contemptible to the besegged: the more earnest he is, the more obstinate they grow. Three thousand Cannon shot doth nothing abate their courage: contrariwise fifteen hundred souldiers of the assaillants being slaine, inflame the Vezelois, they kill the brauest of them vpon the rampars, at the breach and in the trench. Then Sanfac forced to retire, is contented to blocke them vp in the end of the yeare. Briquemault and Guerchy gouernour of la Charité, do afterwards releue them with some refreshings.

Ciuilt warres are but a perpetuall ebbing and flowing of losses and conquests. Poitiers had beene the Theater whercon the Princes had to their ruine played the first act of their tragedie, and now Saint Jean d'Angely must end the victories of the Duke of Aniou. The Duke putt vp with the happy successe of his victories, comes the 16. of October to beseege Saint Jean: but he finds not so easie approches as at the rest Piles commanded therein, who by sallies and skirmishes, shewes that they must come well armed, and at the first assault he kils many of their Captaines, and of their best souldiers. Montesquieu (hee that grew so famous by the murder of the Prince of Condé) died there, but too honorably for him. In the end Biron Generall for the artillerie, (seeing the resolution of the besegged) did mediate a truce, at the end whereof Piles should yeeld the towne, if within a certaine time succours came not, or an answer from the Princes. The day comes, when as Saint Seuerin leading forty horse, doth politickely deceiue both Sentinels and Guards, and vnder the name of a friend, slips into the towne. So the hostages deliuered on both sides, they begin againe to play and batter with their Cannon, and the towne-men to carry earth, make rampars, and to shoot with such a furie, as Sebastian of Luxemburg, Duke of Martigues, and Gouvernor of Britaine, found this towne fatall to lodge him in the monument of his Ancestors. During this battery, the Queene would honour the sege with the presence of the King her sonne, being then nine-teen years of age. But this bredde a ialousie betwixt the two brethren. Charles was quick, vehement, and some-what froward: Henry more tractable and courteous: and Charles euen then perswaded himselfe, that his mother would make him receiue a disgrace at Saint Jean d'Angely, to fauour the Duke her younger sonne, whose aduancement shee made shew to desire. The succeeding yeares will teach vs, that this impression made Charles to loue his brother best, being farther off in the North, then by his presence to enioy the Mothers affections, and to haue authoritie within the Realme.

Finally, the second of December, after two moneths sege, the King signed their capitulation: That they should depart with their goods, armes, horses, and Ensignes displayed, and for foure moneths should carrie no armes for the pretended reformed religion. But as this sege is famous for that it was valiantly followed and defended: so is it likewise famous by the breach of faith giuen by his Maiestie. At their going foorth, they spoile them of their armes, apparel and money: the duke of Aumale, and the Marshall of Vielleuile are not able to make good the Kings promise: nay, the duke of Anious presence cannot retrain their insolencies. They spoile their baggage, they take away their horses, they strip their men. And to to encrease their villanies, the regiment of Sarrieu, being lodged at Saint Julian, halfe a League off, comes ouerthwart, wounds, kils, murders and casts them into the riuer: and happie is he that can escape in his shirt to recouer Angoulême, where Piles and some others holding themselves (by reason of this trecherous and vnworthie vsage contrarie to the Law of armes) freed from the conditions whereunto they were bound by the Capitulation, went to the Princes to vnderstand their pleasures. The Historie obserues aboue ten thousand men of warre lost before Saint Jean, fise thousand Cannon shot spent, fise and twenty, or thirtie Commissaries of the artillerie slaine in their charge, many thrunk away, and in the end the campe was diminished eightene or twenty thousand men.

The army tyred with labour, and prest with want of victuals, and other discommodities, dislodging from Saint Jean d'Angely, gaue the Princes leysure to determin of their voyage:

A treaty of

and the King retiring to Angiers, assigned the Princes deputies thither, to begin the following year by the continuance of a treatie of peace begunne in the moneth of Nouember. Besunars la Noelle and Telligny come thither in Februarie, and returne with no other answer to the Protestants, but a libertie to liue within the Realme free from search in their houses, and for their safetie two townes, which Biron should name vnto them, in the which they might do what pleased them, not impugning the kings authoritie, nor the quiet of the Realme: his Maiestie offering to restore them to their charges, except such as had beene dismissed by the order of Iustice, and the money (growing by the sale thereof) received by the Kings commandement: but forbidding all exercise of religion, but of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish: banishing all Ministers out of the Realme, and requiring them to disarm, to send backe presently their forraigne forces, and to yeeld vp all Townes held by the violence and force of armes. In the meane time postes fle into England and Germany, and to diuert or stay the succours which the Protestants might expect from thence, the brute flies, that a peace is made in France.

The Princes and Admirall thinking they were but deuises to hinder their affaires, euery one prepares againe to put on harnesse: their forces were dispersed into diuers prouinces: those about Bourges had an enterprize vpon the towne, by the practise of a souldier, who by trecherie makes them to loose thirty men at the entrie, and as many prisoners. So hee that thinks to take, is often taken himselfe. The reduction of Poitou, had likewise brought Marans and the Castell of Beauvoir vpon the sea to the Kings obedience. Angoulesme and Rochell onely remained to the Protestants. They had lost Lusignan: but Blay, Taillebourg, the Isles of Xaintonge, Marennes, and Brouage, were yet at their deuotion. To trie Rochel the King threatens them by his letters, and by promises he seekes to win Pardaillan and Romegen, the Gouvernors of Blay and Taillebourg. They answer (saith the Historie) the King wisely, and Lansac courageously: You cannot be more grieved (said Pardaillan) to attempt to force me in this place: then I shal be, for the shame, losse and confusion, which I shal cause you to receive, or any other that shall attempt it. Romegen speaks in the same sense. The effect was more to be feared then words: yet Lansac attempted nothing against them. The Islands had much annoyed the seege of S. Iean d'Angely, and the Laniquenets escaped from Moncontour, were dispersed there. The Earle of Lude, Puigaillard, and la Riviere Puitaille, Gouvernours, D the one of Angiers, the other of Marans, with eight cornets of horse, and twenty ensignes of foot, force the said Islands, and make such a slaughter, as there remained not about three hundred fighting men.

La Noue the Princes Lieutenant in Guienne, studied to recouer Brouage, a place of great importance for the Rochelois, when as the Baron of la Garde attempting vpon Tonne-Charente, made both their enterprizes to proue vaine. Rochel is now blockt vpe on all sides. Lude and Puigaillard had an armie in Poitou: la Riviere-Puitaille the elder, held Marans and other places therabouts: the younger commanded in Brouage. Landereau Vice-admirall held Olone. The Brittons and Bourdelois cut off the Rochelois victuals by sea. La Garde, then Generall of their gallies, did runne oftentimes euen into their hauen: but to presse them on all sides, he would gladly haue beene master of Tonne-Charente. La Noue had vnder-taken the defence thereof, who vnderstanding the Barons practise, so planted his shor, as at his enemies first landing, he slue their Commanders, and many others, gaue liberty to the slaues, and became master of the galley: and if heat had not too soone transported them, the rest comming to enter into Charente, and resolute to land, they could not haue escaped death or prison. This gally did afterwards serue Romegen to beat the Catholikes in many places. And if la Garde preuailed nothing by force, his pollicies were of as small effect. So as he lost his time, men, and mony, and did nothing of moment.

Contrariwise, the defeat of some troups at Nouaille by the harguebuziers of La Noue, vnder the leading of Scipio an Italian Ingenger, and the recovery of Marans by La Noue, F from Chiperon Gouvernor of the place, after the death of the elder Puitaille lately deceased, was the cause of the winning of tenne or twelue other places therabouts, and gaue the Rochelois meanes to enlarge themselves. The spoile of Olone did enrich them, furnished them with 40. good vessels, with some armes and Canon, and a good number of prisoners, and diminished their enemies strength of about foure hundred fighting men. This reuiuing caused

A caused Puigaillard and Fernaque to make enterprises vpon Langon and Gué of Neluyre, and by the recovery of Lufon to molest Marans and Rochell againe, if that la Noue had had not speedily taken this fort from them that came to seize on it, and slue Sforza a valiant Gentleman, Captaine of a companie of Italians, who were come to charge him be-hinde in his retreat.

The Tower of Moric, the castle of La Graue, Talmonde, and the castle of Chise, being taken againe by Puigaillard, recompensed the losse of Lufon: and the conquests of Puigaillard, were at the same time crost by Puisant Gouvernour of Marans, by the death of captaine Dante, who scoured all Poictou, by the route of their company: and wounding in a manner, of all the members thereof, and by the ouerthrow of Chaumont and Gonlens, issued out off Angoulesme with two cornets of horse: by the death also of Guistiere Gouvernour of Saint Iean d'Angely: the ouerthrowe of young Ruiere Puitallé, the route of his men, and the losse of two Ensignes. But the death of captaine Herbelete, Cognes issued out of Angoulesme, which then held for the Princes, and the defeat of his troups famous, a season when as the second parle of peace was reuiuied.

Time brings many changes, now it fauours the Protestants, reuiues their courages, fortifies their hopes, and the Catholikes are new to beginne; the King was wearied with this variable continuance of warre, it drew his subiects from his obedience, ruined his Prouinces, wasted his treasure, and consumed his forces. The Queene-mother, since the enterprize of Meaux, did still nourish in her brest a fire of reuenge. She was wonderfully discontented, that the Protestants in the beginning of the first troubles had so violently opposed against her desire to rule, by the mutuall ruine of the one and the other. But there was paine and peril to suppress the heads of the Protestants: many murtherers, and many poisoners, offered themselves, but the most part drew backe when it came to the effect. Moreouer the Princes grew in age and iudgement, they framed themselves to affaires, they began to know the friends and enemies of the Common-weale. And on the other side many Noblemen of either partie, laboured to temper the humors, both of such as were best affected to the publike quiet, and of those that during these inciuill confusions, made a way for their ambitious designs: whilst that Biron and Telligny chiefe deputies, the one for the King, the other for the Princes, labour about a peace. Let vs see what course the Princes tooke since the battaile of Montcontour vntill the peace. A small ball of snowe rowled from a high mountaine, growes great in a short time, and becomes able to endure a great force. So the Councell whereby the Princes resolved to retire farre from the Conquerours armie, did much auaille them: for they assured their men, fortified themselves with newe troups, and consumed their enemies, in the taking and retaking of places which they had possessed.

But still the poore people suffer for great mens follies. Agemois and Quercy serues now as a good retreat for the Protestants. They finde there a fatte and fruitfull Country, E where by the spoile of the contrary party, they refresh their persons, and make a newe bodie. There is nothing but inroades, spoiles and robbings of the enemy: but there was violent warre about Tholoufa, and horrible fires in their houses which belonged to the Court of Parliament. They haue beene (sayd the Protestants) verie violent to burne them of our Religion, beheaded captaine Rapin, who carried them the Edict of peace from the King, and to commit many other intolerencies, whereof opportunitie now cries for vengeance. Doubtlesse the Iustice of God doth often-times send a wished encounter to bee reuenged of an indignity receiued. The Marshall of Danuille, La Valette, and some other Commanders of qualitie, made some sallies, with diuers variable euent, but not straying farre from their walles for feare of surprise.

F Carmain, Oriac, la Faye, Lesbos, Montefruc, and generally all they besiege (except Saint Felix, from whence the Gascons were repulsed in the assault, with the losse of fifty men, and the Vicount of Montclar hurt whereof he died at Castres) is forced, and the garrisons cut in peeces. During the armies aboad in Albigeois, the Princes, (notwithstanding the crosses of Escars, Pompadour, la Vauguion and others commanding three thousand men) being fortified with fixe or six hundred horse, brought from Rochelle by Beaudiné and Renty, send 1570. Piles into the countie of Rouffillon, where hee did spoile and greatly anoy the Spaniard, A whilest the Kings deputies conferred neere vnto Carcassonne, with Teligny, Beauvais and la Chaffessere, who going afterwards to his Maiefty, concluded what we shall see in brieft. Landucgoc, Viuaréz and Dauphiné, hauing fortified the army with about three thousand harguebuziers, most of them mounted at the countie-mens charge, in steed of those which Monbrun had (through fauour of the fort which hee built vpon Rosne right against Pufin) led away to refresh themselves in their countie, hauing surmounted the difficulties of the mountaines, and the Admirall being freed from grievous sicknesse, which had brought him to deaths dore, at Saint Estienne in Forest, the army comes into Bourgongne, where being fortified with fiftene hundred light horse, come from la Charité and the neighbour B garrious, vnder the command of Briquemault, they incounter a good occasion to aduance the peace.

Incounter at René le Duc.

It seemed to the protestants a matter of some difficulty, to obtaine a peace, vnlesse they approached neere vnto Paris: and to that end, the Admirall had suffered almost all his footmen to furnish themselves with horses, and aduanced by great iournies into the heart of France, whilest his troupes were fresh and lusty, and free from diseases. But he had before him, the Marshall of Cossé, the Kings Lieutenant in the absence of the duke of Aniou: who, to hinder the Princes approach to Paris, seeks means to fight with them. They incamped at René-le-Duke, a place not very strong of situation, from whence they thought to dislodge them with their canon, whereof the Princes were vnfurnished, and by diuers volles C of shot, to make them leaue certaine passages which they held. The Marshall la Valette, Stroffy and la Chastre, come with all speed, charge and recharge them, and at the first, they force them from a passage. Briquemault, Marshall of the campe, Montgomery and Ienlis, endure the shooke, they kill, hurt and take many: and by this firme resolution, make it knowne, that their lodgings are not to bee forced. So the Marshall sounds a retreat, and the Princes, to whom all itay was preiudiciall, being strengthened with new companies drawne out of Sancerre, la Charité, Antrain, Vezelai, and other places of their party, and furnished with some artillery: they turned head towards Paris. But a truce of ten daies, stayed all exploits of warre, betwixt them, and the Marshall. While the Barron of la Garde, Puigaillard and Riniere Puitaille, chiefe enemies to the Protestants, laboured to become D Maisters in Guyenne, and the neighbour countie. To that end, after they had overcome the troupes of horse and foote, led by La Noue, Soubize and Puvault, and by a shamefull chafe shut their companies into Rochell, they recover all the forts and places which had beene taken from them since the surpris of Marans. And the more to restraine the Rochelois, they build a fort at Lufon, vnder the command of capitaine Mascarom. They hoped this fort should be a bait to draw the Protestants to field, but hauing built it without contradiction, Puigaillard tries an other stratagem. Hee retires his forces into high Poictou, and giues out, that the Princes had gotten a great victory, and that he must by the dukes commandment, lead away his troupes with all speed: that by a strong ambush and turning head sodainely, he might charge the Protestants, and defeate them at their first approach. E Notwithstanding, La Noue and his companions keepe themselves quiet, giuing their troupes (amazed by their last fight) time to take breath, the which causeth Mascarom to slacke the gard of his fort.

The fort of Lufon besieged.

La Noue being aduertised, that the fort was to be forced, goes out off Rochelle with foure cornets, eleuen ensignes of French, and three hundred Lansquenets, which remained: Puigaillard gathers together speedily what troupes hee can, which now beganne to leaue him: and to shut vp La Noue betwixt Marans and Lufon: makes them to march two daies and a night to Saint Gemme, halfe a league from Lufon, but with one light repulse. Here his second policy of warre preuailes as little as the first. Hee faynes himselfe sicke, and giues out, that a burning ague detained him in his bed: then vnder colour of the deliury of Rouffiere a gentleman of Poictou, and others whom Puvault had lately taken in an encounter: hee sends a trumpet to assure them of this pretended sicknesse, and to discover the strength of the besiegers. But this spie was not cunning inough: he trips in his answers, and by his faintnesse discouers his maisters practises. Puvault extorts the truth by force: then shewing them, that they had to doe with men that were toyled and broken with their great

A great march, they dislodge from Saint Gemme to ioyne with La Noue. Puigaillard is aduertised that the enemy flies, and retires in disorder to Marans. He approacheth, enters the Bourg, and finding nothing but the nest, some run to the victuals, others to the spoyle. But they haue a contrary aduice. That the enemy is nere and in battaile. La Noue had lodged that country, where as Puigaillards horse could not passe but by small companies. La Noue commanded to the charge. S. Estienne and Bruneliere beginne it, against a hundred and fifty maisters, of the chiefe troupes of Puigaillard, and makes them to stagger. Puvault forceth through them, kils some, and amazeth the rest. Puigaillard and those that were best mounted, flee vnto Fontenay, foure leagues from thence: the footmen hemmed in on all sides, B and broken by the horse, presently giue way, and remaine at their mercy, without mercy, namely of the Lansquenets, who reuenge vpon them the blood of their countie-men, shed nere to Montcontour: Sixteene Ensignes, and two cornets were taken, fise hundred old souldiars slaine vpon the place, and thirty men at armes, with many Commanders and Officers of Regiments and companies. Seuen or eight hundred prisoners were sent away with white wands in their hands. The fort being valiantly assailed, and yeilded by Mascarom, added foure companies to the victory, and this victory caused the conquest of Fontenay le Conte, from whence the besieged retired to Niort: La Noue hauing lost his left arme in the siege.

The battaile
of Lufon.

C Oleron, Marenes, Soubize and Brouage, yeilded to the victors, where as the death of Riniere Puitaille, recompenced La Noue hurt. So as by the recouery of all that which the King held about Rochell, the Protestants coopt vp the Catholikes within the walles of Saint Iean d' Angely. The Prince Dauphin came into Poictou, to repaire Puigaillards losses, and to strengthen the forces of the Earle of Lude, for the making of some new attempt, when as peace concluded betwixt the King and the Princes, stayed the course of their triumphes, the eleuenth of August, and caused a suspension of armes, to renew it againe two yeeres after, with a more vnworthy and horrible proceeding. By this third Edict of peace, they had foure townes of safety, Rochelle, Montauban, Cognac and la Charité, to bee held two yeeres in the Princes names, and the Princes, with the chiefe Commanders of the Protestants, attending the full execution thereof, retired to Rochelle: the armies were dismissed, and the strangers conducted into Lorraine. Soone after, the Emperour Maximilian the second, gaue his eldest daughter in marriage to Philip King of Spaine (so the vnle married his Neece, but the house of Austria hath oft-times obteined such dispensations) and so our Charles in the towne of Meziens in the end of Nouember, tooke to wife Elizabeth the yonger sister, a wife and vertuous Princeesse.

The third Edict of peace.

King Charles marries the
daughter.

There was a peace concluded, but no full obseruation of the Edict: wherevpon the Princes sent Briquemault, Teligny, Beauvais la Nocle and Cauannes to Court. The King at their instance, sent commissioners throughout all the Prouinces of his realme. But there were some amongst them, who (not many yeeres before) had condemned the Admirall to bee E hanged. Amongst others, the Marshall of Cossé, and Proutiere maister of Requests, were at Rochelle, to consult with the Queene of Nauarre and the Admirall, about the meanes in general, to maintaine the realme in peace: and particularly to treat of a marriage betwixt Henry of Bourbon Prince of Nauarre, and Marguerite of Valois the Kings sister, and then to conferre with the Admirall touching the warre which his Maiefty seemed to pretend against the Spaniard in the Low-countries, to the protection whereof, hee was greatly sollicit. The Kings good countenance, and the gifts he gaue to the deputies, namely to Teligny, who seemed to bee greatly in his Maiesties fauour and likewise might doe much to perswade his father-in-law to come to Court, makes them at their returne to Rochelle, to extoll the Kings singular loue and affection to the Queene of Nauarre, the Princes, the Admirall, and to all the rest of their party, and to assure them by his commandment, that hee will not onely maintaine the peace, but also confirme it by the alliance of his owne sister, and that he desires to conferre by mouth with the Admirall, touching this new expedition of the Low-countries, and therefore they should make hast to goe vnto him.

And the better to confirme them in this belife, the King sends Biron after them with the same charge, and that he would procure the Queene his mother and the duke of Aniou his brother, F

This apparent meanes to confirme a publike concord did please the Admirall, beleueing this marriage should be the ground of a most happy peace, and the Queene of Nauarre feared least delay should alter the Kings good meaning. But the accomplishment of the marriage was hindered by some lets. The Pope made some difficulty to dispence therewith, as well by reason of the consanguinity of the parties, (the one being pettie-Nephew, the other grand-child of Francis the first King of France) as also for the difference of their religions. The Queene of Nauarre likewise made some scruple of this disparity of religion, of the ceremonies, and of the place of the solemnity. She would not haue the marriage celebrated after the manner of the Catholike Church, and feared the city of Paris, as most affected to their religion, and of long time an enemy to the house of Nauarre.

Pretexts for the low country warres.

Contrariwise, the King would haue Paris to bee the Theater, where this notable act should be solemnly celebrated in view of the capitall city of his Realme, without changing any thing in forme of royall marriage. In the end the respect of ciuill reason preuailed. As for the motiues of this warre pretended in the Low-country: (they were goodly in shew) for besides this hereditary hatred of the French against the Spaniard, being reuiued by the outrages and warres made in France by Charles and Philip his sonne, the remembrance whereof was yet fresh, they renewed the ancient quarrels of many possessions in the Low-countries, depending of this crowne. Moreouer they pretended new causes, which seemed lawfull to breake the alliance betwixt the two Kings. That his Maiesty had most certaine intelligence of poyson giuen by Philip to his wife, the Sister of our Charles, vpon some discontents and filthy ialousies. These reasons had a shew of truth, and the Admirall to the end the French (who cannot liue long together in mutuall concord, and that by a long use of warre breathed nothing but warre;) should not seeke some new seeds of ciuill diuision, held it good to diuert this vehement heate against some stranger and nation a farre off. Many necessary considerations fortified this ciuill councill. The forces of the Prince of Orange, and his brethren, who spoiled by the Spaniard of many rich possessions both in the Low-countries, and in the county of Bourgongne, had long time sought to recouer it by armes. The credit and fauour of the Low-countrie men in Germany, by reason of the exceeding cruelty of the duke of Alua. Lodowike of Nassau, brother to the sayd Prince, a man of great courage and resolution, prest it forward, and his presence was a spur to the Admirall. Moreouer, to the end it should seeme this warre was managed with the Kings consent, his Maiesty did suffer the Prince of Auranges fleet to ride about Rochell, annoying the Spaniards and Portugalls, which sailed vpon that coast for the trafficke of the Low-countries: and for Cont Lodowike, to sell the booty he had taken from the enemy freely and publicly at Rochell.

So the Admirall, a widower by reason of Charlot of Lauall deceased in the second troubles, after he had espoused the Contesse of Antremont in Sauoy, at Rochelle, and giuen his daughter Louyse to the Lord of Teligny to wife, hee comes to Court, relying vpon the Kings assurances, so often confirmed by messengers: and especially by the Marshall of Colfe, whom the King had sent to accompany him, presuming the Admirall would giue more credit to the Marshalls words, by reason of their familiarity.

The King receiued him with all demonstrations of loue (those of Guise leaue him the place, not to yeeld any thing vnto him, but to returne soone after with greater authority) and to take from him all ialousies and distrusts which were giuen him from all parts, the King at the first doth recompence the losses which the Admirall had sustained during the former warres, by the gift of a hundred thousand frankes, and grants him for one whole yeere, the reuenues which his brother the Cardinall of Chastillon enioyed (being lately deceased in England). He giues him a place in the priuy councill. Doth oftentimes confer F with him touching the warres of Flanders, and makes (shew to be governed therein by his aduice and councill: he honours him with that plausible name of father, and treats with him so familiarly, as the country tooke this familiarity for a seale of his Masters affection to the Admirall, and the people began now to murmure, that Charles not onely fauoured the Huguenots, but would shortly himselfe become a Huguenot. A cunning baite to free the

A free the Admirall from suspition by the aduertisements which had beene giuen him to the contrary. He could now tast no admonitions, his spirit was so transported with the Kings countenance and words.

Doubtlesse the wildome of man failes euen in the wisest, when it pleaseth him that giues it, to weaken the strongest spirits, and (by a iudgement incomprehensible to man) to cast a vayle before his eyes, and to make him vnable to conceiue the Iustice and horror of the iudgement which he meanes to display. For the better aduancing the enterprise of the Low-countries, the Admirall thought it fit the King should make a peace with Elizabeth Queene of England. They might treat it with a very honest colour, to the preiudice of the Spaniards. Elizabeth was not married, and Henry duke of Aniou had no wife, the dignity of so high an alliance was honorable for the duke, and the quality of a Kings brother was not to be contemned by the Queene: haue also in his yong age purchased great glory and reputation. This charge is giuen to the Marshall of Montmorency. But the issue did shew, that besides this negotiation of peace, their meaning was to abuse both the Admirall and all others whom it was expedient to abuse for the execution of the councill of Saint Cloud, and by the same practise to send the Marshall farre from court, least by his ordinary conuersing with the King, hauing a good iudgement, and smelling out the complots of this pittifull Tragedy, he should discover them to the Admirall his cousin: and by meanes of this new peace, the English in the midst of this indignity, should bee restrained from attempting of any thing in fauour of the Protestants, as it chanced. During this time the Admirall retires to Chastillon: and in the meane season they prepare a fleet at Bourdeaux and Brouage, vnder the command of Siroffy, Landereau and the baron of la Garde. The pretext was the warre of Flanders: yet had they expresse commission to attempt vpon Rochell, and by open or secret practises to get it into their owne power.

Peace with the English.

The Admirall hauing founded the sould, vpon his assurance to the Queene of Nauarre of the Kings singular affection to her and to all her house, in the end she goes to Blois, where as the Court remained. Here vpon falls out an accident, which made the aduancement of the said marriage more easie: the death of Pope Pius the fifth. Gregory the thirteenth, succeeded him, where vpon the King sent the Cardinall of Lorraine to Rome, to assist at the new election, and to procure of his successor a necessary dispence, for the accomplishing of the solemnity.

The Queene
of Nauarre comes to Court.

Some letters of the Cardinall of Pelvé (sometimes a scullion in the Colledge of Montaigu, and then seruant to the Cardinall of Lorraine during his study, and afterwards grown to bee a Cardinall) written vnto his maister, being intercepted by the way, conteyning amongst other things: That the Court of Rome did wonder greatly at the familiarity the King vsed to the Admirall, during his aboad neere his Maiesty: that it was fit to vse such policy, attending the execution of the priuy Councill, the which discovered sufficiently that which was generally spoken of throughout all France. This had beene concluded at Saint Cloud nere vnto Paris, amongst few, but it was common in many mens mouthes: and Lignerolles, E gouernor of Bourbonnois, one of the duke of Anious mignons (for that hee had blabbed out some thing which hee had learned in secret of his maister) did expiate the rashnesse of his licentious tongue, with the price of his blood. But wee shall see in our daies a more strange effect of Gods iustice, for that the last of our Kings of the race of Valois, shall end his life miserably in the same chamber where the fatall councill had beene held in his presence. Neither could the aduice of Pelue, nor any other, stay the Admirall from coming to Paris as soone as the King: beeing sollicit by his Maiesty, by many and sundry letters, to conclude fully of the marriage (besides they treated the marriage of the Prince of Condé with the Marquise of Lisle, the yongest daughter of the house of Neuers) and of the voyage of Flanders. The Queene of Nauarre, to whom this long delay was very troublesome, prepared all things necessary for so famous an act, but shee falls sicke of a quotidian feuer, the fourth of Iune, eightene daies after her arriual, and dies the fifth day after her sickness, growing (said the Physicians) of an extraordinary hardnesse of the lungs, with a great impostume, augmented by the great heat of the season, and her continuall trauell in the time of her health. A Princeesse of a notable courage, inuincible in aduersity, of a ready wit, iudicious, absolute in her actions, capable of councill, comprehending things with 1572. with a great viuacity of spirit, and deliuering her minde with an admirable grace, either A by word or writing: of a Iouiall complexion, and very pleasant in conuersation. But happie chiefly in this, that shee left vs a lawfull heire for to inherite this crowne, to redeeme it out of the handes of the stranger, and to preferue it with happinesse and prosperitie.

Many are amazed at this sodaine death, as an assured foretelling of some future mischiefe. The King, the Queene-mother, and all the Kings house shew a wonderfull sorrow: and to take away all suspicion of poyson, Charles commands the body to be opened, and to search the causes of her death. The Physitians report, there is no shew of poyson, but her braine was not opened. Some hold opinion, that an Italian, the Kings perfumer presented her B with a paire of gloues, which preuented her from beholding of that pittifull and bloody tragedie, which shall bee shortly acted. The continuall messages sent from Charles, had likewise drawne the Princes to Court, and this death did seeme to aduance the marriage, for she gaue vnto her sonne the kingdome of Nauarre, and now he beganne to enioy the title of King, and all his mothers succession. The Popes dispensation was necessary, without the which the Cardinall of Bourbon vnle to Henry, who was appointed to marry them, refused to proceed therein. In the end it comes, and the day of the consummation is appointed to bee kept the eighteenth of August.

Such were the actions of the Court, whilest that Cont Lodowike, La Noue, Sanconrs and Ienlis, to whom the King had giuen chiefe Commissions for the Belgike warre, had by C the taking of Monts in Hainault, drawne all the duke of Aluaes forces against them. Flushingue had slaine their Gouverneur, with the most part of the Spanish garrison, and repulsed those the duke had sent to recouer the towne. Many other townes of the Low-countries followed the like example. Holland and Zeland hunted after their liberty. Beginnings which seemed to draw after them a long continuance of great consequence: and the authority the King gaue to the aboue-named to prouide for the succour of Monts, and for the continuing of other like exploits, induced the Admirall to beleue firmly, that the King embraced this businesse without dissembling. According to this authority, Ienlis led fise hundred horse, and foure thousand foote, whereof the duke of Aluaes being aduertised, hee surprised him suddenly, defeated his troupes, tooke him prisoner with D many others, and slue many of his men.

The King seemed displeased with these newes, hee sends to Monduet his Ambassadour in the Low-countries, to procure the liberty of these prisoners: and suffers the Admirall to send such succours as hee could, to ioyne with the army of Reistres which the Prince of Orange had leauied: he caused money to bee made ready for the entertainment of the foote, which they esteemed foure regiments, and thirty companies of men at armes. The Ambassadour of Spaine was gone out of France. The Queene-mother likewise playing her part, seemed to bee ignorant of the Kings designs, and being informed thereof, she seemed ready to retire from Court. These reasons did still confirme the Admirall, Teligny and the rest in that beliefe: that the King concurred with the Admirall in E one will, to send the warres farre off into the King of Spaines countries, the which he had before kindled in the foure corners, and in the heart of this Realme, pretending to entertaine it there, and to maintaine himselfe with the ship-wracks of this crowne, and to seize thereon in time, as the attempt of his designs in our daies haue testified.

The Marshall of Montmorency returned from his Ambassage, bringing a mutual league offensive and defensive, with, and against al men, not naming any one: but the marriage, whereof hee had charge remained fruitlesse: which made many beleue that it was but a meere fiction, fit for the season, where they prepared a scaffold, on the which they should soone present a horrible spectacle. The Marshall either not to bee a spectator nor counsellor, or doubting to bee engaged in these publike and priuate furies, retired himselfe to his house. Rochell was in the meane time beleagard, souldiars arriued hourly, giuing terrible threats against the towne, who beganne to cry to the Admirall for succours. In other townes they heard secret murmurings, which terrified the most cleere sighted amongst the Protestants. These aduertisements found continually in the Admiralls eares. But hee continues alwaies like vnto himselfe, constant in the midst of all motions,

A motions, and grewe resolute against all such as laboured to call him from Court, either by mouth or writing. As for the house of Guise (saith hee) whercof they will put mee in feare, the King hath taken order, making us to sweare before him to continue friends: and as for them of the Religion, the marriage of Madam Marguerit, whom his Mostie giues not to the king of Nauarre alone, but as it were to all those of the party, to ioyne himselfe vnto them by an indissoluble union, is the finishing of their quiet and safety. To conclude, he will bee no more troubled touching the Kings ill meaning, nor the Queene-mothers, the duke of Anious, the Guisens, nor any others.

And that which fetles the Admirall the more in his conceit, he finds the King, (after the death of Sigismund King of Poland) to affect the pursute of that crowne in fauour of his B brother. Charles was cleere-sighted in affaires of State; hee was yong, yet of a quick and ready wit, and (if bloody and furious counsels had not peruerterd him) without doubt hee might haue brought forth better fruites, and this Monarchy had bene freed from the miseries which haue since ruined it. His brother had great credit generally in France: his mildnesse made him pleasing to his Mother, and his liberality, to the people. Hee desired rather to see him command farre off then nere. And the Admirall, who knew the duke of Aniou to be an irreconcilable enemy to the Protestants, supposed that the King would by his absence settle a firme peace: that Henry being confined in Poland, his adherents would grow more mild: that the house of Guise disappointed of this support, would teare the Kings C lookes, the which some-times appeared terrible: and that Charles would soone discharge the Queene his Mother from the gouernment of affaires, and take it wholly vnto himselfe, as already he made shewes of his intent.

The Admirall seeing Iohn of Montluc Bishop of Valence, a man of iudgement, and practised in negotiations, employed in this Ambassage, hee fed himselfe with new hopes. And contrariwise, Montluc (fore-seeing the imminent storme,) was verie glad to bee neither a counsellor nor a witnesse of the miseries that were like to fall vpon the Protestants. And indeed hee had before councelled many of the principalls amongst them not to medle in this imaginary warre of Flanders, but to retire in time to their houses, and not to trust ouer-much in the goodly shewes of Court, considering the estate of the D great, and the ill will of the people of Paris. But thus God confoimes the iudgement, and blinds the vnderstanding of such as hee referes for an example to their posterity. Oh France, my haire stands vpright, and I tremble, to enter into the relation of so inhumaine a Tragedy! And shall wee neuer be satisfied to heare the lamentable and so cruell slaughter of our country-men? what man would not be troubled? what minde would not be oppressed with heauinesse and griefe, to see so much blood vnprofitably spilt in our cities, which should be carefully preferred for the defence of our country against strangers and common enemies? yet let vs passe this dangerous passage: the course of times makes vs to proceed.

A great number of Noblemen, both Catholikes and Protestants, repaired from all parts, E to the solemnizing of this marriage. Those of Guise come, bringing with them a great traine of men of all qualities faithful vnto them. The water which moues by little and little, the birdes which houer aboue it, and the ayre colder then of custome, foretell a storme to come. So the common murmurings, the stirring of the quarter-masters, and other captaines of Paris, the Kings gardes dispersed through the City, the ordinary threats against the Protestants, were certaine testimonies, that this marriage should be seasoned more with blood then water. The day appointed comes: the Cardinall of Bourbon marries the parties vpon a high scaffold, built before the doore of our Ladies Church at Paris. Foure daies are spent in plaies, feasts, dancing and masks: the which finished, the King protests to the Admirall, that he will answer and satisfie the Protestants requests. Euery one of their Churches had their Deputies in Court, for many affaires, where in the Admiralls authority was very necessary. They ought a great summe of money to the Germanes, due for their entertainment in former warres: for the payment whereof, the King had suffered them to taxe themselves to the fit part of their citates. The Commissioners and Receiuers prest the collection, being desirous to make an end of that businesse, the day of payment being past. Hereon the Admirall treated with the Priuie Yyy council, 1572. Councel, on Friday the two and twentieth of August, where the duke of Anjou in the Kings A absence was president.

At the rising of the councell, the Admirall hauing attended on the King, who went to play at Tennis, he retired himselfe to his lodging at dinner time, beeing accompanied with fifteene or sixteene Gentlemen: and reading a petition, when as being about a hundred paces from the Louvre, a Harguebuze shot from the window of a lodging nere by, belonging to Villemur, some-times Schoole-maister to the duke of Guise, carries away the fore finger of the right hand, and wounds him in the left arme. They breake downe the doore of the lodging: they find the Harguebuze, but not him that discharged it. This was Maureuel (vnder a counterfet name of Bollan one of the Kings gardes) a fit man for such murders: who mounting vpon a Genet of Spaine which was prouided ready for him, fled by Saint B Anthonies gate to a place of safety.

The Admirall
hurt.

The King plaied, and vpon the first report of this hurt: Shall I neuer haue quiet (said hee) shs' I daily see new troubles. And casting his racket to the ground, hee retired to the Louvre, and swears with an execration to the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Condé (who were come vnto him to complaine of this outrage) to take such exemplary iustice of the offender, his fautors and adherents, as the Admirall and his friends should haue cause to rest satisfied. He presently commands to pursue him that shot (but they goe slowly after him) hee appoints three of the Parliament to make informations against the offender, Thou, Morfan and Viole: he leaues onely two gates open with great gardes, vnder collour C to search for such as were priuie to this outrage, putting the whole city into armes. The Queene-mother seemes to bee discontented. They doe great wrong vnto the King (cries shee): if hee should suffer this crime unpunished, they would in the end attempt against his owne house. These counterfet speeches retaine the King of Nauarre and the Prince of Condé, who had desired leaue to retire themselves, but then they made no more mention of leauing the Court. Charles himselfe, and Katherin his mother, come in the afternoone to visit the Admirall. The Admirall shewes vnto him the miseries which the breach of the peace would bring vnto France: he beseecheth him to chase away these mu-tinies, and to maintaine his promised faith, wherevpon he was come to Court, and to pro-uide for the preferuation of the realme. But the Queene-mother knew well how to preuent him, least he should acquaint the King with some secrets, touching the preferuation D of his Estate.

Treachery in a King.

The King protests againe to be exceeding sorry: that this act toucheth his honour, and that hee will bee reuenged, so as the memory thereof shall remaine for euer. Hee perswades the Admirall to suffer himselfe to be carried to the Louvre, for the safety of his person: that it was to be feared, least the multitude stirred vp by the authors of his hurt, should fall into some greater mutiny. Hee also aduiseeth the Gentlemen Protestants, to lodge about the Admirals lodging, least (said he) that being dispersed through the city, they should receiue some wrong. But to shew that hee would not forget any thing that might concerne the Admirals safety, seeing the griefe of his wound would not suffer him to be trans- E ported, he commands Coffeins capitaine of his gardes, to giue the Admirall as many of his garde as he pleased, and to suffer no Catholike to enter. And least any man should grow amazed hereat, the King writes to the Gouvernours of the Prouinces, to the chiefe townes, and Magistrates: That hee would take such order, as the authors of so wicked an act should bee knowne and punished. And to his Ambassadors with forraigne Princes: that they should make it knowne to all the world, that this outrage doth displease him. The Queene-mother writes in like manner, but this was onely to keepe euery bird within his nest. In the meane-time the dukes of Anjou and Guise, tooke councell of that which they had to doe the night following. Saturday in the morning, it is bruted throughout the city, that the Protestants did threaten the house of Guise. Herevpon the dukes of Guise and Aumale goe vnto the F King, and say vnto him: that of late they haue found their seruice to bee little agreeable to his Maiesty: that if he were pleased to see them retired to their houses, they were ready to depart. Go (saith Charles vnto them with a frowning countenance) where you please, I will haue you at all times, if you be found guilty of the Admirals hurt. So making shew to be discontented, they goe to horse, and many with them, yet meaning to lie in Paris.

Paris

A Paris was a pit-fall to intrap the chiefe of the Protestants: they being dead, the basest sort of that party, would in all likely-hood remaine quiet. The time now offered a fit opportunity of reuenge, the which should not bee lost. This councell was taken after dinner at the Tuilleries, by the King, the Queene-mother, the dukes of Anjou, Neuers, Retz and Tauan-nes. The King of Nauarres life, with the Prince of Condé, were put in ballance, the warres had beene managed in their names: If they liue (sayd one) they will serue as an ensigne, to reuiue those Huguenots which shall remaine in diuers Prouinces, and shall euery day minister motiues of confusions. Contrary-wise, the Admirall and the principals being taken away, it shall be easie to restraine these yong Princes, not onely not to attempt any innouation, but also in time to win the Kings good fauour by their seruices: also the indignity of B the fact would purchase an insupportable hatred amongst strangers. God disposed the hearts of the councell to this second aduice, so as they will imbrace the Catholike religion, and liue vnder the obedience of his Maiesty. As for the rest (whom the fury of their armes should touch) they might with a goodly pretext, leaue to the ancient quarrell of the Guis-iens against the Admirall, and take for an excuse, the feare they had least the Huguenots should seeke a reuenge for his hurt. To lay all the hatred vpon the Guisians, they giue the charge of this businesse to the duke of Guise: they appoint him the meanes, the time, and the ministers of the execution.

The King resolves to maifice the Protestants.

The night being come, the duke calls vnto him the captaines of the Suisses, and other C companies (whom to that end they had drawne into the city) and deliuers his charge vnto them, which was, to roote out the Admirall and all his partisans. Hee exhorts them to bloud and spoile, and disposeth his troupes in some speciall places. Then he giues aduise vnto the Prouost of the Marchants, the Sheriffes and quarter-maisters: that throughout all France, the like should bee done to the Huguenots as at Paris. That the palace-bell ringing at the breake of day, shall giue the signall: and the marke of these executioners should be a handkerchefe tied about their armes, with a white crosse in their hats, that they should put their men in armes, and be at mid-night in Towne-house, to receiue order what they had to doe.

The duke of Guise giues order for the massacre.

They assemble at mid-night, and place many gardes in the streetes. Some Gentlemen D lodged nere vnto the Admirall, rise at the noise of their armes, and the light of their lamps, and going into the streetes, they inquire of the first they meete, what this assembly of armed men meant at so vnseasonable a time. A doubtfull answere being giuen them, makes them to repaire to the Louvre, to discover more. Here the gardes goe from words to blowes, and fall vpon them. The duke of Guise parts from the Louvre, accompanied with the Knight of Angoulesme, bastard to Henry the second, the duke of Aumale, Cossiens, Sarlaboux, Goas, Atin a Piccard, Hausfort an Auvergnac, and Besmes a Germaine, with some Harguebuziers of the Kings, and all the duke of Anjous garde. The alarum-bell rings at Saint Germaine Auxerrois, and they publish throughout the city: that the Huguenots had conspired against the King, the Queene-mother, and all the chiefe in Court. Cossiens E knocks at the Admirals gate: hee enters at two of the clock in the morning, the foure and twentieth day of the moneth, stabs him that comes to open it, forceth the dores of the lodging, enters with seuen or eight armed. Besmes a household seruant to the duke of Guise, offers the Admirall the point of his sword. Herevpon the Admirall being risen vpon his feet, and couered with his night gowne, sayd: Young man, thou shouldest haue respect vnto my old age, and infirmities, but thou shalt no way shorten my daies: hee thrusts him through the body, and then doubles it on his head. Atin shootes him through with a pistoll: and when as these three wounds were not able to ouerthrow him, Besmes wounds him on the legge; euery one of the rest giues his blow, and thus they cast that body miserably to the ground, whom liuing and in health they durst not looke in the face. The duke F of Guise hearing the noise of their armes in the base Court, enquires if it be done, and commands them to cast him out at the window: who yet breathing, laies hold on the pillar: but these butcherly murderers hurle him downe head-long, where the duke wiping his face with a handkerchefe. I know him (saith hee) it is the very same: and so spurnes him with his foote, then going into the streete: Courage companions, wee haue begunne happily, let vs proceed to the rest, the King commands it. An Italian of the household of the duke of Neuers, cuts off his head, and carries it to the King and Queene-Mother, which causing it to be imbaulmed, sent it to the Pope and to the Cardinall of Lorraine, for an assurance of the death of his most capitall enemy.

The Protestants massacre.

The palace clocke strikes, and the people flie to the Admiralls lodging like madde men, one cuts off his hands, another his priuy members: and for the space of three daies, they dragge this poore carcasfe with all indignity through the streetes, and then they carry and hang it by the feete at Montfaucon. His lodging is spoiled, his house-hold seruants murdered. Those which attended on the King of Nauarre and Prince of Condé, are driuen out of their chambers: (they were in the Louvre, where the King had lodged them, to the end (sayd hee) that (those of Guise hauing the people at their deuotion) they should not in like manner feele the effects of their violence) and murdered in the base Court, the Noblemen and Gentlemen lodged in the Admiralls quarter, vndergoe the like fortune. The like fury oppresseth the other Protestants throughout the city and suburbs, of all ages, conditions and sexes, men, women, and children, rich and poore. There is nothing to be heard in Paris, but a horrible noyse of armes, horses and Harguebuzes: a lamentable cry of people going vnto death, a pittifull complaint of such as cryed for mercy, and the pittifull showts of murderers. The streetes are strewed with carcases, the pauements, market-places, and riuer died with blood. One day alone (by the murtherers saying) hath ended the quarrell, which neither pen, paper, decrees of Iustice, nor open warre could see determined in twelue yeeres. About ten thousand soules makes this Sunday famous for euer, polluted with the spoyling of goods, and the effusion of their blood that were a sleepe, disarmed, and at such a season as they thought themselves most safe. And doubtlesse the horrible catastrophes happened since to our Charles, to his brother and successors, and to the bretheren of the house of Guise, in the last acts of their liues, and generally to all this realme, euen vnto our daies, forceth vs to confesse: that mans blood violently spilt, when as the manner of it may not lawfully be qualified with the name of Iustice, cannot please his sight, who hath created them to his own image and likeness, and fels them deere to the authors of this effusion. The fame of this massacre, had already passed from the city to the Suburbs, when as the Earle of Montgomery, John of Ferrieres Vidame of Chartres, Beauvais la Noüe, Fontenay, and many Gentlemen, lodged in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, perceiuing a number of men to crosse the riuer, to make them equall with their companions: they abandon their baggage, goe sodenly to horse and saue themselves with speed, being pursued halfe a daies journey by the duke of Guise. But he that should haue brought the keyes of Saint Germaines gate, hauing mistaken them, gaue them some leifure to get the aduantage.

The King aduowes the murder.

The King sends for the King of Nauarre and the Prince of Condé, and giues them to vnderstand: That hauing bene crost many yeeres with a continuance of warre, he had in the end found an assured meanes to cut off all moeues of confusions to come: that by his commandement they had slaine the Admirall (the pernicious author of fore-passed troubles) that now they did the like to others in the city, that were infected with the poyson of heresie, and the ministers of his wickednesse. That he remembered well the discomforts he had receiued by their two meanes, making themselves the heads of a troupe of desperate men. That now the cause and oportunitie giues him meanes to bee reuenged of such outrages: but notwithstanding he doth pardon their offence, by reason of consanguinity and their young age, beleeuing that all had bene committed, not by their fault and counsell, but by the Admirall and other wicked subiects, who now haue suffered and doe suffer a iust punishment due to their deserts, so as hereafter they repaire their faults past, by fideliry and obedience, and renouncing the doctrine of their prophane superstition, they cleaue to the Catholike Religion, and retorne into the communion of the Church. That hereafter hee will haue but one Religion within his Realme, euen that which hee hath receiued from his Ancestors: that they should aduise whether they would obey him in this point, if not, let them resolute to yeeld their heads to the like punishments of their companions.

The King of Nauarre beseecheth his Maiesty to remember his promise, and the alliance lately contracted, and not to force him in the religion which hee hath learned from his

A his infancy. The Prince of Condé answers: that the King hath giuen his faith, to all them of the Religion, and that he cannot perswade himselfe hee will breake so sollemne an oath. As for the obedience (saith he) you require of mee, I haue faithfull performed it vnto this day, neither will I hereafter stray in any thing from my duty. But as for my religion, my Liege, I am resolute to continue constant and (with the hazard of my life) maintaine it to be true: you haue granted me the exercise thereof, and God hath giuen me the knowledge, to whom I must yeeld an account, leauing my body and goods to the disposition of your will. This resolute answer puts Charles into choller, who full of threats, giues the Prince but three daies liberty to aduise, whether he would soone loose his head vpon a scaffold. In the end, both abiure the doctrine they followed, and by the intercession of the Cardinall of Bourbon their vnckle, they obtained pardon of the Pope, and were receiued into the bosome of the Church.

A noble resolution of a young Prince.

After the massacre, those of Guise, according to the conclusion of the counsell, should retire themselves into some one of their houses out of Paris, and Charles should expressly charge and command the Gouvernours of Prouinces and townes, to obserue the Edict of peace, and to punish the breach thereof seuerely, to the end the people of France, and their neighbours, should impute all the fury of this massacre, to the ancient quarrell of those of Guise, with the house of Chastillon. But the foulness of the fact might heape vpon them and their posterity, the hatred of all men, with whom humane society and vertue is in recommendation. For they had not spared an infinite number of learned men, of reuerent old men, honest virgins, honourable matrons, women with child, chaste maidens, young schoolers, and little infants hanging at the breasts of their mother. Arming themselves therefore with the peoples loue, they refuse to goe out of Paris, handling the matter so politickely, as they cause the King to auouch all that had bene done. So Charles writes other letters to his Ambassadors and Gouvernours, aduertising them. That the tumult which had happened concerned not religion, but the preferuation of his estate, his house and person, against the practices of the Admirall, and some other seditious persons, who had ioyntly conspired his death, his Mothers, and his bretherens, and therefore hee would haue his Edict of pacification religiously obserued. Yet if any Huguenots (moued with these newes of Paris) should assemble in armes, they should roote them out, as perturbors of the publike peace, referring the surplusage of his will, to the credit of the bearer. And the better to authorise this approbation, the six and twenty day of August, Charles with his bretheren assists in Parliament, all the chambers beeing assembled, where sitting in his seate of Iustice, he declares openly, that those things which had chanced in Paris, were done by his owne proper motion and commandement, yet making no mention of the cause. Christopher of Thou the chiefe President, commended his zeale in the name of all the company.

The Admirall accused of conspiracy.

But to what end did hee write the contrarie the next daie, to his Officers and the Magistrates of Townes; That to his great griefe, the Admirall his cousin, and some others of his partie, had bene slaine at Paris: commanding them to preuent all mutinies and murthers, and to proclaime, that euery man should remaine quiet in his house, without taking of armes, or giuing any offence: and to giue order that his Edict of pacification bee exactly obserued: and yet the same day to publish a declaration of the former tenour, conteyning, that by his expresse commandement, the Admirall and other his complices had bene slaine, not for matter of Religion, but to preuent the execution of a wicked practise made by them, against the Kings person, the Queene-mother, his bretheren, the King of Nauarre, (this was for a colour of excuse, to such as would obiekt, why then was this Prince saued from ship-wracke, and it may bee for loue of him, the Prince of Condé his cousin,) and generally against their houses, and the house of France?

Doubtlesse there was small likely-hood, that a little troupe of men, disperfed some in the suburbs, others within the city in small numbers, should presume to attempt any thing against the Estate. Charles had both night and day his ordinary guards, French, Swisses and Scottishmen: the most of the Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen of the realme were in Court to honour the marriage. Those which had accompanied the King of Nauarre and 1572. the Prince of Condé, had no other armes but their swords: and for a gage of their innocency, had brought for the most part their wiues, children, sisters, and kinsfolke, studying onely to shew themselves at the Tilt and Tourney. The accusation made no mention of time, place, or adherents, neither of the meanes, or any witnesses of this conspiracy. If it had bene plotted since the Admirals hurt, three hundred Gentlemen vnarmed, which had accompanied him, could they haue effected any thing, vnder a Commander, tied by both the armes, and ready to see the one cut off by the aduise of the Physitians and Chirurgians, in a mighty city, and against about three-score thousand men, ready to be opposed at the first alarm? Moreover, the King of Nauarre and Prince of Condé, who had bene still present at counsell, would they haue blemished their honours and houses with so great an infamy? And if their innocency had freed them from the common danger, the consultations of the Admirall and his followers, had they not bene very childish at such a time, in such a place, among so many naturall French-men come with him, who had neither goods, kinsfolke, pleasure, nor content without the Realme? Besides, if the Admirall were suspected of this attempt, might they not haue committed him presently to a safe prison, in forme of his practises, and take such conclusions as the crime might deserue according to the lawes? To conclude, admit the Admirall after his hurt, or else his friends had giuen forth some bad speeches, must the same punishment deuoure so many persons, who conuersed onely with their bookes and papers, with their traficke, and with their worke, so many women, who dreamt but of their hufwifery, so many virgins and infants, whose age and condition kept them from the conference of any counsell?

As for the attempt against the King of Nauarre, that accusation is friuolous. Had not the Admirall him in his power, for the space of three yeeres? what benefit should he reape by his death? Haue they not conuersed long together with an humble and sincere respect of the Admirall towards him, and a perfect loue of the sayd King to the Admirall: but omit all other reasons that might refute this slander: let vs onely obserue the testimony which Montluc giues in the seuenth booke of his Commentaries, vpon this subiect. The Queene-mother (saith he) did me the honour to write vnto me, that they had discovered a great conspiracy against the King and his Estate, she which was the cause of what had happened. I knowe what my belief was, it is not good to offend ones master. The King did neuer forget, how the Admirall made him retire in hast from Meaux to Paris: wee loose our iudgments suddenly, and doe not dreame the Kings haue greater hearts then we haue, and doe sooner forget seruices then offences. And a little aboue: My Lord the Admirall was ill aduised, to thrust himselfe into Paris, to shew that he gouerned all. I wonder, that so aduised and wise a man, should commit so grosse an error. He paid deere for it: it cost him his life, and many more.

The particularities of such, as during this horrible butchery, haue shed their bloods for religions sake, at Meaux, Troyes, Orleans, Bourges, la Charité, Lions, Tholouza, Bourdeaux, Rouan, and other townes, in villages, and in the open fields, as they sought to saue themselves without the realme, haue bene obserued in other workes that are extant, and the blood of these murdered persons, which amount to about thirty thousand, haue dyed the earth, and made the waters red, haue cried so loude, that the heauens haue continued their vengeance, ouer great and small, for so many yeeres, as there remains scarce any one of the authors of this violent fact. Brittan and Picardy remained reasonably quiet: Champagne and Bourgongne shed little blood, through the policie of them of Guise, that all the blame might light vpon the King (as also they had saued many of the chiefe Protestants in the midst of the fury of this Parisien euen-song.) In Auvergne Saint Heran put more money into his cofers, then hee shed blood in his gouernment. In Dauphiné there were some murders committed. In Prouence, the humanity of the Earle of Tende restrained the hands and swords of the bloody-minded.

In the end, the people (glutted with the blood, and cloied with the spoiles of the murdered Protestants,) grow quiet, and the King appoints an extraordinary Iubilé with generall processions, where his Maiesty assisted with the Queene his mother, his brethren, and the Court, of purpose to giue thanks to God, for that which had so happily succeeded. There were yet some thornes stuck in Charles his feet: Rochel, Sancerre, Montauban, Nismes, Aubenas, Milliaud, Priuas, Mirebel, Andure and other small townes of Viarets and Seuennes, serued

A serued as a Sanctuarie for the Protestants that were escaped, to keepe them from daunger. Rochell was not to be dealt withall, and it seemed that industrie and secret practises should preuaile more then open force. Srossy and la Gard: will releue the inhabitants with men to keepe it, and vsfurnish them of victuals, requiring a quantitie to refresh their army. But they had men inough; a great number were fled thither, and many Protestant souldiars, whom the hope of the voyage of Flanders entertained in the Kings army, slipt hourly into their towne. Their priuiledges likewise did free them from garrison, and as for victuals, they had for their prouision, but could not spare any. Srossy and la Gard spent both time and money in vaine about Rochell: they therefore lend Biron vnto them for their Gouernor, with expresse commandement to receiue a garrison. They answer: That they cannot beleue that that charge comes from the King, who commaunded the strict obseruation of the Edict, and grants them the vse of their ancient priuiledges vnder his obedience. And for a testimonie, they produce the Kings letters of the 22. and 24. of August, whereby his Maiesty layes the motiues of the sedition vpon them of Guise, saying: That he had much ado to prelerue himselfe in the midst of his guards, in his Castle of Loure. As for the reasons which made them to auoid all the surprises and baits, of such as Biron sent to treat with them, they vsed the meanes which politicke wisdom doth vsually furnish in such accidents: offering notwithstanding to accept Biron, so as the troupes may bee retired from thence; the exercise of their Religion to remaine free, and that hee bring no forces into the Towne.

Biron summons them by vertue of his authoritie, and vpon refusall proclaimes warre against them: and euen then, vnder colour to giue the armie at Sea meanes to disperse it selfe, he labours by all meanes to cut off their victuals and prouisions, and to weaken them of their men. The King by his Letters-patents of the 8. of October, calls home all that were fled out of diuers townes, saying, That as a good father of a family, he had pittie of his pore subiects, being out of their houses: and for not coming, did seaze and declare their goods forfeit. Yet the excuses which the King made vnto the Pope, to the Duke of Alua, and to the Ambassador of Spaine, that the brutes of the Belgick warre, and all the former Councils had tended to no other end, but to the ruine of the Huguenots: that his intent was to liue in peace and good correspondency with the Catholike King: and the Commissions he had sent to the Gouernors of Prouinces, to degrade all Protestants from their Offices and publike charges, although they were readie to renounce their Religion, except such as advanced to meane offices, were continued by the King, abjuring according to a forme set downe by the Colledge of Sorbonne, and to searce for all Protestants, that during the troubles had had the command of armes, or townes of warre, made this repeale of Charles to be wonderfully suspected.

Hereafter they vie al acts of hostility against the Rochelois: such as they know to be of the Towne, are kept prisoners, and put to their ransom: shippes that sayled towards the port were stayed, all merchandize belonging to the Rochelois seazed and confiscated. They therefore hasten the succours which the Count Montgomery, the Vidame of Chartres and others, prepared for them in England. The 25. of October they set sayle, but not able to approach, they returned backe. Those of Sancerre hauing refused to receiue a gouernour and garrison from the hands of La Chastre Gouernor of Berry, were beleaguerd in the beginning of October, Cadaillet Groome of the Chamber, and the Kings Hunts-man, very well knowne in the towne as an ancient seruant to the Earle of Sancerre, was sent to conferre with them: he brought the Inhabitants to that point, as some desiring, and others refusing: the Lord of Fontaines beeing a Catholike, his brother surprizeth the Castle, by the means of some inhabitants, who shut themselves into it with him: but the resolution, and the greater number of the Protestants displaced them within foure and twenty houres, as Fontaines came to their succors. So as La Chastre prepares now for open force, whereof we shall see the progresse in the beginning of the following yeare. This vnworthy and strange proceeding against the Protestants, had made the French name hatefull to strangers, especially in Poland, and did much trouble the negotiation, in fauour of the Duke of Aniou. Moreover, the Protestants both within and without the Realme, layd plots which in short time might produce dangerous effects. To make the Bishops negotiation more easie, and to crosse

War against the Rochelous.

1572. crosse the proiects of others, they obserue hereafter some forme of iustice against any one A that were found after the furie of the massacre. Briquemaunt a Gentleman of threescore and ten yeares old, and Cavaignes Master of Requests vnto the King, (both inward friends vnto the Admirall, and of great reputation) were of the number. They threaten them with an extraordinary torture, if they set not downe vnder their hands, to haue conspired with the Admirall, the death of the King, his breethren, the Queene-mother, and of the King of Nauarre, promising them pardon if they demand it, in aduowing that wherewith they are charged. we will neuer (said they) accuse innocents, nor our selues for so execrable a crime. The Commissioners not able to extort from them any such confession, they were both by sentence of the Court, as guilty of high treason, vnworthily hanged the 27. of October, in the presence of the King, Queene-mother, her two other sons, and the King of Nauarre. To the same execution was added the like decree against the Admirall. His bodie had beene taken from Mountfaucou and secretly buried, the which the greatest search of his enemies could neuer discouer. They therefore make the forme of a man, dragge it through the citie, and then cause it to be hanged. Moreover, the King commands by his letters-patents, That those of the pretended Religion should be maintained in safetie in their houses, bodies, goods, and libertie of consciences. And to excuse what was past, they cast abroad many libels, defaming the memorie of the Admirall and his followers. They giue new charges to the Ambassadors being in Germany, Poland, England, Suisseland, and other forraigne countries, to iustifie the actions of the King, and Catholikes, to the confusion and dishonor of the Admirall and his partie. But all these proceedings were, meanes to discouer the iniquitie of their pernicious counsels.

For the intent of this declaration in fauor of the Protestants were presently discouered by the tenor of the letters which the Duke of Guise did write vnto his wife, the day that Briquemaunt was executed. The King (said he) hath decreed in Council, vnto to route out this seditions vermine. But few would be taken, and the practises against the Prince of Aungars and others being discouered by this letter, vanished into smoake. In the mean time they continued their attempts against Rochell: and Esars being chosen chiefe of the war for the Rochelois, hauing taken one of the Baron of la Gards gallies, who had approached too neare vnder colour of bringing a letter to the whole bodie of the towne, caused Biron D to publish the Kings Letters-patents, giuen the sixth of the moneth, and to make open warre to the Rochelois. But Charles was not willingly drawne to armes: he sees well that he had kindled a fire which he should not quench when he would. He now tries the last stratagem. La Noue sent home by the Duke of Alua, after the taking of Monts in Hainault, had great credit among the Protestants, as one of the chiefe Captaines which remained. The King sollicitus him to be a meanes to bring the Rochelois to composition. The impossibilitie of the thing (answers he) and my conscience will not suffer me to aduise the Rochelois to offer their throates to them that will cut them. Yet the Kings authoritie makes him to accept of this charge: but rather with an intent to serue the Rochelois, and to retire himselfe from Court, then to hurt them of his Religion: After he had giuen an account of his Ambassage to Biron, who was then at Saint Iean d'Angely, he returnes to Rochell, where he performed his dury so well and carefully, as they acknowledged him for one of the chiefe instruments of the preservation thereof during the siege.

A Comet.

Then appeared there a new starre in heauen, hauing the forme of a Lozenge of foure points, and continued (beginning the ninth of Nouember) the space of nine moneths, immoveable (by the saying of the Astronomers) the first three weekes, resembling that which serued as a guide to the Wise-men that came out of the East, to worship Iesus Christ in Bethlehem. The nineteenth of the said moneth, the King by another Edict, called home all his subiects to their houses, vpon paine of losse of their goods, and sollicitated the Protestant Suisses, to chafe away such as were fled to them for succour. But the Ambassadors in France was of no force, and the taking of Sommers by the Marshall of d'Anuille from the Protestants, the perswasions of Gourdes to draw into the bosome of the Catholike Church Monbrun, Mirabel, and Les Digueires (who euen then made shew of a most valiant, most wife, and most happie Captaine for their partie, and shall hereafter haue a good share in our Historie) the assurance he gaue them, That the King was resolved to suffer but one Religion

Another repeal of the banished Protestants.

A Religion within his realme, with all the preparations for the destruction of them in diuers Prouinces, tooke from them all desire to returne. Seing then that no Edicts can draw them home to their houses, and that Rochell, Sancerre, and other places (being threained) prepare for defence, they must at the least take from the Protestants such refuges as they haue within the realme. To shut vp Rochell, Biron enters into the country of Onts, in the beginning of December, with seuen corners of horse, and eightene Ensignes of foote. Those of Sancerre runne yet at liberty: but the opinion of their chiefe Commanders, that they would attempt some other thing, and the vaine presumption they had of the situation of their hill place, made them the more negligent, both to furnish it with victuals, and to repaire the necessarie fortifications to endure a siege, against the which they should haue foreseene the small hope of succors, and the constant resolution of the assailants. Let vs consider of these circumstances, and prepare our selues to see the greatest resolution of men, led by Captaines to whom the necessity of the time, gaue more credit, then their beginning gaue them authority. Martignon, Pilard, Martinat, La Fleur, Chailou, Montauban, Buiffon, Paqueton, La Minee, and Dorival commanded there ouer sixe hundred and fifty men, and for Colonel they had Andrew Iouneau Bailiffe of the town. An hundred and fifty strong labourers in the vines, wrought great effects with their slings (which were called the Pittols of Sancerre) for the seruices vpon the wall in assaults, scalado's, and sallies.

In Ianuary La Chastre Lieutenant for the King in the gouernment of Berry, and General C of his army, came before it with about five hundred horse, and five thousand foot, sixteene Ensignes of Pioners, and a great number of peasants gathered together: at the first he offers a reasonable composition to the besieged, if they will accept it. As the beginning of this Generall was courteous, so was the proceeding of the besieged inciuill, disdainfull, and contrary to the law of nations. They retaine the Drum, and make no answer. To make his approches, La Chastre builds a fort within foure hundred paces of the towne towards Fontenay, another vpon the way of S. Thibault, a palisado in the field of S. Ladre: intrenched the approches and waies about the towne, planted ten peeces of artillerie in the field of S. Ladre: and sixe others at Orme au Loup: (it is a high mountaine vpon the South side of Sancerre, which commands the towne) he shoots against the walls and houses at random; D and spends in two moneths about sixe thousand Cannon shot (and yet the besieged lost not about five and twenty men) giues an assault, but with the losse of many that were slain and a great number hurt.

The 18. of March, La Chastre by a second battery in three diuers places, beates downe the defences both of towers and wall, makes a breach of about three hundred paces, giues a generall assault, presents a scalado on another side, mines and sapps on the third, that the Sancerrois (wearied with so many difficulties) might shrinke vnder their burthen. But well assailed, and well defended, the besieged with the losse of seuentene souldiars, not onely repulse the enemy, but also make them leaue about three-score of their most resolute men slaine in the ditches, about two hundred wounded to the death, and as many maimed E for euer, then coole their heate causing them to change this haustie furie of Cannons and assaults, into a longer, but more violent warre. They make many forts nearer vnto the Towne, and notwithstanding the sallies and ordinarie skirmishes of the Sancerrois, they furnish them with artillerie and men, sufficient to cut off all reliefe; so as being shut vp on all sides, they begin to want ordinarie victuals in the beginning of Aprill: they eate their Asses and Moyles, then fall they to horses, dogs, cats, mice, moles, and lether, and in the end to parchment, hornes, trappings of horses, girdles, and wild rootes. And in the end of Iune, three parts of them had no bread to eate, some make it of flaxe seed, others of all kinds of herbes mixt with branne, beaten and ground in mortars, and others of straw, of nutte shells, and of flates: greafe and tallow serued for pottage, and frying, yea some (a strange thing and neuer heard of) laboured to incounter the crueltie of their hunger, by the excrements of horses and men. But a horrible thing to see, the nineteenth of Iune, a labourer in the vines and his wife satisfied their hungar with the head and intrailles of their young daughter about three yeares old, beeing dead in languishing, giuing no other graue to the members of this poore carcase, but their bellies. But the Magistrate aduertised of this inhumanity, did for examples sake shorten their daies, finding them guilty of other crimes: neither 1573. neither were they forced hereunto by any extremity, seeing the same day they had bene A releued with portage made of hearbes and wine, whereof there was store in the towne. To conclude, foure-score men died by the sword at Sancerre (saith the Historie) but of hunger both within and without aboue fūe hundred. And euen now the King beganne to see his threats to take effect: I will make them (saide he) eat one another. They were hopeles of all humane helpe: such as they sent out for succours, either fell into their enemies hands, or died by the sword, or returned no more, or could not re-enter. So as they could not hope for any helpe, but in despairing of helpe, when as the prouidence of God brings them a strange and farre-bredde nauon, to giue them the libertie of the fieldes, and the vie of bread.

Seege of Ro-cheil.

The Estates of Poland had chosen Henry Duke of Aniou brother to our Charles for their King (as we shall see in the end of the seege of Rochell) but with a promise and oath taken by the Bishop of Valence, and Lansac in the name of the King their master: That all the townes and persons in France molested for the cause of religion should be set at libertie. At the request thereof, the Ambassadors of Poland, this poore people languishing for hunger (yet resolute to die one after another, rather then to fall into their enemies hands, who threatned them with a generall massacre) the nineteenth of August they obtained of La Chastre in the Kings name: To depart with their armes and baggage: impunitie for such as would remaine still, permission to dispose of their goods, promise to preserve the honour of women and maidens, and to pay la Chastre forty thousand frankes by the Inhabitants that were absent. C So La Chastre entring the last of the said moneth, dismantled Sancerre, beate downe some houses, tooke away the Clocke, Belles, and other markes of a towne: but the other points of the capitulation, were reasonably well obserued: the Bayliffe Jonneau was massacred the 12. of September neere vnto La Chastres lodging.

Now followes one of the most memorable seeges that hath bene in many ages. A sege where many of the commanders, and most part of those, which were noted to haue forced the Admiralls lodging, began the butcherie, and committed so many murders at Paris and else-where, came to seeke their graues. The Kings army was held to be fifty thousand men by land and sea, and three-score peeces of artillerie. The besieged had a good number of Gentlemen and horsemen, eight companies of Inhabitants, nine of strangers, one of the Mayor, one of voluntaries, consisting of twenty Musquetiers, fūe and twenty armed with corselets of prooffe, and thirty harguebuziers: the two thirds thereof, were Gentlemen, and such as had charge in the former warres. Yet the mildest way is the best. And therefore Biron in the beginning seekes some meanes of an accord: but the Rochelois discovering euery day some new practise, beleueed that their preservation consisted in distrust. And a Gentleman being in Rochell, reuealed the intelligences which Biron had with him for the surprizing of the towne, hauing already drawne into the towne some souldiers of Prigailards and Saint Martins companies, and was ready to draw in the most resolute Captaines, if the Mayor and Councell had not held it more fit by a small exemplarie execution, to breake off a great and dangerous enterprife.

To encounter the enemy, La Noue is chosen chiefe of the forces within the towne, without any diminution of the Maiors rights and authority in other things. Montgomeryes succors could not passe: La Noue sends new Deputies into England to the same end, but the league confirmed of late yeares betwixt our Charles and Queene Elizabeth, now againe renewed by the baptisme of the Kings daughter (whereof Elizabeth was God-mother with the Empreſſe) seemed to withdraw the affection which was wont to come from beyond the seas for the releefe of the Protestants, whilst the sallies and daily skirmishes at Rochell, inflame both the one and the other: where by the reason of the neerenesse of the retreat, they do greatly wast the number of the assaylants.

The Duke of Aniou comes to campe.

The eleuenth of February the Duke of Aniou comes to his armie, accompanied with his F brother the Duke of Alanson, the King of Nauarre, the Princes of Condé and Daulphiné, the Dukes of Longueuille, Bouillon, Neuers, Aumale and Guise, the yong Earle of Roch. fou-cault, the Grand Prior, and many other Noblemen, bringing with them a great traine of men, who for the most part would haue bin grieued, they shold haue taken this Sanctuary & succor from the Protestants. This siege was great, & seemed to be of long cōtinuance.

Euery

A Euery man runnes thither, euery one will haue his share. They prepare things necessary for the batterie, and in the meane time make many skirmishes: before they come to their greatest force, the Duke sollicit the Gentlemen and inhabitants by letters, containing both promises and threats. They humbly shew vnto him the necessitie of their defence, knowing no fitter meanes to preserve their liues against the enemies of the peace, then to oppose force against violence, and to retire themselves into well fortified places, vntill it should please the King to prouide for a lawfull assembly of the Estates, and a free Councell. The King on the other side, protesting of his sincerity in matters lately passed, and laying the fault of the outrage happened vpon the pretended conspiracy of the Admiral and his partisans, he summons the Rochelois to open their gates to Biron, or to any other hauing charge B to enter into the towne, as they ought to maintaine his royall authoritie, and so to order it as the place may be no more at the disposition of mutines. Which doing, he grants them exercise of their religion, with the like liberty as he had granted by his Edict of pacification, and withall he takes from them all hope of succors from England.

Biron, Stroſſy, Villequier, and the Abbot of Gadaigne, carrie the Kings promise to the Rochelois: which now neglected, hee would neuer be perswaded by any intreaties or requests, considering how much the King abased himselfe vnto his subiects. They shewing the equitie of their defence, and the tyrannous iniustice of the Baron of La Garde and others, accept the articles offered by the King: but they request that the Edict may not only C be maintained for their priuate respect, but also generally for all of their religion in France. But these were words without effect on either side. The Rochelois are aduertised, how the enemy approacheth with two and thirty peeces of batterie, and that after dinner they shold keepe them in skirmish. They preuent them, they sally forth at noone, kill and hurt in one skirmish of fixe houres, an hundred and fifty men, amongst the which were many captains: La Noue had two horses slaine vnder him, three Captaines, fūe souldiers, and twenty hurt. Thus their courages are set on fire, and the batterie begins: the one prepares to assaile, and the other to defend. The chance fell vpon Claude of Lorraine Duke of Aumale, Vncle to the Duke of Guise, slaine behind a gabion, with a peece planted vpon the bulwarke of the Euangile: and the Towns-men issuing forth at the end of the batterie, kill many, and coole the enemies heate.

Aumale slaine.

In the beginning of March they trie againe, whether they may winne the Rochelois without combat. They offer them the exercise of their Religion within their towne, but abolished in all other places of the Realme. Those of the partie might haue held them for double-dealers. One day of parle was more hurtfull vnto them then many weekes of warre. They resolute therefore to preferre a iust warre before a dishonorable and doubtfull peace.

The batterie is renewed: about thirteene thousand Cannon shot spent in that moneth, shakes both the fortifications and wals: many skirmishes are made: euery one studies to surprize his enemy, and La Noue (seeing his presence of no import to the besieged) where he must yeeld all, or in a manner all, to the popular gouernement, comes to the Dukes army, where he effected more in fauour of the Rochelois being absent then present, as they afterwards confessed. The ordinarie sallies of the besieged wasted the Dukes troupes daily, losing in few weekes aboue twenty good Captaines. The batterie continues in Aprill, and with such violence, as a long wall from the old fountaine vnto the end of the bulwarke d'Euangile, was beat downe to the ground, the bulwarke vn-armed, and the Towre of Cognes beaten downe. In the euening the enemy casts a bridge of wood into the trench, aduancing E euen vnto the bulwarke: they come to the assault, and win two casemats. But they dislodge them: from the one with the canon, from the other with a furious charge: some of them remaine for a gage, the rest saue themselves by flight. Two hundred rondaches and corselets passe by their bridge of wood, and the Cannon playing without intermission, seemed to F keepe the besieged from their defence. But the women and maidens, running with an incredible resolution to cast wild-fire and stones, inflamed the courage of the souldiers. They kill and wound, and in the end force them to abandon the trench, but they loofe about three-score men and some captaines.

The Roche-lois indure
nine assauls.

Hereafter there is nothing but thundring of the Cannon both by land and sea, furious assaults, showers of shot, planting of ladders, ruines of bul-warkes, fappes and mynes, most farall 1573. fatal to their authors: and vntill the end of May, all the attempts that might be deuised in A a mighty and obstinate siege. On the other side, men, women, and children, without feare, endure the rough charges of the enemy, fill vp their breaches, ouerthrow the first that mount, beate backe their enemies into their trenches, follow after them, and fight with variable successe: but most commonly to the aduantage of the townsmen, hauing indured nine assaults no lesse courageously, then valiantly giuen.

Victuals began to grow short in the towne, the Canon continued the battery daily, the number of the souldiers decayed, they had no meanes to refresh them, and many retiring themselves, bred an amazement in the Towne. Some of the chiefe win many men to their wils, and alreadie there were three hundred men, who weary of the warre, will haue a peace at what price soeuer. Others deuise to seaze vpon a gate to depart when they please. These B murmurings and diuisions cause new parles, the Duke of Aniou being desirous to retire with honour. But before the Ambassadors of Poland arriue, they must try their last force. The 12 of Iune the assailants giue a fierce scalado, at the lide breach neare to the old fountaine. About an hundred or fixe-score gentlemen mount with targets and courtelas, some get to the top of the mount, and view the trench and the counterscarpe gabioned within the trench. A volley of shot ouerthrowes fiteene or twenty vpon the place, and makes the rest retire. The Duke himselfe is in danger, but the prouidence of God reserued him for a more exemplarie end.

As he beheld the breach made at the old fountaine, a souldier shootes at him from the C towne: but De Vin the Master of his horse, seeing the fire in the cocke, steppes before him, and with the willing losse of his life saued his masters. In the end the Ambassadors of Poland come the 17. of Iune, to carry away their new chosen King. God vseth this meanes to deliuer Rochell, being vnfurnished of victuals, of munition for the warre, and of many hundreds of their men. The King by his articles of peace made in forme of an Edict, grants to them of Rochell, Montauban, Nismes, and other Townes which had maintained themselves, free exercise of their Religion, and to others permission to liue in their houses without search, to solemnize Christenings and Marriages after their maner, without any greater assembly then ten persons besides the parents: but the said exercise was forbidden in D Court, and ten Leagues round about. Another meanes did greatly ease the beseged, the diuision in the Dukes campe, and the aduertisements they received from their friends following the armie. So the end of this siege, being of exceeding charge, and the graue of about twenty thousand men slaine in skirmishes, encounters, surprizes, assaults, and dead of hurts, hungar and diseases, caused the King to make great desseignes for the repaying of many errors, into the which the priuat ambition of some, abusing the youth and the violent passions of this Prince, had drawne him: but too late for him, for hee sees his Realme inflamed with the same fire, which they perswaded him should haue bene wholly quenched with the blood that was shed at Saint Bartlemewes, and the warres of ciuill diuision viterly extinct. So the feeling he had in himselfe of these actions whereinto they had drawne him, shall soone lodge him in the graue of his Predecessors.

The other exploits of warre done else-where in diuers Prouinces of the Realme, require some place in our History. The Baron of Serignac, a wise man, vertuous, and louing martiall discipline, with some others of Quercy, Foix, and the neighbor Prouinces, hauing caused Montauban to resolute to armes, go to field with their troupes, put a garrison into Terride whereof Serignac named himselfe Baron, took Buzet vpon Tar, 3. leagues from Toloufa, by scalado, assure themselves of Villemur, seaze vpon many other places, fortifie those they had held during all the former troubles, assure the passages; then at an assembly held at Realmont in Albigeois, they made a diuision of their charges and gouernements. The Vicount of G. urdon had a part of Quercy towards Cadenac; and Serignac the other towards Montauban and Gascogne, the Vicount of Paulin, Lauragais, the Vicount of Panas and his brother Rouergue, the Vicount of Caumont, the County of Foix, and the mountain-countrie.

They were equal in their commands: but to auoid ialousie, they decreed that one of them wanting succour, the other Commanders should succour him with all their forces, and be recommended by him. So they all retire to their gouernements, euery one giues order for the preseruatiō of their estates. Serignac occupies some neighbour places, then he

The last charge giuen to Rochell.

Peace of Rochell.

A he camps with two thousand shot, and some horse before Monricou, makes a breach, giues three assaults and one scalado, and is repulsed with losse. Viole and Reauille make him receiue the like disgrace, and kill many of his men. But he is reuenged to the benefit of one of his Captaines, beseged in a village with foure-score men, he slue about two hundred men, and put the rest to flight.

The Earle of Villars, Admirall of France and Lieutenant for the King against the Protestants in Quercy, and the Countries thereabouts, gathers together his troupes, dispersed into garrisons, beseegeth and takes Saint Geniez in high Quercy, carries away the Lord of the place, notwithstanding the composition made to depart with their liues and goods; who was sent prisoner to Cahors. It is better to hunt as farre off, then neare at home. The pursuit

B of many, against whom he had made cruell warre, brought him to a scaffold, as a spectacle and triumph to his enemies. Brisevel in high Rouergue had a capitulation better obserued: but the Admirall lost in counter-change, in the moneth of May, Soreze-Montesquiou, two leagues from Tholoufa, Lodeue a Bishopricke, and rich in the mountaines of Languedoc, and Mas Saintes Puelles, neare to Castelnau-darry. The Marshall d'Anville did likewise arme against the Protestants fixe Corners of horse, and ten thousand foote, with fourteene peeces of batterie, pretending to beseege Nismes, and then Vzez, but the surprize of Sommiers, neare to Beziers and Montpellier, called him from his enterprize. He beseegeth it, makes a breach and giues two assaults, which were defended to the losse of the beseegers.

C The Earle of Candale, brother-in-law to the Marshall, arriues with an hundred horse, and twelue companies of Gascons, who desire to haue the fore-ward at the third assault: but with the losse of three hundred of the most resolute. This checke amazeth the Earle. What D fooles are we (saith he to the Marshall his brother-in-law) to cause our selues to be thus beaten, murdered and slaine, for their pleasure, who haue murdered our kinsmen, friends, and allies; and will one day pay vs with the same money.

The sege of Sommers.

He had reason, and the issue will teach vs soone the effect of this true diuination. And if the Marshall of Montmorency had bene present this fatal 24. day of August, the same fury had interred him with all his house vnder this common ruine, as many others, yea Catholikes suffered the like violence by the practises of their priuate enemies, to whom the time D and force gaue meanes to reuenge their priuate quarels vnder an other pretext. There were 4. moneths alreadie spent at this sege, about fise thousand Cannon shot had beaten the wals of Sommiers to powder, victuals failed, and the beseged demanded nothing but composition. But the Marshall would haue it by force. He exhorts his brother-in-law to reuenge the death of his Captaines and souldiers, who suffers himselfe to be perswaded, but as he goes resolutely to the breach, performing the duty of a braue Commander, and of a resolute souldier, he sees the place couered with a great number of his men, and himselfe in the end ouerthrowne dead vpon the carcases.

This hens-roost might haue bene the sepulcher of many more, but Gremian (to whome the honor of the taking and keeping of Sommiers is chiefly due) after they had performed E the duties of valiant men, accepted the composition was offered by the Marshall: To depart, their drums sounding, ensignes displayed, their matches light in the cockes, with seauen dayes liberty to carry away their baggage, and to retire where they pleased. So the Marshall seeing the resolution of them of Nismes, and hauing lost two thousand, fise hundred of his best men, dismissed his troupes, and proceeded afterwards against the Protestants, by seizures and sale of their goods within his gouernment. The Admirals army had another successe. Terride, Flaigac and generally all which the Protestants held beyond the riuer of Garonne, recompenced the losses he had receiued. But Caussade staid the course of his victories, and made him vnable to do any thing worthy of fame. La Motte Puiols kept the towne with 600. harguebuziers, & the repulse the Admirall receiued after a great losse of his forces, F caused in the end the ruine of his army, the which the Vicount of Gourdon shortned of a company at the passage of Dordonne, chasing the rest which marched to the sege of Rochell. The King of Nauarre had lately inuited his subiects of Berne to returne into the bo-some of the Catholike Church. They answered their Prince with excuses, thinking it proceeded from some other motion then his owne: and protest to other Churches of that partie, to perseuer and maintaine themselves with them in the same religion: See now the effects of their protestations. The Baron of Grandmont, marcheth into Bearne to plant A the auncient religion. They troupe together within the Country, retaine him prisoner, and cut the most of his men in peeces. Saint Romaine was chiefe of the Protestants in Viarez, Monbrun in Daulphiné. The first held Villeneuve, the last seized vpon Orpierre, Serres, Meuse, and by diuers courses became terrible in the Diocesse of Die, and the neighbour mountaines.

Protestations
against the peace of Rochell,

These new broyles thrust their neighbours into like reuolts: and the King who thought by the abolition of the Edict, of the yeare 1570. at the least by the departure of his brother into Poland, and a peace granted before Rochell, to enioy an assured rest, finds himself incombred with new and generall combustions. Those of Quercy, Languedoc, and their B neighbours, planting an order and rule for the warre, and the administration of Iustice, protest against this Edict, tearing it captious, and a fore-runner of new massacres. Our capitall enemies (said they) the authors of fore-passed disorders, remaine the onely counsellors and gouernors of the King and his estate: all the Churches of France, are deprived of the publike exercise of religion solemnly graunted: and now by this Edict abolished: all the contents of this last pacification, and whatsoever else is promised vs, are but words without effects: it is a generall abolition of what is past, the murderers are absolved, and no mention made of any iustice to be done against them: Al Ecclesiastical discipline being forbidden vs, they will plunge vs in Atheisme. This treaty is but coloured by some priuate persons without any generall aduow: whose approbation cannot preiudice the vniuersall bodie, neither ought they to yeeld to any thing without the common consent of our Churches. These complaints and protestations cause them to assemble at Millaud, and afterwards at Montauban, and there diuiding Languedoc into two gouernements, they make C Montauban chiefe of the one, and the Vicount of Paulin Gouernor in that part; and Nismes of the other, for the nearenesse of Seuennes and Viarez, vnder the command of Saint Romaine: but both subiect to the authority of the Estates of the countrie; who gaue them counsell, and furnished them with money, being chosen in either gouernment of the worthiest men of the countrie, yet in such sort, as the particular estates of euery Diocesse, did in matters of importance, confer by their Deputies with the Estates of the whole gouernement, and according to their conclusions, the gouernor shall carry himself, and receiue D money from their hands. To fortifie this order, they decree: That the souldiers should be content with their entertainment, without spoiling of the countrie: that the townes and villages of the contrarie party, should be taxed and forced to contribute for the entertainment of garrisons, to the end their labour and reaping of their fruits might be free. The reuenues of benefices was appointed to make a stocke of money, to be employed in their greatest affaires, the which they had leysure to effect: for the election of the King of Poland busied the Court and Councell in feasts, dancing, and pleasures. So they man many places, from whence they might at need draw forth almost twenty thousand men; and by seizing on the Clergie lands, and the contribution which came from all parts, they weaken their enemies. Many Catholikes otherwise discontented, growing familiar with them, and beginning to ioine their forces together, lay great desseignes, which shall soone breake out in all E parts.

Their petitions and admonitions to the King.

Matters thus handled, giue a beginning to the fift troubles in France: but before it brake forth, the Protestants of Languedoc sent their Deputies to the King. They humbly thanke him for the affection he had seemed to haue to the maintenance of peace within his realm, and necessarie meanes to restore an estate threatened with imminent ruine: they protest of their obedience, but they beseech his Maiestie not to find it strange, if they assemble to preuent the pernicious attempts of wicked Councillors, who by their fraudulent and violent praetises, had induced him to declare himselfe, both by his mouth, and his letters patentes, to the great blemish of his reputation among strangers, the Author of the massacre committed at Paris, the which he had few dayes before disauowed, That they cannot beleue he should willingly condescend to so bloody effects: and the feare they had to fall into the like forced them to seeke all meanes they could to warrant themselves, with the losse of their companions blood so vniustly shed.

They request therefore: That for the effect of the peace, those of the religion should in those

At those Townes they held, and in two others of euery Prouince, chosen by foure Deputies, haue garrisons entertained at the Kings charge, the exercise of their religion free and publike, to all such as would demand it, the obseruation of their Ecclesiasticall discipline, the buriall of their dead, without distinction of times, and of Church-yard: the exemption of contributions for the Ceremonies of the Romish Church: reception of their children into Colledges, vnder Tutors of their owne religion: Legitimation for such as should be borne of the marriage of Priests conuerted to their doctrine. Erection of a new Court of Iustice in euery Prouince, composed of Iudges of the same Religion. The rythes which they payd to Priests, to be reserued for the maintenance of their Ministers. Punishment of the authors, counsellors, and executioners of massacres, as theues and disturbers of the publike B quiet. Moreouer, they demand, that the Admirall, with all those that had bene murdered, and that were then liuing, should be reputed to haue bene, and to be faithfull seruants and subiects to the King and his Estate, innocent of rebellion, and guiltlesse of conspiracy. A nullity of all acts made against them as calumnious. Restitution of goods, honors, and offices, to the heires of them that were murdered. Abolition of all infamous monuments, and generall processions instituted in memory of so execrable a day.

These were the principall points of their propositions, amongst other articles concerning the gouernement. But they treated partly, as humble seruants, partly, as armed subiects, like vnto such as beg for almes with their swords in their hands. And as a new alteration C on flies easily and suddenly from one Prouince to another, so those of Prouence, Daulphiné, Lionnois, and others, ioine with the first: and by the mouth of a Deputy, present their petition and admonitions to the King. The King sends him to certaine Commissioners, to conferre thereof: and promiseth, that after he had conducted his brother out of the realme, he would do all things necessarie for the contentment of his subiects.

This hardy resolution taken in Languedoc and the neighbour-countries, made our Charles The apprehension of Charles to change both his countenance and his speech. He sees well, the more he hasteth, the more impatiently they did beare his brothers departure: namely, the Queene-mother, the Duke of Guise, and the Clergie. Henry himselfe desired rather to beare the title of Duke of Anjou in France, then the King of Poland: neither was hee greatly pleased, to make so long D and so crosse a pilgrimage. His most confident seruants would willingly haue discontented the Polonois in their answer, either to haue sent them away ill satisfied, or to winne time vntill the Spring. But there was no remedie: Charles could no more containe himselfe amidst the complainys which came from so many parts of his Realme, but sometimes giues out threats against them which had abused him, making him beleue, that after the execution of the foure and twentieth of August last past, hee should raig free from confusions. Strangers reproch him openly with the irreparable wrongs hee had done to himselfe and to his subiects: and accuse him, that in stead of a father, hee had bene a butcher, and a hang-man of his people, or at the least taxed his honour with this title, by the induction of the principall authors of this horrible disorder. The delays of his brother dis- E pleased him. Henry by his first affability won the peoples hearts. The affection which Charles noted of long time in the mother, to his aduancement as her best sonne, the credit which the house of Guise had in him, or at the least seemed to haue, and the hope which the Clergy grounded vpon his authority (they had already recompenced these agreeable seruiCES which hee had done them, with a present of three hundred thousand Crownes, and had much augmented it, if Rochell had bene taken) made him to be suspected and fearefull to the King his Brother, who euen then would willingly haue found the meanes to chastise such, as vnder the shadow of his name, had opened the way to so great iniustice, and such enraged furies. But during these garboyles and confusions of affaires, he could not any one of his Councillours of State, that did teach him to dissemble, and to containe himselfe, vntill that opportunity should giue him meanes of reuenge. So his complaints and threats were carefully obserued, and bitterly digested by such as it concerned. The Queene-mother, not able any longer to deferre the departure of her sonne Henry. Goe (saith shee) my sonne, you shall not continue long there. And as Charles goes before vnto the frontier, pressing his brother to follow him, he is suddenly staid by a great sicknesse, at Vitry in Champagne, giuing occasion to his most confident seruants to thinke; that about two attended the issue of his infirmity: and to speake disgracefully of the Queene-mother, the new King, and their trustiest seruants, whereof some retired from Court, and went to shroud themselves in Brittanie, seeing that the vigour of the Kings youth, had expelled the venime of his disease, by his head, necke, and visage. The King of Poland building vpon his mothers promises, departed in the end of October, being assured of the loue she bare him aboue the other two. She feared the humors and threats of Charles; and Francis Duke of Alençon did not greatly affect the house of Guise, neither had he approoued the massacre. The malcontents, who with a lesse odious name called themselves Politicks, find credit with him, think him fit to reduce the affaires to a better course, and make him to repine at the final account is held of him: they let him vnderstand how small a proportion was allotted him for his maintenance: the distrust they haue of his faith, the opposition of the Queene-mother, to keepe him from the Lieutenantancy of the Realme (who gaue the King to vnderstand, that by meanes of his male-content, he might stirre vp some factious mutiny hauing the forces at his command) the search was made of him, and the meanes which were offered vnto him to restore the Realme. Katherine was well acquainted with these practises, but she cunningly makes her profit of them all, during the Kings sicknesse, to auoid the danger when she pleased, and to ruine one by another at need, as hereafter we shall see, they wil do their best. During these alterations, those of Languedoc fortified themselves. To keepe them at a stay, vnder hope of some content, they appoint a generall Parliament at Compiègne: the Prouinces prepare their remembrances, some Deputies were on the way with instructions and Commissions, to speake boldly, namely against the authors and counsellors of murders. The Queene-mother and her followers fearing the touch, obtain a reuocation of the States, and labouring at the first to pacifie these deputies by promises and words, in the end they change their countenances, they vse threats, and do so terrifie them, as they returne home onely with a vaine hope, to receiue satisfaction shortly to their demands, and permission (especially to them of Languedoc) to assemble againe for the drawing of new articles, concerning the preferuation of themselves and their associats: the which they did afterwards at Millaud in Rouergue, and those of Rochell entred into association with them, forced vnto it by the practises and deuises of Puigauillard, Landereau, the Baron of La Garde, and others attending to surprize them: but ended with the yeare, and the liues of some that vndertooke it, being publicly executed.

The fourth troubles begun with the massacres had some respite by the peace of Rochell: but now this last conspiracie discovered, and the practises to surprize them of Languedoc, with the secret leuies of men, to assaile them suddenly, giues an entrance to the fit. The Protestants alledge for the ground of their arming, the infinit outrages which haue bene done them within few moneths, and send aduertisements and admonitions to the Princes, Nobility, the Parlements, and the Estates. The Malcontents, and such as were most inward with the Duke of Alençon, fore-seeing the shortnesse of the Kings life, yet not daring to complaine of it, but in shaking of the shoulders, and holding downe the head, solicite him to get the Lieutenantancy generall, to represent the Kings person, or if they will imploy him against them of Languedoc, that he should seeke to saue the Realme from the violence of such as by the death of Charles, and the absence of Henry would seeke to seaze thereon. He makes request vnto the King, being at Saint Germaine in Lay, and the king doth acquaint the Queene-mother, and the Marshall of Montmorency with the Dukes desire. To deny the Duke his request (saith the Marshall) were to do him wrong, and to call his sufficiency into question, seeing the same place had bene giuen to the Duke of Anjou without demanding it. But the Queene-mother, and those of Guise, desired it rather for the Duke of Lorraine, whom soone after she expressly called to Court: and in the meane time seemed to beleue, that they be practises of the Marshalls of Montmorency and Cossé, at the persuasions of the King of Nauarre, and Prince of Condé, to the end the Kings furie might ruine both the one and the other.

She therefore takes Councell to assure her selfe, and to ruine such as would follow any other partie but her owne: and euen then did she trouble the Kings head with an exceeding feare and distrust of his household seruants. The Duke of Guise would gladly haue vndertaken the house of Montmorency: but it was to no purpose, if all the foure brethren were not taken

A taken in one net. The Marshall of Anuille was in Languedoc, and determined to ioyne with the Protestants: yet the death of the eldest might make the rest easie. So the Duke of Guise one day pickes a quarrell in the base Court of Saint Germaine with Ventabran his household seruant, and for a slight cause, being resolved to kill him, he drawes his sword. Ventabran flies directly to the Marshall of Montmorencys chamber, which he finding shut, he mounts higher to that of the Constables Lady and widow: where finding Thore, he staves, and there receiues some blowes, but it was flatlings with his sword. This tragick act (turned to a iest) sent the Marshall out of Court: but he shall soone returne to receiue a great disgrace. The Duke of Alençon resolves likewise to leaue it, and to leade the King of Nauarre with him: but the execution was of great difficulty. To aske leaue would breed too many scruples and ieaousies in the Kings head: to go without leaue, was to accuse himselfe of some plot, and to be pursued as a fugitiue. He therefore stirs not, but lets passe a troupe of two or three hundred horse, assembled in Normandie, to fauor (as the common bruit was) the Duke of Alençons retreat, or as others would haue it, (but without any likelihood) to murder the King, his mother, and his Councell. This leuie terrified the Court, and brought it to Paris: they presently charge the Duke of Alençon, and the King of Nauarre. To purge themselves they publish a declaration the foure and twentieth of March, touching the fact of Saint Germaine: they protest of their good affection to the King, and they offer their seruices against all Rebels.

C Hereupon the Marshall of Montmorency is perswaded to come to Court. He is no sooner arriued, but they appoint him the Bastile for his lodging, and for companions in prison the Marshall of Cossé, La Mole, Cocornas, and Tourtay, seruants to the Duke of Alençon, whereof the three last lost their heads at Paris, culpable onely to haue bene acquainted with some of their masters Councels to abandon the Court. During these broiles in Court, the Protestants and their associats make their profit in Viarez, Daulphiné, Languedoc and Poitou. And the Marshall of Anuille, hauing by letters surprized, discovered the practise against him, conferred now with Saint Romaine Gouverneur of Nismes, but seizing on Montpellier, Beaucaire, Lunel and Pezenas, he giues the Protestants some cause to suspect his desseignes. The Politicks of Poitou hauing ioyned with La Noue, seaze vpon S. Maixant, D. Melle, Fontenay, Lusignan and other places. The checke fell vpon the Normans. Montgomery, Lorges, and Galarodon his children. Columbieres, Sey, and others with troupes of horse and foot, had secretly taken S. Lo, Carentan, and Valongues: but Matignon and Feruaques ioyned with the forces of the Count Thorigni, (who already camped before Saint Lo) shut him into Danfronc, a weake place, and ill furnished, with three-score horse, and foure-score harguebuziers. They batter the Castle, make a breach of fise and fortie paces, and hauing bene vigorously repulsed from a sharpe assault, the Earle abandoned by his people, (whereof the most part were gone to his enemies, and the rest wauering, being vnfurnished of munition, water and succors, perswaded by the Lord of Vasséy (for hee held it farre more honorable to dye vpon the breach, with a pike in his hand, then to fall into the Queene-mothers power, to end his dayes ignominiously on a scaffold:) hee did but capitulate (but not without a grievous apprehension of Columbieres, desiring rather to die vpon the breach, then to serue as a spectacle at the Greue at Paris,) to depart with their liues, and to carry away some furniture with their swords and daggers: vpon condition notwithstanding, to remaine some time in the hands of Matignon, and Vasséy kinsman to the Earle, with surety of his life. A captious and fraudulent composition: the obseruation whereof must needs be broken. The Earle goes forth, and was led away by Matignon and Feruaques at midnight: but his company remaine at the enemies deuotion, who force the Castle, kil some, spoile the rest, and put them all to ransom. Then Vasséy appointed by the two Commanders, ledde the Earle to Paris: where since we did see him gore a mournfull scaffold, and expiat by his death (to the Queens content) that of King Henry her husband. In the meane time, the Duke of Montpensier made war in Poitou, but slowly: and except the Castle of Talmont which hee tooke from the Protestants by composition, he did not any thing worthy of memorie.

The taking hereof was encountered with two great disgraces, the one nere to Saint Germaine, in the defeat of his company by Saint Estienne, Capitaine of Fontenay, (who flue many gentlemen: led away 15. or 16. prisoners, got great store of baggage, and the Dukes plate:) the other at the siege of Fontenay. Some thinking to reuenge a disgrace, doe oftentimes increafe it. He got nothing but blowes, with the losse of the most resolute of his troupes: and then an honest colour, the Kings sicknesse, called him from this siege, to attend new Commissions and forces. At that time, the Prince of Condé did recreate himselfe in Picardy, wearied with the turmoiles of the Court. Being aduertised of diuers practises layed to seize vpon his person, he flies into Germany, with Thoré, ill beloued by reason of the Marshals of Montmorency and d' Anuille his brethren, and the counsels giuen to the duke of Alençon. Being at Strasbourg, he exhorts the Protestant Churches, to relie vpon his loue and zeale for their reliefe, and Thoré perswades his brother d' Anuille, to open his eyes, and to embrace the occasion that was offered. This Marshal held the wolfe by the eares: for on the one side, the Protestants of Languedoc might greatly crosse him, if he had banded his forces directly against them: and on the other side, hee feared the King, and the Queene his mother, who to keepe him in awe, caused his eldest brother to be safely garded, as a sure pledge for his yongers actions. He must therefore assure himselfe on all sides, and according to the course of the market, entertaine both the one, and the other, expecting a Catastrophe of this strange and horrible Tragedy, which was acted in Court.

The King declined in the meane-time, and decayed visibly in the prime of his age: and since the King of Polands departure, he seemed more changed in minde, then in body, being incensed especially against the authours and counsellors of the massacre (as he made knowne by his speeches, to some of his Court, being enemies to iniustice, and by letters written out of the Realme) for whom he prepared a strange potion, if the prouidence of God had not reserued them as scourges and ministers of that punishment he meant to inflict vpon this Realme, to the end that seeing him afterwards to cast these rodes into the fire, we should confesse: that it is not now alone that he sheweth himselfe the gardien and Protector of this Monarchy. At that time Charles lay taken both hand and foot, his chiefe seruants were dead, disgraced, and absent. The motiues of new troubles did much disquiet him. He did fore-see infallible seeds of combustion in the coloured captiuitie of his brother, and brother-in law: in the imprisonment of the two Marshals: in the exile of the Prince of Condé, in whose fauour the Germaines began to arme. He sees his subiects cruelly armed one against another, and the fire of diuision ready to waste the Realme. His infirmity had some intermission during winter, but in the end, after he had languished the moneths of February, March and Aprill, tormented with many pangs, he kept his bed: and the thirtieth day of May, he slept his last sleepe, in the castle of Bois de Vincennes, after great effusion of blood, which issued out by all the passages of his body, the last two weekes of his sicknesse, during the which he endured all the violent assaults & combats which the vigour of youth might suffer in the extreamest pangs of death. His successeur could not come so soone from Poland. Catherine therefore to assure his authority during his absence, had obtained on the nine and twentieth day, letters of Regency from the King, directed to the Gouvernours of Prouinces: and the better to fortifie this nomination, to restrain the Princes of the blood, and to maintaine her selfe in the midst of confusion, she causeth letters-patents to be sealed by the Chancellor of Birague, her seruant, and by this meanes doth abolish the fundamental lawes, the order of the Realme, the priuileges of Princes, the authority of the generall Estates, and the prerogatiue of the Parliaments.

Charles dies.
His dispositi-
on.

Charles was borne the seuen and twentieth of Iune 1550. and began to raigne the fifth of December 1560. A Prince of a very actiue disposition, inconstant in his thoughts, violent in his enterprises, impatient, ready of conceits, the which he did expresse in good termes, a diligent obseruer of other mens natures, cholerike, secret, a dissembler, cruel & a blasphemour. But let vs impute these vices and others, not to his natural inclination, but to his gouernors and schoole-masters, amongst the which the history doth especially note Martignes and Losses, who with the consent of the mother corrupted this young Prince, and made him take the habit of Vices and infections, wherein they daily plunged him. They might haue pruned this yong plant better, to haue brought forth better fruits. At the beginning hee was open, courteous, studious, sober and little giuen to women. His speech was pleasing: he loued musike and poetry: we read yet good verses compiled by him in French. But the pleasure of hunting transported him wonderfully, and the blood of wild beasts, which he

A he slew with singular delight, made him with long continuance, as it were greedie of mans blood. But let vs tremble in this death, vnder the iustice of Gods iudgements, who suffered (after so horrible a butcherie committed and commanded during his raigne) him to be surprized with a great debility in his latter dayes, to wallow in his owne blood, vomiting it out pitifully by all the conduits of his body, as a iust iudgement for him that barbarously shed it, throughout all the Prouinces of the Realme. Doubtlesse God loues not the Prince, that thirsts after his subiects blood; for the subiects blood is the very blood of their Prince.

HENRI the third, the 62. French King.

*I*t is a great comfort vnto me (said Charles some few houres before his death) that I leaue no heires males lawfully begotten, for leauing him young, he must indure many crosses, and France hath need of a man. But alas! we shall now see one aduanced to the crowne, whereunto the fundamentall law of State and honor doth call him, installed with a confused beginning, and afterwards by an Edict of pacification, to reduce and retaine his subiects happily in their obedience, vnder a raigne as lasciuious and voluptuous as the other had bene cruell and bloody: vntill that the house of Guise (seeing the King barren, and his successor confined in shew beyond the riuier of Loire) shal discover their ambition, and cause (but in the end with the losse of the liues of two of the chief

F motiues of confusion) the people to breake out into a blind, vaine, and trecherous rebellion, being too ready to second the ambitious desseignes of great men, and to runne at random vnder the liberty of a turbulent raigne, and for the last scene of this Tragedie, they stirre vp a monstrous Monke, traiterously to murder him, and by his death to extinguish the name of Valois, and vnwittingly to set the Crowne of France vpon the head of Henry, the first of the branch of Bourbons, whom we shall see happily called from beyond the riuier of Loire, Loire, miraculously to take the helme of this estate, and valiantly to encounter the dangerous attempts of his enemies, who had already proclaimed a triumph before the victory; wisely to quench the fires of diuision kindled in his Realme, and to raigne most happily, and by the admirable fauour and blessing of heauen, to gouerne his people in concord, peace and loue. This is the man whom France had need of, to pacifie the diuisions both of great and small; to restore their generall and priuate ruines; and vnder so gentle and milde a command, to preserue them from the proud Empery of Strangers. Doubtlesse France cannot be gouerned but by a Frenchman, as we shall see, hauing obserued the beginning, progresse and pittifull end of this Prince, vpon whom depended the estate of this great and mighty monarchy.

Postes flie with speed to carry newes to the King of Poland, of the death of his elder brother, whilest the Queene-mother (attending his comming) made a truce with them of Poitou, to the end she might with lesse opposition supply the warres of Normandy: and to stay them of Languedoc and other neighbour Prouinces, she perswaded the duke of Alancou and the King of Nauarre, to aduertise them of the death of Charles, and solicited the gouernours to write vnto the new King, touching their zeale to his seruice, and desire (vnder her regency) to obserue the like fidelity to him, as they had done to his Predecessors. Matignon labored in the meane-time to take Saint Lo, and Carentan from certaine gentlemen Protestants, whom the breach of faith to the Earle of Montgomery, had made resolute in the defence of such places as they held. Columbiers hauing escaped from Danfron, puts himselfe into Saint Lo with a small troupe of men, where hauing endured three assaults, and slaine nine or ten of their enemies captaines, with three hundred of their men, in the end he is strooke dead with a shot: the which daunted his souldiars, who (vnfurnished of a Commander, that might encourage them with the like authority, toyled with long fighting) leaue the breach, and in their retreat abandon both the place and the liues of two hundred men, to the mercie of Matignens souldiars, to make satisfaction for the death of their companions. Carentan might likewise haue interred many Catholikes vnder the ruines of her walles: but Guttri and the chiefe of his company, seeing themselves alone in Normandy without any hope of succours, went out by composition on horse-backe, with their swords, and the souldiars vpon condition to serue the King where he should imploy them.

Confirmation of the Queens regency.

Here vpon letters-patents come from Henry, intituling himselfe King of France and of Poland, dated the five and twentieth of Iune, bearing confirmation and amplification of the Queene-mothers Regency and gouernment of the realme. Hauing therefore taken the oath of all the Gouernours, and published the Kings letters-patents, to make the way for her sonnes returne out of Poland, shee calls for the Nobility, assembles the foote, makes leauies of Reistres and Suisses: sends to the Prince Daulphin sonne to the duke of Montpensier, and to Gordes (who made warre in Daulphiné:) That they should doe their best endeouours to ruine the country which the Huguenots held: and chargeth the duke of Vzez, and the Lord of Ioyezue, to be watchfull ouer the Marshall D'Anuille, with whom shee had small credit in Languedoc. The imprisoning of his elder brother, the exile of the two younger Mery and Thore, and the Regents letters being intercepted, had incensed him: yet did he swim betwixt two streams, and maintaining himselfe betwixt both, hee did nothing trust the Catholikes: and not louing the Protestants, he applied himselfe vnto them as he had need of their helpe. These proceedings bred some ieaousie in them of Tholousa: but especially the truce he made with the Protestants; the assignation he gaue for the assembly of the Estates of the Prouince at Montpellier the second of Iuly, and the ordinary residence he made in that towne. So this Parliament by two decrees of the 19. of Iune, disallows the truce; forbidding all persons within their iurisdiction, to goe or send to these pretended Estates, appointed without the Kings permission, vpon paine to be declared rebels, and breakers of the lawes.

De Anuille associates himselfe with the Protestants.

Moreouer, the Protestants (perswaded by this truce, which gaue them some hope of peace) began to allow of their Gouernours actions: and (notwithstanding the aduice of some who condemned this association (as threatening the ruine of their party by this conjunction) they vnite their forces with the Politikes, offensive and defensive against all that would

A would assaile them. These enioyed some rest, whilest that Montbrun cuts in peeces a regiment of the Prince Daulphins forward, and couers the bridge of Royans with foure hundred of the brauest of his army, slaine vpon the place. For a reuenge, he besiegeth Alais a small towne, batters it, makes a breach, giues an assault, and is repulsed: but the besieged being vnable to maintaine it, retire into the castle: the Prince surpriseth them, casts some downe head-long, and burnes the rest that were within it. Ofte was the second of his triumphes: but Liuron staied his course. The succesful sallies of the Townes-men, and the ordinary courses of Montbrun, who descending from Loriol, did stil keepe the Prince in alarm, makes him to raise his siege, and to put his men into safety.

The Protestants being freed on this side, they were fortified on the other, by the taking of Vessaux, a small towne in Viuarais by Bochevade. Perigourde takes Chalençon, and Saint Romaine Nonnay for their part. La Noue (not to approue Katherins regency, but rather to second the Prince of Condes forces which were prepared in Germany) was at truce with the Regent, for the moneths of Iuly and August, in the Prouinces of Angoulmois, Poictou, and Xaintonge. But the Regent hoped to subdue the Protestants of the said Prouinces, before her sonne should arriue. For the effecting whereof, shee assembles men from all parts, to surprise them suddenly: that being rooted out, the King should haue nothing to doe but with them of Daulphiné and Languedoc. So the duke of Montpensier, Chauigny, Puigallard, Richelieu, Buffy of Amboise, and other Commanders, meet at Saumur with ten thousand men, and eightene peeces of artillery. The Protestants flie speedily to armes: those of Lusignan in the beginning of Iuly ouerthrow the Gentlemen of Poictou: and those of Fontenay nere vnto Nantes, ouerthrow five hundred Hargubuziers, almost all yonger brothers of the Gentlemen of Britan.

These two checks thrust the duke to the siege of Fontenay le Conte. Saint Estienne commanded there, with about twenty Gentlemen, and foure hundred souldiars, who after some fauorable sallies, hauing valiantly maintained two sharpe assaults, and one scaladoe, the sixteenth of September, after fifteene daies siege, beginning to treat of the composition before in question: behold captaine Masseronse, either through feare, or desire to provide for himselfe, or being too confident, for that they were vpon termes of capitulation, giues entrance to some of his acquaintance: the rest runne thither by heapes, they force the breach being ill garded, and become masters of the towne: they kill some souldiars, ransom others, strip the rest, and chase them away with a white wand in their hands: but they vse the towne with lesse rigour then a place taken by assault. The Baron of Serignac, otherwise called Terride, recompensed this losse at the same time by the surprise of Castres in Albigeois, and the slaughter of two hundred Italians being in garriison: and Langoyran gouernor of Perigueux for the Protestants, by the absolute defeat of two hundred Harguebuziers, whereof six only escaped, to carry newes to the rest of their party.

Fontenay surprised.

Then Henry escaping secretly out of Poland, approached the Realme, where his new crowne attended him, deuising a farre off to ruine the Huguenots and to plant the only religion of his Fathers throughout the whole realme. There is no sinne so great (said the Emperor Maximilian vnto him) as to force mens consciences: and such as thinke to command them, supposing to winne heauen, doe often loose that which they possesse on earth. The like admonitions were given him in all places, in Austria, Venice and Piedmont: they exhort him in all places to pacifie the troubles of his Realme. But comming to Lions, for the first fruits of his entry, they cause him to commit a great error: for (as Montuc notes in his commentaries) in steed of pacifying all things past (as hee might easily haue done, and haue giuen vs peace) they cause him to resolute vnto warre, making him beleue, that entering into Daulphiné all would yeeld vnto him, where as the least dog-hole made head against him, and the best of his conquests could neither recompence the bloud of his men, nor the treasure he should spend in this warre.

The new Kings arrival.

The Queene-mother, the dukes of Guise and Neuers, the Marshall of Retz, the Chancellor Rirague, and some other new-bred Frenchmen, disposed of the affaires at their pleasure in the secret Councells of the Cabinet. The King did willingly giue them authority (and what might be expected of men who gladly would people France with new Colonies of Italians, Lorrainers and Piedmontois) carrying onely to court Ladies, from the which hee had 1574.

Il council.

had bene sequestred almost a yee, with this nation which is lesse lasciuious then ours. A These pernicious counsellors cause him to protest by sundry proclamations of his loue to the good of his subiects, and to abolish what was past, so as they lay aside armes, deliuer him all his townes, and liue quietly in their houses, without any search, constraint or molestati- on for matter of conscience. A policy practised by them, to entertaine the fire of ciuill dis- sention, to rule in this confusion, and to fortifie a third party, which in the end we shall see will oppresse the King, and bring the Realme to a very miserable estate. The Protestants stood then the more vpon their gards: they are full of ieaousie, distrust, doubt and feare. All those Proclamations made no mention of liberty of their religion, neither of a Parlia- ment, for the politike gouernment, nor of a nationall counsell, for matters of conscience. And what was it, to grant vnto the Rochellois liberty of conscience, and to forbid the exer- cise of their religion for a certaine season, but to keepe their party at a gale, whilest by their great preparations which were made in all parts, they should be able to put a mighty army to field, to ruine them without hope of rysing?

Lusignan.

So they arme on all sides, especially in Poictou. The Baron of Fontenay (afterwards Lord of Rohan in Britan) being followed by three-score gentlemen and six-hundred good soul- diars, puts himselfe into Lusignan, which the duke Montpensier threatned, and according to the leisure he gaue him, he provided for the fortifications and all things necessary to main- taine a memorable siege, which might by the meanes of some succours consume an army before the castle. About the beginning of October, the duke incampes before it, and with a battery of about two thousand three-hundred canon shor, thinks to draw the besieged to a composition.

They importune them, but they answer, they will attend a generall peace for all them of their religion. He spends twelue hundred and fifty canon shot more, makes a breach, giues an assault, and is repulsed and beaten backe with great losse. Fiue daies af- ter the besieged sally forth, and to reuenge the blood of seuen young gentlemen, fixeteene souldiars, and twenty that were hurt at this first assault, they cloy fiue canons, fire their powder, kill nine captaines and many souldiars, bring away many Ensignes, and returne laden with spoiles, armes and prisoners. This disgrace disperfed a part of his campe, and made him to spend all the moneth of Nouember without any attempt against the be- sieged. In December the duke fortified with twelue hundred Reistres, and fixe hundred French foote, presseth Lusignan againe, and the more to anoy them, he batters downe a mill which did furnish them with meale. So (their hand-mills not able to suffice) they beganne to want bread. To ease them of some superfluous mouthes, they craue a pas- port for some gentlewomen and other persons vnfit for the warre, to returne to their houses, or to some other places of safety. But the harred this Prince did beare to the Protestants had more force in him, then the ordinary curtesie which Frenchmen beare vnto Ladies. He supposed the wiues and children should be an vrgent sting to draw their husbands and fathers, to yeeld speedily. Now their horses serued them for food, the souldiars (almost starued) tooke away the bread violently as they carried it from the Queen: E they breake into many houses in the night, to seeke for victuall, they had no wood but mouables and the ruines of houses, ill clothed, ill shod, ill lodged, and no cleane linnen, toyled with continuall trauell, to defend themselves both aboue and vnder ground, to frustrate the mines which the duke caused to be made, two of the which in their ruines buried many of the assailants, and gaue the besieged courage to continue firme in their resolution.

The 23. of the moneth they begin to thunder with eightene canons and foure culue- rins, and the next day they continue the same fury with fiue and twenty peeces. After din- ner they come to the assault: the showers of musket shot comming from sundry flanks, makes the enemy retire, and to leaue the breach full of dead bodies. The greatest force F was against the rauelin of La Vachery, which being won by the assailants, makes them re- tire to the castle that had it in gard. At the first port of the castle euery man did shew his resolution: all fight in the midst of the thunder, fire and smoake, and fiue houres together dispute it with a doubtfull and bloody fight. In the end both the one and the other (being tired with so furious an assault) take breath, the besieged remayning maisters both of the towne

A towne and castle, being reduced to foure-score cuirasses, and foure hundred and fifty Har- guebuziers, resolute to liue and die both in the defence of the place and of their quarrell, hoping that La Noye would find meanes to send them some reliefe.

Not courage, but force failed them. So as Fontenay, the fiue and twenty of January, ac- cepted the articles of composition which the duke offred vnto him by the Collonel Sarric: Lusignan yeelded. Himselfe and his gentlemen to depart with their armes, horses and baggage, the captaines and other Commanders, euery one with a curtall, if they had any, their armes and bag- gage: the souldiars with their Harguebuzes, their matches out, and their Ensignes wrapt vp, the gentlewomen, and all others that would depart, to be conducted in safety to their houses, or else to Rochelle. Thus it was concluded. This siege caused aboue twelue hun- dred men to be slaine, a great number to be maimed, and ruined a mighty army. They endu- red ten thousand canon shot, with many assaults, and lost fiue and twenty gentlemen, and about two hundred souldiars. And the duke, for a memory of his losses, caused the castle of Lusignan to be razed, being in former-times one of the goodliest fortresses in Europ. Such conquests were of more difficulty in Daulphiné: the Protestants had more places, and more captaines at their deuotion. Poussin, Liuron, Prinas and others did greatly hinder the trafficke of Marzeilles and Lions: and some running into Piedmont had charged the Kings baggage returning from Poland. To reuenge these insolencies, the King sends the Prince Daulphin to besiege Poussin: eightene thousand men besiege it on either side of the river C of Rhone, in the beginning of October: foureteene great canons batter it, and make a breach: Rochegude and Pierrebourg defend it with a wonderfull slaughter of the enemy, and so terrified the rest of the army, as all were ready to trusse vp their baggage: but foden- ly the wall shaken with the artillery, and ouercharged with earth cast vp for the trenches within the towne, falls downe to the ground. So the towne lying open, and the ruines not to be repaired during the siege, the place being too straight, Saint Romain, after many in- roads and sharpe skirmishes, enters into it, and iudging that in the end it would be forced, he drew out of it men, women and children, and putting them into Prinas in safety, he a- bandoned, and left Poussin to the besiegers mercy, who entring by heapes, spoile, sacke, burne and make the place desolate: and by the taking thereof, they recover a part of Viua- D rais, Grane, Loziol and Roinac (being vnable to endure the canon) made easie the appro- ches of Liuron. But let vs view the estate of Languedoc.

sieged.

The Queene-mother, and those of Guise, desired infinitely to dispossesse the Marshall D' Estate of Lan- Guedoc. Anuile of his gouernment, for he crossed their aduancement with all his power, and staied them from proceeding (as gladly they would) against his elder brother being a prisoner. But yet if he had not fortified his estate with the Protestants party, who were then strong in Languedoc, hardly could he subsist amongst so many and so mighty enemies. He therefore in open assembly of the estates at Montpellier, ioynes himselfe with them, and according to the declarations lately published by the Prince of Condé, and the people of Languedoc, he sets downe the causes of this his new and forced taking of armes. The Vicont of Turenne E his sisters sonne, doth likewise publish his, of the same substance. Thoré and Mern bretheren and the Earle of Ventadour (brother-in-law to the said Marshall) ioync with him. The duke of Alanson seems to fauour it: but the euent will shew, whether it were fraudulent, or with a sincere intent.

This reuolt amazed the Court, and to stop the course thereof, the Queene-mother doth presently, by gracious letters, inuite the Marshall to some agreement. But giuing the Pro- testants but a simple liberty of conscience, she debars them of the publike exercise of their Religion. The Marshall protests of his affection to the common good of this Realme, and assures the like desire to be in his associats: but with all he shewes, that the counsellors, who by that horrible and infamous massacre the foure and twentieth of August, had caused the deceased King to breake the last Edict of pacification, gouerning at this day the helme F of the affaires; it was very difficult to settle a firme peace, the which cannot subsist, vnlesse the exercise of both religions may be indifferently allowed within the realme.

So this treaty of peace remayning fruitlesse, the Queene-mother changeth her coun- tenance, and labours by diuers practises (but in vaine, the alliance being yet too fresh) to sow diuision betwixt the Marshall and his associats, and yet by sundry messages continues this this pretended parle of a generall peace in France. But it could not be concluded with A such conditions as the King required: that all his townes should first be yielded vnto him without exceptions; and then would he grant his subiects peace. The Prince Daulphin, hauing left the command of the Kings army to the Marshall of Bellegarde, he comes in the midst of December to campe before Liuron. Roesfes a gentleman of Daulphiné commanded there; with about foure hundred men, but full of resolution and great valour, in a hilly place, strong of situation, but then of no fame amongst the other townes of Daulphiné. Foureteene companies of the Kings gards; eleuen Ensignes of Suisses, twelue Ensignes of Harguebuziers, Prouencals and Daulphinois, nine Ensignes of Piedmont, three hundred men of the old bands, foure companies of men at armes, and eight cornets B of Reistres besiege it on all parts. Two and twenty great peeces of battery, planted in three parts, doe batter it, and after eleuen hundred canon shot, make a breach of fixe hundred paces.

The Marshall was not satisfied with this ruine: he will haue all battered downe, and with a generall ruine fill vp the trench. They make a greater breach with a new battery, of foureteene hundred canon shot. He recouers the trench, and makes defences for his men. All this doth nothing amaze the besieged: but contrariwise, to shewe that they haue force to defend themselves, and that they must haue great dexterity and resolution to take them: they tie to the end of a pike, a horse-shooc, a paire of mittens and a cat; they lift vp the pike, as if they would say: Marshall, this cat is not taken without mittens. Such was the C estate of Liuron, when as the King sojourning at Auignon, being distressed for money to supply his excessiue charge and prodigality, Charles Cardinall of Lorraine (labouring the marriage of Henry with Lewis of Lorraine, daughter to the Earle of Vaudemont his kinswoman; and to furnish this excessiue and stately pompe, aduising the King to sell for a hundred thousand crownes in benefices, was surprised with a feuer, and falling from a feuer into a frensie, he died the 23. of December, in the midst of a cruell tempest, and violent whirlwind, which vncouered the houses, and loofened the barres of iron in the Carthusiens Couent, in the suburbs of Auignon.

Some impute this death, to the smelling of a certaine precious purse, which was giuen him full of rare peeces of gold, with the Queene-mothers priuity: whom the foresayd treaty of marriage, which the Cardinall did practise, made remember the crosses she had suffered after the marriage of Francis the second, her eldest sonne, foreseeing that this new alliance tended but to restore the house of Guise to the same authority they had enioyed vnder the raigne of the sayd Francis. Others did attribute it to the blowes the Cardinall had giuen himselfe vnder colour of deuotion, in the company of them that beat themselves in the sharpest time of winter. Others applied it to the iust iudgement of God vpon this Prelate, who drawing all his greatnesse, and all his meanes from the Clergy of France, would yet perswade the King to so pernicious an alienation of goods appointed for the vse of the Church, whatsoever it were. Notwithstanding the strict familiarity which the Queene-mother had with the Cardinall, yet did she giue this testimony of him after his death: that E the three and twenty of December a most wicked man was dead. And the people both farre and nere sayd: that this extraordinary storme in the ayre, noted that this man, hauing by cursed practises filled his house with exceeding wealth, sacke, and torne France in peeces with intestine warres, did then feeble the iust reward of his actions. Doubtlesse such as the life is, such is the end.

Whilest the King becomes a new brother of these tormentors of themselves, otherwise called Penitents, and the court busied some-time in the processions and ceremonies of this new brother-hood, the Estates of Languedoc fallen from all hope of peace, battered Saint Giles nere to Auignon, and became maisters thereof, the Courtiers making no shew to succour it. Montbrun on the other side keeping the field with his horse-men, did still F catch vp some that were farthest from the campe. But Liuron was a Church-yard for the most hardy of the assailants: euery man defends his goods and his life: men, women, and children, all labour in the fortifications, to repulse their enemies, and vnder the command of La Hay, (a young gentleman about three and twenty yeeres of age, valiant and pleasing to the soldiars of Roesfes hauing bin slaine at the breach with Fianney and Bennuer captaines) strew

A strew the ruines of the walles with carcasses, cast many into the trenches, dead, wounded and languishing: and finally (after many assaults, and infinite Canonadoes, fortified with two and fifty souldiars) they forced the enemy to found a retreat, and to couer themselves from the shot, pikes, swords, stones, and such armes as necessity could yeeld to the besieged. Thus those of Liuron withstood the fierce assaults of their enemies: the army diminished, and a certaine disease hauing wasted most part of the Piemontois, crept in amongst the other nations: when as the King iudging of the rest by this small towne, found that he must seeke out some other meanes to reduce his subiects to obedience: Who were so resolute to armes, as a simple offer of liberty of conscience, might soone make them fall away. Many conquests cause but flight triumphs. A more stately crowne attended him: his B coronation called him, and the taking of Aiguemortes, a sea towne and of great importance for the Protestants; imited him to stay the course of their prosperity by some negotiation of peace.

Henry therefore packing vp his baggage, the thirteenth of Iauary, and approching nere to Liuron, staid some houres in the campe. Here the souldiars cries and exclamations against him, and especially against his mother, gaue him to vnderstand, that the horrible disorders and vnworthy gouernment of the latter yeeres, had with-drawne that loue and reuerence to their Kings, for the which the French nation had bene so much commended: and so altered the mindes of the greatest part, as their iust grieif transported them beyond the C bounds of reason and modesty. Ad murderers! (cried they with open throate) you shall not stab vs in our beds; as you haue done the Admirall and the rest: Bring vs those Adignons, with their ruffes and perfumes: let them come to looke on our wines, they shall teach them whether it be a prey ease to carry away. A lesson for a Soueraigne Prince, that if any diuersity of religion diuide his subiects, yet is he a common father to them all. As no reason doth allow of the sonnes ingratitude to the father; so all lawes doe abhorre the inhumanity and impiety of a father to his children.

The campe being dislodged, the rest of the Piemontois repasse the mountaines. The Daulphinois ashamed of the disgrace they had receiued at Liuron, disperse themselves here and there: some cornets of Reistres follow the Marshall of Rez into Prouence, the rest D with the Suisses are giuen to the duke of Vzez, to make warre in Languedoc: a gouernment where-with the King had lately honoured him. Strange alterations. The duke of Vzez is now armed against them; for whose protection hee had often fought during the former warres, and the Marshall D'Anville lately their capitall enemy, now supports them. Thus great men play with Religion, fitting themselves to that party which they thinke may most auile them whatsoever it be: and the people is still the anuile, whereon all forces of hammers strike. But the Marshall did little remember the obseruation of the Articles sworne in the association. And dissolutions creeping in amongst the Protestants, could not but preface a speedy ruine of one of the parties, or of both together. Yet he entertained himselfe with them. So likewise did the Duke of Vzez, and protesting that hee E would make no warre but against the Marshalls faction, hee promised to reconcile all the Protestants to the King; if they would sequester themselves from the Politikes their associates. But he would haue bene glad, that in ruining the one party, they should haue ruined themselves. During these contentions betwixt the Marshall and the Duke, the King was crowned at Rheims, the fiftenth of February: and soone after he sent home Elizabeth of Austria (widow to Charles the ninth) to the Emperour Maximilian her father, but with a lesse traine then her quality required. Then hee married Louise the daughter to Nicholas Earle of Vaudemont in Lorraine, who they supposed should haue bene the wife of Theré the Constable's youngest sonne. Practises of the Queene-mother, to maintaine the authority shee had gotten in France, about a daughter-in-law of meaner quality then her selfe: and to fortifie her selfe with them of Guise, against the houses of Bourbon and F Montmorency.

This marriage should haue caused as chaste and as vertuous a bed on the Kings behalfe, as he was chaste and vertuous whom hee had now espoused. And it seemed the dissolutions and excesses of Court were come to their height in the reigne of Charles the ninth. But heereafter both King and Court (for the subiects doe frame themselves to the 1575. diuided both the Prouinces and the affections of this realme. But the time now calls vs to A a strange consideration, happened either by policy and of purpose, or else accidentally, as it chanceth often in worldly affaires, whereof the wife of this world can make their prouident commodity, to draw forth all such fruits as mans wisdom giues them hope to produce at all euents. But he that fownds the botome of mans heart, laughs from aboue, and when hee pleaseth, (euen when as man dreames not of it,) hee confoundes the wisdom of the wife, the fooles in their follie, and the malicious in their owne malice. The Duke of Alanson seemed to liue in great familiarity with the King, since his returne from Poland into France. Katherine sayd, that this reconciliation of the two bretheren was the meanes to maintaine the Realme in peace. But the Councells, practices and negotiations, tooke another course then was expected. The Prince of Condes affaires prospered on the other side the Rhine. Those of Languedoc preferred the defence of their liberties with the hazard of their liues, before the yoke of a doubtfull and disloyall peace.

Wherefore to ruine at once the generall forces of the Protestants, which threatned most dangerous effects to come: the Court (as good schoole-mistres of dissimulations) must take an other vnaccustomed habit. Doublet Katherine gaue many of these instructions to her children: and the issue will shew vs, that there were many of her deuises in the managing of the following affaires. Sodenly the duke of Alanson seemes discontented. He cannot (saith he) haue iustice of the outrages were done him in keeping him prisoner; they disdain him; those of Guise are preferred by reason of the Queene their cousin the Kings wife; his presence seemes offensive to the King, who can endure no companion, nor any great man nere him. Thus it is bruted in all parts, that the duke of Alanson is in very bad termes with the King. These horse-leeches of the Court, who by publike troubles aduanced their priuate affaires, buzzed in his eares: hee beleeueth them, and many of the Nobles ioyne with him: the King and Queene-mother, and the Councell seeme to be amazed thereat. In the end he leaues the Court the sixteenth of September, and meeting many Gentlemen halfe a league from Paris, he retires to Dreux: thether repaired daily vnto him new troupes of the Nobility of both religions, and amongst many, some inwarde seruants to the Queene-mother, namely Buffy of Amboise, a bloody, wicked, and a furious man.

This departure causeth new broyles and murmuring in Court. Euery man thinks, euery man speakes according to his owne imagination or desire. Some beleue verily, the two bretheren are at discord: that the duke not able to endure the brauadoes of them of Guise (whom hee abhorres and loues not, as the authors of publike confusions) goes to ioyne with the Protestants and Politikes, to augment his portion, and by their common forces to plant a peace in France. Most of the Protestants were filled with pleasing hopes, promising themselves a golden world vnder this pretended reformer. But the cleere-sighted remember what was past, and by the present estate iudge of the future. They know well the strong and variable humour of the Mother: and say, that she vseth E the dissembling of her children as a last for all feate: that hauing preuailed little with the Lions skinne, shee will now put on the foxes: that shee findes the Duke fit to intrappe them, seeing that both Protestants and Politikes seeke him ioyntly, to vndertake their quarrelles, and to make him their head: that beeing young, and of small iudgement, neither greatly carefull of religion, or the reformation of the state, there was no likely-hood hee should runne this course without their instruction, who had kept him so long in their power.

Thus men discoursed: but we commonly beleue that for certaine, which wee most desire: All other aduice is reiected. They hope from the Duke of Alanson both the safety and the protection of the Realme. He, to maintaine so commendable a reputation, giues F an account of his actions by a publike declaration, protests to imploy his forces, meanes & life, to banish the troublers of the publike quiet, to pursue iustice for all robberies, thefts, murders and massacres, to restore Noblemen, Gentlemen and others, being prisoners or wrongfully banished, to their goods, offices and honours, to abolish all taxes, imposts and extraordinary subsidies, to maintaine the ancient lawes of the Realme, to defend the Nobility

The duke of Alanson discontented.

A Nobility and Clergy in their privileges, freedoms and liberties, and by a generall and free assembly of the three Estates, to confirme a good, firme and sure peace in France: he takes all naturall Frenchmen of both religions into his protection, and (vntill that a holy council may decide the controuersies which diuided their soules) he exhorts them to liue in brotherly loue, and to suffer euery man to enioy the exercise thereof. This declaration is followed by letters to the Prince of Condé, the Marshal D'Anville, to the Earle of Ventadour, Viconte of Turenne, and to the chiefe amongst the Protestants: the most part of them receiue leaues of paper for an vndoubted oracle. Whereof some sayd, they should shortly haue all things at their will: but it was without effect, and contrary to promises.

The Prince of Condé, laboured then for great succours in Germany. This publication B comes happily to dispose Frederick Elector and Cont Palatin to make a league with him: That they should not lay aside armes vntill the King had giuen the government of Metz, Thoul and Verdun to duke John Casimir his sonne, the places and reuenues depending on the sayd Bishopricks for the entertainment of necessary garrisons vnder the Kings authority, and free exercise of the reformed religion. That the King should giue him an honorable entertainment; and to the Protestants of Languedoc an annuall pension of fixe thousand crownes: And a mutuall protestation both by the heads of Germany and France, to doe their best endeauours for the good of France. All this must needs feed the people with hope, to prevent all future troubles. But the Prince had some horse-leeches about him, who employing their companions purses, filled their owne cofers with golden crownes: and the Protestants imployed many persons in the affaires of their religion, who had neither faith, piety, nor religion.

The Court was wonderfully disquieted. The King sends many posts to the gouernours of Prouinces, coniures them to keepe their faith, accuseth the Protestants and Politikes, to haue withdrawne his brother from him, forbids his subiects to giue any aide, fauor, or support to the duke of Alanson: calles the gentlemen together, & besides his bands of Ordinary, hee makes new cornets of horses, and for their entertainment he imposeth new taxes. And to moue the people, and retaine them in obedience vnder the shew of deuotion and piety, he ordaines processions, fasts and praiers, and makes vowes and pilgrimages. But D being returned to the Louvre, the Ladies, and his little dogges (which he kept very daintily,) made him to forget the care of affaires, and to leaue the managing thereof to his Mother and some Councillors. She makes a journey to the duke her sonne, to reconcile him (sayd she) vnto the King. But the suspitious held, that her going was to furnish him with new instructions: that being declared Generall of these troupes, both forraigne and French, and of diuers religions, and hauing ratified (as he did soone after) an accord made with Casimir, she might agree at her pleasure with him, and so disappoint the great designs of the army. After this parlee, the duke marcheth into Poictou, the Earle of Ventadour comes vnto him with three hundred horse, and twelue hundred Harguebuziers: many great Noblemen and Gentlemen repaire vnto him. During these confusions, the duke of Guise E and his house, deuise to lay the foundations of a third party, the which we shall soone see breake forth. For the present, he assembles twelue hundred maisters in Champagne, vnder the Kings authority, and Stroffy twelue thousand foote: the duke of Vzcz sends vnto them the rest of his horse, and the duke of Montpensier sends his troupes of Poictou.

The Marshall D'Anville had required some cornets of Reistres from the Prince of Condé, to fortifie him in Languedoc: But seeing these last designs had called away the Kings forces, to keepe the Germane army from entring: the councell decreed, that attending Casimir comming, these Reistres appointed for Languedoc, should goe to the duke of Alanson, being already chosen to be their chiefe and Generall. This did weaken their party, and this first check brought the most part of his councillors into a bad reputation, and confirmed the Pretestants in the ielousies they had conceiued of the duke of Alanson. Thore F led these troupes, being about fiftene hundred: some French Gentlemen ioyned with him, with five hundred shot. The dukes of Guise and Mayenne, Biron, Fernagues and others, compassed them in. Some retire and cry for money: some fight, imitating the French, but the greater number preuailes. Haffing the Colonnell, with his Licutenant and some Reistres, and French, are slaine vpon the place: the rest flee.

Murmuring amongst the King.

Clermont and many others being taken, with some cornets, serue as a triumph for the duke of Guise: five hundred Reistres ioyne with his troupes, he himselfe (following them that fled) receiued a shot with a pistoll in the cheeke, and by his fall gaue meane to many to escape the fury of his victorious armes. There led the remainder of this ship-wracked duke of Alanson, being taxed as a bad man of warre, and not capable of counsell. This wound is a ladder for the duke of Guise to climbe to wonderfull credit with the Catholikes: wound is a ladder for the duke of Guise to climbe to wonderfull credit with the Catholikes: the Kings actions both publicke and priuate, beginne to displease him. The King (say they) takes his ease, and drownes himselfe in delights and pleasures: his brother troubles all France, and the house of Guise beares the burthen of the affaires of the whole common-wealth. And vpon these fauourable repinings, the duke hereafter grounds most terrible defeignes.

His forces were not able to encounter the power of Casimir. The King therefore calls for Mansfield, Schomberg, Bassompierre, and other Colonells, who promise to bring him eight thousand Reistres within six weekes, giuing them three hundred thousand frankes downe, and foureteene hundred thousand when they were entred. The King was wonderfull needie: all was spent in vnprofitable sumptuousnesse, and vnworthy dissolutenesse: and part of this money could no where be so easily found, as in the Parisiens purses. To induce them thereto, they obtaine Bulls from Pope Gregory the thirteenth, and foure Churches appointed within Paris to obtaine pardons for many yeeres, vpon condition to aide the King, to roote out heresies. And to drawe the Parisiens by others example, they gaue it out, that Piennes should his inheritance, to lend the King foure hundred thousand frankes: that the Italians of Paris did furnish the like summe: and the duke of Neuers, the Cardinall of Ferrara, Gondi, and Birague, nine thousand frankes. Neither the first, nor the second bayte could make the Parisiens to bite. They say, that within fifteene yeeres their Citie had contributed twelue millions of gold, not comprehending the loanes and extraordinary imposts leauied at Paris, and throughout the Realme: that these ciuill dissentions, waste both their men, and money: they beseech him that (according to the notable aduertisements of Saint Lewis, to his sonne and successor) he would maintaine his subiects in peace and concord, by the bonds of piety and iustice. He must haue money, and not words: and that by force, seeing loue cannot preuaile. Paris therefore is suddenly inuested with garrisons: the King of Nauarre at Saint Cloud, the duke of Guise at Saint Denis, the duke of Neuers in the suburbs of Saint Germain. Biron at Montmartre, the Marshall of Rez at Pont Charenton, and Bois de Vincennes. Thus the Parisiens are restrained of their victuals, and force extorts from them the money, which kindnesse could not win. In the meane-time, the pretended Reistres were far off, and duke Casimir marched with the Prince of Condé.

The Queene

A German army for the Prince of Condé.

To diuide the duke of Alanson from these two heads, and frustrate the defeignes of the Prince of Condé, the Queene-mother comes againe to the duke: shee treats a suspension of armes for six monethes, and during the same, shee giues him for hostages, the townes of Angoulesme, Niort, Saumur, Bourges and La Charité: and for the Prince, Meziers. The King doth ratifie this truce: but the gouernours of these places, for the most part refuse to yeeld them: neither will the Prince allow of it, for already there marched ten thousand horse, sixe thousand Suisses, two thousand Lanquenets, three thousand French Harquebuzers, with foure great peeces of battery, and sixteene lesse: the which threatened to make their passage easie. This army made chiefe account of the money which Languedoc should furnish, and the Marshall d'Anville had promised the Prince to meeete with good troups, and to bring the pay vnto the army: but no man appeares, neither is there any newes of money. An affront which then had made them yeeld to any passable conditions of peace: if they had bene offered it in the beginning of these first confusions, and might haue transported the men of warre beyond the bounds of modesty and reason, if by a good and commendable discipline the Prince had not restrained the soldiers infolencies.

At their entry, those of Langres (seeking to crosse their passage through their territories) did presently see the Reistres to spoile all, to loade their cartes, and to burne the neighbour villages to ashes. Those of Dijon made some sallies, but they were small to

A to some: others were content to salute them with their Canon, shot into the ayre. Citteaux-Gilly a Castle depending on the said Abbey, and Nuis a small towne in Bourgogne, where the first conquests of the Reistres, the Prince and Lanquenets: where they learned by the slaughter and spoile which was made at Nuis, how troublesome a thing it is, for a Prince (enemie to blood and spoile) to be mastered by the greater number, being strangers in his armie.

The Reistres begin to mu-
tine.

At Lourdon the Reistres threaten the Prince to take another party, if he giue them not ready money. Having contented them with hopes and good wordes, the armie passeth Loire, marcheth directly to the riuer of Allier, and takes Vichy by composition, a small Towne vpon the passage. Thus these strangers did forrage, whilst the King by a proposition of truce gaue hope of a future peace: and to preuent surprizes, he studied to fortifie the places about Paris, whether the whole army threatened to come: for the effecting whereof he finds his ordinarie let, which was the want of mony. The Parisiens remembered with what violence the King had lately forced them to yeeld to his demands: they now promise for their contribution foureteene hundred thousand frankes.

The Queen-mother pursues this suspension of armes, she furnisheth the Duke of Alanson with very exquisite meates, sends him his great hories, and causeth them to be proclaimed traitors, that would not yeeld to the Duke her sonne: amongst others the Inhabitants of Bourges, and La Charité, offering Tours and Blois in exchange of the said Towns. Those of Guise haue their desseigne apart. He speakes boldly, that France hath no need of a truce: that they will fight with their forraine foe, and vpon this hope published, they build the projects which we shall see them shortly to vndertake. Amidst these common diuisions, a new confusion troubles the Court.

The King of Nauarre, vnder colour of hunting, escapes from Paris with a small traine: and writes to the King from La Fere in Picardie (a towne belonging vnto him,) That the apprehension of a new captiuitie, and the ordinarie slanders of his enemies, are the causes of his retreat. The King excuseth himselfe, and would haue him returne: but he had the fieldes at libertie. And seeing this proiect will not preuaile, he must try another. Some bad Councillors, which gouerned the Prince of Condé, aduised him to passe the riuer of Allier, and speedily to ioyne with the Duke of Alanson, leauing Duke Casimir on the other side the riuer, who should follow his ordinarie march. In the meane time the Duke of Maienne, attends them at the passage with the Kings army. This trick left the Reistres to the slaughter: but Casimir an aduised and couragious Captaine, lodgeth his men with aduantage, and attends the enemy. The Prince discovering their desseigne, turns towards them, and makes the Kings troups retire to their lodging. The Auernacs fearing lest this army should passe the rest of the winter vpon their marches, make them to take the way of Bourbonois, giuing them an hundred and fifty thousand frankes. Here began the first parle of peace: and to this effect, letters and instructions were sent into Guienne, Languedoc and Dauphiné. Charoux a little towne in Bourbonnois, besides mony lent, payed the charges of some daies

E that the army staid there, whilst they made question to yeeld. The eleuenth of March, the Duke of Alanson comes to the plaine of Soze, where in a generall muster, they numbred thirty Cornets of Germaine horse, ten of French: seuentene ensignes of Suisses, seuen of Lanquenets, eight of French, and the Prince of Condé, deliuering the white Cornet into the Dukes hands, according to the articles of their capitulation, he was solemnly proclaimed Generall of this mighty army. The King in the meane time, with the Queene-mother, and their Councillors, omitted no practises to corrupt Duke Casimir, and to breake the treatie betwixt the Prince and the Duke. On the other side, the French, Reistres, Suisses and Lanquenets, demanded nothing but battell, or to march towards Paris: but the Duke of Alanson was already assured of the best part of his demands: and the armies without any memorable exploits of warre, did onely spoile and destroy France. At length the Queene-mother seeing matters almost brought to a desired end, she comes to the army the seuen and twentieth of April, where after diuers Ambassages and contestations, she granted in the end to the Duke Casimir a company entertained of an hundred men at armes, forty thousand frankes yearly pension, and two thousand crownes for the entertainment of a certain number of horses. In consideration whereof, he did renounce the article concerning Metz, Thoul,

1576. Thoul and Verdun. That of eleuen millions of frankes that were due vnto him, hee should receiue two millions within fixe weekes, and a sufficient pawne of Iewels for the rest, and the reuenues of Chasteau Thierry. The Duke of Alañon should haue for his part, Aniou, Touraine and Berry, for an increase of his portion.

The Prince of Condé should haue the gouernement of Picardie, the Towne of Peronne for his abode, and two hundred souldiers in garrison: free exercise of the pretended reformed religion throughout the Realme, attending a free and generall Councell: Chambers in the Parlements of both religions, for the administration of Iustice: and at Montpellier for Languedoc, leauing them eight townes in guard, for the assurance of these articles, and of their persons: Aiguil-mortes and Beaucaire in Languedoc, Perigueux and le Mas de Verdun in Guyenne, Nyons and Serres in Daulphiné, Issoire in Auuergne, Seine, with the great Tower in Prouence. Restitution to the King of Nauarre, Prince of Condé, Marshall of Anuille, and diuers others, of their goods, offices, and honors, which they enioyed before the foure and twentieth of August 1572. Moreouer, the King did auow by a sollemne declaration: That the Massacres of the said yeare, had bene committed against all right and law of armes. He ordained, that the children of such Gentlemen as had bene murdered, should be freed from all charges of warre: and such as were no Gentlemen, should be eased of Subsidies for fixe yeares. He disannulled all iudgements giuen since the decess of Henry the second, in hatred of Religion: and lately against the Politickes. He freed the Admirall, and al others murdered, from infamie: restoring their children to all their goods. Hee restored La Mollie, Cocornas, and others, executed or condemned for contempt to their honors. He aduowed the taking of armes by the Duke of Alañon and his associates, as taken for his seruice, giuing him the towne of La Charité for two yeares. He appointed a Conuocation of the Estates at Blois in Nouember following. Hee cleared the Marshalls of Montmorency and Cossé of all accusations, held them for innocents, restored them to their former liberty, and acknowledged them for faithfull seruants to the King, and officers of the Crowne. The Edict contained many other articles depending vpon the former, and was allowed by the Parliament of Paris the 14. of May.

So the Queene-mother granted much to many, to giue nothing to any, but to the Duke her sonne, who alone got more then all the rest together. Also Duke Casimir had no sooner turned his backe from France, but they began to find this peace to be counterfeit, being made onely to disarme them, and to diuide the Commanders. The Prince of Condé did first feele the breach of these promises. They deny him his gouernement of Picardie: some feaze vpon Peronne, and put in practise a strange peece of worke. Diuerse enterprises vpon the Princes person, make him to leaue the duke of Alañon, & to retire into Guienne to the King of Nauarre, whom those of Rochel receiued into their towne, with much honour and great triumph the eight and twentieth of Iune. All such of his traine as they suspected were excluded.

Vpon deniall of Peronne, the King granted to the Prince the towne of Saint Jean d'Angely: but the inhabitants had a watch-word, and a mutuall oath (after the example of a priuat league made by three-score Gentlemen of Poitou, who would haue no exercise but of the Catholike Religion) to maintaine one another, and not to giue access to any one, of what Religion soeuer, to the end their quiet might no waies at al be disturbed or molested. The Prince seeing himselfe to haue this repulse, he caused some Captains to enter secretly, and then assured himselfe of the place. It was then found very weake for the assurance of his person, against so many enemies as sought his death. He therefore discouers a certain practise against him, but farall to the author alone. In the end of October he takes Brouage, a strong place neare vnto Rochel. The Catholikes murmure against him, and accuse him as a disturber and breaker of the peace. Contrariwise, hee demaunded Iustice against them that had seized on Peronne, as troublers of the publike quiet, and guilty of treason. The Protestants likewise complaine vnto the King: That in diuers places they are disquieted in the exercise of their religion granted by the Edict. That many Preachers moue the people to sedition: That the Chambers of both religions are not created: That Iustice is denied them: That both great and small bandy against them. And they produce ample and certaine proofes of these complaints and griefes.

Then

A Then those of the house of Guise studied to discouer those terrible proiects which they had long hatched. The cloke of religion was a plausible and fauourable pretext, to aduance the desseignes of their pretensions. They had of many yeares, (especially vnder Francis the 2.) disputed of their beginning, and of the rights which falsely they pretended to haue vnto this Crowne. Charles and Henry were become odious: the first by his violences, the last by his dissolutions. Francis Duke of Aniou, (for hereafter he shall carry that title) had lately troubled France, and was taken for a turbulent Prince: a title vnpleasing to the people. The diuision for matters of conscience, seemed sufficient to keepe backe the chief Princes of the bloud: the rest were weake both of age and power. Those of Guise in the meane time, had neither forgotten bountie, courtesie, nor shew of zeale in pietie, to winne the Catholikes hearts. The Queene-mother vsed them for a purpose, that by the mutuall ruine of the one and the other, she might maintaine her authority.

B But their fauors within the Realme were not auailable. The Protestants crossed them infinitely: they must seeke a forraigne support. They find it sily at Rome, and in Spain. The Pope gouernes Catholikes consciences, and great men do still find in Religion a wel-colored pretext to trouble the State. The King of Spain feared, lest the peace of this Realme should breed him warres. The Prince of Auranges, and many townes of the Low-countries cast themselves alreadie into the Kings protection, against the Spanische tyranny. They sollicite the Duke of Aniou instantly, and propound conditions vnto him, which make him to open both eares and mouth: and already many Gentlemen and Captaines armed for this quarrell. So both the Consistorie at Rome, and the King of Spain might well countenance these desseignes, grounded especially vpon the defence of the Catholike religion: the one for the zeale he carries to the rooting out of heretic: the other, for the profit he reapes by our common diuisions.

C And therefore those of Guise send their Agents to Rome, with instructions, and shew; That by the negligence of Kings issued from the house of Valois, descending from the line of Hugh Capet, (in the which there appeared none, but were dull or heretickes) the Catholike religion decayed in this Realme: whilst that the race of Charlesmaigne honoured with the blessing of the Romaine seate, the which subsists not but by that race (from the which they will make the world beleue, that they are descended in the direct masculine and lawfull line) remains despised, although it be ready to serue the Church faithfully, and that there liue at this day Princes of that race, commendable for their vertues, ready to spend their bloud and meanes, to augment the dignitie of the Church, and for the destruction of heretickes. And therefore they beseech the Consistory to approue and fauour their desseignes. Their chief desseignes were to ouerthrow the succession brought in by Hugh Capet, in the full assembly of the Estates, and to make the naming of a successor subiect vnto the said Estates: to cause the Princes of the bloud, that should oppose against the decrees of the Estates, to be declared incapable to succeed vnto the Crowne. And the residue, of what qualities soeuer, Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, degraded of their dignities: the money growing of their confiscations, to be employed for the warre, and their bodies to be executed. A reward to be appointed for them that should roote out such as could not bee apprehended. To make the Estates protest to liue and dye in the faith, set downe by the Councell of Trent: to cause it to be signed in the open Parliament: To reuoke and disannull all publike Edicts in fauour of the Protestants and their associates, and to pursue them to the death that should hinder the extirpation of heresies. To cause the King to reuoke the promises made vnto the Protestants, and to prescribe a certaine time vnto their associates, in the which they should present themselves before the Ecclesiasticall Iudges to bee absolved: and then to be sent vnto the King, to purchase pardon of the crimes committed against his Maiesty. To cause the King to name a Lieutenant generall, a Prince capable of experience, and fit to encounter the rebellion of Princes, that should seeke to hinder the effect of the precedent articles: and who neuer had had part, society nor communication with heretickes, to whom both he and his Ancestors had euer bene professed euemies: and to require his Maiesty to honour the Duke of Guise with that charge, being inuued with all the perfections requisite in a great Captaine, and worthy of that Commission. To cause Iudges to be appointed to examine the crime committed by the Duke of Alañon, declaring him-

To cause the said Duke to come to the Court, with the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Condé: and by ordinary and extraordinarie forces, to seaze vpon the Duke, King, Prince, and all others that had accompanied them, and followed them in their enterprises. To cause such Captaines, as the parishes should giue to the Duke of Guise, to put all Protestants, their adherents and complices, to the sword, both in the country, and in walled townes. To subdue by force or intelligence the reuolted Provinces: to be masters of the field, to block vp the townes that were opposite, and to put all to fire and sword, that would make head against them: And after this goodly and infallible victory, hauing won the loue of the Clergy, Nobility, and people, to take exemplarie punishment of the Duke of Anjou and his complices, then by the Popes consent and permission, to put the King and Queene into a Monastery, as Pepin his Ancestour did in former time to Childeric: and for an acknowledgement, and in fauour of the Romaine Sea to abolish the liberties and priuiledges of the French Church.

The first League at Peronne.

These high and great proiects were harkned vnto, receiued and fauoured in the Court of Rome, and from that time those of Guise did not cease to dreame of the meanes to aduance the effects. But this was to reckon without their host. They haue compassed some of their conclusions, but the end proued quite contrary to their intents: wherein we admire a most singular prouidence of the King of Kings, whereby he hath vnto this day miraculously balanced, and in the end by his singular grace setled the estate of this Realme. The articles of C this association were first drawne at Peronne in Picardie: but disguised with goodly shewes, to blind them that would examine them more exactly: which were to maintaine the Lawe of God, to restore the holy seruice thereof: To preserve the King and his Successors in the Estate, dignitie, seruice, and obedience due vnto him by his subiects: To restore vnto the Estates of the Realme, their rights, preheminences, and ancient liberties. And for the execution of these articles, a certaine forme of oath was propounded, inflicting paines of eternall damnation to the associats, that for any pretext whatsoever should withdraw themselves from this League, and a bond for such as should be enrolled, to employ their goods, persons, and liues, to punish, and by all meanes to ruine the enemies and perturbers thereof, and to punish them that should faile, or make any delaies by the authoritie of the head, D as he should thinke good.

The Duke of Alanson reconciled to the King.

This done, there were nothing but posts carrying the first newes of their desseignes. They cast many libels throughout the streetes, in many good townes: they murmure that they are too much supported by the Edict: they practise some to serue as fire-brands to kindle a new warre: and vnder this plausible and commendable title of the name of the Church and diuine seruice, the people (a fit matter to nourish ciuill diuisions) giue eare to such as seeke to thrust him into mutiny. The King was daily aduertised of new complots. He found that this match did kindle a fire of perpetuall combustions within his Realme. On the other side he hated the Protestants, and would ruine them by degrees, but not by such instruments as wrought without his authoritie. His mother likewise hated them to the death, and greatly E desired the ruine of the heads, being well content that these confusions should still diuide the French, so as holding the staffe in her hand, she might terrifie her children, and maintaine her authoritie, make warre, and giue peace whensoever she pleased. Thus she causeth the Duke of Alanson to come to the Court, and the King to entertain his subiects of both religions, in hope of better concord, by means of this reconciliation: and to cut off all new factions, he deferred the generall assembly of the Estates vnto the 15. of December following. He presumed likewise, that all his subiects abhorring the ruine of Townes, the desolation of countries, and the spoile of strangers, would gladly prefer the entertainment of a peace solemnly sworne, before the continuance of war: and by this means, he should preuent all turbulent persons, and bridle the Protestants; whom he meant to consume otherwise F then by open warre: whereby neither his predecessor, nor he himselfe had gotten any honorable triumphes:

The beginning of the Parliament.

The day (appointed for the Estates) comes, the King himselfe begins it. He laments the calamities of his Realme, whereof the tender age in the which his brother and himselfe were in the beginning of these ciuill warres, may well iustifie them, that they were not the authors

A authors and motives. He protests to haue no desseigne nor desire, but for the safetie and quiet of his people, whose miseries he would redeeme with the price of his life. He coniuers the assembly to assist him in his holy resolution. To deuise some meanes to redeeme the lands of the Crowne, engaged for aboue an hundred millions of gold: to vnite themselves firmly together, to root out all feedes of partialities, to reforme abuses, establish Iustice, and to restore the Realme to the ancient dignity. Birague the Chancellor addes the rest: but the two maine points of his speech, were to iustifie the Queene-mothers gouernment, and to demand money. Peter d'Espinae Arch-bishop of Lions, and the Baron of Senecey are speakers: the one for the Clergy, the other for the Nobility: and both conclude a publike exercise of one onely Religion in France. Peter Verforis, Advocate in the Court of Parla- B ment at Paris, Orator for the third estate, insists especially for the vnion of all the Kings subiects in one religion, but by mild meanes, and without warre: hee beseecheth the King to maintaine his people in peace, to reconcile his Princes, and exactly to examine the badde gouernment of his treasor.

The third Estate more indifferent and moderate.

The King seemed to incline onely to alter some articles in the last Edicts of pacification, and not to abolish it quite: but he was needie, and feared that wherewith they threatened him: That no man would assist him, but vpon condition to make warre against the Huguenots. Thus the perswasions and promises of the Clergie, and Nobility, preuailed more then those that preferred peaceable proceedings before violent: making him resolute to armes, to C root out all other exercise of religion but the Catholike, to banish all Ministers, Deacons, and ouer-seers of the pretended reformed Religion: and yet to take all his other subiects of the said religion into his protection, attending, that by better instructions they might bee reclaimed to the bosome of the Church. But the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Condé, the Marshall of Montmorency, d'Anville, and other Noblemen, both of the one, and the other Religion, had well fore-seene these conclusions, and refusing to assist at this pretended Parliament, conclude a Nullity of all that should be decreed to preiudice the Edict of pacification, protesting that they were resolute to maintaine themselves in the rights, liberties, and freedoms, which the last Edict had granted them: That the troublers of the publike quiet, and the sworn enemies of France, should find them in a iust defence, and they D should answer before God and Men, for all the miseries that should ensue thereby. For answer, it was ordained, that men should be sent to winne some to the Catholike Church, and all to the obedience of the Kings new Edict, tending to maintaine the Romaine Religion, to roote out all other exercise, to defend the King, and to preserve his people. The king thought by this opposition to stay this new faction which fortified it selfe daily. It was a great indiscretion to countenance an association and league, which vnder the ashes of the last warre, being yet hot, couered the coales of a generall flame. The King of Nauarre be- E seecheth the Estates, by the Duke of Montpensier (who was sent vnto him) not to infringe the Edict of peace, and to suffer them of the Religion to enioy that which had bene so solemnly granted. He offers to submit himselfe, if they shew him how he erres: but hee in- treats them, that in a matter of so great importance, they will giue him time to thinke seriously thereon, and to attend the opinion of an assembly of those of his Religion, and of the Catholikes associats, which shortly shall be made at Monrauban.

The King of Nauarres request to the Estates.

The Prince of Condé answers more sharply: That he doth not acknowledge them that are assembled at Blois, for the Estates of the Realme; but a conuenticle of persons corrupted by the sworn enemies of the Crowne, who haue sollicitied the abolition of the Edict, to the ruine and subuersion of the Realme. That if they had bene lawfully called, he would haue assisted for the sincere affection he beares to the kings seruice, and the quiet of his contray. That he will neuer giue his consent to the counsels of the authors of so many confusions which he foresees, whereunto he hath alwaies knowne the kings disposition to bee repugnant, and a friend to Vnion; being the sure and principal means to preserve his Crown. F That he hath alwaies honoured the Clergie and Nobility, and will maintaine them with all his power: but hee pitties the people, whome these pretended Estates of Blois seeke to ruine.

The Prince of Condes answer.

The chiefe of the Politicks protest: That they do not cleaue to any other religion, then that of their Fathers: but as touching a general peace, they cannot allow of this resolution: The declaration of the Politicks.

To

1577. To take from the Protestants the publike exercise which had beene so solemnly graunted A them. The Duke of Montpensier (being returned) perswaded to haue the Edict confirmed. The third estate presented a new petition vnto the King, beseeching him to vnite all his subjects in one religion, but without violence. Doubtlesse a King may well ruine euery priuate man, but not all mankind in generall. One succeeds another, and the children (whose age and innocency doth naturally free them from the rigour and violence of armes) do inherit the humors, passions, and quarrels of their fathers.

The Protestants supplication.

The Protestants ioyndly beseech the King, not to suffer this assembly (which they cannot allow for a generall Parliament) to consult vpon the point of Religion due vnto a free Councell. The Estates (said the King) should neither be free, nor generall, if I should make this prohibition. And as they may demand what they please, so may you do the like, and I promise you in the word of a King, and of an honest man, that whatsoever I ordaine, shall be for the contentment of all my subjects, and the quiet and peace of my Realme. In the meane time, they consult how to leuy money for the warre. The King gives notice to his Gouvernours, and publisheth by his Letters-patents: That hee is resolu'd to graunt the Estates their requests, touching the exercise of one onely religion. And Milleguier is sent to the Princes of the Empire, to diuert some from their affections to the Prince of Condé and his adherents: and to obtaine from others a leaue of Resistres. Thus the warre begins in Guienne.

The first ciuill warre.

By the Duke of Aniou, and

Of Mayenne.

The King of Nauarre attempts vpon Marmande, a Towne of his gouernement, but without effect. The Duke of Mayenne comes for the King: and whilest hee is the strongest in field, he batters, takes and sackes, Thone-Carante, Marans, and other places thereabouts. During the Parliament, the Deputies of the Low-countries came to demand succors of the King and the Duke of Aniou for protector of their liberties and priuiledges, against the tyrannous gouernment of the Spaniards. He is now declared the Kings Lieutenant generall. They giue him a mighty army, with the which (contrary to the oath taken by him in the obseruation of the accord and promise past with the Prince of Condé and the Duke of Mayenne,) he besiegeth and takes La Charité by composition, and Yssoire in Auvergne by force, where the blood of the Inhabitants, shed without pittie by the Duke of Aniou, confirmed the Protestants in the bad opinion they had conceived of him.

The siege of Brouage.

Rochell crossed the practices of the contrary party: whose happy exploits caused the duke of Mayenne to send forth a Nauy to sea, vnder the command of Lansac: which presenting it selfe before the Isle of Ré, retired, seeing the Ilanders resolu'd to fight if they approached. The Rochellois, to encounter them, arme seuen ships, those of the Ilands five, and intreate the Estates of Holland and Zeland, vpon good assurance to ayde them with some great vessels, to withstand the force of this Fleet. The Nobility, by their example, inuite all others, and of all qualities, to charge themselves willingly for the maintenance of this army. The Duke of Mayennes first conquests make him proceed. And to make his enterprises vpon Rochel more easie, he comes before Brouage the 22. of Iune. It is a small square towne, built in a marish recouered out of the sea, fortified during the third peace; and at that time ill furnished with men, victuals, and munition: and besides, ill-beloued of the Ilanders about it. Those of Rochell, whom it doth greatly import for the preferuation of their Estate, did greatly indomage the assailants, and cut off about 600. of their men in short time. But a diuision happened, and was cunningly maintained betwixt the Nobility and the Rochellois: the Prince of Condé hauing (vnder the conduct of Clermont Admiral for the Rochellois) lost some vessels, being runne on ground, the rest being dispersed, and thereby the Isle of Oleron lost. The Kings approach to Poitiers: the supply of Suisses in the campe: Lansacs comming into the rode of Chef de-Bay neare vnto Rochel (where he burnt one of their principall ships, and tooke another, but without the losse of a man) the death of Sere chiefe of the besieged, slaine with tenne or twelue others in a sally by night, the number of sicke and hurt which they had to feed, the ruine of their forts, the enemies approach, the want of victuals, and the threats of the Duke of Anious comming, who would intreate them as he had done the inhabitants of Issoire: all these considerations made them enter into capitulation, by the which they departed the 28. of August with their armes and baggage, leauing the place at the victors deuotion.

This

A This happy successe should haue made the Duke of Mayenne aduance with his army: but the progresse was dangerous for the Kings Estate: who to maintaine himselfe, must proceed after another sort. His maner of life was contrary to the violence of armes: he was of a soft and delicate nature, impatient of labour, a friend to rest, feasts, dancing, and other pleasures, which peace brings to them that are giuen to delights. So the peace which had been plotted during the siege of Brouage, was concluded at Poitiers, and was receiued in the end of September with so great ioy of either party, as the Prince of Condé caused it to be proclaimed by Torch-light in Rochell the same night it came: although it were not so beneficiall for his party as the first. This last Edict cut off some articles of the former, made no mention of strangers: left their consciences free, yet without exercise, but in Townes and places where as then it was publickly vsed in Gentlemens houses that had high Iustice and sees, in what assemblies they pleased: for others of meaner quality, a certaine number, and in euery Bailiwiki a fit and commodious place for the publike exercise of the pretended reformed religion. So the proud desseignes of the Duke of Guise were made frustrate for this time, and it layd for some yeares, vntill that by the death of the Duke of Aniou, we shall see them reuiued, but in the end to the Authors confusion.

The peace of Poitiers.

The partialities and leagues made within the Realme, in the which many, both great and small, had farre engaged their goods and reputations, were the cause of great difficulties, in the execution of the Edict. Those of Languedoc especially, (from whom the Mar- shall d'Anuille had estranged himselfe) did ioyntly, with the other Prouinces, sollicite the King of Nauarre, to obtaine an explanation of many ambiguous and doubtfull articles. So a whole yeare was spent in instances, pursutes, and declarations.

Articles of hard execution.

The conference at Nerac betwixt the Queene-mother and the King of Nauarre, decided many difficulties: but their spleenes cold not be so easily tempered, and sometimes in one Prouince, sometime in another, the Edict was diuersly and many waies broken. The most factious were very loth to lay aside Armes: the Politikes did daily diuide themselves from the Protestants: the Protestants sought to keepe themselves from surprizes, and full of distrust, maintained themselves quietly in the midst of many stormes which threatened them.

As for the King, experience hath now taught him, that the power of man cannot force mens consciences: that spirituall diseases must haue spirituall cures: that faith is not planted in the heart by violence: that wee must attend from heauen the conuersion of them that are strayed, and that the Prince is a patterne whereto his subjects willingly conformance themselves. He therefore shewes himselfe in publicke, for a myrror of reformation and pietie, and as a testimony, that his greatest desire is to conformance the diuisions in his Realme, hee buildes many Monasteries, Chappels, and Oratories: vndertakes many pilgrimages on foote, confirms the Brother-hood of Penitents, erects the Order of Hieronymites; is daily conuersant with the Capuchins and Fueillants, called Iesuites: and by their instructions and directions erects many Companies: hee carries a Crucifixe and Beades in procession, with a whippe at his girdell: hee causeth many Bookes of deuotion to bee printed. And to conclude, hee leades a life more besitting a Cloyster then a Royall Court: and following the example of Lewis the eleuenth his Predecessour, hee institutes the Order of the Knights of the Holy-Ghost, binding them to conditions, which carry a strict bond to the Church of Rome.

The kings behaviour during the peace.

Hee pretended to giue diuers blowes with one stone: To vnite great men by an inuio- lable concord and amitie, for the good of themselves, the State, and their Countrey: To please the Clergie-men, and to leade all the Clergy in a leash: to winne the peoples hearts who are fedde with shewes: To suppress the grudging and the ill-will which the intolerable oppression of his subjects bred, to remedy the extraordinary expences of his court in vsual excesse, and for the entertainment of a number of minions and Horse-leeches, to whome they must rather weigh, then tell mony: But chiefly to pull downe the Protestants, to vndermine them, and by this lure of worldly greatnesse, to withdraw the chiefe heads, who could not attaine to this high and stately degree of Knighthood, but in renouncing of their Religion.

The Order of the Holyghost erected.

Henry (for trumpets of his deuotion) had the Fathers of the Capuchins, Fueillants, and Iesuites, Dom Bernard Fueillant, and Edmond Auger a Iesuite, gaue him publickly in their 1580. Sermons, and priuaty in confessions and companies, the testimonies of the most religious Prince, the most courteous, and the most carefull to vnite his subiects, first in their obedience to God, and then to him, that euer France hath knowne in many ages. But we shall see in the end most of their tongues sold for money, and others, who making profession to come into the pulpit to instruct the people, shall basely contradict and controule these goodly Oratours, and by a contrarie language, suborne the peoples affections, subuert their senses, and as it were with little linkes of gold, draw them after them, tyed by the nose, tongue and eares.

Sermons

Motives of rebellion against the King.

The feasts, masks, stately marriages, sumptuous pastimes, and the new impositions to maintaine them, led the first dance of rebellion. The Queen-mother, and those of Guise, seeing the King drowned in these delights of Court, did willingly entertaine him in that humour, that either busying himself to number his beads, or to tread the measures of a dance, they might hold the reines of government, and dispose of affaires without controule. But he knew well the ambition of these men. He was iealous of his royall authority, and in the midst of his delights and pleasures, their presence was suspect vnto him. He was more pleased with the familiarity of meane men, whom he had aduanced to exceeding greatnesse: and still he set some minion in centinell, to watch if they should attempt any thing against his royall dignity. Those of Guise are not idle, they watch for occasions, they receiue such as are mal-content, they practise men of their owne humors and dispositions, and fit for their desseignes: and can cunningly promise cure and helpe for those vlcers and sores which the people of France do generally complaine of.

These first discontents of subiects, oppressed with insupportable charges, and the impatience of the Clergie, who see their enemies to enioy a firme and solid peace, which did newly strengthen and close vp that old wound, which had lately imbrued all France, made them easily to reuiue the league of Peronne, and vnder two goodly pretexts, (religion, and the ease of the people) to discover the desseignes which they had long before conceiued. All encounters made the way easie both within and without: within, their hearts disposed to reuolt: without, the Spaniards greatnesse, who had now invaded the Realme of Portugal, and by this vsurpation had a great meane to disperse his Indian gold in France. And the duke of Aniou made warre for the Estates of Flanders and other vnited Prouinces, which had called him to free them from the tyranny and domination of the Spaniards. But these discourses belong to the Spanish, Portugall, and Flemish Histories, and may not enter into this volume, which inuites vs to an end.

Prolongation of trauels granted to the Protestants.

New motives of rebellion.

The last Edict (as the former) accorded some townes vnto the Protestants, for hostages and sureties of his word, during the terme of fixe yeares. Now the King summons them to deliuer them, seeing the time prefixed was almost expired. But the peace had beene so often broken, as so short a time could not quench the fire-brands of warre, nor giue a full execution to the Edict. To content them, the King grants a prolongation for the retaining of these townes for some yeares. This grant serues the Princes of the league for a new motive of troubles and disobedience. They giue it out generally: That the King fauours Hereticks, and that he will bring in heresie. They consider not, that he could not but by force (the euent whereof was doubtfull) recouer the said places, being strong and peopled with numbers of Protestants. The King of Nauarre fees as farre off, that the heauens are ouercast, and foresees that this storme doth threaten his Estate with a horrible tempest: they sollicite him to ioyne with this party: they make him goodly offers in shew, but all was but to lull him asleepe, or to cast vpon him all the causes of the future miseries, and to make him more odious and detestable. He giues the King intelligence thereof, and puts him in mind of the aduertisements he gaue him in the year 1576. vpon the treaties of the league in Spain and at Rome. He sees this myne is ready to breake, and that it is now time to thinke of his affaires. Hee assures himselfe of the amities and friendshipes of England, Denmarke and Germanie.

The duke of Aniou dies.

But suddenly there fallies a new accident, which breakes vp all the bankes that restrained the ouer-flowing of the League. The Duke of Aniou, whether his riot in the Lowe-countries, or griefe to see his desseignes ouerthrowne, or the wicked practises of Saucedo, (drawne in peeces since by foure horses) or some other secret attempt against his life, had shortened

A shortened his dayes: he dies at Chasteau-Thierry. Whatsoeuer it were, such as were employed to see this man tortured, and to discover the secret intentions of his masters, were afterwards vnworthily intreated, and ranfomed by the chiefe of the League. This death aduanced the King of Nauarre one degree. The King suffers the Court of Parliament to receiue the Roses in May, that were presented vnto him, (according to the custome of the Princes & Peeres of France) in quality of the first Prince of the blood, and first Peere of France. Most part of the Realm cast their eyes vpon him, as the Sunne-rising. This on the one side doth amaze the authors of the League, and on the other side, it presseeth them to try their fortunes now, whilest the King remains alone of his line, without hope of issue, and the King of Nauarre farre off, as it were exiled, and in shew excluded from euer passing the Loire.

They assemble the heads of their house at S. Denis, and presently make the seedes of their counsels to appeare in Picardie, Champagne, and Bourgongne. They make the townes to abhorre the Huguenots yoke, which (say they) the King of Nauarre prepares for them. They talke not of the King but with contempt: they cast forth libels and shamelesse Pasquils: they disgrace him in companies as a Sardanapalus, and idle Chilperic, drunke with prodigalities and dissolutenesse, and for a third Crowne (his deuise shewing, that hee attended the last in heauen) they were ready to shauie his crowne, like vnto a Monke in a cloister. The people beeing corrupted, and drawne from their obedience, by the disorders of the Court, suffer the poyson of audacious mutinies to creepe into their hearts. But let vs in few words see the conception, the deliuey, and the growing of this League in Paris, which shall cast forth store of branches into all the quarters of the Realme. Roche-blond a Cittizen of Paris, a turbulent and factious man, the first Tribune of this League, encouraged by some great men, and supported by the chiefe Ministers thereof, ioynes with Prenost the Curat of Saint Seuerin, Ba:her Curat of S. Benoist, and Launoy a Chanon of Soissons, sometimes a Minister, but fled from Sedan for adultery. These foure Arch-leaguers, hauing banded all their wits to ruine the house of Bourbon, and to aduance that of Guise, sow a pernicious seed of rebellion throughout the city, and frame a petty-Councell of the chiefe cittizens, who take the charge of the sixteene quarters of the city and suburbs, to practise all they could, and to entertaine them with discourses, grounded vpon the malice of the time, full of schisme, heresie, and tyranny. This petty Councell, compounded of Roche-blond, Compans a Merchant, Cruce a Proctor, La Chappelle, Louchart a Commissary, and Buffy le Clerc a Proctor, brought their deliberations and proiects to the grand Councell, which consisted of Doctors Curats, Preachers, and other men of marke.

In short time they make a great brother-hood, and finding themselves strong, they aduertise the Duke of Guise, of the affection of the good Catholikes of Paris, (that is the name which the Leaguers challenged to themselves) and their zeale to the preservation of Religion, and the rooting out of the contrary, and the ruine of tyranny. He concedes with his breethren, and sends both to giue and to take an oth in an assembly held in Reims place, at Paris. Then the most factious are sent to the townes and Prouinces of the Realme, with good instructions, to ioyne new confederates to their body, vnder a pretext to fight against heresie and tyranny. Then might we haue seene the chiefe pillars ouerthrowne that support a Prince: loue and authority, and hatred and contempt to supply their places. The Preachers publicly in all places, did terme the King a tyrant, and fauourer of Heretickes. The people did applaud them: and from this deadly hatred which they had conceiued against the King, his Councell and fauorites, sprung that fury which was soone after dispersed ouer all the body of France:

Trumpets of rebellion.

The better to countenance this League, they present it to Pope Gregorie the 13. that he might blesse it, and declare himselfe the God-father, as made for the ornament and support of the Catholike and Apostolike Romane Church. Gregorie was well pleased they should attempt any thing against the Huguenots: but hee did not approoue those popular rebellions which were made against a most Christian and Catholike King, neither would he be the fire-brand of a war which he could not quench. And so he sent the Deputies back without any answer. The League impatient to attend the resolution of Rome, layes open his desseignes, and makes them plausible, causing one of the chief Princes of the blood, to be produced.

The League presented to the Pope.

But not app.

1585. an actor and to carry the bable. They publish, that the King (dying without children) hath A no heire nor successor but the Cardinall of Bourbon, a Prince broken in yeares, without hope of issue, or to suruiue the King, who was sound, lustie, and young. But they secretly season the simple peoples minds, with that vniust vsurpation of the Capets, vpon the heires of Charlemagne: they print bookes, they cast forth diuers Libels, yea some Preachers make it the Text of their Sermons. Two principall fire-brands inflame the League. The assembly made by the King of Nauarre and the Deputies of that party at Montauban, to resolute the meanes to maintaine themselves, if the League (abusing the Kings name and authority) should seeke to offend them. And the voyage of the Duke of Espernon to the King of Nauarre, to conferre priuately with him in the Kings name.

Motiuues of League.

The chiefe of the League presume, that the King meanes to arme, and to employ the King of Nauarres forces against them. They seeke to preuent him, and to that intent they send forth many Commissions: but lest any should controule them, they cloake them with the Kings name, wherewith they maintaine themselves to be well allowed, as a thing done for his Maiesties seruice. The King in the end of March disauowes them, and forbids all leaues of men of warre. To iustifie themselves and their rising, they publish the motiuues of the Cardinall of Bourbon (who notwithstanding serued them but as a cipher) with the Princes Noblemen, Townes and Catholike commonalties to oppose themselves against heretiks. That they had contemned the resolution of the Estates, to make warre against heretiks, and to disannull all Edicts made in their fauour. That the succession of the King of Nauarre (whereof he hath conceiued a great hope since the death of the duke of Anjou) would cause great confusions within this Realme. That preparations were already made both within and without. That by an accord made at Magdebourg the fifteenth of December last past, the troupes of the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Condé, the Queen of England, the King of Scots, the Count Palatin, the Dukes of Saxony, Pomerania, and Wirtemberg, of the Landgraue of Hessen, the Suisses and other Protestants should ioyntly enter into France before the fifteenth of Aprill next following. That the Huguenots would not yeeld vp the townes which they held for the assurance of the last Edict of peace. That there is great abuse in the prouision of Offices, in the leauies of money, and in the inuention of exorbitant imposts.

Then they complaine of the minions in Court, who abusing the Kings name and bounty keepe the Princes and Noblemen that were truly Catholike, from all acceffe to his Maiesty, perswading him, that it is necessarie for the preseruacion of his Estate, to diminish their authority: they braue the Nobility, dispose of gouernements in fauor of their followers, waite the treasure, oppresse the people, restrain the libertie of Iustice, ruine the Clergie with tenths and extraordinarie charges. And then they declare: That these iust motions, and the suddenesse of the mischiefe, had thrust them into armes: the small credit they had with the King, hauing no other meanes to let him vnderstand their complaints: and in the end they protest, that their taking armes, was onely to restore the Church of God to her true and ancient dignity, vnder the exercise of one religion throughout the Realme and Commonwealth; To restore the Nobility to their honour and freedome: to ease the people of extraordinary charges inuented since the raigne of Charles the ninth, and not to employ the money leuiued thereby but for the Kings seruice. To require the King to prouide for his succession against the publike and priuate calamities, which the pretensions and contentions for the same might cause: and to chafe from Court such as abused his fauor and authority. In the end they protest and vow, not to lay downe armes, vntill their proposition bee fully executed: and that his Maiesty had preuented the danger, the feare wherof hath made them to take arms. These fall impressions had wonderfully incensed the people: but when as they talked to them of a synode held at Montauban, and of a Diet in Germanie, where they complotted to inuade France, and to chafe away both Masse and Priests: they take the words of these passionate men for Oracles of truth. They presse to enter into the League, such as demanded nothing but change, bankrupts, men indebted, malefactors, wicked and notorious persons.

To conclude, such as had need of ciuill war to liue vpon the Common, follow the Guisians Ensignes: The double pistolets of Spaine begin to shine, the Captaines arme and go

A to field. But the Huguenots are at Rochell, in Languedoc, Guienne and Daulphiné: and they go to seeke them in Picardy, Champagne, Bourgongne and Prouence. Marseilles is surprised the ninth of Aprill, by the practises of Daries the second Confull: but suddenly recovered, and Daries hanged. Mandelot seized on the Cittadell of Lions the second of May. Orleans shuts her gates against the Duke of Montpensier, sent by the King, to assure himselfe of the Towne. The other townes rise: the factious worke, and the army of the league marcheth towards Paris: euery day they are fortified with some new troupe, and euery day some towne declares it selfe enemy.

declaration.

The King in the meane time, made no warre but by writing, thinking by mild and gentle meanes, to pacifie them that spake too proudly. He shewes by his declaration, the zeale he hath alwaies borne to the Catholike Religion, and the necessitie that forced him to a peace, finding all the Estates of his Realme tyred with the calamities past: that peace was the only meanes to vnite his subiects in one religion; to establish Iustice, to reforme abuses and manners, to ease the Clergy, honour the Nobility, and to free the people from oppression: that he giues no benefices but to Prelates indued with learning and pietie. The Nobility should be reconciled, leauing their spleene and distrusts. The people freed from denouing warre, should eate their bread in peace: and yet many both impudent and rash, more hypocrites, then religious, gather by this peace, that he secretly fauours heretickes: the which neuer entred into his thoughts. That he neuer fauoured the succession of a King, who may preiudice the Catholike Religion. But to vnderstand a quarrell for the royall succession, whilest he is yet aliue, and in hope to haue issue: that were to distrust of Gods bounty, and (as it were) degrade him from the estate wherunto God had called him. That he hath honoured (with the greatest and worthiest offices of the Crowne) those Princes that complaine to be debarred his fauour. (And indeed the Duke of Guise was Lord Steward of France, Gouernor of Brie and Champagne, and euery one of the same house aduanced to a gouernement.) Then hauing promised to restore the Church to her beauty, to giue content to the Nobility, and to ease the people, he intreates, coniures, exhorts, and commands all Clergimen, Gentlemen, Parlements, and townes corporate, to separate themselves from that which may hinder so holy an intention, to abandon all Leagues and associations, and to vnite themselves vnder his obedience.

Moreouer, the King writes to the King of Nauarre, That hee should containe himselfe with patience: to the end the people may know whom to blame, as the motiuues of these new combustions: assuring him of his loue, and that he will neuer forget his interest no more then his owne: against them who (vnder goodly shewes) attempt against his person, and Crowne, to make them great with his losse, and the whole ruine of his estate. The King of Nauarre obeyes, and letting passe all occasions to arme, hee protests notwithstanding, That (seeing the sword readie to strike his Lord and brother) hee will preuent the danger.

The King of
declaration.

And whereas he is accused of Heresie, he answers: That he was born vnder the tolleracion of two religions in France: that he will leaue that wherein he was bred, when by a lawfull Councell they shall shew him another truth then that which he beleeueth: and therefore he is no heretick, nor yet relapse, seeing he was not fallen from his first opinion. That hee is no enemy to the Catholikes, for that when the Edicts had granted liberty of conscience, he presently layed downe armes: that in all places he maintaines his subiects in the same libertie, as he found them after the decease of his mother. That at the pretended accord of Magdebourg, which the preachers of the League publish in their pulpits, as an imaginarie assembly, and fit to be spoken by a Montbanke, the deceit appears plainly, in that they name (in the extra& published by them) the Ambassadors of the Elector Palatine, and of the prince of Auranges, whereof the Elector was deceased about a yeare before the term they specified, and the Prince slaine at Delft, 4. moneths before. That hee hath requested of the King a prolongation of the townes which he holds for assurance of the last Edict, and will deliuer them before the time, so as the League lay aside armes, and yeeld vnto the King the places they had seized. That whereas they declare him incapable of the Crowne, it toucheth him very neare: yet doth he thinke least of it, hoping that God by his bountie will long preserue the King, for the good of his realme, and will giue him issue, to the gricfe of all 1585.

A great error
of State.

his enemies. That those which by their declaration terme him desirous of the Kings death, A a troubler of the State, and an enemy to the Catholikes, haue falsely and wickedly lyed, beseeching the King to giue him leaue to end this quarrel with the Duke of Guise, one to leaue, two to two, or ten to ten: without farther troubling himselfe, or afflicting any of his people: but no man vndertakes this ly, no man accepts of this challenge. Against this first inso-lency of the league, he should oppose other armes then a pen: another cuirasse then a pe-nitents weeds: another countenance then doubtfull and trembling. The authority of a assured brow, the constancy of a manly courage, a resolution fit for a royall Maiestie, should haue disperfed this warre of gyants, and suppressed these mutinous Legions. But the Queen-mother (accustomed to fish in a troubled streame) winkt at the Duke of Guise. Shee was B well pleased with these broyles: she was contented the Duke should terrifie the King; to make him abandon the Protestants, and to force him to banish his new minions from Court, who had brought her in disgrace with the King her sonne: (he had now sequestred her from a great part of the affaires, he held her as it were confined in her houses without the Louure) to the end she might be sought vnto, to auoid the blowes of him that was ready to strike. Her ambition moued her thereunto, rather then any desire she had to aduance the Duke: to crosse both the King and Duke, and to bring disorder, and confusion into the State: and to stand alone in the midst of these furious tempests.

The League might easily haue bene ouerthrowne. In the beginning they had but a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot in field, and the greatest part knowing that these C troubles concerne the King and his Estate, retired themselues in time. Most of the townes wauered betwixt obedience and rebellion: some remained in their fidelitie, the rest might haue bene assured with small force. But Katherine terrifies him most of all. You haue (saith she) to do with the Pope, the Emperour, the King of Spaine, the Duke of Sauoy, with some Princes of Germany, with the Catholike Cantons of the Suisses, who renounce your alliance, and with all the house of Lorraine. They number fise and twenty Prouinces, and great Commanders in this party: your best townes are engaged, all are resolute to hazard goods, persons, and liues, to saue religion from shipwracke. Thus this poore Prince is terrified: he thinks the Duke of Guise is at his heeles, and holds the Capuchins cloister to bee more safe for him, then his Louure. He is not the same man that vanquished his enemies D at Iarnac and Montcontour, he wants courage, he desires nothing more, then to purchase the Dukes fauour: and promisseth, that for a peace hee will giue them a good part of his Kingdome. The Duke of Guise, a Prince of great experience, discrete, valiant, and worthy to be numbred amongst the brauest Captaines; knowes the King is full of feare; and sees that the lustre of his armes shines ouer all. His courage swels through the Kings childish feare: he continues his course, and begins to hope for more then he had pretended. Hee therefore demands much, and his request ioynes his owne priuate interest with the publike: he beseecheth the King to make an irreuocable Edi&t, for the extirpation of heresies, to take away the townes held by the Huguenots by force, to renounce the Protection of Ge-neua: to allow of their armes, and to ioyne his vnto theirs. Which was as much to say, of E a King to make himselfe a partizan.

The Duke of Guise fortified
by a peace.

The King makes a counterfet peace with them, and by his Edi&t of the 18. of Iuly, reuokes al other made in fauor of the Protestants: he commands their Ministers to depart the realm, and to all his subiects within 6. moneths, to make profession of the Catholike religion, or to auoid the cuntry. He approves the Leaguers armes, as leauied for his seruice, allows of their pretexts, and by secreet articles concluded at Nemours, contents them in all matters, only with this condition: To leaue the league, and instantly to lay down armes: a trap wher-by they should in the end be taken. As for their security, they left it to the Kings good pleasure: yet would they haue in their powers, the towne of Chalon, Thoul, Verdun, S. Disier, Reims, Soissons, the castle of Dijon, Beaune, Rue in Picardy, Dinan and Conco in Brittain: F they caused to bee paid to the King 200. one thousand, sixe Crownes, and two third parts for the strangers which they had leauied: they had a discharge for an hundred six thousand three hundred and forty Crownes, eight solz, and three deniers, which they had taken vpon the generall receipts. They obtained an hundred thousand crownes to build a citadel at Verdun: and entertainment for guards on horse-backe for all the Princes of the League.

To

1585.

A To conclude, the extorsions, robberies, burnings, profanations, and other insolencies which such armes drawe after them, deuoured more flesh in three moneths, than this warre continued, wasted more far, and sucked more blood from the poore people (for whose ease they had so often protested to haue taken armes) then the ordinary charges could haue consumed in many yeeres. This outrage was the cause of seuen and twenty Edi&ts, to discharge those millions of gold, which this fury had wasted, to the peruerting of Iustice, policy and the treasure.

A rash enterprise ruines it selfe when it finds resistance, but if the attempters finde that they are feared, their impunity growes confident. This peace had made a great breach in the Kings authority: but they had extorted it by force, not three daies before hee had B proclaimed them rebels and guilty of treason: they might then easily iudge, that he would hatch an egge whereof should spring some notable reuenge. Doubtlesse Henry determined it: but the three brethren, who were the chiefe architects of this conspiracy kept themselues a part, and could not be catcht in one net: and to maintaine themselues, they had no better expedient then by armes. They make the King resolute to warre against the Protestants: they shew him the facility thereof, three mornings (say they) will end it: We haue the assistance of all Christian Princes, the Germane forces will march no more for the King of Nauarre, a poore Prince, without money and without credit. The Queene of England shall haue worke enough to resist the Spaniards attempts (the Spaniard prepared C then that great army against England, which we shall see disperfed with small resistance, like a puffe of winde) and their strongest places will parte at our first approches.

Let vs make warre (saith the King) against them in Gods name. I will entertaine three armies: one in Guyenne, an other about mine owne person, and the third vpon the fronter, against the strangers whom the Huguenots expect out of Germany, there wants nothing but money: the charge amounts to foure hundred thousand crownes a moneth. I haue by your aduise broken the peace (saith he to the best of the Clergy, of the Parliament and of the citizens of Paris being assembled at the Louvre) assure me now of meanes to make warre. And afterwards he said to the Cardinall of Guise. The heads of the Clergy are they which haue most importuned me to warre: it is no reason I alone should beare D the charge of that which redounds to the publike. I assure my selfe, you will not faile to assist me. And to the first President (notwithstanding the Parliament had lately verified the letters-patents, whereby the King condemned the authors of this rebellion as traytors) I haue found so much zeale and affection in you, to cause mee to reuoke the last Edi&t of peace, as I assure my selfe you will find reasons sufficient to perswade them of your faculty, to forbear their caterrainments, so long as the warres shall continue. And then to the Preuost of marchants, he sayd. The city hath shewed it selfe most affectionat to the breach of the Edi&t: they must be as willing to contribute to the charges of the warre. Go presently, and assemble the body of your city, and make mee an imposition of two hundred thousand crownes.

Warre against the Protestants.

E Without doubt euery one of these was very willing to haue warre, but loth to seale the discommodities it brought. They begin to finde that the most preiudiciall peace is better then the most triumphant and victorious warre. Yet the league will haue warre: and euen they, whose forefathers were wont to carry it beyond the seas, into Asia, Affrica, and to the end of the world, doe now nourish it in their owne country. But the authors thereof could not stand but in the midst of a generall confusion.

The King of Nauarre seeing this cloude ready to breake vpon his party, complains, that the King without consideration of the priuate interest hee hath in this last reuolt, hath made a peace with his enemies; and hath armed them with his owne forces; and authority, against his estate, his blood and himselfe. Hee laies open, by a publike declaration, the causes which moued the league to take armes, the vanity of their pretexts, the fruits which all France may expect by the treaty of Nemours; and then with the Prince of Condé his cousin, the Marshall D. Cossuille (hereafter Duke of Montmorency, by the death of his eldest brother, and in the following raigne Constable of France) and other Noblemen, Gentlemen, Prouinces, Townes and Commonalties of both Religions, he protests, by a lawfull and necessary defence, to maintaine the fundamentall lawes of families, and the Estate and liberty

1585. liberty of the King and the Queene his mother. Was it not sufficient for these Princes, A to haue the King and league against them, but they must be charged with a new assault from beyond the mountaines? Sixtus the fifth, a more violent man then his Predecessor, casts out his lightning against these two Henries, King of Nauarre and Prince of Condé: he excommunicates them, degrades them and their successors, from all dignities, namely their pretensions to the crowne of France, exposeth their countries and persons in prey, to the first that should seize on them.

The Popes Bull declared void and of no force.

The Court of Parliament finds this act to be rash, insolent, strange, and farre from the modesty of former Popes, and saies vnto the King: that therein they find nothing like to the Apostles successor. The Registers of the Court, nor yet Antiquity did not teach them: B that the Princes of France were euer to seeke iustice at Rome, or that subiects did euer take knowledge of their Princes religion. Seeing then the new Pope, in stead of instruction studies nothing but destruction, and that he changeth his sheep-hooke into a fearful firebrand, to ruine those vnto whom he should winne vnto the Church, the Court could not admit this Bull, so pernicious for all Christendome, and derogating from the Soue-raignty of the crowne of France. The Princes likewise protest against the sayd Bull, and appeale from it, as abusive and scandalous, vnto the next free and lawfull councill: where they will prooue (sayd they) that Sixtus the fifth, calling himselfe Pope, terming them heretiques, hath falsely and wickedly lied. This opposition was set vp in Rome the sixth of No-uember. Thus the Parliament grew resolute against this Bull: but it yielded easily in other matters, which did but impair the affaires. For the fifteenth of October they allowed of the Kings declaration, which imposed confiscation of body and goods, against such as without the warrant of the Catholike Princes had opposed their forces against the league: and reuolued the terme of fixe monthes granted by the Edict of Iuly, to fifteene daies after the said declaration.

Open warre.

To crosse this Edict, the King of Nauarre, by a declaration of the last of November, doth seize, and giues commissions, to sell all the fruits, rents, reuenues, moouables, debts, and all other profits whatsoever, of the Inhabitants of townes, where the Edict of Iuly, touching the fixe monethes, and of October, touching the abbreviation to fifteene daies, had bene receiued, published and executed: and likewise of Gentlemen and others carrying D armes, with the Leaguers and their adherents: as also of the Clergy resident in the said townes, or contributing for their party, and to let out their Lands to them that would giue moft. His words and deeds were all one: for presently his people lay their hands to worke.
Saint Mesmes keeps the Marshall Matignon in breath. Lual chargeth him in Xaintonge, and raizeth the siege of Taillebourg, where the Ladies of Tremouille (the mother, and daughter) were besieged. The Vicont of Turrenne ouer-runs Limosin, and for a gage of his inroads takes the Bishoprick of Thules. The Duke of Mercoeur, on the other side, thinks with two thousand men to doe wonders in Poitou: but there must be a proportion betwixt him that forceth, and him that hee meanes to force. The Prince of Condé makes head against him, and not onely driues him from Fontenay, but also makes him, for his better safety, retire farre into Brittan with losse and disgrace. Being freed from this incombrance, hee besiegeth Brouage, and had already brought it to that necessity, as the most resolute were ready to yeeld when as newes came vnto him, that three captaines, Du Halot seruant to the King, Le Fresne enemy to the Earle of Brissac, Gouemour of Angers, and Rochemorte, a partizan to the King of Nauarre, had seized on the castle of Angers, one of the strongest places of the Realme, garded by a captaine, and twelue souldiers.
The enterprise was well made, well executed, but not so well continued: for Du Halot came too soone into the towne, protesting that hee had taken the castle for the Kings seruice. They detain him prisoner, and besiege the castle, whether the whole Coun-trie comes.

The voice of Angers.

At night they demand to parle with Ensigne. Hee as ill aduised as the first, comes forth vpon a little bridge: A Harguebuzier makes an offer to shoot at him: Wherevpon hee seekes to returne: but Rochemorte with his companie, fearing to be forced by the multitude that came running, drawes vp the bridge. Le Fresne hangs by the chaires to pull it downe: but the Townes-men cut off his hands, and hee falls into the ditch, where hee was

A was slaine by a stagge they kept there. Du Halot was presently executed within the towne.
These two being dead, they demand of Rochemorte, for whom hee holds? For the King of Nauarre, said hee. Herevpon they cast vp a trench against the castle, attending the Duke of Loyeuse the Kings brother-in-law. During these broiles and troubles Rochemorte (flum-bring one day in one of the windowes of the castle) was there slaine with a Hargue-buz shot.

The Prince aduertised of the surprize of the castle, and of *Rochemorte*s answer: but not of that which happened since, leaues Brouage: and to oppose sufficient forces against the league, he marcheth with about eight hundred maisters, and twelue hundred Harguebuziers on horse-backe, passeth Loire at Roifiers betwixt Saumur and Angers, chargeth home B to the suburbs, forceth some barricadoes, and spends a whole day in skirmishes: but hee heares no newes from the castle, neither for the alarm in the towne, nor the noise of his troupes. No man appeares: no answer, no signe is made: the Actors were buried in their enterprise, and sixteene souldiers remayning had already capitulated. Doubtlesse too much courage and too little consideration (a dangerous ouer-sight in any great commander) had engaged the Prince on this side the riuer of Loire, amongst many armies of enemies, hauing no bridge at his deuotion, without boates to repasse, or any hope of succours. Then that cheerefull hope which had brought that little army, turnes into confusion and disorder: for the duke of Mayenne had passed the Loire at Orlean, with fifteene C hundred horse, Reistres, and French, to cut off the Princes way, if he repassed the water. The Duke of Espernon, and the Marshall Biron kept Beaufle towards Bonneuaille, to meet with him. La Chastre had drawn vp the mills, and boats, and kept the passages of Loire. The duke of Loyeuse marched at his backe. Entragues Gouernour of Orlean came to crosse him, and all the commons did rise. On the other side, the Princes troupes were tired. Hee failes of two or three passages vpon the riuer, whereof he made account, betwixt Blois and Amboise. The amazement increaseth, and his number decreaseth: such as had friends in Beaufle, Dunois, Perche, Vendosmois, or Maine, steale away. The Lord of Rohan (aduising him not to thrust himselfe into an apparent ruine) had turned head towards Britan. All the foresaid enemies forces would within few daies charge him: Being neere to Vendosme, D he leaues the chiefe charge of the retreat to Clermont, and Saint Gelais: ordereth the companies, provides for his house-hold seruants, and at eleuen of the clocke at night, he parts, accompanied with the Lords of Tremouille, Auignigni, and few others. Finally after infinite toyle and dangers past, he recovered the Isle of Greneze, lying in the English seas, and so London, being receiued by the Queene, with all the honour, and fauour he could desire: and then by her commandment accompanied with a good number of the Nobility, and men of warre, in ships well appointed, he repassed the seas, obtaining a sufficient conquest to haue saued himselfe, and a rich spoile to haue returned with his head to Rochell, rather then to the Greue or the Hales at Paris.

Saint Gelais, Bois-Duly, Aubigni, la Tifardiere, and some others are commended to haue E wisely preferred these broken troupes nere to the forest of Marchenoir, diuided into small companies, of twelue, and fifteene, whereof (notwithstanding the townes of Orlean, Blois, Amboise, Tours, and others thereabouts, were straightly garded) many repassed the Loire.
Saint Gelais and others taking the high-way to Paris, crossed many companies dispersed in Beaufle, and hauing wandred long in the forest of Orlean: in the end they passed the ri-uer nere to Gyen, and at last recovered Rochelle, where the Prince, the chiefe of the army, and the most part of the troupes were already in safety.

The lightnings of Sixtus, and the second Edict of October had wonderfully moued the King of Nauarre. Now he complains to the Clergy, to the Nobility, to the third estate, and to the Parliament of Paris, of the breach of the last Edict of peace, and that they had caused the question of succession to a King yet liuing, to be decided at Rome, that they would make F a Prince of the blood of France subiect to the Pope, that they suffer the consistory to giue that which belongs not vnto it: and that the Pope disposeth of Realmes, and principalities at his pleasure. Then he sheweth the miseries which these vnciuill warres will breed: he exhorts them, not to serue as instruments to the Leaguers, to ruine the King and his Realme. And finally, seeing they are so ill aduised, he protests as before. That both he and his, will vse all lawfull meanes, to resist the violence of their enemies, and cast all the miseries A that shall ensue vpon the authors thereof.

Strangers deale earnestly in the cause. The Princes of Germany make intercession to the King, at the King of Nauars instance, that he would be perswaded, at the humble petitions of his neighbours, and that opening his eyes at the teares, and his eares at the complaints of his subiects, he would maintaine his owne good, quiet, honour, and faith, his crowne and reputation, and preserve a body wounded vnto death. But those of Guise kept him in awe. He speaks not but by the mouth of the league. I make and change (said he vnto the Ambassadors) my Ordinances as necessity doth require, for the good and quiet of my subiects: and leaue the care to all Soveraigne Princes, to gouerne their people as they shall thinke fit. I haue the feare of God liuely grauen in my heart: neither will I doe any thing against the honour of my conscience, and the fatherly care I haue of my people. B

army.

This pleased the league: they are now on horse-backe. The Duke of Mayenne marcheth with about two thousand horse, French and Reistres, twelue regiments of foote, and six thousand Suisses. He must bring the Princes of the bloud prisoners to Paris in triumph, their captaines chained, and couer the fields of Xaintonge, Poictou, and Guyenne, with their slaughtered souldiers, returne victorious, and bring to the King the conquest of all the places, that made resistance. But what exploits? what triumphes? The wrath of God ruines his men in those countries. He besiegeth, batters, and takes some filly places, which are scarce noted in the French map, as Montignac, Beaulieu, Gaignac, Castels, and Saint Bazille vpon Garonne: Montsegur, Castillon, Puynormand in Perigueux, and the most part by composition (but badly obserued) leauing behind him Figeac, Cadaillac, Cajor, the houses of the Vicont of Gourdon, Montfort, Bergerac, and Saint Foy, places of importance, all held by the Protestants. The difficulty of passages, the ouer-flowing of riuers, the vehement cold, the continuall raine, want of money, munition, victuals, and supplies of men, with-draw him from this warre, to goe to winter at Bourdeaux, there (in the midst of his loues) to make some enterprizes vpon the castles, to the preiudice of the Marshall of Maignan. So the most of his souldiers (detained long without either honour or profit) disband of themselves, and the Duke brings from this voyage a more famous spoile, the heire of Cannont, being but twelue yeeres old, to giue her to one of his sonnes. He had before time done better in Dauphiné, where keeping his faith inuiolable, he had happily preferred his reputation and credit. Indeed hee then liued onely vnder the Kings lawes and obedience, and now he spends much time, labour and money, to effect little in Guyenne. In the meane time the Prince of Condé renewed the warre, assisted notably by the Earle of Laual, and Saint Gelas, who commanded about foure hundred and fifty men, and by the new conquests of Dompierre (a castle nere vnto Saint Iean, belonging to the Marshall of Rez, where the booty repaired the losses late suffered by the souldiers) of Royen, a strong place nere vnto Brouage, of Soubize, Mornac in Allenoirt, Mondeuis, and others, defaced the greefe of the former crosses. In the midst of these prosperities, he tooke to his second wife, in Taillebourg, the sixteenth of March, Charlotte-Katherine of Tremouille, sister to Claude of Tremouille Duke of Thouars, &c. by whom he had Henry of Bourbon Prince of Condé, the first Prince of the bloud at this present, and first Peere of France.

Within few daies after, Tiercelin with his regiment of about sixe hundred and fifty men, returned from an enterprize, which Saint Lue the Gouvernour of Brouage had made (but in vaine) against the Ile of Oleron. The Prince aduertised of his passage, followes him, with La Tremouille his brother-in-law, La Boulay, Auantigny, and some thirty others: he chargeth them in the reere, nere vnto the suburbs of Xaintes, and kills thirty or forty of his men: the rest put themselves in battaile through the fauour of the hedges and the highway. The Earle of Laual comes galloping, with about fise and thirty horse of his company, which had bene lodged a little from thence: and seeing the Prince and the rest of his company engaged in the combat, he goes directly to the Colonels Ensigne, couered with a battalion of pikes: he breakes them, fights with him that carried it, pulls it from him, puts him to flight, kills threescore souldiers vpon the place, and chaseth the whole regiment. Tiercelin saued himselfe, carrying to Xaintes a hurt in the arme, and many others being maimed. Tremouille had a horse slaine vnder him: and some were hurt, but the Earle lost Saily

But what did the King of Nauarre in the meane time? Hee hath vntill now maintained himselfe vnder the obedience of the Kings commandments: hetherto there hath bene nothing but mutuall writings, Edicts, declarations, commandments, directions to the officers of the crowne, for the execution thereof. Hereafter he displaies other armes then paper andinke. The Marshall of Matignon had besieged Castles in February: the King flies thither with about three hundred maisters, and eightene hundred Harguebuziers on horse-backe: he raiseth the siege, disposeth of his affaires in Berne: comes to Nerac, and assures the towne: passeth the Garonne at Saint Bazille (notwithstanding the Duke of Mayenne who lay within two leagues of his passage) crosseth Perigord and Angoulmois, and so comes into Poictou, where the Marshall Biron, with about twelue hundred horse, and foure thousand foote, molested and troubled the country nere vnto Rochelle and besieged Marans. The arriual of the said King, and the resolution of the besieged, commanded by La Tardrie, made the Marshall to passe the riuer of Charente, and to leaue Marans to the free exercise of both Religions. The King of Nauarre went to Rochelle to visit the army at sea, and by a palissado, to keepe in them of Brouage.

C The Cardinal of Lenoncourt, and the President Brulart, were sent the yeere before from the King, to assure the King of Nauarre of his Maiesties loue: and to exhort him againe to vnite himselfe to the Catholike Church, as well for the good of his conscience, as also to make his way to the succession of the crowne more easie: to shew vnto him the causes that had moued him to breake the peace, and to intreat him to yeeld the townes of surety. The time would not suffer these propositions to take effect: but contrariwise, after the example of the league (said the King of Nauarre) we should demand better townes. So the Ambassadors ended their charge, beseeching the said King, to enter into some treaty, wherein the Queene-mother should deale to his content, so as he would stay the leauy of Reistres, Lanfquenets and Suisses, which Cleruant, Segur and Guitri had procured. He accepted of this D conference, the which breeds a truce in the end of the yeere, but with protestation, not to stay the good will of such as in so important an occasion, and extreame necessity, had gone to field: that (rayfing the Kings authority troden vnder foote, by the breach of his Edict) they might preferue him from the forraigne inuasion of the League. He was better affected to a good peace, then to a bad truce. But the Queene-mother telling him, that the King would make no peace, nor truce with him, vnlesse hee would become a Catholike, she made this conference altogether fruitlesse. She lets him vnderstand, that this change would make his condition more free, more assured, and more fit for his calling: that his conuersion would bring him in grace with the King, leauing to court a Maior of Rochelle, whom he did not command absolutely. But this Prince had his eares to much beaten with this proposition, and could not yeeld therevnto, but by due forme, which was by a holy and lawfull Councell. And the Duke of Neuers, thinking to adde some more perswasive reasons then the rest of the assemblie: you cannot (saith he) leauy any imposs thre. (A Prince doth what hee will, when as hee wills nothing but what hee ought.) You haue reason (answered this Prince, being free and of a quicke conceit) for wee haue no Italians amongst vs.

The Queene-
mothers conference with the King of Nauarre.

This conference bred a ieaousie amongst the Parisiens. They were more inclined to a revolt then euer. The Duke of Mayenne aduertised that the Queene-mother advanced towards the King of Nauarre, to mediate an accord, he makes hast to Paris, to reproch the King, that this negotiation was contrary to his Edict: that such a peace could not be good, F breeding effects in religion, contrary to the tranquility of Catholike consciences. Being arriued there, the six Arch-leaguers impart vnto him their secret articles: to suppress here, reforme the Court and the insolency of Mignons, and for a farall wound to the Estate, to seize vpon the Kings person. He allowes of these counsels, and sounds their designs, but finds the execution difficult. So the Rats in the Fable found this expedient to be very good, to be aduertised of the Cats approach, and to saue themselves, to hang a bell at his his care: but none durst undertake to doe it. The Queene-mother aduertised of this desperate humour, tooke her way to Court. Her arriuall, with the irresolution of the commanders, left the Parisians wauering, in the midst of so dangerous an enterprife. The Queenes departure kindled the warre in Poictou. The King of Navarre goes to field, takes Chisay by composition, Safay by assault: forceth Saint Maixant to yeeld, reduceth Fontenay to his obedience: besiegeth Mauleon, and during the battery takes it by escaladoe.

Des Diguieres in Dauphine.

They of Dauphiné seeing all Guienne in armes, would not be the last to make it known that they had interest in this cause. Des Diguieres perswads himselfe that he shall reduce this Prouince to the King of Navarres deuotion, with this designe hee caused John Bap-tista Gentill (issued from the noble family of the Gentils in Genoua) to come from Fleue-rac in Geuaudan to Serres, a man prompt in warlike conceptions, hardy in enterprizes, and happy in executions. And commands him, if it might bee, to desflower the Virgin of Dauphiné. This Virgin was the towne and Archbishopsrike of Ambrun, for during the ciuill warres all the townes of Dauphiné had bene held by the Protestants, except that, being built on the topp of a Mountaine, and fortified with a Cittadell by the Duke of Mayenne.

Ambrun taken.

Gentill viewes it by night, and reports that there is means to take it. They march with three hundred horse and nine hundred Harguebuziers during the longest nights of winter, when arriuing by foure of the clocke in the morning, they finde the towne in armes, and the Inhabitants ready to entertaine them, for one of townes-men had slipt from the troupes resting that night at Chorges, and giuing aduertisment vnto Gessen Gouverneur of the place. Notwithstanding all this Gentill aduanced with Corbiere, La Riviere, Masse, Bagard and other captains. Des Diguieres followes him with Saint Ian his cousin, fifty men armed and fiftie Harguebuziers, Morge commanding the rest, and Parbault the shot.
The Sentenell hearing the noise of their armes, cries who is there? It is (said Gentill) Mounsieur Des Diguieres that comes to Petardyou. The Petards worke their effect. At the third blow they enter into the base Court of the Citadelle, pel-mell with them that are assailed, they force them to quit the place, and to flie vnto a plat-forme towards their canon. They chase them, kill some, and force the rest to cast themselves desperatly from the walles into the towne. They of the dungion defend themselves coragiously. Gentill threatens to blow them vp with his petard, the which he planted at the dore of the store-house where their poulder lay; whereat they grew amazed, and yeelded to haue their liues saued. Gessen intrencheth himselfe to stop their descent into the towne, but day being come it was forced, and hee being retired into a Tower of the Archbishops palace, made his composition to haue his life saued. Thus the Virgin of Dauphiné was desflowered.

Guillestre taken.

The taking of Ambrun opened the passage of the mountaines of heigh Dauphiné, and the towne of Guillestre gaue entrie into Piedmont. Gentill viewes it, and vnder-takes it in the hottest of the Inhabitants alarum, hauing made many fires in their ditches and raclins, to discouer such as should approach. Foure Petards force three gates and breake downe a drawe-bridge; the townes-men fight valiently, to hinder their entry, they kill and hurt many; Prunieres Lieutenant to Des Diguieres had a dangerous blow on the head with a stone, yet they were forced to receiue a law from the stronger.

Saint Iulian a good place in high Viarez was also surprized by Gentill at the instance of the Seigneur of Chambauld. Montfalcon in Vellay was more painefull, for their guide hauing lost his way by reason of the darkenesse of the night, they could not ariue before the breake of day, but there happily fell a great mist to couer their approaches. The Sentenells were euen then gone downe to assist at the opening of the gate: when as behold an vnexpected thunder of Petards taught the townes-men, that a place enuied is in great danger when as the gards leaue their walles at the breake of day.

These happy exploits did winne capitaine Gentill much reputation. From henceforth they attempt not any thing but they desire to haue him a principall actor. The Earle of Chastillon desired to reuiue that which hee had vpon the towne of Puy, in Au-vergne whereof hee had failed by the bad conduct of capitaine Saint Martin (otherwise called Villaret of Geuaudan) who through indiscretion or otherwise, had left some wax in the Touch-holes of his Petards, so as they could not take fire at need, yet had he happily set them

A them to without any discouery, so as the Earle being discontented returned with all speed with nine hundred foot, and foure hundred horse. Whilest he treated with Gentill touching this attempt, he had some let which staid him in Languedoc: during the which Gentill had leisure to goe and view Lions, the capricious Inhabitants hauing newly demanteled that Cittadell; which hauing found pregnable, Chastillon, Des Diguieres and Chambauld ioyned their troupes together vpon a pretext to besiege Nonnay in Viarez; perswading themselues to carry it vpon the assurance which Gentill gaue them, if the King of Navarre had not commanded Contr Chastillon to goe and ioyn with the army of Kellres. Who made preparation to muster vpon the plaine of Strasbourg, and Gentill to accompany him, to open such passages as should be needfull.

B Whilest the King of Navarres armes prosper in Poictou: and the Duke of Mayenne treates with the leaguers at Paris, and the mouth of his mutinous preachers, disgraceth the Kings authority with the people: the duke of Guise, continues to make warre against them of Iametz, the which he had begun against the Duke of Bouillon, from the first beginning of the league. Sedan and all that principality serued as a retreat for the neighbour Protestants, and as a Port for strangers to enter into France. These are the pretexts wherewith he couers his designs, but he had another principall motiue: from Sedan the King had intelligence of all that was practised in Champagne and Lorraine, in the yere 1585. When he sees himselfe maister of Douzy; Rocroy and Raucourt; hee passeth the Meuze, and enters into the soueraignty of Sedan, afflicts the countymen with all the cruelties that warre could imagine, whilest the famine presseth them within the towne. To quert this storme which threatned Sedan, the Duke of Bouillon causeth Schelandre Gouverneur of Iametz, to set vpon Verdun, a towne on the frontiers of Champagne, which had tumultuously runne into the league: the Duke of Guise runnes to succour it, and by his absence giues the Duke Bouillon means to succour Sedan. Therevpon the Queene-mother, at the request of the Duke of Montpensier, vncle by the mothers side to the Lords of Sedan, procures a truce for fifteene daies, betwixt the two Dukes, during the which, the enterprife vpon the citie of Iametz, for the Duke of Guise, prouing fatall for the vndertakers, disposed their wills to a condruce of a moneth.

D This fell out happily: for the Germaine army, whereof hee was named Lieutenant Generall vnder the Duke John Casimir (who substituted in his place the Baron De Onaw the nephew of the Elector Palatin nephew and pupil to the said Duke, hindring him from marching in person) prepared to make their musters in the plaine of Strasbourg. So the Duke of Bouillon goeth into Alsatia with foure hundred horse, and eight hundred Harguebuziers to make them aduance: and the Duke of Guise comes to the King to Meaux, to receiue (said he) his maiesties commandments, in so great, and so important a cause: but in effect, to complaine, that since the reuocation of the Edict of peace, hee had followed the warre against heretikes with so small fauour, as the King had suffered them in their houses to enioy their goods and Estates peaceably: That in steed of selling and employing them to their ruine, hee caused the reuenues of the Cardinall of Pelleue to bee seized on (a man borne in France, but Espaniolized at Rome) for that in open consistory, hee had ven-uously maintained the iust motiues of the taking of armes by the Catholike Princes against the Huguenots.

That this warre had more aduanced the Mignons, then ruined the Heretikes, and that the money raised by the subuention of the Clergy, serued to entertaine the said Mignons; that neither the Kings Councell, the Parliament of Paris, the inferiour Iudges, nor the Prouost of Paris had sworne this last Edict. That the townes which had demanded the extirpation of heresie, and the reuocation of the last Edict of peace, were treated like enemies.
That he had caused the Cittadels of Lions and Mascon to be beaten downe, surprisied that of Valence, disgraced Brissac, Crussilles, Gessen, Entragues and others, and peruered the affignations which he had giuen him, to be repayed the money the which hee had disbursed in this last leauy of men of warre.

But the King knew well how to counter-balance these complaints of the League, with their owne breach of the Articles of Nemours. Hee had well obserued, that their insolent passions aspired to some greater designs then the Articles made mention of.

1587.

Those of Guise had demanded towns of assurance against the Protestants in those Prouinces where they were not at all to be feared. The duke of Aumale had newly surprized Dourlans and Pontdormy, but he had failed of Boullen through the fidelity of Saint Maria. They had lodged in their Cittadel of Vitri Le Francois an Italian at their deuotion, and tooke an oath of many Gouvernours to hold their places for the duke of Guise.

The King desires peace.

The Duke will haue war.

But the Kings meaning was to liue and reigne: yea though he did buy a good peace to the contentment of both parties. But the contrary designs of the King of Nauarre and the duke of Guise, could not be reconciled: and he had no meanes to subist betwixt both, but must leane to the one, or the other side, nor oppress the one without rayeing of the other. To conclude, not daring to shew himselfe a King, he suffers at the chiefe of the league, to become counterfeit Kings. Hee exhorts the duke of Guise, not to expose the Estate in prey, to procure the contentment of his King, the liberty of the Clergy, the dignity of the Nobility, and the peoples ease, by other meanes then that which destroies the honour of the Soueraigne, spoiles the Churches, suckes the gentlemans blood, and driues the people into despaire: and inuites him vnto peace, by promises of aduancement for his house and party. But a warlike minde will haue nothing but war. The Duke could neither endure the search nor the cure thereof. Thus peace is banished. The Duke seekes all meanes to ruine the Huguenots: and beseecheth the King to stop the army of strangers, which were euen now vpon the frontier that they might not returne into Germany, with a victory ouer France, and a triumph ouer the Catholike Church. Still must this venerable pretext of Religion serue to colour the wicked passions of men. He procures many commissions, especially for his brother the Duke of Mayenne in Daulphiné, for the Duke of Joyeuzé in Poytou, and for himselfe against the Protestants army.

The Kings forces.

The Protestants army.

If the King had not shewed the like care on his part, the people would haue said, that as long rest doth dull the courage of a horse, so since the Duke of Joyeuzés marriage, the pleasures and delights of Court, and the solitariness of Vincennes, had much decayed his accustomed generosity. He therefore diuides his forces into three armies. The first at Chaumont in Bassigni, consisting of fife and twenty companies of men at armes, twelue enignes of foot in the regiment of Escaleaux, sixe of Joannes, sixe of Gré, with many other blankes signed for other commissions, at the will of the Duke of Guise, who increased this army with foure hundred Lances, and two thousand Italian foote, sent by the Duke of Parma, and the Duke of Lorraine (suffering himselfe as the eldest of the house, to bee carried away with the vaine hopes that were giuen him, of a good portion in the pretended succession of Charlemagne) held also goodly and great froces vpon the frontier, at the Duke of Guises deuotion. The Duke of Montpensier commanded the second at S. Florentin, nere vnto Troyes, the King with his presence honoured the third at Gyen, stretching along the riuer of Loire, to keepe the King of Nauarre from ioyning with his strangers on this side the riuer. The Duke of Joyeuzé presuming of an assured victory, lead an other army into Guyenne against the King of Nauarre, and the other heads of the league, armed euery one of them by himselfe.

The army that came for the Protestants, consisted of fife thousand Reistres, fife thousand Lansquenets, twelue thousand fife hundred Suisses in three regiments, eleuen cornets of French, ten companies of Harguebuziers on horse-backe, the which in all were about thirty thousand men. The King of Nauarre assembled his forces in Gascony. The Prince of Condé, the Cont Soissons, the Vicont of Turenne, the Cont of Rochefoucault, the Lord of Tremouille, and others, made great preparations. The Lord of Chastillon gathered an army in Languedoc: Des Diguieres held himselfe ready to passe at need.

Thus this poore and miserable realme, is ready to serue as a prey to people differing in tongue and manners. Without doubt, men iudge of the offence, by the punishment. The witch-craft and diuination (whereof some make open profession) blasphemny vnpunished, lust, dissolution, prodigality, ambition, discord, and crnelties: but aboue all, impiety, licentiousnesse, atheisme, superstition and iniustice, the roote of miseries which are crept into France, haue filled vp the measures of her iniquities: and now shee is ready to drinke euen vnto the lees. In former ages the court was a schoole of vertue for the French Nobility now it abounds in dissolutnesse, disorder and excesse. The most modest grow insolent, the

A excesse of great men breeds it in the meanest. And doe wee wonder if the same scourges, whereby the fearefull wrath of God iustly kindled, haue ruined more flourishing Estates then this, doe now wast our fields. The army of Strangers now enters into Lorraine, whose errors at their entry will cost them deere that commit them. The Duke of Bouillon is young, little respected, and ill obeyed. Cleruant, Guitry, Beauvais La Noelle, Digoinnes, Montionet, Vezines and others assit him, but most of them are more fit to carry an Ambassage, then to vnder take a charge. The chiefe of Germany is but a meane Gentleman, valiant out of doubt, but too weake for so great a charge, hauing no reputation but what hee hath gotten vnder duke Casimirs authority.

In the beginning of August, discord (a dangerous plague) bred a great confusion in their proceedings: the duke of Bouillon would haue imployed this army to victual the places of his soueraignty: the Generall of the Germanes desired to haue a Prince of the blood to march before him: the Reistres and Suisses loofe a goodly occasion at Pont Saint Vincent, to fight with the league, who made a shew to ioyne with them: the Lansquenets are commended to haue resolutely cast themselues into the water, to passe and come to battle. Some would spoile Lorraine, others would carry their reuenge into the heart of France. The Germanes choofe the way along the riuer of Seine, and so to passe into Picardy. The French had more reason: that they must ayme at a passage ouer Loire, and fauour the King of Nauarres approach. In the end the way of Loire was resolved. They fire some villages in Lorraine: the countries lying vpon the passage are wasted, the army finds neither mills, nor ouens standing, which bred a generall discontent amongst the Reistres and Suisses. As the army passed through the country of Barre, and Ginuillois, newes comes that the Lord of Chastillon is beset in Grefille in Lorraine, with foure hundred horse, and fiftene hundred Harguebuziers: the Duke of Bouillon makes hast to vngage him. The Earle of La Marke his brother so toyles himselfe in this action, that he fallies sicke, and dying, leaues the conduct of the fore-ward to the Lord of Chastillon: the army is turmoyled with continuall raine, they want victuals, and the grapes and other fruit beeing not ripe, breed many fluxes: yet did they surmount all these difficulties, and hauing passed the riuers of Marne, Aube, Seine, La Cure, and Yonne, they approached nere vnto Loire.

The Earle of La Marke dies.

The army approaching to ioyne with the Prince of Condé, the garrison of Perreufe being abroad carried away some Reistres: the Earle of Chastillon sent to demand them by capitaine Gentill and vpon refusall threatens the towne with the rigours of warre. The Admirall (said they) was more dangerous then his sonne, yet passing nere vnto vs with great armies, he neuer had the heart to besiege vs. Poore foules, who trust in the strength of their armes, and the bounty of their walles; and yet haue no meanes to resist the violence of an Engine that is portatiue. Chastillon causeth the Regiments of Languedoc to march. The Lords of Mouy, Montlouet, Esternay, Lieramont, Rully, Langres, Broffes, and others doe accompany him. They plant about one thousand eight hundred Harguebuziers at the defences of the ports to shoot asloone as the Petard had plaied. Gentill prepares his rouling bridges and makes fast his Petards through the fauour of the night: they beate downe the ports and draw-bridges and at the sixth blow they become maisters of the towne; where they retire their Reistres, and suppress their insolency that spake so proudly, teaching the Inhabitants that the law of armes doth bind them to answere for their actions whom they bring in for their garde.

Here the Reistres and Suisses make a second complaint: the King of Nauarre appears not, the water is low, but the Kings forces are lodged vpon the riuers side, and threaten to fight with the first that shall approach: the ruine of the strangers army was to keepe the King of Nauarre from ioyning with them: and therefore, the duke of Joyeuzé staied the said King with an army, strong with men, munition, artillery, and other meanes. For their first exploits, the King of Nauarre had defeated some companies which had aduanced too farre into the country. And Charbonieres and Bori remaining with their regiments, at La Mothe Saint Eloy (being beaten by the fauour of the capitaine of the castle, who lent some peeces, to breake their barricadoes: against the oath which he had giuen, not to commit any act of Hostility) were defeated by Joyeufes troupes.

The strangers second complaint.

the third, both by composition. But the defeat of the companies of Pueilhes: (where some A being taken after the fury of the fight, others yeelding vpon their enemies faith; were in a manner all insolently slaine in cold blood) together with the foule warre at Saint Eloy, shall be decreely sold vnto the victors, who hauing added the Abbey of Maillezay to his first conquests, he left Lauerdin to command the army, and returnes to court, to demand a triumph of his victories, and a supply of greater forces, the plague hauing much wasted his army. In his absence the King of Nauarre defeated three of his companies of men at armes, tooke their cornets and many gentlemen prisoners, pursued Lauerdin vnto La Haye in Touraine, chased the Duke Mercœur, and by the conduct of the Vicont of Turenne, tooke all his rich baggage: then at his returne he receiued the troupes which the Cont Soissons brought, and those of Normandy led by Colombieres.

This respite gaue the said King meanes (as we haue noted before) to gather together his B forces in Gascony, and so to ioine with his army in Xaintonge. On the other side, the Duke of Ioyeuse, supplied with horse and foote, repasseth the Loire, and with twelue thousand fighting men, comes to encounter the King of Nauarre. The King of Nauarre had two riuers to passe, to come into Xaintonge, Drougne and L' Isle. The Duke of Ioyeuse, dronke with prosperity of a hasty aduancement, who of a priuate gentleman was made a duke, and of a duke brother in law to the French King, and charged (but not so much by the King, as by the League, whereof hee was a partisan, hauing married the Queenes sister) to giue battaile at all euents, would cut off these passages, presuming that he which passed first, C should haue an aduantage ouer his enemy.

The King of Nauarre knew it well: yet, did hee not loose any time in curling his haire. The nineteenth of October, accompanied with the Prince of Condé, the Cont Soissons his brother, the Vicont of Turenne, and other good Commanders, hee takes his lodging at Coutras, to passe the riuier of Drougne at a ford. The duke supposing to haue him at his deuotion betwixt two riuers, giues the Rendez-uous to all his forces the next day, betwixt Roche-Chalais and Coutras, and there made choise of his place of battaile to his best aduantage, halfe a League from Coutras. Being lodged there, the King of Nauarre commands the Duke of Tremouille to passe the riuier and to lodge at Chauderon two little leagues from Coutras. He doth it, and then sends the Baron of Saint Surin one of his cap- D taines of light-horse with his company to learne certaine newes of the enemy. Soone after he brings him word that he marched directly to his quarter. About mid-night the duke takes the field which he had viewed at his going to lodge, whether he was no sooner come, but Bellegarde Gouverneur of Xaintonge (who led the Duke of Ioyeuses fore-ward) comes vpon him with fife or sixe hundred horse and foure hundred shot on horse-backe. Hee aduertised the King of Nauarre that the whole army aduanced, and by the aduise of Vinans Maister of the campe to the said horse-men, he retires slowly, turning still head towards the enemy, and skirmishing with them in many places. This he did of purpose, for by this stratagem he kept the enemy occupied vntill eight of the clocke in the morning, and gaue the King of Nauarre meanes to passe the riuier with his troupes and canon, and to make choise E of his place of battaile. The King of Nauarre and his souldiers, had swet more in skirmishes, then in Tennis-courts, and did take more pleasure in the dust of their enemies chase, then in feasts. The inequality of the number doth not amaze them. Hee marcheth before: resolues his men to fight, makes them to fall on their knees and pray to God, puts his horse-men into foure squadrons, his owne, that of the Prince, the Earles, and the Viconts. The souldiers inflame their courages by mutuall skirmishes, and reprochfull speeches: from words they goe to blowes. The King of Nauarres artillery thunders first, at eight of the clocke, and at the first volle sweepes away seuen captaines of the regiment of Picardy. The Dukes answers him, but without effect. The ignorance or malice of canoniars hauing planted it so low, as it fell vpon a little hil betwixt both armies. The Dukes horse-men led by Lauardin, Saint Luc and captaine Mercœur discharge their first fury vpon the Duke of Tremouille as the first obiect of their armes, and being double in number, they passe through them at the first charge, and ouer-throw Vinans Maister of the camp (who was sore hurt) with some others, like vnto a violent streame which ouerturnes all that it encounters.

And whilst that the Duke of Tremouille (hauing rallied his men together) went and planted

A planted himselfe before the King of Nauarres troupe who marcht to the combat, they encounter the Vicont of Turenne who aduanced to second the light-horse-men. They kill his horse with their Lances, and put his troupe in disorder. But hee is remounted before the enemy could doe him any more harme, being loath to quit his part of the cake for to light a checke.

The Duke presuming by this first good hap, to obtaine a totall victory ouer three cheefe heads of the house of Bourbon, aduanceth resolutely, flanked with two hedges of armed men to charge with the Lance. The foure Commanders and the Colonel of the light-horse march euery one in the head of his troupe, first easily the pace, then the trot, and after in their full carier. They charge and breake them. This conflikt (which consisted B for the most part of leaguers) was almost as soone dissolued, as it was resolued on: it beganne at nine of the clocke, and at ten not any of the Dukes men had any offensiuie armes: some are ouerthrowne, some taken, and some seeke their safety in flight. The victors pursue them three leagues, and strew the fields with men, horses, and armes. The Duke of Ioyeuse retired towards his footemen and artillery, his horse being hurt in the thigh with a shot, hauing not any one with him but Breze who carried the white corner; wandering thus in the midst of the field where the battaile was fought, a Gentleman followed him, with whom another ioynes; They take him and demand his name; the which hee telles at the first summons. Fife or sixe other men at armes ariue as they were leading C him to the King of Nauarre, and seeke to take this goodly prize from them. In this contestation one of them fore-seeing that if the prisoner were once in the Kings hands, hee should be in safety, and they frustrate of their pretentions; or (as some say) reproching him with his breach of faith at Saint Eloy, and at Croix-Chappeau, against the company of Pueilhes, hee shootes him behinde with a pistoll through the head whereof he fell dead to the ground, loosing both life and meanes to try with the rest with what moderation and clemency the King of Nauarre could vse his victories. It is a pittifull thing for great men to fall into the handes of pettie companions, who neither can nor will respect their qualities.

His brother Saint Sauueur, Breze who carried the white corner, Roussay the younger brother of Piennes guidon to the Duke, the Earles of Suze, Gauuelo, d' Aubionx, the Lords of Fumel, Newfus the elder brother of Perigord, young Rocheffort, Croissete, Gurai, S. Fort, guidon to Saint Luc, du Bordet his ensigne, de Paux Lieutenant to Bellegarde, gouverneur of Xaintonge, Montignis Ensigne, Tiercelin maister of the campe, Piuviall, La Brangery, Campels the younger, La Vallade, Bacullard, with many other captaines, and a great number of men of account and quality, with about halfe of the army, made the battaile of Coutras famous by their deaths, as the most memorable of all that haue beene giuen for religions cause in France. Many rich prisoners, and a very rich spoile. All his cornets taken, his cannon carried away, and his baggage seized on. At their returne from the pursuit, D thanks were giuen to God vpon the place of battaile died with blood, and covered with carcases. But that which honoured the King most: in the midst of this so commendable a moderation of this victory, hee shewed himselfe no lesse milde and courteous to the prisoners and the wounded, then wise and valiant in heate of the fight. Hee caused the dead to be buried, cured the wounded: sent home almost all the prisoners without ransom; gratified most of the Commanders, caused the Ensignes to be deliuered to Montigny about the rest, commended him to haue behaved himselfe valiantly in the battaile: whereby hee beganne to purchase fauour with the King of Nauarre, and afterwarde gotte great reputation with him for his valour and fidelity, when as hee vnited both crownes into one.

The Prince of Condé, at the first charge had a blowe with a Lance on the side, and being engaged vnder his horse, it did so preiudice his health, as the griefe thereof did soone hasten him to his end. This is the greatest losse of the Protestants army in this combat; in the which there was a very small number slaine, and not one of account. The King of Nauarre is now freed from the snares that were layed for him: now hee aduanceth towards the spring of the riuier of Loire: and giues aduice of his desaigne to the army of strangers, which then was in Hurepois about the Lands of the Lord of Chastillon.

Death of the duke of Ioy-euse.

1587. The King camped vpon Loire betwixt Cofne and Neufui, and by aduice of the Duke of A Neuers he cloies the passages wih trees, stones and other hindrances where the horses should passe. The second cause (next to God) of the ruine of this army, to whom they thought the King at his entry would haue presented a blanke to prescribe what they pleased. The Duke of Guise followed them at the heeles, and the Duke of Mayenne on the one side: and yet both of them could not keepe them from surprising of some small townes to refresh their army. But when as they see themselves frustrate of all hope to ioyne with the King of Nauarre, or to passe the riuier of Loire, that they must either retire, or march forward to meet with the King of Nauarre, or ingage themselves farther within the realme, to seeke bread for themselves, and forrage for their horses, or else march on the left hand and wander into vnknowne countries, they grow amazed, they mutine, they faint.

The German army in Beaulieu.

Charged at Vimory.

Some Frenchmen attempt La Charité: but their enterprise succeeds not. In the end they B lead the army into Beaulieu, where they should find meat both for man and horse. The seuen and twentieth of October they lodged at Vimory, and places thereabouts, neere to Montargis. To take from them this lodging, the Dukes of Guise and Mayenne (taking advantage of the passages of the riuier of Loing) come at supper time with fiftene hundred horse, and fife thousand foote, and charge the Baron Donneau, being lodged in Vimory with seuen or eight cornets of Reistres: but they had almost verified the saying of the King of the Epirots who vanquished the Romaine army. Wee are undone if wee get such an other victory, for three hundred horses of baggage, the Barons two Cammels, and the death C of fifty souldiers with an hundred seruants, was not sufficient to recompence the bloud of forty braue and gallant Gentlemen, and two hundred good souldiers slaine vpon the place by the Reistres, who speedily repaired to their cornets, whilest the Dukes men were busie at the spoile. The Duke of Mayenne receiued two pistoll-shot on his caske by the Baron, and in exchange, the Duke gaue the Baron a wipe on the fore-head, with his courtlas, but with small hurt.

Treachery of Pan.

The duke of Guise hauing failed to surprize the Reistres lodging at Vimorri by the Lions force, he now imploies the foxes suttlety, and the malice of a treacherous man who heretofore had vowed so great affection and fidelity to the King of Nauarre, who iudging another by himselfe, and not able to imagine that so treacherous and detestable a thought D should euer harbor in the heart of a French gentleman, whose quality should be free from al treason: had sent instructions to the duke of Bouillon general of this army, touching the seruices which he expected from this Champenois. As the duke attended newes hourly, behold he comes to the army, he adretheth himselfe to the Earle of Chastillon, intreats him to giue him access vnto the duke of Bouillon, and presenting vnto him a peece of a crowne which had bene broken for his credit, he greets that vntil that time he had not meanes to produce any effects in fauor of the King of Nauarre, for whose seruice he would alway bee ready to imploy both his wit and bloud, that hauing no meanes vpon the fronter, for that the duke of Guise would neuer suffer him, nor his company to abandon him; hee had now good oportunitie to deliuer, the towne & castle of Montargis into his hands. If he thought E it fit to aduance the cause, the duke of Guise hauing lodged him with his company in the castle, and left two companies in the towne to fortifie the Inhabitants. If this (said he) will not serue, I am not resolu'd to returne any more, but to retire my armes, my equipage, and some soldiers of my intelligence, and then come vnto this army and so vnto the King of Nauarre. The duke of Guise hauing not thought it fit that Pan should play his part vpon the fronter, and hauing failed in his enterprise against the Baron of Onaw at Vimorri, hee tooke the way to Eltampes in shew to defend the way to Paris. But he had purposely plotted this stratagem of Montargis, foreseeing that this place lying conuenient for the Earle of Chastillon being nere vnto his house, he should bee principally imploied therein: And that as he had ruined the father at the Parrisien Mattens, the 24. of August 1572. hee would F also make the sonne companion of the same fortune.

The Duke of Bouillon, the generall of the Germanes, the Earle of Chastillon, and the chiefe of the councill holding it not conuenient to neglect this encounter, they commit the execution to Chastillon. Hee returnes Pan and giues him Saint Laurent his Steward to goe into the towne and castle to discouer the truth. But the Traytor had giuen order

A order the souldiers should lye close, if happily they should send any one to visit. S. Laurens reports, that they saw no cause of suspicion, beleeuing that Pan meant sincerely: and Pan for a gage of his fidelitie, promising to remaine in the hands of such as Chastillon should please, vntill the place were wholly at his deuotion, they thought he could not giue any greater assurance. But to constitute himselfe voluntarily an hostage and caution for a disloyall and treacherous desseigne, was it not wilfully to ruine both his life and honour vpon hope of an vncertaine recompence? Thus great men play with the liues of men, as with tennis balls, not caring how to hazard them, so as they will become instruments and ministers of their passions.

The Duke of Guise had instructed him to make all these offers, and to submit himselfe to B more if it were required, promising him that he would take so many prisoners and men of quality, as they should be glad to exchange him. Pan returns about two of the clocke after midnight with one confident souldier to bring in them that should bee sent to seaze vpon the castle. Chastillon giues him in guard to some of his Capitaines, and commands Captain Teissier of Nismes to go with an hundred and fifty souldiers to enter the castle, and to seaze vpon the ports, aswell of that which was towards the fields, as of the other which entred into the towne. The souldier guides them, and at their first entrie they find many bottles of good wine, and meats fit to procure thirst. He leaues twenty harguebuziers vpon the drawbridge, assures the castle, and then he sends his Colonel word that hee may come safely.

C Capitaine Gentill (a man suspicious and very distrustful in such Stratagemes) had growne ielous of his conduct by a simple souldier, and being much practised in those pollicies of war, the which we must beleue sparingly, hee intreats the Earle not to aduance before he had bene within the castle. I feare (said he) some double practise; at my returne I will tell you if it be safe. He goes thither alone, and calls for Capitaine Teissier, adding, that the Earle of Chastillon approched. But at his entry he obserues the ground had bin newly remoued: hee heares the noyse of arms in the Church and chambers of the castle, which were lockt vp, & some armed men which he saw going from a hall into a chamber increast his ielousie. But the impatiency of a souldier, complaining that Chastillon stayed too long, confirmed his beliefe. He suddenly returnes, and passing the bridge he aduiseeth Teissier to saue himselfe with D his men. Teissier had not leysure but with three, all the rest beeing spoiled by the deuices which they had prepared at the entrie of the castle. And when as they heard Gentill cry vnto the Earle of Chastillon that he should returne, they presently shoo't at him a farre off, hauing left all hope to annoy him nearer. Pan seeing his practise not so successfull as he expected, is wonderfully danted. He thinks he is now at the pits brink which he had prepared for another. They lead him to the Duke of Bouillon, who resolues to teare him in peeces with horses. The Baron of Onaw holds opinion, that it were better to leade him to the King of Nauarre: and fearing lest the French either through compassion or corruption should yeeld vnto the prisoners perswasions, will himselfe haue the guard of him, and doth so clog him with chains, as euery member shrinks vnder his burthen. Yet within few daies after he freed E himselfe and escaped, verifying, that men vnable to resist the force of wine, are vnfit to guard prisoners or townes.

This losse of horses and baggage, makes the Reistres to mutine againe, growing impatient, neither seeing their pay, nor the King of Nauarre: for a baite, they force Chateau-landon, and spoile it. The Prince of Conti's arriall neere vnto Chartres, (where the Duke of Bouillon resigned him the charge and the white corner) pacified this mutinie. Then the Swisses treated with the King, by the Duke of Neuers meanes: his Maiesty hauing now conuined them by their alliance with this Crowne, to serue him, or to retire themselves: some of the Capitaines follow the Kings party, others receiuing foure hundred thousand crowns returne to their country: but some of them at their arriall lost their heads. By this defection, the army is halfe decreased: the toyls of the warre tyre them: the discommodities proue F at length insupportable: many of the troupes disband: they fore-see an apparent danger, if they giue battell. They take Councell the 24. of November, to turne head, and to draw this languishing army vp to the Springs of Loire. But the Duke of Guise had well obserued from the beginning, that striking the shepheard, he shall disperse the flocke. The Baron lodged at Anneau neare to Chartres, with seuen Cornets of Reistres: but he trusted too indif-1587. creetly to a promise made by the garrison of the said Castle, not to commit any act of hostility, and to furnish him with victuals for his money. The Duke manned it by night with good store of harguebuziers: and at the first sound of the trumpet, to horse, hee enters the towne with all his forces, euen as their carts stopt vp the streets and gates in the morning. Being thus surprized, and hauing no meanes to recouer the fields, they are forced to return into their lodgings, and to remaine at the Conquerors mercy, either slaine or taken. The spoyle was great, eight hundred Wagons, great store of armes, Jewels, and chains of gold. Two thousand horse of combat and of carriage. So as in one night, all the Dukes foemen were in a manner horsed, rich in spoiles, and rich in prisoners. The Baron, with some few others, leaped ouer the walles and saued themselves, through the fauour of the night, and in a marish. He makes a stand halfe a league from Anneau, and rallies them together that escape. The Suisses that remained come vnto him: all determine to breake. The Prince of Conty, Duke of Bouillon, Chastillon, Cleruant, and the rest, become answerable for what is due, so as they will march on. They might easily haue forced through the Duke of Guises army, but they were surprized with feare, a passion which doth easily vanquish the quicknesse of mans iudgement.

The army hath now but one wing to flie withall: it is a bodie without armes or legges: yet the hope of payment makes them continue their course vp against the riuer. But the disorder was great: feare accompanies them, many Gentlemen slip away daily to their houses: and most of them which remained could not easily resolute to fight. They must make long marches to auoid the enemy: they had no guides, no smiths for their horses, who were spoiled for want of shooes, no bread for the souldiers, no forrage for their horses, their troupes wasted, most of them were without powder, without bullets, and without meanes to recouer any: the Lansquenets are reduced to two thousand, and most vnarmed, and the Suisses haue changed party. The Reistres thinke of nothing but of their returne into Germany: the French slip away hourly. The Duke of Espernon coasts them with the Kings armie, and wisheth they would accept of a capitulation, to disappoint the Duke of Guise of an absolute victorie which he did expect. The Duke of Guise pursues them, yet is it not fit for the Kings estate, he should wholly vanquish these mained troupes: the seruant would then presently attempt against the master. Morcouer, this army still holding the field, the Realme should bee much impouerished: and ioyned with the King of Nauarre, they might effect great matters.

The King offers them a safe conduct to returne, vpon condition that the French should deliuer vp their colours: that the Reistres trusse vp their Cornets, and that all sweare, not to beare armes in France without the Kings expresse command. The eight of December they accept of this capitulation at Lency in Masconois, and so disband. The Lord of Chastillon protests neuer to deliuer vp his Ensignes but to the King of Nauarre. He vnderstands the Reistres threaten to carry him away as a pledge: but he frees himselfe from their mutiny like a gallant Gentleman: And being loth to trust this safe-conduct, or to fall into the hand of the Duke of Guise his capitall enemy, he resolues to passe through Auvergne with ten or twelue men well mounted, and marching by night only to recouer Geuaudan, and from thence into Languedoc. Captaine Gentil dissuades him, and makes him resolute to take the way of Viarez with the remainders of the shipwracke, assuring him to lodge him within few daies by the petard in the towne of Pont Saint Rambert. He had onely remaining forty Cuirasses, thirty harguebuziers on horsebacke, and foure hundred foot, with the which hee had come to the Reistres. Some Noble-men and Gentlemen desire to runne the same fortune. Momy (being so sicke that he could scarce sit on horsebacke) Lieramont, Rebours, S. Auban, Ouinville, Legualda, Rouffelle, Fereng, Baudans and others. Gentil marcheth in the head of the foot-men and couereth them with some ranks of horse, and Chastillon is in the reere to make head against them that should pursue them. But as they thought to take Pont Saint Rambert, they were in danger to be taken themselves. Mandelot, Gouvernor of Lyonsnois, had newly lodged foure hundred men there by the commandement of the Duke of Guise, to cut off the bridges, and to fight with the Reistres which they thought would passe that way. Mandelot, Cheurieries, the Earle of Tournon, Pelloux (who commaunded a great garrison in Nonnay) and all that had any authority come to take from them all meanes to passe

A passe but by force. There is nothing, before, behind, nor of either side, but opposite to his retreat, his sword makes his way: he passeth through all that he encountreth like lightning, and forceth his enemies to fight, or to flie, he giueth occasion to the children of the country to call it The battell of surne-tayles. This passage failing them, Gentil takes his way vpon the left hand, and at midnight takes a great village betweene Lyons and Pont Percier. As they refresh themselves, the neighing of horses which they heare giue them notice that the enemy approaches, Mandelot followed them with sixe or seuen hundred horse, and with out a thicke cloude which did then miraculously couer them, they had bene exposed to his mercy. The cloude and the rough way vneasie for horses, kept the enemy from approaching any nearer, besides hee feared some ambush. They passe the bridge at Percier, and who so had charged them in a great plaine beyond the bridge, they themselves confesse, that the place, with watchings, and the toyles of the way, had made them altogether vnable to resist.

The cloude vanisheth at the breake of day, and Mandelots scouters seeing them aduanced in the plaine, they gallop after to ingage them in the fight. Chastillon would haue charged them, but Gentil discouers the whole troupe, who had come time enough if they had fallen to blowes. They passe the plaine, and plant their foote-men by a riuers side, where through the fauour of some Willows, they might second their horse-men being in fight. His first enemies appeare: Chastillon chargeth them so resolutely, as there remained about 30. vpon the place: The whole troupe arriues and repulseth him so furiously, as he is put to rout, and loseth some of his men at arms, who were caried prisoners to Lyons. Gentil, Ouinville, Legualda, Rouffelle, Fereng, Baudans, and some other horse-men second the foote-men, whom the enemy prest, causing them to march on, and to turne head at euery streight and commodious place they came vnto. Night beeing come, Mandelot, who had followed them thirty houres together, went to refresh himselfe, giuing leysure to this tyred troupe to lament and bewaile the mischaunce of their Commander, whome they supposed to bee vterly lost.

He was in the like paine for his foot-men, who he thought had bene defeated: when as approaching neare vnto the mountaines of high Viarez, the Lord of Chastillon, S. Auban, Lieutenant of his Company of light horse, Captaine Escallier Lieutenant of the Collonnels Companie of his Regiment, Captaine Gache and some others, comming to ioyn with them, to saue these poore men from a generall ruine, and by their presence reuiue the vigour of these foote-men to indure with their accustomed courage three assaults, from diuers garrisons to the shame of them that charged them, before they could recouer Rou-tourton in high Viarez. Mandelot went to Court, to giue an account of his diligence, but hee receiued reproch both of the King and the Duke of Guise: for that hee had not charged Chastillon in that great village, or past the bridge at Percier before him, to haue defeated him in the plaine. The which did also bring him in disgrace with them of Lyons who neuer after loued him. The strangers thinke to refresh themselves at Geneva, but the most part were not able to get thither: and many of the Commanders, either with languishing and grieve, or as the common saying was, with the sweet Wines they drunke with the Duke of Espernon, gaue vp the ghost. The Duke of Bouillon died the 11. of Ianuarie, in the 25. year of his age, leauing Charlotte his sister for his heire, married since to the Vicount of Turenne, now Duke of Bouillon, and Marshall of France.

Another troupe of Reistres marched towards the French Conté: the Marquis of Pont, eldest sonne to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Guise, pursuing them (against the publike faith) vnto the mountaines of Saint Claude, enter the territories of Montbeliard and Hericourt, where by a lamentable reuenge vpon a poore innocent people, by the burning of two hundred Villages, by the forcing of many wiues and maides, and by the murdering of a great number of all ages, all sexes, and all qualities, they leaue the markes of the inhumanity, and the brutish furie of the League, and carrie the spoiles of their triumph into Lorraine.

All the chiefe of the League assemble at Nancy, where they resolute to make the last trial of their ambition. The season inuites them, mens humors are well affected. The Catho-likes consciences, freed from the furie of strangers, confesse themselves wonderfully bound 1588. to the Duke of Guise: the people extoll the victory of Auneau, and the dispersing of this great armie: the Nobility of the League lookes bigge, the Clergie reioyeth, the Preachers tongues are fire-brands of sedition, they speake in derision of the King in their Pulpits, (before time the Pulpits of truth,) are now become the Chaires of Iuglers: they make the King a Saul, and the Duke of Guise a Dauid, Saul slew his thousand, but Dauid his tennethousand.

They publish generally in their Sermons, that the King had leuied the Riestres, to oppose them against the Dukes holy enterprises, and to expose Paris as a Prey: but by the Dukes valour and constancie, religion had now triumphed ouer heresie. The Pope sends vnto the Duke a Sword grauen with flames. The King of Spaine, and the Duke of Sauoye, conceive great hopes. The Duke of Paris salutes him, and amongst all the Princes of Europe (saith hee) Henry of Lorraine alone deserues to commaund in warre. They make bone-fires in all places, and sing the wondrous workes of the Duke of Guise, to the Kings disgrace. The people of Paris especially (possessed with the praises of the house of Guise, and the disorders of the King, the dissolutenes, lechery and hypocrisie of the Court, vnder a shew of penance) leane to the party which they hold almost certaine: they disdain the present estate, apprehend what is to come, and thinke to loose nothing by the change.

Henry of Lorraine discouers all this, and thinke to make his profit of so goodly an opportunity. He knowes moreouer, that Ioubert and Miron haue giuen their opinion of the Kings disability to haue children. He makes himselfe more pleasing to the people, who feare the succession of a Huguenot Prince: he intertaines them with great familiarity, but with an humour aspiring vnto tyranny. He sees the maiestie of his Soueraigne disgraced, his enemies retired to Rochel. England ready to be invaded by a proud army from Spaine: he giues eare to the counsell of the Arch-leaguers, increased to the number of sixteene, by reason of the sixteene quarters of Paris. He is crafty, aduised, foreseeing, generous and valiant: but variable, corrupt, a dissembler, secret and patient. He will by no means vse his owne name in any thing, yet will he effect that by another which hee attempts or takes in hand. He aduertiseth the Cardinall of Bourbon (who goes but as he is led) that this goodly opportunity must not be lost. But the secrets of his heart were contrarie to his outward shewes.

This assembly at Nancy tended onely to force the King to make his Will, and to allowe the regencie vnto them: It was therefore concluded: That the King should be urged to ioyne his forces effectually with the League. To displace such from their Offices as should be named. To bring in the Inquisition of Spaine, and to publish the Councell of Trent, but with a moderation of such things as derogate from the priuiledges of the French Church. To consent to the restitution of the goods sold by the Clergie for the Charges of the warre. To giue them townes to be manned and fortified as the time and necessity required. To forfeit the Huguenots bodies and goods, and to entertaine an army vpon the frontiers of Lorraine, against the Germans, who threatened reuenge for the insolencies committed in the County of Montbelliard.

But to subiect the Kings authority to the desseignes and practises of the League, what was it, but by this meanes to aspire to the Crowne? To haue him ruine them he loued, and that were allied vnto him in bloud: what was it, but to make a bush of a Forest, and a desert of a goodly Kingdome? And this word of Inquisition, is it not hatefull vnto all men? It was necessarie for the Spaniards, who had no better meanes to plant and maintaine Christianity. But the tediousnesse and manner of their proceeding is horrible, the malice and calumny of their spies and informers abominable, their prisons vnder ground fearefull: their racks and tortures intolerable, the yellow gowne without sleeues painted all ouer with Duels, the Myrre, and Corde: and for the last act of this pitifull Tragedie, the fire had made it detestable to the Flemings, and execrable to the French. As for the reception of the Councell of Trent, the soueraigne Courts of this Realme haue neuer so aduised our Kings, for the preiudice they should doe vnto the Crowne, and the priuiledges of the French Church. To require redemption of the Clergie goods, and to haue the King force them that were beneficed to redeeme them, was it not to haue him make warre for the Church, and the Clergie should giue the alarme, and shadow themselves vnder the temporality, whilst that the Nobility should go to fight, and the people languish? The League had

The disposition of the duke of Guise.

A had obtained some townes of assurance, and the Parlements labored to put downe the Huguenots. To conclude, the King had not refused the chiefe of the League any demande that he might lawfully graunt, and had yeelded them many things which he might by his authority refuse.

B Besides the motions of the Kings apprehensions, the first beginning of his misery is, that almost all his counsellors of state are corrupted, they conceale the truth, they fit themselves to his humors, they are fearefull, weake and inconstant. Without doubt that Prince is miserable (saide an Emperour) from whom they conceale the truth. They perswade him, the Duke of Guises party is strong, that the Townes and Prouinces looke onely after him: if he enters not into it, he must be subiect both to League and Huguenots. Yet he meanes to be master ouer both, but he takes not the safest course. He becomes the head of the Guisards party, and talking of nothing but of the voyage of Poitou, thinke to winne the peoples loue, and to stoppe the murmuring of the League.

C The Prince of Condes death made the enterprise easie. A great debility of the stomacke, a difficulty of breathing, a great costiuenes, a continuall vomiting, with an alteration and extreame paine, surprised him the third of May, halfe an houre after supper, and the second day of his sicknesse, a suffocation of all his vitall spirites, sent him from the bedde vnto the graue. He was a Prince indued with all the qualities fit for a great Captaine, vnder whose magnanimity the Protestants conceiued great hopes. The bodie was opened, and the iudgment of Physitians was diuers. The bottome of his bellie was pale and burnt: his bowels ouerflowed with a reddish water: the stomacke about the orifice pierced through with a round hole, and the vitall parts being viceried, made some suspect poyson, others held that it was the remainder of the potion hee swallowed in the year 1572. which making an impression in the bowels, had by little & little weakened the stomacke, of the paine whereof, as also of his side, by reason of the blowe he receiued at the battaile of Contes with a Lance, he had complained many weekes before his death. The Colledge at Montpellier did subscribe to this last opinion.

In the meane time the King doth not greatly affect this enterprise against the Huguenots: hee desires to diuert the warre which the League would make immortall. But the Commander vnder whom he assembles his forces, makes him fall from a feuer to a frensie. They had long before made the Duke of Espernons aduancement odious to the people. The League made him the onely author of all disorder: but the succession to the office of Admirall, & the gouernment of Normandie, wherein the King had installed him since the death of the Duke of Ioyeuze, & their disdain for that he had crossed the Duke of Aumale in his enterprises vpon Boulogne, and other places in Picardie, shall soone discover the violences of an ambitious spirit, who thinks that the very heauens should giue him place.

The Duke of Guise findes, that the warre which he made against the Princeesse of Sedan, by Rosne his Lieutenent, did but blemish his new trophees. Shee had alreadie chased him from Douzy: shee had by the Lord of Nueil slaine seauen score of the most resolute of his troupes, almost as many hurt and drowned in flying, and two hundred led prisoners to Sedan. The consideration of an innocent pupill, makes this warre execrable, and makes them odious that attempt to take from another without any iust cause. The Parisiens faint, if he come not to confirme them. They call him: and he leauing Sedan and Iametz, thinks it is now high time that the King either yeeld or breake, and that now they must shew the effect of the Conclusion of Nancy.

F He comes to Soissons. The King is very iealous of this approach: and knowing the Parisiens humor and deuotion to the Duke, he sends him word by the Lord of Belieure (a man of great and sound iudgment, who for his great employments, both within and without the Realme, was then one of the chiefe of the Kings Councell, and lately the most worthy Chancellor of France) that he should doe him a pleasure, not to come to Paris in a time so full of troubles and factions. If he come against his will, he will lay vpon him the cause of all the miseries, which his presence shall breed. But to loose all, there is but one hazard: Pompey thinks, that striking the ground with his foote he shal raise vp an hundred Legions. He comes to Paris at noone the ninth of May, followed onely with eight gentlemen, not to amaze the King. He lights at the Queene-mothers lodging, and goes with her to do his dutie dutie vnto the King. The people follow him by troupes with great ioy: euery one blesteth A his comming, euery one makes new wishes. The Parisiens had long forgotten that ancient and chearefull salutation of, God saue the King. When they see him passe, they change it into God saue the Guise, God saue the pillar of the Church. A doting Gentlewoman sitting vpon a stall, puld downe her maske. Good Prince (saith she) seeing thou art come, wee are all saued. He makes his reuerence vnto the King: but not so assured as he was accustomed: hee layes open the causes of his comming, and iustifies his actions as well as hee could. Then seeing the King readie to dine, he retires to his lodging, and not one Courtier accompanied him as before. At dinner he growes more resolute. They meet both after dinner at the Queene-mothers lodging. The King full of ieaousie and feare: The Duke with a braue and resolute B countenance. The people attend the issue of this conference. The next day the Archbishop of Lyons (the chiefe pillar of the League) arriues: the Dukes friends and seruants enter: the 16. Tribunes of the Rebels and Conspirators bring and carry away sundry intelligences. To conclude, all now prepare to execute that whereof they sayled the last yeare. A notable error of State: for destroying the principall, the accessarie perissheth of himselfe. The King had sufficient forces to suppress these first insolencies. He had the names and surnames of his enemies: most of them were daunted with feare, with these long parles and goings from one to another: others did hide themselves: and some dreamed of nothing but of flight. The multitude is apt for tumults. A chearefull and resolute countenance of the King might easily haue dispersed this tempest. But in stead of confirming him, they make him more irre- C solute: they talke of nothing to him, but of the Dukes practises with the Parisiens, and that by his long delay he will be preuented. He meanes to anticipate the houre, and thinks it sufficient to terrifie them: for the effecting whereof, he commands the Marshall of Biron, to draw his guards of Suisses and French out of the Suburbs into the Cittie, and lodgeth them in diuers quarters, to feare the people, if they stirre. Le Gast with his company, held the little bridge neare to our Ladies Church. Grillon, Saint Michaels bridge: the Marshall d'Aumont mans our Ladies bridge with harguebuziers: the Suisses are diuided into diuers places, before the towne-house, in the new market-place, and at S. Innocents Church. But either through want of iudgement, or for want of men, they had forgotten the place Maubert. The people grow amazed: the chiefe of the League terrifie them with the apprehen- D sion of a spoile: they shut vp their shops. Their trafficke, tooles, pens and paper, are conuer- ted into halberds, pertuisans, harguebusses and swords. The scholars come from the Vniuersitie, and ioyning with some multitudes of the people, they ceaze vpon place Maubert: the neighbors arme, all the city is in combustion: some cry out for Barricado's, there is nothing but stopping of the waies: they flanke them, and man them, they make them from thirty paces to thirtie, euen to the Centinels of the Louure, they draw the chaines: no man passeth without the word, or a passe-port from the Colonels or quarter masters. The Earle of Brissac, Boss-Dauphin, Chamois, and other heads of the League, charge the Suisses, and kill some: the rest being terrified with this vnexpected turie of the people, without Commanders, without conduct, and without assurance of the Kings intention, choose rather to yeld E their pikes, then to charge them in this violent occasion. Without doubt a more manly courage and constant resolution had forced the Parisiens to fortifie themselves in the bot- tome of their cellars. Citties begin a mutinie boldly, but they execute it faintly, if they see any resistance, vsing still more words then deedes. The consideration of wife, children, and shop, do easily quail their first heate. S. Paul, (a simple Gentleman, but a chiefe man in this party) causeth the Kings Guards to retire with their hats in their hands, and their armes downe. They crie out generally against the Tyrant, against the Huguenots against the Poli- tickes. It fares with them in a manner as it did in former times with the English and Bour- guignons.

The Queene-mother had alwaies made her profit of the variety of FaCTIONS: shee is now F decciued, the Duke of Guise will not employ her in that he hath desseigned: shee takes her coach, and comes amazed to intreate the Duke to pacifie this tumult. Bellieure followes to the same end. But the Duke answered. These are wild buls broke loose, whom I cannot stay. So great a desseigne was not attempted to faint in the midst thereof. It was no longer time now to dissemble: the maske vncovered, and the foard sounded, they must goe on, and

A seaze vpon his person, without whose ruine their victory would be imperfect, for the effec- ting whereof ten or twelue thousand men were ready to enter by night at the new gate, to beset the Louure, and to shut vp all the passages. Foure Gentlemen familiar, with the Duke, aduertise the King hereof: yet can he hardly belecue it, but that the people will alwaies wil- lingly yeld to the Kings clemency. Yet his Councell desired to be out of Paris. They lay open before his Maiesty the generall reuolt, in the which Phillip the faire was forced to saue himselfe among the Templers: the party-coloured hooe of redde and sky-colour, where-with Charles Duke of Normandy, and afterwards King of France, the fift of that name, and furnished the wife, was hooded, to saue himselfe from the peoples insolency, dur- B ing the Captiuitie of King John his father in England: the reuolt of the Mailotins: the mutine of the Caboches: the crosses of Saint Andrew, the deposition of Salcedo, the ad- uertisements of the King of Nauarre, and the conspiracies of the last yeare, which now hath broken the bankes, and ouerflowed all.

His feare increaseth, yet he settles his countenance. It is reason (saith he) to prouide for these disorders, to assemble the Councell, and to giue all men contentment. And the better to disguise his intent, he sends backe the Queene-Mother vnto the Duke, to perswade him to come vnto the Louure, and to assure him, that hee shall returne with such satisfaction as he can desire. She intreats him in this vrgent necessity, to make knowne vnto the King, that he hath more will to preferue, then to ruine his Crowne, and to settle the Estate which C this mutiny hath wonderfully shaken. To intreat an enemy, is to shew that he feares him. The Duke seemes cold: he laies the motiues of these tumults vpon the people, to whose assis- tance he is drawne, more by the violence of necessity, then by his owne desire. It were a great indiscretion (sayd he) for me, to cast my selfe naked into a suspected place, at the mercy of my enemies. The King vnderstanding by his Mother, the Dukes obstinacy in his desseigne, resolues for the safety of his person. He goes from the Louure with a small traine, with a shew to walke in the Tuilleries, and from thence he goes to lodge at Trapes. I giue thee my curse (said he, turning at Chaliot towards Paris) disloyall and ingratefull City: a City which I haue alwaies honored with my continuall abroad, a City which I haue more D enriched then any of my predecessors. I will neuer enter within the compasse of thy walles, but by the ruine of a great and memorable breach. Cursed likewise be you all, for whose content I haue purchased the hatred of so many.

O Duke! thou hast drawne thy sword against thy Soueraigne: but God hath stayed thine arme from striking. It is a folly onely to terrifie him, who may finde meanes of reuenge. Many of his Faction blame him to haue erred in the maine poynt, wherein consisted the per- fection of his victory, by this attempt he hath blemished his reputation with all Princes. All Kings are bretheren, one royall blood summons an other, they haue an interest in this cause, they affect troublers of anothers Estate, but they cannot endure them in their owne. He therefore thought it good to send the Earle of Brisac vnto Sir Edward Stafford being then Ambassador for England, to informe him of the subiect of the Barricadoes, who came E accompanied with certaine gentlemen to visit the Ambassador in his Lodging, to offer him (amidst these populer insolencies) a safegard, intreating him not to bee amazed nor to retire him-selfe, vpon the assurance and protection of the Duke of Guise. The Amba- ssador answered, that if he had beene a priuat person in Paris, he would haue cast himselfe at the Duke of Guises feete, to thanke him most humbly for his courteous and kind offer, but being neere vnto the King for the seruice of the Queene his Mistris (who had a league of amity and friendship with the King) he neither could nor would receiue any safegard but from the King.

The Earle of Brisac told him, that the Duke of Guise was not come to Paris to attempt any thing against the king or his seruice: that he was only forced to defend himselfe, that ther F was a great conspiracy against him and the city of Paris: that the Towne-house and other places were full of gibbets, whereon the King had resolued to cause many of the city and others to be hanged. Wherefore the Duke of Guise intreated him to aduertise the Queene his Mistris of all these things, to the end the whole world might be informed. The Amba- ssador answered that he would easily belecue that he had spoken this vnto him. That great and bould enterprises remaine many times incommunicable in the bosomes of the themselves. But he would tel him freely, that what had past at Paris would be found strange, and of dangerous consequence by all the Princes of Christendome, who haue interest there in. That no cloake, how godly so euer, could make it allowable, being the duty of the subiect to continew constant in his due obedience to his Soueraigne. That if there were gibets prepared, men would easily belecue it, if the Duke of Guise will shew them: and admit it were so, it were an odious and intollerable thing for a subiect to seeke to hinder by force the iustice which his Soueraigne would doe by armes. That he promised him willingly that he would aduertise the Queene his Mistresse of all that he had said vnto him. But to be an interpreter of the Duke of Guise his conceptions, and of his parties, it did not belong vnto his charge, the Queene his mistresse being wiser then he, to belecue what she pleased. Then B the earle asked him if he had any armes: to whome the Ambassador answered, if you question with me as one that hath beene some-times a friend and familiar with Mounsr de Coffe your Vncle, it may be I would tell you, but being as I am you must pardon me: Your house will be presently leached said he, for they thinke you are armed, and it is to be feared yee wilbe forced. I haue two doores in my lodging replied the Ambassador, the which I will cause to bee shut and defend them as long as I may, to the end the world may know how vniuently the Law of armes is violated in my person. After which the Earle of Brisac said, I pray you tell me as a friend, haue you any armes? to whome the Ambassador answered, C seeing you aske me as a friend, I will tell you: if I were a priuat person here I would be armed, but being an Ambassador, I haue not any but the publike faith. I pray you said the Earle of Brisac cause your gates to be shut, I will not do it said the Ambassador, an Ambasadors house must be open to all commers, and goers: moreouer I am not in France to remaine still at Paris, but neere vnto the King where-so-euer he is. This discourse passed betwixt the Earle and the Ambassador of England, which I haue thought good to insert at large.

Without doubt the prouidence of GOD had prepared a strange Catastrophe for the Duke, for the King, and for his realme: who at this time, by his singular loue to this Crowne, did diuert the successe which they expected of this shamefull and reprochfull mu- D tiny. O Paris! King Charles the eight had in former times made the twelfth day of May famous, by the absolute conquest of the realme of Naples: and now thou deuiseest to haue this twelfth day noted with red letters, and hereafter to be celebrated, for that in the same day thou hast presented vpon the Theater of thy rebellions, a King dispossessed of the Capitall City of his realme. Nay rather what coale can sufficiently note to our posterity, this mournfull and vnfortunate day? What law of forgetfulness, may wipe out the remembrance of thy shame, ingratitude and treachery? what lotion can wash away the spots of thy pollution, filthinesse and villanies? what fire shall euer consume the memory of the rebellions, tyrannies and seditions, of this fatall and abominable League? O Barricadoes, you are the spring of those fouds, which shall for a time drowne this Estate: and the E instrument where-with that inscrutable wisdom would chastise, both the King and the Realme.

Fatall and curfed day of the Barricadoes, the birth day of our miseries, and the funerall day of our happinesse, which hath broken the bounds to those streames of bloud which haue drowned our fields; which hath made libertie captiue; truth criminall, rapine iust, and tyranny and inuasion lawfull: which hath puld a crowne from a Kings head, and the Lawes out of the heart of the realme, which hath armed a President to mutine the people of his quarter, which hath made cowards courragious to set vpon the Kings gard, which hath made the most wicked insolent and caused them of the League to triumph through the streets of Paris, as a perfect image of all villeny: which hath made the 16. Tribunes to publish that wretched rebellion and to qualifie it with the title of a iust defence against the King: aduer- F tising all the townes of their confederacy that God had preserued that holy and religious city from a great massaker, and from a fearefull sacke, that the Duke of Guise had prevented the counsell of the pollitikes, and especially of the Duke of Espernon, who had so posselt the Kings heart, as he had caused him to resolute to ruine the chiefe and most Catholike families of Paris, to suppress their liberties, and to depriue them of their religion, thinking

A thinking there was no better meanes to force obedience in a people, then to keepe them vnder and to depriue them of their wealth, the which made them insolent, mutinous and rebellious. The Duke of Guise at the beginning of this bold and insolent attempt, writes presently to his most trusty friends, to repaire speedily vnto him with armes and horses: but no baggage. I haue ouerthrowne the Swisses (said he to Entragues governor of Orleans) cut in peeces some part of the Kings gards, and hold the Louvre so straitly beset, as I will giue a good account of what is within it. This victory is so great, as it will be remembered for euer. But oh Duke! is it presumption that bandies thee against the rules of reason, or weaknesse which abates thy courage and resolution in suffering him to scape; who within few moneths shall heape B this thy victory vpon thy head, and by thy vtter confusion shall make it memorable for euer? Both the one and the other brings a sodaine repentance vnto man, and makes him wise too late. Thou seemest, oh Duke! to touch the heauens with thy forehead, and hell with thy foote: but learne, that our histories are full of the violent deaths of those proud spirits, who seeke their glory and profit with the ruine of their Country, the preiudice of states, and the subuersion of common peace. That great God which reuengeth the iniuries of Kings and people, laies publike ruines vpon them that doe them. The slaughter at Vassy kindled the fire of the first ciuill warres. So thy Father died, soone after the new troubles which followed. Euen so the like storme threatens thy ruine in the midst of thy violent passions.

Entragues had assembled the Nobility of the League at Baugency: but the foureteenth C of the moneth, he writes vnto them. Our great, could not execute his desseine, the King hauing sued himselfe within Chartres: I wish you to retire to your houses, as quietly as you may, making no show to haue scene any thing. And in the end: I am so amazed, as I know not what to doo.
I belecue him. Kings haue long hands, they catch a farre off, and their blowes are dangerous. So hereafter the King shall free himselfe from the leaguers party, but he shall be little the better. The Duke is no lesse troubled in mind; seeing the Sunne of the royall Maiesty eclipsed: he seemes grieved: rebukes the people, causeth outrages to cease, deli-uers the French companies their armes, and puts them out off the City, but at Saint An-thonies gate, quite contrary to the way which their Maister tooke. In such mutinies, no mind, (be it neuer so resolute) continues still constant in one Estate. The Duke of Guise
